But was the man a humbug? At every step Dud took by the fellow's side he wrestled with this question. 'No,' he thought. 'It's to judge him crudely to assume that if he's not a madman he must be a charlatan. These things are much more subtle than that.' And he began calling up all he'd heard of such personages as Simon Magus and Paracelsus and Eliphaz Levi and Cagliostro. 'They must all have gulled people over and over again without the least shame; but I can't imagine their not believing in their own power. I certainly prefer this notion of his that he's been some kind of demigod in the remote past to any spiritualistic tricks. Besides, after all, there may be a kind of truth in what he says! There may never have been an actual god, or man either, corresponding to Urien, but if from 1000 BC to 1000 AD those old bards told themselves stories about Urien, and worked themselves up into ecstasies over Urien, why shouldn't their fancies correspond to a certain tremendous cosmic power that really does incarnate itself now and again? I don't like it, and I don't like him, and I'd give every penny I've got for a convincing proof that he's not my father; but I can't take him as simply a liar, and I can't take him as simply a madman.'

'Oh, damn it, sir!' cried Dud in exasperation. 'I've heard wonders enough this afternoon without any ghost-wind! Besides, if anything, the wind has dropped. Look there! The grasses were stirring when we first got here, and they're absolutely still now.'

'All right, lad,' answered the Glymes man, in a voice so natural, so friendly, and so sensible, that No-man felt almost sympathetic towards him. 'We won't call it a ghost-wind. We'll just call it the wind getting up — as it usually does get up when I come to Mai-Dun. You won't feel it for a couple of minutes, nor will the grasses, but you'll see then.'

And sure enough he was right. Not in a couple of minutes, perhaps, but certainly in five minutes, No-man was aware of some sudden indefinable change. It was a vast universal shiver, a vibratory stir, a low faint indescribable tumult, a deep-throated humming in the purlieus of space. What it brought into Dud's mind was, first, the scriptural phrase 'a rushing mighty wind', and then a sense as of the beating of the wings of a vast host of invisible birds.

It pleased him that his mother's man took no credit for the coming true of his prediction. He did not even glance triumphantly at his son. All he did was to stand absolutely still, like a colossal rabbit who freezes at the approach of a pack of dogs. Before becoming immobile, however, he thrust his right hand deep into his trouser-pocket, and tried to do the same with his left, but in this he was prevented by the fact, as our friend had not failed to note, that he had already stuffed that aperture quite full with his cloth cap.

They were now at the extreme eastern end of Mai-Dun, the particular portion of the turf metropolis that most antiquaries regard as the oldest. Of this fact our friend, of course, was ignorant. Indeed, if it had not been that there was a marked difference in the contours of the trench where they had first entered it, Enoch Quirm might have led him round and round for hours without his being conscious of any north or south or east or west.

The wind that had got up, whatever its nature may have been, came straight from the direction of Chesil Beach; but such was the peculiar configuration of Mai-Dun that once within the circle of the place its course became arbitrary and wayward. Whether it would have been the same with any wind from that quarter, Dud knew not; but certainly this particular wind, as its force gradually increased, began to act in what seemed to him an eccentric manner. In place of leaping straight over the trench where they stood and streaming away across the centre of Maiden Castle, this wind seemed to descend bodily, just as if it were a compact and living entity, into their trench, and thence proceed to whirl round the whole circle, gathering speed as it went, and uttering long-drawn, gasping, spasmodic sighs.

Dud had always been something of a wind-worshipper, and he was preparing now to enjoy to the full the feeling of this cold, slippery, invisible being beating against his bony frame, when he became aware that his companion was muttering something. Whatever it was — probably Taliesin's chant to the wind — the strange elemental syllables were in singular harmony with the subhuman sounds that went sighing past them.

'This Old Welsh', he said to himself, 'must be the most primitive of all tongues. It sounds as if human inventions, human necessities, human thought even, barely entered into it — as if its rhythm were identical with the orchestration of the planet, whose only notes are the motions of air and water, and its only burden the ancient sorrow of the earth. What he's muttering now must be what the spirits of space must have heard, rising night by night, day by day, through millions of ages, from an earth that as yet knew no organic life.'

Something atavistic in No-man's nature was stirred to the depths as the two men stood there listening, the one in silence, the other muttering his incantations. 'It sounds', he thought, 'as if the whole round earth were strung with invisible harp-strings that responded to her rush through the ether.'

The men's position as they stood there certainly lent itself to the depth of our friend's impressions, for, though they were lifted up by the towering mass of this city of chalk and turf above the rondure of the planet, the fact that they stood at the bottom of that trench cut them off as completely as if they were below-deck in some voyaging ship of space.

It thus was brought about that Dud, the wind-lover, found he had never realized until now what a mystery it was, this creature that sweeps so tumultuously and with such a rushing sigh over the surface of the earth. He felt as if it were the Great Spirit itself, beating against the mass of inert matter. There, under their feet, was immobility, the immobility of what could never move of itself; and here, whirling over their heads, was the primordial impetus of all motion!

Such, however, was the obstinate egoism of Dud's nature that his impressions at this unusual moment soon settled down into a reviewing of his own personal predicament, and such was his irrational childishness that this reviewing took the form at first of a ridiculously trivial grievance against Wizzie.

'She kicked my stick under the bed,' he said to himself. 'She kicked my stick with her bare feet.' He was prepared for any revelation about Wizzie's obscure past. He was prepared to accept with philosophic calm the most shocking details of her life with Old Funky. But this kicking of his stick under the bed, and that she did it with her bare foot, seemed a grievance whose proportions could not be exaggerated.

Most people would have surmised that Dud had been brought up with some small sister of his own age with whom the eternal belligerency of childhood had led to perpetual physical contest. They would have taken for granted that it was the memory of some babyish biting and scratching that made it so terrible that she had done it with her bare foot. But our friend had, as a matter of fact, never been allowed to play with other infants, and, save for the few timid advances to the girl of the stick-house, all his early intercourse with the opposite sex had taken place in his imagination. A much wiser guess as to the cause of the triviality of Dud's grievance, and of the grotesque manner in which at this eventful moment the thought 'She kicked it with her bare foot' rose into an outrage worse than adultery, would have been that his long years of cerebral eroticism had so perverted his natural instincts that in all these things he was at once superhuman and subhuman, prepared to be oblivious where normal passion tends to grow homicidal, and prepared to make an issue of some infinitesimal clash between masculine and feminine nerves.

But each man's world is the whole world, and if Dud's grudge 'She kicked it with her bare foot' lacked objective proportion, so no doubt did Wizzie herself show a lack of intelligence in not confiding more fully to a mate prepared for anything.

And out of proportion though Dud's grievance was, he felt at this moment far too inspired by the Mai-Dun wind to submit tamely to any grievance against the girl. He thought to himself as he glanced at Urien, 'This self-indulgence of yours, my good man, in your wild fancies ought to be a warning to me. What I must do is to take life on its lowest level, gather my soul together, and stand what fate sends. And I won't change from holding fast to Wizz and bearing the burden!'

It gave him a curious satisfaction to use the word 'burden' in these colloquies with himself. He envisaged himself standing here on this planetary excrescence, lean and compact, stripped of all nonsense, even as the place itself was, and prepared to bear the burden. This had long been a favourite clue word of his. He had used it when the other boys laughed at him at the agricultural college. He had used it when he found Aaron's ways to the Woman from Wales hard to witness. He had used it when his mother's own aloofness to himself, with her eternal romances and fantastic embroideries, saddened and troubled him. He had used it when his desire for Mona was frozen by his nervousness in her presence. And above all he had used it when attacked by his morbid fear of physical pain.

He was doing what he called bearing the burden when he let his mind brood upon an aspect of physical pain that always horrified him: its power of feeding on its victim till, swollen by his blood, it becomes his alter ego, forcing him into an interior vacuum where all is insubstantial except the quivering umbilical cord that connects him with the pain-self. Broodings of this sort he had quickly to forget or life would have become intolerable, but there was always their mark on the wall of his mind, like the mark left when you take away a picture, and this mark was the sign-manual of the burden.

What he decided now as he stood in this darkened turf-shell of the encircling wind was that he would bring his whole life under this bearing the burden. He decided that he would force himself to talk sympathetically to the Glymes man about his identity with Urien, Lord of Illusion. He decided that he would betray no shrinking from him even though his senses revolted to a point of nausea from the mortuary smell of his skin.

Such were No-man's thoughts as he shifted his cudgel from his right hand to his left, the better to turn up his coat-collar, for he began to feel chilly; but he soon became conscious that this Mai-Dun wind was impaling him on the horns of a crisis quite as sharp as those of any bull-god. 'I must stop this business with Thuella,' he thought. 'I shan't breathe a word to Wizz about the Scummy Pond, but I must stop it!'

Chillier and chillier he grew under the growing force of the wind; and there came to be presented to him one of those searching glimpses into his intrinsic self that come so seldom to mortal men. 'I could never give up my life like old Claudius,' he said to himself; 'but I could struggle, like this man of mother's, after the secret. Not in his way, not by magic, of course — but I could drop the entire world and live for the spirit, as long as I was allowed my imaginative lusts!'

And it came over him what a blind plunge into reality it had been, this Dorchester life! Before he came here what he lived in was a sort of Nirvana of mystical sensuality; but these people of Glymes and Friary Lane — why, he felt as if they were all conspiring against him to draw him out of his quiescence. Did that mean that his quiescence was an evil thing? He couldn't believe it! But, evil or not, it was his life; and under the surface, under his dealings with all these people, it would have to go on. Nothing but death could stop it. And perhaps not even death. Perhaps it was this secret life of his that would help him to survive death! But that brought him back to those two women's graves. Had Mona, with her indifference to herself, become nothing, while his mother, with her absorption in herself, was still vividly alive? But what he lived for, though it wasn't a cause like Claudius's, wasn't exactly himself. It was himself in a certain relation to the cosmos.

Down at the bottom he knew he disliked all flesh and blood, not excluding his own. What he secretly longed for was to live for imaginative lust, for intellectual pleasure, and for the magic of the universe. He could have gone on enjoying his Mona-wraith, reading and writing eternal romances, walking forever over the downs, in perfect contentment to the end of his days. It was human beings that spoilt life for him. It was Glymes and Friary Lane. It was letters from Yeovil and lunches with Mr Cumber. 'I'm afraid of their eyes,' he thought to himself. 'That's the whole thing! Their eyes won't let me enjoy myself.'

But the wind seemed to be dividing him in half just now like a sharp sword. What he felt at this moment was beyond any moral struggle. He might make resolutions about not doing that with Thuella, but give up his secret Nature-worship in order to serve humanity like old Claudius — he couldn't do it! He wanted to live a life that hurt nobody. But why should he have Glymes thrust upon him, and the Horse-Head's troubles? Oh, that he might never have to meet another human eye! What he couldn't stand were all these terrifying conspiracies — so much more frightening than anything in Nature — that looked out of the human eye. 'I'd be all right', he thought, 'if I had Wizz absolutely alone.'

But what this wind was doing was dividing him like a sharp sword. Half of him was crying with a savage finality 'I! I! I! I!' while the other half was threatening to put a leash round the neck of this 'I' and turn it into an obedient servant of evolution, or Communism, or the will of God!

The colder Dud got in this Mai-Dun wind, the more savage grew the pleasure that he took in thinking of this leash with which he would drag himself here and there. 'If it's not my nature to have a cause like Claudius,' he said to himself, 'at least I'll hold Wizz against the ribs of my loneliness and make people realize the tragedy of girls like Mary!'

His brain began whirling from point to point in his secret life; but just as a tapering water-spout might carry various objects in its upward swirl, yet steadily diminish its mounting circumference, so his thoughts drew these points nearer and nearer to each other as they whirled up in their spiral ascent.

And after all, wasn't this wind only bringing to a climax a change that had already come over him? His nature, he told himself, had always been more abstracted than malevolent, and the lovers' quarrels he had had with Wizzie, since that All Souls' Day, had broken up his inhuman isolation.

'The truth is,' he thought, 'I have a shy, frightened, morbidly shrinking soul under my lean bones. There's nothing manly or masculine in my soul. It's the soul of a neurotic nun. I haven't the gall to stand up to a single human being. All my life I've dodged and shirked. That sweet fool Nance is attracted to what doesn't exist! What would she think if she knew that her warm touches make me shiver all over as if I was made of brittle glass? I expect Mother was really like that. I know she hated to be kissed. I expect that eternal embroidering was her escape from people. What a thing to be made of flesh and blood and to loathe flesh and blood!'

Our friend edged himself forward a little and tried to listen to the Glymes man's mutterings. 'Why don't you try to understand your son a little?' he apostrophized his parent. 'One live son is better than many dead gods.'

'What is your idea', he suddenly cried out, raising his voice, 'of the difference between good and evil?' His question was carried by the wind as it swept over tussocks of grasses, over hoof-marks of horses, over windings of sheep-tracks. It was carried sighing and swishing over the heads of daisies; it was carried sobbing and soughing between the stalks of last year's thistles; it was carried sliding and slithering along narrow rabbit-runs; it was carried with faint elfin screams through the curves of snail-shells; it made sorties from mole-hill to mole-hill; it whistled over the thresholds of shrew-mice.

But his father's answer was harsh and discordant. 'What's that, lad? What's that? What's that? What's that?' And the man began turning these harmless monosyllables into incoherent croaks such as might have proceeded from that crow sign in his hairy chest.

'Never mind now,' muttered our friend. 'I won't bother you now.' And he thought to himself, 'How bitterly alone we are when it comes to taking stock of our essential life! What was I thinking of just then, when I blurted that out? Oh, Thuella, of course! No, I must take that damned nerve between Thuella and me, and cut it clean through — cut it with a knife! It must be Wizz alone. I can't hold Wizz against my ribs and do that with Thuella.'

The wind had turned so cold by this time that Dud shivered. ‘Come on, sir!’ he burst out. ‘Let’s go! I’ve had enough of this.’

His father gave him an angry look and shrugged his shoulders. ‘You’ve broken it with your cursed questions’, he muttered. ‘Come on, then. Never mind the circle! We’ll go back by Monkton and the Weymouth road.’

They clambered up the opposite bank, descended into a parallel trench, mounted thence to the crest of a second ridge, down again into another grassy channel, up once more to yet another turf rampart, and then down at last into the umbrageous valley below.

Dud remembered afterwards how vividly every detail of the way stood out before him as he came down the slope by his father’s side. There was a dead rabbit in the path, in the last stage of its decomposition, and he had to force himself to do what he always did with dead things — to make the sign of the cross over it and to place it carefully in the ditch. As he stooped down for this pious act, Nature, as if unsympathetic to such proceedings, brought it about that his gorge rose to a pitch of actual retching, so that although the rabbit got its obsequies — such as they were — he himself was denied any sort of ritualistic satisfaction.

‘No, no,’ he said to himself. ‘I’m going to try more than ever to make Mary Channing a book that shall — and I’m going to stop doing that with Thuella! I’m not going to care what’s in the Yeovil letter. But I haven’t come out of my Mona-wraith world to be caught by your manias, old Topknot. There I’m hard as a rock. But oh deary I! Damn all these people. Why can’t I be left alone in peace with Wizzie? D. No-man and his girl... D. No-man and his girl... D. No-man and his—’

His thoughts were interrupted by a peevish and fretful grumbling from his companion, and he noticed that his father now began to manifest the same sort of symptoms of nervous exhaustion that a priest who on an empty stomach has been chanting a long and complicated mass might display on his way back to breakfast. He asked for a cigarette, cursed irritably when the wind extinguished his first two matches, fussed with his sweater, which seemed to have gathered itself into unconscionable folds round his hips, kept searching about under his trousers for the tape on one side of his drawers which had escaped from his braces, fumbled at one of the buttons of his coat which kept slipping out of its button-hole, and at intervals pressed the front of his wrist against his eye-sockets as if his eye-balls hurt him.

He grumbled more than our friend thought necessary about their inability to open a gate into the lane above Monkton, and seemed to find the effort of clambering over it almost beyond his strength. To some remark of No-man's about the peacefulness of the little churchyard he broke out crossly against the way the enclosure had been mown. He even displayed annoyance at the manner in which Dud hung back to get a final view of Mai-Dun between the trees. 'We'll be catching our death in this damned wind', he muttered, 'if you keep stopping like that!'

All this would naturally have amused and perhaps even gratified our friend as signs of a pleasant human weakness in the man, if he himself had not been so wrought up by his experiences on the hill that he had lost all power of humorous observation. He tried to put his father out of his mind and gave himself up to the sweetly dolorous motions of the wind in these freshly green elm-branches.

A feeling began to take possession of him that he had known before, but never quite as intensely as at this moment, as though all the long generations of men who had listened to this mysterious sound had left behind them some abiding residue of their deepest underthoughts, thoughts full of dark rain-swept vistas, sweet and tender and infinitely sad, and yet with a strange hope in them too, a hope that went drifting down mossy alleys and away over primrose-sheltering banks and sedgy streams towards cool dark retreats of the fevered spirit, far from human lives, but gathering up all the mortal pity, purged and muted and transformed, of what it had left behind. ‘I must carry the soul of Mary Channing with me into this green dimness,’ he thought. ‘That’s what I must do in my book! I must collect the shreds and patches of her poor substance that were dissolved among the elements, and comfort them in some way, and give them pardon and peace. I must wash every memory of our accurst justice from them and bathe them in this healing greenness. Perhaps the only after-life we shall get is a gradual dissolving of our identity among the memories of all we have enjoyed most.’

All the way back to the town, as he walked by the side of his silent parent along the Weymouth road, this posthumous restitution of Mary Channing obsessed his mind. In some wild fantastic manner he linked the dead woman’s personality with Wizzie’s, linked her poisoned husband with Old Funky, linked himself with the dim figure of the equivocal gallant for whom she killed him. ‘I believe if I hadn’t got Wizzie,’ he thought, ‘I’d be taking Mary’s ghost home with me to my room — not as a substitute for Mona, though, but as...’

But even the Mai-Dun wind lacked the power to inspire our friend with any role really appropriate to this ill-used shade. But he fell into a deep consideration, as they moved on towards the cemetery and the Amphitheatre, with the spire of All Saints’ already appearing in shortened perspective behind the brewery chimney, as to the manner in which he would make his Mary a veritable symbol of all the women whose love of love, and love of pleasure, and loathing of married slavery, had made them victims of a morality based upon property. ‘I’ll make her so pitiful,’ he thought, ‘and I’ll describe her judges and her husband and the cruelty of those onlookers so piercingly, that I’ll burn this crime into the bones of Wessex. I’ll do what they did to her, only the other way round!’

But from Mary his excited mind soon came swinging back to his own affairs. ‘What will there be’, he thought, ‘in that Yeovil letter? Well! I’m ready, whatever it is!’

And then, as they drew near the cemetery and he decided that nothing would induce him to enter that place in company with his mother’s man, he thought how, if he were writing a story about himself, he would make All Souls’ Day this last autumn appear like a new birth, the birth of a middle-aged man over forty into normal human life. ‘The truth is,’ he thought, ‘what I have to struggle like the devil to be is what normal men are already by the nature of things. And yet I would not change with any of them! I’ll still be myself: but I’ll be myself entering their life.’

They were opposite the cemetery now, and our friend took good care to look the other way, and to think the other way too, lest some telepathic wave of consciousness should set Urien upon entering the death-enclosure.

But what was this? Yes, there was some kind of circus — and it looked to his eyes most startlingly familiar — being put up in the Fairfield! ‘I expect it’s a different one, though,’ he said to himself. ‘There must be endless ones on the road.’

And then the thought came to him: ‘But I’m certain Wizz told me none of them went their rounds till the summer. What the devil is this, then?’

Urien made no sign of any sort as they passed the cemetery, and Dud didn’t dare to take off his cap. ‘But what would you think, Mother,’ he said to himself, ‘if you saw us passing you without a word?’

It was a relief when they began to skirt the iron railings by the Amphitheatre; and Dud tried hard to put both cemetery and circus out of his mind and to concentrate on Mary’s execution. He had picked up some ghastly details from various traditional accounts of this event, but upon these he refused to let his mind dwell.

‘That’s one thing I learnt from old Aaron,’ he said to himself. ‘Aye! how I remember the way he looked on his knees at prayers when he used to say, “And keep us all, dear merciful God, from thinking of cruel things, lest our thoughts carry food to the devils.”’

When they came past the railway station our friend remembered how he had decided during his first encounter with Wizzie not to have any scruple about making love to Thuella. ‘Well, I’ve got plenty of scruple now,’ he thought, with a wry grimace.

But here were the South Walks; and presently the familiar cenotaph hove in sight. ‘How like a figure in Hardy’, he said to himself, ‘poor Nance looked that day staggering against those rails! It’s funny how I began my life in Dorchester just as the Mayor began his, only Trenchard sold his woman and I bought mine!’

‘You won’t mind if I don’t come with you further than the Hangman’s Cottage?’ he remarked to his companion. ‘It’s a quarter to five, I see, and I promised to be at Friary Lane at five.’

Urien surveyed the big clock on its sixteenth century façade, and nodded amiably. ‘Don’t bother yourself, lad! Further or no further, ’tis all the same. But I’m right glad you came up there with me.’

By a mutual instinct to avoid the crowds on South Street the two tall men crossed over by the entrance to Bowling Alley Walk and proceeded up Trinity Street. This particular thoroughfare — for when he wanted to take a walk through Came or Herringston he generally started by way of Acland Road or the Icen Way — was less familiar to him than the other Dorchester streets. The fresh interest he took in it now as they advanced made him think how completely he'd taken all that old life of his for granted, and all the people in it for granted! Though he was a man of thirty when the three of them died, it was as if he had been a boy of thirteen. It was through the thick mist of an absolutely secretive imagination that he saw his mother perpetually embroidering, his pseudo-father perpetually praying and gardening, and Mona managing them all like an angel from Heaven.

But how different life was since he had lived in Dorchester! The old Roman town must have had in its possession some ancient classic cement of actuality that had the power of making the real doubly real! Nothing but his imagination had been really real to him before he came to Dorchester; but how palpable Wizzie was, and how terribly alive Thuella was! Claudius and the troubled Horse-Head, too, were no mean wedges of this new verity; and as for the warm touch of Nance...

But the Glymes man and he were in High West Street now, and he became aware that it was Mr Quirm's intention to go down Glyde Path Road to the Hangman's Cottage. Into this romantic by-way Dud therefore escorted his companion, and he soon recognized that this road was, like Trinity Street, almost new to him. This was proved by the fact that it was left to Mr Quirm to call his attention to a curious water-spout or gargoyle head that had been placed above the old brick entrance to what looked to our friend like a Quaker meeting-house. He had come upon a mention of this head in Hardy's book, but apparently it occupied in poor Trenchard's time a different position from what it did now. In the overcast afternoon light of this spring day the stone face, as the two men paused to gaze up at it, wore a most ambiguous expression.

'Well? What about it, lad? What about it?' chuckled the Glymes man grimly.

‘I don’t — know — what — to think,’ hesitated the son. ‘Doesn’t it look — rather — as if — as if it hid some terrible world-joke behind that skull, some joke that nothing could—’

His father gave him a most sardonic glance from under his eyebrows. ‘Joke, do you say? He’s grinning at his own mental pain — that’s what he’s grinning at. He’s the face in God’s backside — that’s what he is. You’ve got to walk round your precious world, my lad, and see the other side, before you can talk about his little joke. It’s a joke all right, but it’s a deep one! It’s the deepest, my good boy. He’s the original Momus, lad, that’s what he is: the face that peeped out of God’s backside when He found His creation “good”.’

Dud struck his oak cudgel on the stones of Glyde Path Road and moved on. He detected, without being able to define it, an emanation of something so sinister from the man at that moment that it suggested things far worse than any blasphemy. He received an uneasy impression that Mr Quirm would have exactly that same grimace on his own majestic physiognomy when he came to die.

‘But if so,’ he thought, ‘if this whole Urien game of his is a devilish joke, why can’t someone make him stop it, and set him off on a different track?’

They were soon descending the steep slope between the high walls that leads to the Hangman’s Cottage. ‘It must have been up this hill’, Dud said to himself, ‘that the executioner came when he met the sheriffs officers taking Mary to her death. Oh, damn them! Damn them! But you wait — you wait. That Momus grin is not the last word!’

At the Hangman’s Cottage they separated, the father following the track towards Frome House, the son the path underneath the slope leading up to the prison.

Our friend was dismayed, as he approached the coal-yard, to catch the familiar voice of Claudius raised in violent altercation with someone. 'Is he quarrelling with the boss?' he wondered. But when he reached the yard — and it was clear that the quarrel must have been a vociferous one, for every goose, duck, and fowl had cleared off in terror — he found it was with young Dunbar Wye that the row was taking place.

Dumbell happened at that instant to be rallying the candidate for Communistic virtue for his inability to deal with his sister Jenny. 'That's what comes', the young man was saying, 'of taking women from their place in the kitchen and letting them meddle with men's affairs!'

Both the controversialists now recognized Dud and gave him casual nods; but it was clear to our friend that his presence rather intensified than diminished the ardour of their dispute.

'And what are you doing now?' jeered the irrepressible Dumbell. 'What have you come to as a result of all this doctrinaire internationalism? You've come to shovelling coal! Jenny's quite right to quarrel with you. This nonsense always leads to something unnatural. Its whole basis is unnatural; and it can only be imposed on healthy-minded people by brute force and blind—'

'What?' shouted Claudius, his face looking almost purple under its smears of coal-dust. 'What's that word you used then? Has there ever been in history such blind tyranny as the tyranny of Fascism? The things that go on in those—'

'But that's natural,' shrieked Dumbell. 'Can't you see it? That's natural compared with your monstrous and hideous logic! It's healthy and natural. It's the Nature-born force of a great man, of a born leader, of a real Caesar of the popular will. It's the heroic force that's genuine and righteous, that has blood behind it, real red blood, without which, and without the shedding of which, nothing good can come. Fascism's a return to Nature, to the genius and honesty of Nature, after the gibble-gabble of parliaments, the poppycock of vote-seekers, and the unreality of logic. Our faith's a real faith, with traditional human feeling behind it! Our leader's a real leader, with the laws of Nature behind him! Our severity's a real severity of the roused-up blood of the race itself, which at all costs must keep its historic —'

'Past!' interrupted Claudius, hoarse with indignation. 'Its natural Palaeolithic past! We, I am thankful to say, are concerned with the future! It's the future we're creating. Of course we appear to you unnatural. That's how all evolutionary progress appears, to the woodenheads and mudheads, of that which has to be changed! And as to what you said just now about women, I'd sooner, my dear Dunbar, never see...'

But Dud, who, unlike Dante, derived no pleasure from cruel and shameful backbiting, lifted his cudgel in a sort of deprecatory apology for having to go on, and hurried off towards the bridge by the White Hart.

It was already chiming a quarter past five from the clock above the Corn-Exchange when our friend, with the Yeovil letter still unopened in his pocket, reached Mrs Dearth's house in Friary Lane.

As a rule, when he came to this house, he found the front door unlocked, but this afternoon, when he tried the handle, the door refused to open. He hesitated whether to step back into the street and call up to Wizzie's window, but there were people about, and he had no idea of Wizzie's mood, so he decided to knock and wait for Jenny to open to him.

While he waited, his mind reverted to the dialogue he had overheard between Claudius and Dumbell. 'Evolution against reaction,' he thought; 'but after all, this struggle between Communism and Caesarism is the whole thing today. Cumber said he was an old-fashioned Liberal, and I suppose

I’m an old-fashioned individualist, but when I listen to those two and see how desperately they believe in themselves, I feel as if old Cumber and I were completely out of it.’

He knocked again at the door, this time with the handle of his cudgel.

Once more, as he stood there waiting, his mind played round the dispute in the coal-yard. ‘You’re outside all this, you old devil!’ he said to himself, thinking of the hairy chest of the Glymes man. ‘I suppose your idea is that in two thousand years the mental pain of the world will be beating at the mystery just as it did two thousand years ago, whereas Communism and Fascism will both have been supplanted by some kind of anarchistic system.’

But though it gave Dud a certain sardonic pleasure to think of Mr Quirm’s manias as more lasting than the absorbing catchwords of the day, he did experience a vague uncomfortable feeling that both himself with his Mary Channing and his father with his chthonian conjuring tricks were outside the real pressure of life.

But Jenny Dearth opened to him now, and he saw at once that something had gone wrong. She led him into the kitchen without a word and closed the door upon them.

‘Nance is up there with her,’ she said. ‘Oh, no! She’s all right.’ And then, after looking at him for a moment without a word, but with nothing but anger and contempt in her face, she announced in a low bitter tone, ‘And he’s started writing letters to me. That must be one of your ideas!’

Dud began blurting out some awkward pleasantry about Mr Cumber’s party, but he soon broke off in confusion, for the woman’s face was dark with emotion.

‘Good Lord!’ he thought. ‘She must have sent Dumbell down there on purpose. Those letters must have maddened her. I wish she’d tell me what he said.’

‘Don’t stand gaping at me like a sanctified ninny!’ cried Mrs Dearth. ‘You stare too much. All you can do in life is to stare.’

Dud nervously collapsed on a seat by the window. He thought to himself, ‘Is this the dark pain the Glymes man talks of, that unlocks the secret of life?’

He looked vaguely round for a place to prop up his stick; but afraid lest it should fall with an inappropriate clatter on Jenny’s stone floor, he laid it down humbly at his feet.

‘What right have you’, Mrs Dearth cried — and he noticed that the effect of anger on her face was to make it much more human: it lost its equine nobility and became at the same time meaner and handsomer— ‘to meddle with my affairs? Look to your own, you idiot! They’re not what you think they are. Nothing’s like what you think it is in your great rum-a-drum wooden head! He says in one of his letters that you think I’m hard on him. I hard on him! I, who’ve done more for him than anyone in the world — far more than his own mother!’

No-man shuffled uneasily in his seat. He did not dare to meet her eyes for fear of exciting her still more, and he did not dare to look at the door for fear she would see he’d heard the steps of someone coming down. He looked at his two hands, which were spread out palm-downwards on his separate knees. These hands of his looked so gaunt and so harmless as they lay there that it made him feel indignant with all these people for not just accepting him as a simple well-meaning honest man who only wanted to be alone.

‘And what’s this between you and Nance Quirm?’ Mrs Dearth went on. ‘She’s been hanging about here waiting for you and her husband all the afternoon, and she never waits for Urien. She’s upstairs now with Wizzie. I got weary of her talk — all about what you’ve done for Urien. Have you started meddling with their affairs too? Oh, you’ve got round Nance, sure and proper, with your sympathetic starings! She thinks you’re a saint. She thinks you’re the only man she knows with a really noble heart! You with a noble heart! You who don’t know what natural human feeling is!’ She gasped and choked in her emotion, and came a step nearer him. ‘Aren’t you satisfied, then, with what you’ve done to your own, that you’re playing your games with Nance? I suppose you’ve told her to talk to Wizzie, just as you told him you’d talk to me! Oh, you’re a sly one, with your roundabout ways and staring eyes! You’ve turned Nance’s head with your dear sympathy, that’s what you’ve done, and that’s what you wanted to do! Oh, you’re the one to give Enoch a lift, to help a fellow-writer with the Cumbers, and meanwhile steal away his wife’s heart!’

Could our friend have stared just then at his own visage in a mirror, he would have noticed that it had its mouth open and that a tiny dribble of saliva was descending its chin. This idiotic expression of his, combined with an unruffled air of martyred helplessness that seemed to be murmuring ‘Hit me! Hit me!’, was evidently, of all human attitudes, the one most calculated to drive the Friary Lane lady to distraction.

‘Old Claudius’, he found time to think, ‘must have said every wrong thing that it’s possible to say to a woman in love. He must have enlarged on aqueducts, he must have dragged in Marx, he must have appealed to reason, he must have talked about forgiveness, till he had thrown so much straw on the fire that when it did begin to burn...’

‘You thought only of your own selfish sensations when you first brought Wizzie here,’ was what he now heard Jenny say. ‘It was nothing to you that you took her life away from her — yes! her life! Nothing to you that you broke up her career and spoilt her natural self-expression forever. You and him and all of you are the same. He has his selfish theories, and you have your selfish books, and as long as you can hoist a woman up into your own romantic fancies you think you’ve done all that’s necessary. That’s to be our whole life, just pleasant adjuncts to your careers — here when we’re wanted, there when we’re not wanted — and all the time — you mark my words — Wizzie’s far more of a genius at her job than you’ll ever be at yours! And you keep her here as your plaything, idle and useless! You’re too selfish, or too depraved, even to give her a child. You take a girl who’s an artist in the most difficult of all arts. I suppose she’s never told you how early she had to begin, or what she had to go through, to become what she is? You get round her by your damned sympathy and your romantic talk, and then go and keep her shut up like a common tart — yes! like a common tart, for your lazy-dazy lust! You don’t even try to get her a house of her own. Oh, no! you can’t afford that! The truth is you don’t want her in your real life, which goes on in that precious attic of yours above the churchwarden’s shop. You want her here, all fresh and prettified, for your off-time entertainment! Is that a life for a spirited girl who might be earning money at any hippodrome in the kingdom? The truth is, my good staring friend, you don’t know what real feeling is!

‘And what makes it worse is your conceit, and the grand opinion you’ve got of yourself! Oh, you’re the noble one, you’re the one who’ll set everybody right. And now you’ve gone and got round Nance. It was him in the coal-yard, no doubt, who told you Enoch was a wife-beater. Oh, you’re a pretty pair, you two! As if we all didn't know she can twist that great idiot round her little finger!

'But you and he down there must be interfering! Nance must be saved from her wicked husband; and who must undertake this tender task but you, the sympathetic, staring you! That's the whole thing, my good man.'

But Dud, who had by this time managed to shut his mouth and even to wipe away with the back of his hand the spittle from his chin, noted that the introduction of Nance into her diatribe had acted like a lightning-conductor and drawn off a good portion of her electric anger from its more dangerous concentration upon Claudius. 'If I can keep her on Nance,' he thought, 'she'll soon be all right.'

'Yes, I confess I have got rather fond of Mrs Quirm,' he murmured craftily.

'You see?' she cried, falling at once into Dud's simple trap. 'It's your conceit that makes you act as you do. You'll never be any good in the world or any help to anyone till you've got rid of your conceit! I know you through and through, and what's wrong with you is simply conceit. You're a monster of conceit!'

Dud was quick to recognize the fact that this attack on his intelligence rather than his heart was a sign the Horse-Head was softening; and he hurriedly picked up his stick. Holding this great club in his hand, he could not help pondering on the changes already produced by Claudius's darling evolution.

'It's doubtful', he thought, 'whether any of the men of old time, except perhaps a few mediaeval knights, would sit as quiet as I'm sitting here now with this Cerne Giant stick on my lap, listening to the Horse-Head putting me in my place!'

‘Yes, it’s your conceit,’ she added, her face by this time wearing an almost indulgent expression. ‘You think you’re ever so much nobler than Wizzie because she lets herself go and you never do. You think you’re behaving like I don’t know what because you don’t let yourself go with her when her nerves are bad, whereas of course a really sympathetic man wouldn’t be able to rest till he’d found out why she was like that, so that he could remove the cause.’

Dud gave a deep sigh of relief and thrust his hand into his pocket to make sure he had the Yeovil letter. The immediate effect upon him of Jenny’s outburst was to accentuate his usual animal-like passivity. Not that he had totally forgotten the spiritual illumination of Mai-Dun, but so far it had only penetrated the rational surface of his consciousness. A flicker of it did, as a matter of fact, come back to him even now, but so far it only enabled him to give a quick ironic inward glance at the fatal inevitableness of his idiotic docility: it did not give him the power to adopt any other method of retort!

His thrusting his fingers into his pocket, however, and their consequent contact with the Yeovil letter, caused him to wonder whether Jenny Dearth knew more than he did of the relations between Wizzie and those circus people. But she couldn’t, surely, have spoken in that tone if she had! The more she knew of those people, the more she must realize what a good turn he had done Wizzie by rescuing her. She talked of the cause of Wizzie’s nervous irritability. The cause of it was in his pocket now: her mysterious fear of Old Funky and Mummy Urgan!

He looked at Mrs Dearth closely. The woman’s anger was gone. But though her face was no longer handsome and human, it was not quite itself.

‘Well, up you go to Wizzie,’ she said. ‘Tell her I’ll bring the tray in a few minutes!’

He got up obediently. ‘I’m sorry, Jenny,’ he said, speaking in rather a high-pitched tone, and with a sort of airy emphasis of impressive candour. ‘I’m sorry if I didn’t do any good by my meddling, as you call it. Perhaps if everyone treated my ways as drastically as you do I would begin to change. Perhaps anyhow I’ll begin to change! I give you my word of honour I’ve thought of it. Something must change — I can see that. There must be some sort of a “primum mobile”, and some sort of a Prime Mover, or there wouldn’t be any—’ He was going to say ‘evolution’, but he knew Jenny would take that as a piece of malice, so he said ‘progress’ instead, and leaving this brisk word behind him, like a puff of gun-smoke, in Mrs Dearth’s kitchen, he nodded his farewell to her and went out into the entrance-hall.

It was lucky that in doing this he shut the kitchen door behind him, for to his surprise — though not to his very great surprise — he found Nancy Quirm standing in the front entrance, apparently watching something in the street.

She turned when he came out, and in his heart he thought at once, ‘She’s been listening!’ But Mrs Quirm beckoned him to join her at the front door.

‘What is it?’ he asked, for all he could himself catch from the street was that familiar ‘Ech–o! Ech–o!’ of the local newspaper’s distribution. This cry of ‘Ech–o!’ always made him think of making love to Wizzie, for it was usually to be heard about six o’clock when they were lingering over their tea together in their upper room.

‘It’s the Funny Man!’ Mrs Quirm cried eagerly. ‘There he is! There, don’t you see him, Mr No-man? He’s talking to those boys over there!’

Our friend followed her gaze and responded to her excitement with an alacrity of interest he was far from feeling. The person she called the Funny Man was indeed one of the sights of Dorchester. He really was a quite authentic Momus, and in his present occupation as town-crier for the Tenth Muse he lent himself, with his quips and cranks and wanton wiles in a manner almost Elizabethan, to the old-world liveliness of the town.

If Dud could never help thinking of making love to Wizzie when he heard 'Ech–o! Ech–o!', he found that it was almost always when he was deepest sunk in this book that the accents of the Funny Man reached him. Mary Channing's waverings between a life of her own and obedience to the grinding selfishness of parents and husband gained in their human subtlety by being attuned to the Funny Man's Shakespearean fooleries as they drifted down High East Street.

'Yes! I can see him; and I can hear him too. How wonderfully he does it. It must be quite a good performance, this piece he's talking about!'

As soon as he had uttered these hopeful words and glanced into her face he knew she must have been listening to their talk, for she accepted his forced geniality at its face value, whereas under normal conditions she would have caught him up and protested with lively vehemence. Had she heard all? Had she heard Jenny accuse him of meddling between husband and wife? 'I bet she did,' he said to himself, noticing, with nervous relief but with mental suspicion, that she didn't cling to his sleeve in her usual impulsive way.

But it was his destiny to receive a greater shock to his nerves than any touch of his Cemetery Woman's warm fingers.

'Come in here for a second, Mr No-Man,' she whispered, opening the dining-room door and entering the room.

She turned her head as she preceded him, and threw him a look which she evidently felt to be the look of a reckless courtesan. 'Jenny'll be five minutes at least,' she whispered. 'I know she hasn't spread the bread and butter yet.'

As soon as the door was shut on them he knew that his Cemetary Woman was in a fever of emotion. ‘Come over here and sit down,’ she murmured. ‘She’s spreading the bread and butter, I tell you, and Wizzie’s tidying up her room for tea. There’s — no — chance — of anybody’s — coming — no — chance — of anybody’s coming — no chance — of anybody’s... ‘ And in her excitement she actually repeated these words in a sort of infantile chant.

She pushed him down into the arm-chair that had always been Claudius’s, and with a look in her eyes that Dud had never seen before in any woman’s eyes she perched herself on the chair’s arm.

Our friend’s thoughts became like the darting wings of a flock of swifts. ‘She doesn’t know that my soul’s as brittle as glass and as cold as an icicle! She doesn’t know that under her hot hand and heavy cowslip breath I feel as light and frail and feathery as hoar-frost! She’s no more idea what a person like me really feels than she has of the feelings of the Loch Ness Monster!’

And while he felt the hot magnetism of her senses rock him on its waves like a baby in a cradle, he thought how unemotional, how coldly vicious, how entirely imaginative, his own sensual feelings were. ‘Why,’ he thought, ‘I can’t even enjoy playing with Wizzie without reminding myself that I bought her for eighteen pounds! What I’m made for is quiet, cold-blooded lust. This hot passion’s horrible to me!’

‘I — couldn’t — wait — to — tell — you — any — longer,’ she gasped in a queer husky voice, a voice quite different from her usual sweet rich tones; and he noticed that as she spoke she made a feverish rocking movement on the chair arm, just as if her whole body burned with such passion that the mere pressure of the woodwork was a relief.

‘You — don’t — mind — do — you — if I touch — your hand? — It’ll make it easier — to tell you.’

No-man had already raised his arm and rested his hand on the curve of the soft limb that was nearest to him, across which her skirt was tightly drawn, and, when her fingers closed over his, his nervous shrinking became so acute that he gripped her with the talons of a vulture.

‘I heard,’ she whispered feverishly, leaning forward and pressing her shoulder against his. ‘I heard what Jenny said about you and me. I knew it was in her mind. I knew she’s been thinking of nothing but you and me ever since you first came to Glymes.’

Now that the first shock of the situation had ceased to startle him Dud became so detached that his thoughts wandered away altogether from the excited woman. They reverted again to the difference between Urien’s mania for reaching the cosmic secret and the argument between Dumbell and Claudius about the past and the future.

‘Do you know’, Mrs Quirm continued, ‘what Jenny’s made up her mind about? That you and I are lovers! Can you imagine such silliness? Yes, she’s certain it began soon after you first came.’ As Mrs Quirm uttered these words she actually touched No-man’s chin with the extreme tip of one of her hot fingers.

Our friend bit his lip and stared into the empty grate, which was still shining with the vigorous blacking Jenny had given it that morning, but into which, not content with this, she had put a small pot of yellow musk.

‘Of course I know we’re nothing of the sort,’ Nancy went on, dropping the hand she had raised, ‘but it’s amusing, isn’t it, what people will say? What I wished you’d say to Jenny was that I’d been your mistress from the first day we met, from that first All Souls’ Day, No-man!’

It gave our friend a very odd sensation to hear his name, a name he had selected for its gaunt and grim taciturnity, used in a manner like this, as if it were a synonym for ‘sweet chuck’.

'But — my dear — you weren't!' murmured our friend calmly. He was, as a matter of fact, a good deal less agitated than he would have expected by all this. The agreeable problem slid coldly into his mind as to whether it would give him any sort of pleasure to pull her down on his knee. But instead of trying such an experiment he made his voice as light and humorous and friendly as he could. 'Besides, by this time we'd have certainly quarrelled, whereas—'

'I seem not to care what I say to you!' Nancy went on, bending so low over him that she did almost, without any help from him, slide down upon his knees. 'Do you know I'm afraid of you, No-man? You've done something to me that makes me more afraid of you than I ever was of Enoch. Just feel, No-man!' and for the first time in his extremely inexperienced life it was our friend's destiny to know what it was to have his fingers snatched at by a woman and pressed against her side. It was under her left breast that she pressed them, and he was not only made aware of the beating of her heart but of the fact that her whole body was quivering. She held his hand tightly against her side as she spoke, pouring out the words without a pause, and in the old rich mellow tones again; and the sweetness of her breath made him feel as if he were being rolled over and over in a whole field of cowslips.

In exultant and voluptuous tones, quite free now from all hesitation, she told him how she had loved him since their first meeting in the cemetery. She told him that she had at first struggled against this feeling; but on Candlemas Night, when he had come to Glymes, she had decided that there was no harm in yielding to it, no harm in giving it free rein in her secret thoughts, as long as no one else knew.

'What made you decide on telling me?' was his comment on this.

These tactless and even, in a sense, brutal words were accompanied by a perceptible stiffening of No-man’s frame and by the removal of his fingers from hers and the withdrawal of his hand from her side. But it was clear to him that Nance had no more idea of how he was shrinking from her than she had of the contents of the sacred books of China. It gratified an obscure malice in him to notice this innocence of hers, and he wondered if it weren’t connected with the feminine experience of thousands of years that what you least expect, as the card-readers say, is liable to happen.

At least he had not got up; and the quivering nerves that wavered towards him like the antennae of a sea-anemone deceived her by their sweet assurance that if he only could be kept where he was for a little longer all might yet be well.

But a certain vein of wicked malice in him got more and more satisfaction the longer he continued to lie back in old Claudius’s arm-chair, not because from Nancy’s soft body, burning with desire, there emanated the fragrance of a bed of cowslips, but because there was something piquant to him in the fact that she interpreted so incorrectly what these invisible antennae of her feminine desire, wavering towards him, signalled to her. ‘They signal all right,’ he thought, pondering upon her condition in his most cold-blooded manner, ‘but she interprets them all wrong! They tell her I’m getting pleasure from what’s happening, but they don’t tell her the ambiguous nature of this pleasure I’m getting. She thinks I’m struggling against an inevitable attraction to her body. She thinks I’m holding myself back with a will of iron from taking her on my knee, whereas what I’m really doing is holding myself back with a will of iron from struggling out of this chair.’

But there had come a hot flush on Nancy’s cheeks now, and she was doing to the limit what she had begun to do that very first day when he came to Glymes. She was telling him all sorts of details about Enoch, even going to the length of describing various aspects of his love-making that had offended her.

This really did shock our friend. ‘I suppose’, he thought, ‘that when women fall in love, whether for the first time or the fifth time, everything connected with their new love is pure and beautiful, whereas all other sensual experiences suddenly become dull, coarse, distasteful, indifferent, and even faintly comic! I suppose they detach themselves completely from these experiences and regard them with shameless amusement, as if they had happened to someone else!’

The irony of the situation lay in the fact that Nance in her girlish innocence supposed that she was exciting the strongest of all masculine passions by these revelations.

‘Poor old chap!’ Dud groaned. ‘Thank the Lord no son of mine’ll ever hear such things about his father!’

But there was a yet further surprise in store for him. He had begun to take for granted that this woman hated Enoch with a relentless and vindictive hatred. But not at all! Though she told Dud things that made him shiver through the very bowels of his being, she uttered other words — and entirely spontaneous ones — that proved to him that at the bottom of her heart she loved Urien still.

‘This is getting beyond me,’ thought our friend. ‘Can a woman love two men? And does she know what our relationship is?’

On and on ran the stream of Nancy’s voice. Every now and then she would give little curious indrawn gasps for breath, but all the time she leaned lower and lower over him, not touching him any more, but causing him to feel the tenseness of her nerves even more than when she was touching him.

One thing he noticed in his feeling about her was that her passion for himself, instead of making her seem younger, made her seem older to him. He began to experience the sensation that he was much younger than she was, and he tried in the most cold-blooded way to account for this feeling. He came to the conclusion that it was due to the fact that never before in his life had any woman been really in love with him. This conclusion gave him a curious shock, and his physical distaste at her propinquity subsided a little, though no sensual response took its place.

'No woman', he kept repeating, 'has ever made real love to me before!' He thought of Mona's goddess-like detachment. He thought of Wizzie's reluctant wild-bird yieldings to his satyrish caresses. 'It's because I made my Mona-wraith into such a perverted elf, he said to himself, 'that a real woman's love seems so...'

And then he recalled how he had imagined himself, on that Candlemas Night at Glymes, bending back Mrs Quirm's white neck and kissing it under her chin. But how queer it was! This hot, feverish woman's body leaning over him seemed to have no connection at all with that cool soft anonymous throat to which he had felt that moment's piquant attraction.

Why was that? Was he so perverse that he couldn't feel anything towards a woman unless she were absolutely cold? What did a characteristic like that mean in a person's life? Was Jenny Dearth right in her denunciation of him as a cold-hearted and inhuman wretch? Trying, rather pathetically, and certainly very belatedly, to get out of his own skin in this surprising situation, trying to realize, as Jenny had said he couldn't do, the real tragic identity of another person's soul, it did strike him as an abominable trick of Nature that the passion of a woman who has lost the bloom of her first youth should appear at such a disadvantage compared with the passion of a man. But did it appear at a disadvantage? What if it was all a damned sensual lie, invented by the lusts of men who liked to corrupt innocence rather than respond to desire?

‘Poor darling!’ he suddenly heard himself utter in reply to her passionate confidences. And then, in an abrupt reaction from the smug hypocrisy of this ‘Poor darling!’, he broke out in the same brutal strain as before: ‘My dear, my dear, why in Heaven’s name are you telling me all this?’

But Nancy seemed as if nothing that he said made the least difference. Dud had never had the privilege of experiencing the natural consummation of normal desire, but it struck him now as if his Cemetery Woman had reached some point of intensity that narrowed down her appeal to a desperate cry from her body to his body, a cry that numbed and atrophied her awareness of their two conscious minds.

The grotesque idea came into his head that if he stretched out his finger and touched the form that leaned over him his finger would catch fire like a match.

‘She’s telling me all these things about him’, he thought, ‘without knowing what she’s saying! It’s like a terrible drum-beat — that’s what it’s like — to hide what she’s doing.’

The secret maliciousness that he had felt at the start had died down in him. He began to wonder if even now he couldn’t, by thrusting her head back and kissing her throat, excite himself enough just to embrace her once. The odd thing was that it never crossed his consciousness that if he did this it would be any betrayal of Wizzie, still less of that man of his mother’s. But no. He couldn’t do it! The passion in her overwhelmed him too completely. It would be her mouth — always her hot mouth — and her breath like burning cowslips!

He decided that this thing must stop. He must get up somehow from this fatal chair. If her feelings were hurt, well, there it was!

Then a cruel inspiration came to him. ‘I know, my dear!’ he said coldly, pushing her gently aside and rising to his feet. ‘I know: you’ve gone through hell in one way and another — but you’re not the only one. You’re not the first, my dear, and you won’t be the last. Do you remember how we met at those graves, and how you told me about your boy’s death?’

They were standing facing each other now, and they both could hear Wizzie’s voice calling down from the top of the stairs in reply to something that Jenny was saying to her from outside the dining-room door. And Dud wished, then, to the depths of his contrarious soul that he had used any method, rather than that one, to end this wretched scene. The workings of the woman’s face, as she took in his word about her son, were harrowing to watch. It was as if, instead of her human blood recovering its circulation after being frozen to death, all the fiery pulses of her being had been smitten at full beat by the descent on them of an avalanche of ice.

‘Nance, dear, my Nance!’ he cried, laying his hand on her sleeve. He felt at the moment how ironic it was that he should be the one now to be doing this, but he spoke earnestly and with full sincerity. ‘If only your boy were alive’, he said, ‘I’d show him what friends you and I are now. We’re bound together now for life, my dear. I felt we were when we first met. I had a presentiment; and now I know it. Don’t ‘ee be too sad, dear heart! What Jenny said of us isn’t true; but something better is true. I know you, Nance, for what you are, and you shall know me. This love business passes away anyhow, Nance. We can begin where most couples leave off. We first met at our graves and we must make that a covenant between us. Give me your hand on it, my girl!’

As he spoke, he held out his hand to her. But she did not take it. Her warm body had become a hollow reed, in the heart of which the Promethean spark had been extinguished. Slowly, and as if by some power beyond her will, her soft features returned to their normal expression, each wry curve, each wretched twist, smoothing themselves out, not so much as shadows in water after their dispersal by a flung stone, as shapes in a flooded landscape when the waters have subsided. But such shapes, returned though they are to light and air, carry upon them an indescribable film, the ashen-grey deposit of their long submersion.

Dud had many strange feelings as he watched her there, while the voice of Wizzie from the landing above cried out impatiently: ‘Tea’s ready, you two! What’s the matter with you? Are you deaf? Jenny’s up here, and tea’s ready. We’ll begin without you if you don’t come!’

He felt as he watched her, for those brief seconds, as if her soul had drawn back down some long narrowing perspective, and was hesitating there whether to return to the tunnel’s entrance or to go on and on and on till perchance it came out on the other side! There must have been something in his eyes that showed her at that second that he was not unaware of what he had done to her, and this knowledge, as it passed between them, came near to bringing her the relief of a flood of weeping. But she swallowed her tears.

He took her head in his two hands and pulled it against his chest so that her hair tickled his chin. But he did not kiss her, and she remained motionless, his hands clasped round her head. While he held her like this the voice of the Funny Man was audible again from the far end of Friary Lane. Then suddenly she broke away; and they both heard Jenny running downstairs.

Nance moved to the door and got it open in time to confront Mrs Dearth in the passage.

‘What on earth—’ began the latter, but stopped abruptly.

‘I can’t wait for tea,’ Nance said; and Dud thought she said it in a purposely loud voice so that Wizzie upstairs should hear. ‘Mr No-man’s been telling me of his walk with Enoch, and I must hurry back to Glymes. He can get his tea, of course — but he doesn’t like to. He’ll just put the kettle on and linger about. I’ll find him washing himself, I expect — not having a bath, you understand, but putting his head into a basin of water, over and over again! He says he says his prayers while he’s doing that. I don’t know what prayers, I’m sure. But what he likes is for me to have tea ready when he’s ready. I wouldn’t be surprised’ — and she gave a little forced laugh, for the benefit also, he divined, of the girl upstairs— ‘if I got home before six and began my tea well before you three are finished! Good-night, Wizzie, dear!’ And she raised her voice. ‘I’m off! Good-night, Mr No-man!’

It was Jenny who helped her on with her hat and cloak; but Dud met her eyes as she stood on the threshold.

‘Listen!’ she said, holding the front door open. The old mummer must have been announcing the entertainment for that evening to a group of men in the high street, and his resonant actor’s voice gave our friend a queer impression that he too, and Nance, and all of them, were characters in a play.

‘I suppose the town-crier’, he thought, ‘announced the execution of Mistress Channing in a chant just like that!’ And there came over him, as he and Nance lingered in the doorway holding each other with their eyes, a strange feeling as if all the buried generations of Dorchester were murmuring in a low persistent monotone, ‘Pity, pity, pity, pity — none is good, none is bad — pity, pity, pity, pity!’

It struck him as very queer, while he and Nance stood there, that he should be so reluctant to let her go. As he looked into her face, all his shrinking from her vanished away. That chant of the pity of the generations seemed to turn her feeling for him into something tender and precious, all passion spent; and he felt as if, when once she was gone and he had to go upstairs with that unopened Yeovil letter in his pocket, he would be leaving a protectress behind and plunging into a mêlée of unknown peril.

Answering he knew not what, when the door was shut, to some toublesome comment from Jenny, who looked especially grim and caustic in her black dress, he followed her upstairs. ‘You talk of our baffled desires breaking into the world’s secret,’ he said to himself, apostrophizing his mother’s man, as he entered Wizzie’s room, ‘but for most of us desire itself breaks like a bubble when it gets anywhere near the secret!’

Jenny’s strained and caustic mood didn’t last very long when their tea-party was once under way. Wizzie herself turned out to be in high spirits that afternoon, whether due to the fact that she was still wearing her pretty luncheon dress, or because she felt she’d carried it off better than she anticipated with the Cumber people, or simply because she enjoyed playing hostess to Mrs Dearth, he could not decide, but her happy mood was not long in communicating itself to Jenny.

He had many curious thoughts below the surface of their chatter as the meal went on. For one thing he found himself placed opposite the fire-place, from which the lamentable, life-drained portrait of Teucer Wye looked down upon him. Hypnotized by the pitiful eyes of this young-old victim of the cloud-painter, and still hearing the voice of the Funny Man in his ears, Dud began to feel as if his emerging from a life lived entirely between his Mona-wraith and the memory of his mother were something that might vanish away as suddenly as it had appeared, flinging him back upon the Royal Martyr and the Questing Beast. ‘But it can’t, it can’t vanish; it never can vanish! Did you think you could meddle with flesh and blood and go on just the same?’

It was much more than an hour after they sat down when Jenny retired and he and Wizz were left alone. Most of their talk at the end had been about Teucer Wye and the way Thuella was treating him; and Wizzie had astonished her lover, and apparently Jenny too, by the intensity with which she stood up for Thel.

No-man was in no mood for angry discussion, and he had just listened in quiet and passive astonishment to his girl’s startling defence of her friend. Mrs Dearth herself, perhaps in the reaction from her outburst in the kitchen, seemed reluctant to protest. The gist of what Wizzie had said was that no one knew what Thel had had to put up with for years from that tiresome old man. ‘He looks harmless enough,’ Wizzie had explained, ‘but if I’d had to bear what Thel has from him, with those old books and all, and his sneering at everything she enjoys, and her supporting him all the time, I’d have killed him by now. Yes, I would! I’d have killed him if I’d had to hang for it!’

But the moment they were alone, Dud, without beating about the bush, brought out the Yeovil letter. The girl had lit the fire to make their tea more cheerful, and it was upon a Wizzie lying back at ease in the arm-chair, more serene and placid than he had known her for a long while, that, standing opposite her by the mantelpiece, No-man released the thunderbolt. ‘It’s got the Yeovil postmark right enough,’ he said, holding it between his finger and thumb. ‘ “Mr. D. Noman, High Street”. He’s forgotten the “East”. Would the Urgans make a mistake like that? He’s been twice to my room, too.’

‘Damn you, open it! Or let me! Give it here!’ She was on her feet already, and she rushed up to him trying to snatch the letter from him.

But his infantile instinct to tease her, especially in the face of this ‘Give it here!’, and his outraged regard for ritual and decency, made him hold up the Yeovil letter at arm’s length out of her reach.

There was a struggle between them, and as she clung to him, growing more and more angry while he backed away from the fire, they collided so violently with the edge of the tea-table that they unbalanced the milk-jug, which fell down with a crash on the floor.

She had never turned upon him a face so contorted with fury as she did now, and he was glad enough to let her get hold of the letter as he knelt down on the floor. Crouching there in the simple desire to escape the sight of her face, and trying to mop up the spilt milk with his handkerchief, he began gathering together the broken bits of china.

That the girl’s anger was short-lived, that after she had torn the letter from its dirty envelope she was frozen numb with the shock of its contents, Dud from his task on the floor soon realized. She took it over to the fire, and as he gave her a sidelong glance from his crouching position, he saw that the impulse crossed her mind, for the beat of a second, to fling the thing into the flames. She did tear it in half, and Dud felt no impulse to stop her, but no sooner had she done this than it seemed to him that a weight of inert despair descended on her, depriving her of all anger, of all energy, almost of all feeling.

With the torn letter on her lap and the torn envelope at her feet, she sank down on the edge of the arm-chair and stared hopelessly and vacantly in front of her. He could only see the profile curve of her small face, but in his mind he knew that those unseeing eyes, gazing so straight before her into nothingness, had grown large and round.

His own thoughts, as he mechanically rubbed the milk stains on the carpet with his soaked handkerchief, were the last he would have expected. The images of his mother and Mona came into his head, combined with the problem — of all things in the world most out of place just then — whether his mother's way of life or Mona's offered the better hope of surviving death.

He found himself making every excuse to delay the moment when he must get up from under the table. Over and over again he rubbed these dark milk stains with his handkerchief, which was by this time as wet as a sponge. Faster and faster whirled his thoughts as he postponed the moment when he would have to break in upon her despair.

He noticed that her numbness was so complete that she did not even resort to her trick of polishing her knuckles. One hand hung down like the handle of a pump, limp and lifeless at the end of her cold arm.

What he kept trying to return to was a segment of empty space that had somehow obtruded itself into this upper room; and on the horizon of this empty space hovered his mother and Mona, for even the Mona-wraith was gone and the Questing Beast was gone. Over this empty space those two forms brooded, but both it and they were threatened by a great tidal wave of disturbance, a towering wave that rolled and heaved and crested, bearing the faces of Urien and old Claudius and Jenny and Thuella and Nance. Out of this wave these faces appeared and reappeared, tossed and swirled and buffeted, as if the ship that carried them had foundered.

'I must hold tight to Wizz. I must finish my book about Mary Channing.' These two necessities, as he rubbed at those dark stains with his soaked handkerchief, pressed upon his suspended intelligence rather as objects than as ideas. The Wizzie object was a formless figurine-idol, like one of those minute doll-shapes that represent the soul or ka in Egyptian tombs, only less definitely outlined. This he seemed to carry under his ribs. The Mary Channing object, on the contrary, was a globe of air, like a child's soap-bubble, in which he discerned not only the tragic figure of his heroine and the obscure shapes of her parents but all the familiar landmarks of the old town.

When he did struggle up at last from the floor and take the torn letter from the girl's lap, it was as if he had a tremendous weight upon him. He felt as if he were doing this not only with the Wizzie object under his ribs but with the dark globe of his book, heavy with earthworks and amphitheatres, bowing him down as the world did Atlas.

Even now, with the two torn halves of the letter in his hand, he felt an overpowering reluctance to read it. He found himself inclined to imitate Wizzie in her hopeless apathy and to sink down in a chair opposite her and let all go.

He did sink down for a minute there, and just stared at the two bits of paper in his fingers. On these two bits of paper, in place of any threat of Old Funky's, he saw the dispute between Claudius and Dumbell, and he thought of the Glymes man on Maiden Castle. 'With all your magical humbug and your mental pain,' he thought, 'you are wrestling with the secret of life, whereas both Communism and Caesarism are just methods of—'

But, brushing these things aside with a splash like that of a fish rising to the top, one single word from the Yeovil letter caught his full attention. It was an odd word to be there. It was the word 'Lovie'. But it was 'Lovie' who broke the spell; and jumping to his feet, he puzzled out now, word by word, in the light of one of the candles under the portrait of Mr Wye, the letter's astonishing contents.

It was, as we have said, written in pencil, and it ran as follows:

Mister D. Noman, Sir,

I takes the liberty of letting you know that the child Lovie, what have been hid from your knowledge by she and me with Best Intentions, be going to be took to the Ouse owing to Mrs. Urgan aving found out all. Never would this ave rizz if Her we know hadn't stopped payment. In case, Mr. D. Noman, Sir, you wish to adopt the child Lovie me and me missus will say nothink save for small compensation for expenses already incurred. Hopping this finds you, Sir, same as it leaves us at present,

Your obedient servant to command,
Ben Urgan.

Dud's first feeling when he had finished this communication was one of immense relief. When his eye first fell on the word 'Lovie' scrawled on that dirty piece of paper, one of his wildest and most lurid imaginations with regard to Wizz and Old Funky seemed to be coming true, namely that she had had a child by the old man but that in her misery of mind she had murdered it, and the Urgans had been holding this over her ever since! He had thought of this possibility, and of many others equally unpleasant, for so many months that it was a heavenly reprieve to know the worst and to find that the worst was only Lovie.

He knew Wizzie had no confidence in his behaving well at a pinch of this sort. He knew that just as she couldn't understand the defects of his quality, so she couldn't understand his quality. The subject of Old Funky always divided them; so he had naturally avoided approaching it; and even if he had approached it, it would have been hard to have said to her in cold blood: 'I don't care, my dear, what children you've had, or who gave them to you!' But as it was — Good Lord! he was ready to adopt Wizzie's child tomorrow. He remembered his thoughts about parthenogenesis in connection with his own birth. He would no more see Urgan's blood in Lovie than he was able to feel Urien's blood in himself!

But the realities of this Roman town were thickening upon him. First a father, and now a child! But he knew himself in these things. This was just the sort of shock he could bear with the equanimity that was the advantage of having such an outrageous imagination! The reality, when you met it, was mild in comparison.

All this rushed through his brain as he played with the two halves of this bit of paper, separating them and fitting them together under the candle.

'Well, old girl?' he murmured, coming close up to her. She listened to the sound of his voice as a suicide drowning in the sea might listen to a dialogue on the deck above, and he received, as their eyes met, what was the greatest shock to him in the whole episode — the feeling that the girl was, in regard to this matter at any rate, completely insane, and that there could be no rational exchange of ideas of any sort between them about it.

'Wizz, my darling! My life, my love!' he cried, when he caught this look. 'You're my girl always, you're the same always. Don't look like that, Wizz, don't 'ee do it!' And he flung himself down on his knees by her side. 'Look at me, Wizz!' he repeated. 'Look at me, my treasure. It's your old Dud speaking to you! We'll go to where the child is tomorrow. We'll take her away. We'll have her always. She'll be yours to me — nobody else's! Of course we'll take her! Little Wizz, little Wizz, do you hear what I say?' And in the tumult of his anxiety he seized her by the shoulders with his two hands and shook her violently.

But the girl snatched at his wrists and flung him back with all her might. 'You — fool! You don't know what you're saying. There! Let me go. I tell you I've got to think this out alone.' She swayed to her feet and drew away from him. He too scrambled up from his knees and stared helplessly at her.

Yes! There was that look in her eyes that he'd seen in the caravan. To talk to her now was like talking to a person in delirium.

'Wizz—' he began desperately, but she cut him short. 'You — fool!' she repeated. 'You know no more about it than — than—' And to his dismay her voice broke into a long-drawn terrible moan, like the moan of a wild beast that has been wounded, and, rushing to the bed, she threw herself diagonally across it, and lay there face down, her arms stretched out taut and stiff in front of her, and all her fingers extended.

After a minute or two that terrible moaning ceased. But her quietness was almost worse to No-man, for it seemed to draw a screen round her, like those hospital screens with which they isolate the beds of the dying. One little movement of hers was a relief to him, however. She clenched her fists. This seemed more natural. Those stiff extended fingers had been ghastly.

But he couldn't escape from a sickening fear as he saw her lying there. Suppose the reaction from this business over the child had really driven her insane? He had no Wizzie then! The madness in her brain would be always a death-wall between them.

He walked slowly round the foot of the bed, stepping gingerly, as if she lay on the edge of a precipice and a touch might fling her down. He stood so close to her clenched outstretched hands that he could see the distended blue veins and the sharp knuckles, white under the tension. Her straggling brown hair looked so extraordinarily innocent of the whole situation. He longed to appeal to it, his old playmate, the companion of so many amorous nights. What had it done to be tangled and disarranged like this? Well! this was reality.

And all the world would say he had been living a wicked, an inhuman life when he lived alone with his Mona-wraith! But here they were, two human skeletons, a horizontal one and a perpendicular one, making in that criss-cross position a monstrous caricature of a cross without its head-piece. And all the time there was only wanting the simple exchange from brain to brain of a little philosophy, just a little, little philosophy!

So thought the distracted Dud; but the longer she lay there, the more sickening grew his fear — a fear that needed more than a little philosophy to allay – that he really was in danger of losing her.

He surveyed her form, extended so piteously across the bed, and he had the feeling that he was dealing with this wounded body rather than with any conscious mind. There was the head he knew so well, but he felt as if the curves of her back, the outline of her limbs under her skirt, her prostrate legs and upturned heels, had substituted themselves for the conscious brain of his Wizzie. They were there instead of the girl he knew, and they were all he could appeal to!

Suddenly the sight of the inverted heels of her shoes, as they lay turned up at the ceiling, stabbed him to the heart. They looked so grotesque and yet with such a lot of life of their own in them. They looked as if they wanted to dance on the ceiling. They looked as if they wanted to trip off and away and dance on many ceilings! And yet they held so much — so much more then any other part of her — of her intimate woman's life. They were what she tapped the floor with under the table. They were what she ran down the stairs on. They were what held her up as she stretched her muscles when she was alone, as she made her secret faces in the glass.

And this body extended in front of him had given birth to the unknown body of Lovie! Old Funky had done for this woman's body what he wasn't man enough to do! But it wasn't that that bothered him. He felt that he now knew why she was often so sad. A piece of her had been torn away from her; and it was her fear of his knowing about this that had doomed her to her wretched half-life. The virtuous Old Funkys of Mary Channing's time had killed Mary and her unborn child together; and the wicked Dud — though he hadn't known it — had put his girl's child away!

No wonder women were different from men! No wonder they were swept away by irrational moods! No wonder they flung down these fatal miraculous bodies of theirs sideways across beds! To be able to give birth to another entity — that in itself was so desperate, so inexplicable a thing, that they ought to be petted and cosseted and humoured all the days of their lives — yes, and all their crimes forgiven!

Jenny said he had no feeling; Jenny said he was a selfish sensualist. It was his selfishness that shivered, then, with an ice-cold death-chill at the thought of losing his girl?

He tried to imagine what life would be without this form in front of him. He couldn't conceive it! Standing there now, with the middle of his thighs in an exact line with her convulsively clenched hands, the weird fancy came to him that it wasn't a headless cross that they were making but a mathematically correct image of the letter T.

And he remembered how he had felt when he heard of the deaths of Mona and his mother. Not anything like this! He was bewildered and upset then, but this cold breath of something happening to Wizz was more than that. It was blighting desolation. And yet he could only remember one single occasion when his mother had got really angry with him — and not one when Mona had!

What was it that made those clenched hands and prostrate head so precious to him? Jenny had accused him of having no feeling. What was it to have feeling? What would a person with feeling do now?

'Wizz, Wizz,' he began again. 'Little Wizz! Look up and speak to me. I've no right to hold anything against you. I've nothing against you! We'll go tomorrow to Yeovil and get hold of Lovie. Jenny won't mind her being here with us.'

But there was no answer from the form stretched across the bed, no answer from the tense white knuckles, no answer from the figure that Old Funky had found so 'lurin', no answer from the stiff girlish shape that in its prone position had become, in conjunction with his own lean frame, such a beautiful example of the letter T! 'What would a person who had feeling', he thought, 'do at this juncture? Lift her up in his arms? Argue with her? Beat her?'

In place of doing any of these things, he recommenced his feeble murmurings, more as if they were addressed to himself than to her. 'You know I do love you, Wizz, don't you? I may not be good at showing it, as some men could, but you've grown into me, Wizz, my only one; you've grown into me!'

The girl on the bed made no answer; and it was unlucky that at that second, as he lifted his head, he encountered the humiliated and offended look of Thuella's portrait of Teucer Wye. 'If you can't be a man', Mr Wye's expression said, 'the best thing for you to do is to read Plato.'

CHAPTER 7. Lovie

‘BETTER PUT ON my grey dress,’ thought Wizzie, a couple of days later, as, about eleven o’clock, she awaited the return of D. No-man from his High East Street room.

‘And better put on my new underclothes with it,’ she added hastily to herself, as attired in nothing but her slip, and with bare arms and feet, she moved from her cupboard to her chest-of-drawers and back to her cupboard.

‘But what’s the use? What the hell’s the use?’ were the sentences that the girl’s inmost consciousness kept reiterating as she sat on the bed and pulled on a pair of new stockings, stockings even newer than the underclothes.

In the process she was now engaged upon, it was natural enough that she should note what certainly was the unequalled beauty of her limbs. ‘Soft... ‘ she murmured aloud, as she let her fingers stray pensively along her thigh. ‘Soft as any damned school-miss.’ She leaned forward more intently and passed her hands over her muscles. Then she gave a glance at herself in the mirror. For a moment she saw herself as she used to be when, in those wretched tights and that loin-cloth of red plush, she was ready to rush into the tent and jump on her horse’s back. Those tights, and the gaudy beads she had to wear along with them, were detestable to her, but far worse was that bit of red plush. When she put that on she used to feel as if she were going to be a mark and a mockery before a jeering crowd. But in spite of these absurd gauds, she well remembered how proud she used to be of her figure. She remembered how taut and tense every muscle of her body was, and in such perfect training. Yes, in those days her whole frame was as lissom, as supple, as plastic to every strain she laid upon it, as the body of a ballet-dancer. She sighed heavily as she lowered her eyes and completed the business of fastening up her stockings. 'What's the use?'

Shaking down her soft grey skirt and smoothing it carefully round her hips and flanks with her fingers, twisting about as she did so with sideways glances at the looking-glass, she made little forlorn whistlings, not bothering to screw up her mouth to do it properly, but just enough to do it audibly.

The top of the old-fashioned looking-glass standing on the chest-of-drawers had ornamental carvings on each side of it that resembled ears. It also had two carved holes in the crown of its woodwork which possessed a faint likeness to eyes. Thus the demon-artist who, in spite of the neatest housekeepers, can give to the scatterings of chance in the arrangements of human rooms a mischievous twist of his own, brought it about that the glassy portion of Wizzie's mirror — that world of unexpurgated reality which is yet not quite the same as the ordinary one outside — should represent, as it stood there, an enormous gaping mouth. It was in this mouth, beneath the unsympathetic leer of a pair of low-lidded eyes, and beneath the suspicious pricking up of a pair of alert ears, that Wizzie's person had to appear whenever she made her toilet.

'What's the use?' was still the weary burden of her consciousness as she presently fixed upon her head the fashionable hat of the Cumber party and smoothed back her hair below it with quick deft touches.

A glow of faint satisfaction warmed her pale cheeks as she did this, to think of the shock her ladylike appearance would be for the Urgans and their entourage.

'How Popsy will stare!' she thought. 'She won't like it a bit! She'll be sick with envy — the little fool!'

When she was ready to go, she sat down by the fire and slowly pulled on her gloves with her eyes on the bright flames. As she did this, she glanced at her wrist-watch, her Easter present from D. No-man, and was annoyed to find that it still lacked five or six minutes of eleven, when No-man was to call for her.

'I suppose Lovie will be able to walk back,' she thought. 'Perhaps I ought to have let him bring the pram; but we'd look so silly wheeling it empty through the streets.' And her mind reverted to a certain annoying scene of the day before, when Jenny had supported D. No-man in his insistence on purchasing this indispensable adjunct of a child's life.

'I'm not going to put up with it', she said to herself, 'if he goes on making all this fuss. You'd think Lovie was the only kid in Dorchester. No, I'll have to make a stand at the start. I'm not going to have him interfering, messing about with the kid, and spoiling her, and turning her against me. If he's set on having her with us, he must take the consequences. He's not her father.' Her mind reverted again to the perambulator. 'Silly!' she thought. 'Kids of three are too big for prams.'

But the consideration that D. No-man wasn't Lovie's father switched her mind to the man who was, and with one glove on and one glove off, and staring at the fire, she became lost to every conscious thought but the sick hatred that was now, and had been for the last three years, her dominant obsession.

Up it rose, that familiar demon, that terrible 'worm i' the bud' that had come to be the gnaw and the fret of all her real existence; and as she mechanically began yielding between gloved fingers and bare knuckles to her accustomed habit, and as she broke this off for a second to stoop over the hem of her elegant skirt and pick a wisp of cotton from its edge, the almost insane landscape of her tragedy took its implacable shape.

She saw herself, she felt herself, she knew herself, a real artist, after those years of unwearied labour, in the art that was her life; and she saw Old Funky, like a maggot in the rose of that life, withering her petals, her stamens, the very calyx of her being, so that only an empty husk was left, and the seed — the seed!...

No one watching the girl as she sat there in her pretty clothes and neat shoes, and with as refined a lady's purse as could be bought in Dorchester on her soft lap, would have guessed for a moment what dark thoughts they were that made her frown. That frown had always been sometimes visible, even when, so to say, she wasn't frowning; but now it never for a moment disappeared. Even D. No-man had noticed it of late, and had said to himself, 'She's frowning in her sleep.' But she wasn't frowning in her sleep. Those two small lines were always there now. They were there when the image of Old Funky was completely swallowed up in kindly oblivion.

Especially might an onlooker have been deceived by the natural way she glanced at the watch on her wrist. But perhaps a woman wouldn't have been deceived by that! So large a part do these tiny fate-hammers play in the lives of most owners of the small wrists held up to reveal their message that a girl on the way to execution might well look at her watch, not to see how much longer she had to live, but simply because, after adjusting her hat and smoothing out the wrinkles in her gloves, it had become an automatic gesture. Thus, though she felt no impatience with regard to D. No-man turning up — indeed, her impression of her own feelings was that she would have taken it very calmly had he never turned up — it was inevitable that she should lift her elbow more than once in its tight-fitting sleeve to glance mechanically at her wrist.

But her thoughts about Old Funky were always in the back of her brain. Whenever she had a moment to herself — unless in the middle of a blood-curdling novelette, and not always even then — Old Funky would sit down with her, or lie down with her, or stare out of her looking-glass by the side of her own face.

On the occasion of Nance’s recent visit to Friary Lane, Mrs Dearth had countered the visitor’s praise of No-man by extravagant praise of Wizzie. How much Wizzie had confided in her of her past life Jenny revealed to none; but if she had known about Old Funky and about the existence of Lovie, what she had thought of it all can easily be imagined! Wizzie to her was a girl in whom sex-instinct and maternal instinct were underdeveloped, a girl for whom the first experience of sex-violence had been a shock from which recovery, if it every really came, would be very slow.

‘Love, and love alone,’ Jenny would have said, ‘can obliterate such memories. The poor thing’s ignorance of sex coincided with her wholehearted devotion to the circus-ring, and the man must have taken advantage of that.’

Jenny did reveal to Nance that in her opinion Wizzie’s circus-man had been a first-rate teacher, and that, if he did take advantage of her, it was his hold on her as a teacher that had given him his opportunity. ‘When a girl like Wizz’, she assured Nance, ‘has had a shock of that kind, it’s like a wedge of iron in her soul. It starts a brooding hatred that can sap the very spring of life.’

Mrs Dearth’s view of the case, though based on imperfect knowledge, was not an unreasonable one. The birth of Wizzie’s child had been to her like the madness of a fever.

No-man’s wild imagination had indeed not been far from the truth when the lurid idea of infanticide crossed his mind. At the beginning, in her feverish agitation, she had not been able to endure the sight of the little creature, and it had needed all the old wife’s astuteness to avert worse scandal than a birth in her caravan. Nothing but the blind impulse of the healthy young animal in Wizzie's blood had kept her from complete despair.

Her hatred for Old Funky had all the same grown to such unbalanced proportions that she would spend hours inventing complicated schemes of revenge. Indeed, when No-man took her away her mood had not been at all unlike what that quixotic sensualist wanted to imagine it. She had let him carry her off in the benumbed unquestioning passivity of a Bronze Age captive. Had the good man, however, brought down his Cerne Giant club on the head of her enemy, it would have jumped better with her feeling than having to run away, but, as it was, this lean staring gentleman with his obscure talk was at least a new court-card in her wretched pack; and, after all, a man at her side was a man at her side, and she had no divining-rod to sound the abysses of this particular man's limitations.

If Old Funky — who wasn't, as she well knew, nearly as old as his name sounded — hadn't so fatally intertwined himself with her passion for her work, her feelings would have been different. If only she could have left the whole lot of them and started her life afresh in another circus! But she wasn't herself, her free independent self, any more. In some damnable way her work and Old Funky were blent together. He had trained her too assiduously, too patiently, the old devil! Not a curve of her frame, not a muscle, not a suppleness, not a quivering balance, not a poise, not a motion, not a turn, not a twist of her young body, but he had watched its development with the eyes of a lynx! If only she had had another trainer, if only his work hadn't been work on her own body, if only she could have done it for herself without him, she would now be able to put him out of her mind and let all he had done to her go to the devil! His taking of her then would have remained as a fever-memory, a horrible unreal illness, a passing madness. All could yet have been well if only he hadn't been the one who had made her what she was. No acrobat, no dancer ever had such a training! That man was born to train her, and she had responded to his persistency with a perseverance that only he could evoke. He had made her a flawless, a perfect instrument. She knew it. And all for nothing! All just so that he could play with her and destroy her.

Various disgusting occasions came rushing into her brain now, as she rubbed her bare knuckles with her elegant gloved fingers, occasions when Grummer Urgan had burst in upon the two of them with savage jealousy. She had laughed at the woman while the man sneaked away. 'What do you take me for?' she had retorted. 'Do you want a good show, or don't you want a good show? Why don't you send me off and get another girl?'

And when it was all over, and only her hatred and her nerves and tempers were left, they'd got Popsy. 'But he couldn't train Popsy, and the old horse couldn't—' But at that point, as always, quite apart from her will a hot tear ran down each of her cheeks. Her feeling for the horse was the one living thing left in her except her hatred! These clothes, these shoes, this hat were part of her hatred. They would show him how little she cared, by showing him what a lady she'd become! But the horse — No more of that; she must stop thinking of that. Was Popsy riding him in that field this very day? 'Silly!' And she rubbed her cheeks with her gloved hand and looked at her watch again, this time quite consciously.

Oh, why didn't D. No-man come? He ought to know by now that she couldn't bear being kept waiting. But it was just like him — lost in that ridiculous book! If he couldn't do anything but write to earn his living, why couldn't he write something that a person could read?

With a childish movement then, just like a little girl who ought to be doing home-lessons instead of spoiling her eyesight, she slipped her fingers — the ones bare of her grand gloves — under the cushion of her arm-chair and brought out a tattered story-periodical. The discoloured pages of this unliterary pamphlet she now began hurriedly to turn, wetting the tip of her first finger at her lip to expedite matters, and assuming an expression of placid achievement when she found the page with the corner turned down. Then, heedless about creasing the flimsy ladylike dress that was to be her revenge, she pulled up her feet beneath her and settled herself to read, holding the paper — for she was short-sighted and the print was microscopic — close to her face.

She hadn't submerged herself, however, for more than a couple of minutes in The Adventures of Lily Turnstile, when she heard the front door open and shut, and No-man's steps in the passage.

Under the cushion again went Miss Turnstile, for though she knew that he was aware of her passion for such thrilling tales, she had a feeling that it was more appropriate and more in keeping with her hat and her shoes to be found idling by the fire than absorbed in such reading. It was part, too, of her instinctive system with D. No-man to emphasize her romantic desolation. It helped to make him polite and concerned, and while it stopped his asking futile questions, it kept him — or so Wizzie fancied, judging by Lily Turnstile, who drove her infatuated count into slavish obsequence by such a demeanour — on the sort of tenter-hooks on which elderly protectors of young ladies ought to be kept if their interest was to be preserved. Her glove was being hurriedly pulled on and her feet were no longer in the chair when the door opened and No-man entered.

'Good girl! You're all ready, I see,' was his greeting, and then: 'But I say, sweetheart, how lovely you look! Lovie will be simply thrilled to see you.'

If he hadn't said just that — though by this time she ought to have grown accustomed to his stupidity, which made Lily's count seem a veritable thought-reader — she'd have probably smiled and let him kiss her lips. As it was, she turned to him the coldest of cheeks. But even so — why did she always forget how carefully balanced a lady's hat has to be? — it became imperative she should go once more to that mirror-mouth under the leering eyes, and once more see Old Funky clapping his hands as he always did when her act went well.

'I never told you, old girl,' D. No-man remarked as they went down the narrow street which in her rebellious mind — so often had her companion tired her by his praise of its antiquity — she had come to call Itching Way, 'that I saw a circus there when I came back with Urien from Maiden Castle; only of course I couldn't tell if it was our foreign circus; but I thought it might be, only I remembered how you said that none of them — Think of our having only met each other last November! I feel as if I'd known you all my life, old thing. Don't you feel like that?'

What Wizzie felt — as, stirred apparently by the thought of their first encounter, he clutched the tightly sleeved grey arm at his side — was a nervous irritation that was almost unbearable. Why couldn't he see that the idea of having Lovie hung round her neck, like the albatross in Gems of Standard Poetry, was the last straw? And why, when he got into this mood, did he always call her 'old girl' and 'old thing' instead of by her name? 'I've got a name,' she felt inclined to cry, 'if you haven't!'

He went on holding her arm as they passed down the South Walks. 'I suppose he knows', she thought,'that I wouldn't lean on his arm if he didn't hold me! I wish he wouldn't hold me. He pinches me, and he knows I don't like to be held. I feel as if he were a policeman walking me off to fetch Lovie. Oh, he's talking about the chestnut-blossoms now. Why must he always show me everything? Does he think I haven't got eyes? Oh, I wish he was carrying me in my coffin! Then he could have Lovie all he wanted to, and I'd be at peace.

'How Grummer Urgan will stare when she sees what a lady I've become! Shall I see Popsy? I hope so, and I hope she'll die of envy. Here's the old war-stone. It makes me sick to see it. Thel was with us that day, though! Thel will never have a baby, she says. She'd sooner die first. If Lovie's pretty, I'll take her out to Thel's tomorrow. I've had a baby. I'll show my baby to Thel and see what she says. I'm younger than Thel, but I know a lot more than her. She'll feel like a kid when she sees me with Lovie.

'He doesn't want to give Lovie up. It's Grummer making him. If Lovie were entirely mine, and not his at all, would I be glad I've had a baby? I'll get Jenny to go with me and buy her clothes. No, I won't take her to Glymes tomorrow. I'll buy her clothes tomorrow and take her the next day. If he's crazy to keep Lovie and have her to teach, I'll be glad to take her from him. Yes, I'll be gladder, the more he feels it! I know its Grummer who made him write. I'll let her see I know it. I'll be very cold to her and make her feel things — things like her being a common woman and me a lady. He shall never speak to Lovie again, though he begs and begs. Oh, I must tell D. one thing; and I hope he'll do it, though maybe he won't. A person can't tell from moment to moment what D. will do.'

It was not till they were at the station gates that he dropped her arm. She glanced furtively at his profile. He was evidently pulling himself together to do what wasn't easy for him.

'Listen, D. No-man, will you do something for me?'

'If it's not to make a row with these people! Certainly I will, my sweet.'

'Do you mind, D. just for once, just for this time, making out we're married? It'll be easier to get Lovie away then.'

The man was silent for a second. He evidently didn't want to do it. Oh, it was just like him — a little thing like that! Then he stopped, and she had to stop. That was a bad sign. No, he wouldn't do it! He always stopped like this when he was going to give some roundabout reason why he wouldn't do what she wanted.

'What's the idea, kid?' he enquired. 'It's not their business whether we're married or not. You don't want to be married, do you? You've always said — at least I thought you've always meant—'

'Only to them, D. only to them! It'll make it so much easier.'

'I don't know what concern it is of theirs. I'm going to adopt the child. The letter said "adopt". That was their word. Are you thinking they won't consider me respectable enough to take a child they were going to put into the workhouse?'

It was Wizzie's turn to be silent now, but as he watched her he saw her lower lip begin to quiver and the familiar wrinkles appear that meant she was about to cry. 'Oh, if you're going to take it as hard as that, child,' he cried hastily, 'I'll do anything you want. I know it's wretched for you, all this business. I don't like it very much myself. But it's only right we should have the poor little thing. There, there, my darling one, my precious one, don't 'ee cry! Sure I'll say we're married. I'll say I got a special licence last November. I'll say we were married last week by the Bishop of Salisbury. I'll say anything, if you'll only be a brave girl now, and let's get this damned business over!'

'It's — only — to — say', murmured Wizzie, drawing the back of one of her wrists across her cheek, 'just once — anything you like — that makes them think we're married — but if you don't want to—'

The harsh-gay noise of the circus now reduced them both to silence, and they entered the Fairfield. Threading their way between a couple of gypsy-carts, they soon found the Urgan caravan, and, with composed faces and all the assurance they could assume, they mounted the steps side by side.

It was clear they were expected, for there was Mummy Urgan in her best black gown and all her jet beads, and there was Popsy in her stage finery, and there too, dressed in a manner more suited to a little acrobat than a child of three, was Lovie herself! The small creature was sitting on the knees of Old Funky, who himself, attired in his usual tight-fitting green-black coat, sat on the bed.

The little girl turned her head away as soon as the strangers entered, and, flinging her arms round her father's neck, burst into a fit of sobbing.

It became plain at once that the child had been told that she was to be taken away by these unknown people, and Wizzie's first thought — and she was too unanalytical to be surprised at anything she felt — was a wave of dark anger with them for making it so hard for a baby to go with its own mother. She herself was so absorbed in taking in her child's appearance — yes, thank goodness, Lovie certainly was very, very pretty, and Jenny would make a fine fuss of her, and how nice it would be to buy her clothes with Jenny, and Thel would change her mind, when she saw her, about never having a baby — that it was with less than half of her consciousness that she caught the look of deadly malevolence that the child's father cast on her companion.

'Mornin' to 'ee, mister!' murmured Old Funky hoarsely. 'Mornin' — madam!' This last word was uttered with a sarcasm so biting that Wizzie threw at No-man a glance that was at once imperious and beseeching.

'Mrs No-man and I', began that gentleman, laying down his cudgel on the foot of the bed, 'have come, as you see, ready to take this little one — That is Lovie, I suppose? No, no, don't cry, little girl! The man's very fond of little girls. The man will be very kind to little Lovie. The man'll give her

While he uttered these words, to Wizzie's complete astonishment, D. No-man bent over Old Funky and caressed the sobbing child, stroking its brown curls. Beneath his forward-bending figure she noticed that Old Funky had shut his eyes and was silently murmuring — without making any audible sound — some rigmarole of his own. What struck her as odd was that the child, though it still sobbed quietly, dropped its hold on the old man's neck and turned its blubbered face towards the stranger.

But a still greater surprise awaited her, for, not content with this advantage, D. No-man with one bold swing lifted the little thing bodily from the circus-man's arms and began swaying it to and fro, hushing its sobs against his chest with a series of sing-song murmurs such as 'There's Lovie! There's little Lovie! There's the man's Lovie!' — a performance that clearly had a most comforting effect.

It was Mummy Urgan who intervened now, interrupting a nervous and timid advance which the bedizened Popsy had begun to make to Lovie's fashionably dressed mother.

'Better take her straight off, straight away — there's a dear gentleman,' whispered the old lady. 'I've had a trouble enough to get him round to this, and if the child have took to 'ee, as seems it has, and 'tis plain you be wondrous smart with childer, the sooner you're out o' here and well away, the better for all! Give your missus the money you've a-brought, and if'tis a fiver — I told 'un a fiver 'twould be — I'll say you be a real gent. And don't 'ee let—'

By this time No-man had been hustled so hastily to the door that it was not till he was bearing the gleaming little personage down the steps that he handed the woman his precious wallet.

Nor was it Lovie who stretched out her arms to Old Funky, but Old Funky who stretched out his arms to Lovie. Such at least seemed the explanation of a spasmodic jerk, like the jerk of a frog, made by the figure sitting on the bed, a futile jerk that only ended in the same incoherent gibble-gabble, with shut eyes and sucked-in lips, that the old man had been engaged upon when they first entered the caravan.

‘Don’t ‘ee let she hit her, nor spend she’s tempers on her, mister!’ were the last words Wizzie heard through the caravan door as Grummer Urgan came back with the precious wallet. The girl did her best to carry off her amazement at seeing this object in the woman’s hands, and she promptly opened it with the most natural air, not even concealing the fact that it contained another fiver in addition to the one she now extracted.

Meanwhile, Old Funky had stopped making obscure noises and had opened his eyes. Before he consented to receive the bank-note, however, which his wife held out to him, he seemed to find it imperative to give weight and permanence to his feelings in some sort of solemn ritual. He rushed accordingly to the caravan door, which Grummer had closed on her return, and, reopening it, sank down on his knees there and lifted both fists — the thumbs compressed within the fingers — straight into the air, where he caused them to quiver and shake with the passion of the curse he sent after Wizzie’s friend.

Not the blind Cyclops, hurling curses at ‘Outis’, the Greek ‘No-man’, could have given vent to more ferocious maledictions than those that now issued from that kneeling figure.

Wizzie could guess the kind of thing he was shouting from his lifted fists and the look of his back in its long tight coat with the tails flapping over his heels, but neither she nor Grummer nor Popsy, and certainly not the retreating No-man, could hear a single word. The noise of the circus-engine swallowed up the abduction of Wizzie's child, just as it had drowned the cries of Wizzie herself when Lovie had been begotten.

The glance that Lovie's young mother now fixed upon that grotesque gesticulating form would have revealed a great deal to any shrewd observer. What Wizzie thought she felt, as with screwed-up eyelids and contracted brow she watched him kneeling there, was simply contemptuous hatred; but an expert in women's expressions would have found something far more complicated than that in her face. There was even a weird flicker of sensual satisfaction in it, the look we assume when we scratch some sore spot that gives us an excruciating pleasure, a tickling pain, to touch at all!

That no one could hear a word he uttered made no difference, for had the words of Old Funky's curse been heard by everybody they would have been totally incoherent. The phrase 'rats and gall' might have been caught, together with something about 'maggots and gizzard'; and to a very strained ear, in the midst of that whirligig din, there might have come syllables that sounded like 'the worms of Herod' and 'the lice of Pharaoh'. But beyond a wish that No-man should quench his thirst with the urine of dogs, and have sand for bread, and that his bowels should burst with those of Judas, and his skin itch with the scabs of Job, it would have been the general drift, rather than any particular details, that the hearers would have carried away.

More articulate, perhaps, at the end, before the distracted old man scrambled to his feet, would have sounded his vague but reiterated prediction that No-man hadn't done with him yet, that he would in fact make him eat with Old Funky, drink with Old Funky, lie down with Old Funky, till he should pray for Pummery to cover him, and for Maumbury to hide him, and for the fishes of Chesil to carry him quick into the pit!

Urgan greeted her husband's return from the top of the steps. 'You and Popsy best be off to show now. What's the matter with 'ee, then? Doesn't 'ee mind what us 'cided on? Hasn't us argied long enough about her going with she? What be up to, then? What be mumbling about? 'Twas thee bubbled us into all this brabblement; and 'tis lucky I've got a head on me, or Lordy knows where us 'ud be by now! In jail maybe, for all you gone and done!'

Old Funky made no reply. If he wasn't by rights as old as his name, he looked a deal older as he squatted down on the bed and shut his eyes. Many people, when things have been too much for them, or when they've received an overwhelming shock, follow the example of Julius Caesar and hide their eyes; but Old Funky neither muffled his face in his mantle nor brazened it out. He just sat on that bed, the bed where Wizz had given birth to Lovie, with his lips working like a monkey's, and kept his eyes tight shut. He hadn't cast a single glance at her since she entered the caravan, and this piqued her in some curious manner; and as she stood talking to Mrs Urgan and Popsy, with the caravan door swinging on its hinges in the wind, she edged round a trifle so as to keep that figure on the bed in sight.

'What a silly softy I am,' she said to herself. 'I hoped he'd be funny over Lovie going, the dirty devil, and now he does this and it makes me kind of want to cry. I'd like to cry — that's what I'd like! I'd like to cry and cry, and yet take Lovie away! I'd like him to hold Lovie like he was just now every day, and me to come and take her away every day! Mercy! How he looks, with his eyes all pinched up and his mouth working! That night when he got hold of me his wig fell off. It was like scrabbling at a slippery egg when I pushed his head away. I could have broken loose altogether. I could have thrown him on the ground and run out, just as I was. But I only kept pushing his head away and digging my nails into it till I felt all weak. He's got the marks of my nails, though, I bet a tanner, under that wig, and somewhere else too. My! I let him have it! Yes, you ugly, dirty little devil, you'd better screw up your eyes and work your chin. Yes! 'Twas me, your little Wizziepeg, what you thumped and tickled and cursed and petted and made her muscles ever so, and her balance never to be beat, what took Lovie away! And I'm going to keep Lovie away, too. Never, never, never will you see Lovie again. See her? Oh well, perhaps I'll just let you see her. Maybe when I'm wheeling her in her pretty pram down the South Walks one hot day, with my parasol and my magazine and my nice muslin dress, there'll you be, you dirty little devil, with your Frenchified tail and your shaky pins and your Wizzipeg's nail-marks under your wig. And you'll say to yourself then, "Oh, and if I had my own child Lovie, to eddicate, like I eddicated her mummy, for show-riding, how blest I'd be!" And if I just nod to you in passing — for of course I shan't speak to you, and you'll know it would be impossible to speak to Lovie — you'll think to yourself, "There goes No-man's girl and his girl's girl — how happy they look!"

'My! If you're not beginning to cry, you ugly funny little man! And I could cry myself, and that's the truth, for I'd sooner be in the circus, you bald-headed old devil, with you clapping your hands and the crowd hallooing, than walking dumb and mum along of him, and him droning on about how they burnt Mary what's-her-name, and how the history women worshipped bulls, and how he and me were sweethearts before history began.'

But she mustn't go on peeping at Old Funky across Grummer's heaving bosom. She must listen politely, and like a lady, to Popsy's chatter. 'No,' she now found the spirit to say in a clear firm voice to Popsy, 'no, I never regret my marriage. My husband writes very interesting books; and we talk a lot about them, about history and the old days, and he asks my advice, though of course I don’t know much yet; and we go walks up Lovers’ Lane in the afternoons. I expect you know Lovers’ Lane, Popsy? There’s a gate, a little way up, that looks over a pond and an ash-tree. Mr No-man and I often look over that gate.’

Wizzie’s volubility was now rewarded — though in truth she hardly knew what she was saying — for Old Funky opened his eyes and their glances met. But then it seemed to the girl that it was extraordinarily difficult for either of them to look away. They could only stare; and this they did, mute, bewildered, hypnotized.

‘Yes, it’s a very nice lane, as you say, Popsy. You said you knew it, didn’t you? And it’s nice leaning over that gate, isn’t it, by that pond?’

But Popsy, though she knew Lovers’ Lane, had apparently never noticed the pond. ‘Can you see yourself in it?’ she asked innocently. ‘I like seeing my face upside down, and it looking at me.’

It transpired, however, that Grummer Urgan had known the Lovers’ Lane pond in former days, though not for twenty or thirty years. ‘But in my time you certainly couldn’t see your face in it. You couldn’t see anything in it but green slime. In my time girls were frightened of it. ‘Twere quite a game with our young men to lift we over gate and pull we toward thik green pond. ‘Twere only a very little pond, ‘ sknow, no more nor a girt hole in ground under thik ash-tree, but ‘ twere turble deep. Sookey Marabout — and don’t ‘ ee say’ — this was addressed not to Lovie’s mother but to her father— ‘thee don’t mind Sookey Marabout, Father, for you were mighty taken wi’ she in them days. She used to tell as how when her grand-dad, what lived up that way, towards Pigeon Barn, tried to find bottom of thik green pond, it hadn’t no bottom, but just went down and down. “You’d have come out in Australy, Sookey,” her grand-dad said, “if you tied your pinny up wi’ quarry-stones and dived in. And what’s more,” ‘a said, “thee’d have to take care, Sookey, that ‘ee went in with thee’s head and heels fixed proper, according to geography rules, for’t be wondrous, they do say, how travelling down turns into travelling up when you be going to Australy. It have to do wi’ volcannies what be down there. They be turble rough with a maid wi’ stones in her pinny travelling to Australy, they volcannies be!”‘

‘He’s wanting to speak to me; but he durstn’t open his mouth,’ was the thought that flickered through Wizzie’s mind now, as she said aloud to Mummy Urgan, ‘What’ll I give Lovie except bread and milk? Does she have any meat yet? She looks as if she wants feeding up.’

The old woman’s face lost in a moment its air of sentimental reminiscence. ‘You best arst him,’ she replied curtly. ‘He’s always been one for interfering. The Yeovil doctor said not to give her a taste of meat; but he were minded — oh, I do know him! — to make a show-maid of her, and he thinks a bit o’ meat do build up. ’Tis all of this here show business, and making of ’em to turn turvy, and jump through they hoops, that he thinks about!’

‘What a lovely dress, if you’ll excuse the remark,’ cried Popsy irrelevantly. It had not been concealed from Wizzie with what passionate interest her successor was gloating over her fashionable attire; but now, when the lively girl, with her bangles all jingling, took the edge of one of the visitor’s frills between her plump finger and thumb, the irony of it was that in our friend’s watching of Old Funky’s twitching mouth the careless ladylike retort she had been storing up for Popsy’s benefit was never uttered.

‘Sookey Marabout were a wunner!’ went on Mummy Urgan pensively, her sentiment for buxom young women overcoming her spleen about Lovie’s diet. ‘You do mind she, Father? Her and me were always together. “Black and White” the boys called we in them days. Gracious! But Sookey were a tansy for the lads to spy on when her went minny-catching! You've a-said the same your wone self, Father, and what a prime one her'd have looked on hoss's bare back.'

'Why can't he spit it out?' Wizzie kept thinking, her eyes growing rounder and rounder as they remained fixed on the man on the bed. 'You filthy old devil! Have you gone dotty? Yes, you look like a monkey in a cage — that's what you look like — jabbering to yourself and can't spit out a word!'

But Old Funky sat up at last and said his say. 'The old hoss,' he began, and this word alone made the girl relax and move a step towards him. 'The old hoss — have — pined — and pined — for 'ee, Wizz. Her can't no more manage 'un than my old 'ooman can. 'Tis — a wonder us — don't — hear 'un stamping and neighing for 'ee now! I'se warrant he knows right enough 'ee be in caravan!'

Wizzie's eyes opened to their fullest extent. Her mouth twisted. The old woman, watching her, evidently expected a fit of hysterics, but even she could not know how great was the lump that rose in the girl's throat.

As she struggled against that great lump, which wouldn't down, her heart made the maddest leap it had made that day. 'Suppose I stayed here', her heart whispered, 'and rode him again tonight? And rode him tomorrow, and never stopped riding him till we were both dead! I'm proper fond of my old D. and I hate you to hell, you filthy old monkey, but — but — suppose I never went back? He'd look after Lovie, and I should be gone!'

And then her body, below — oh, deep below! — her beating heart, must needs add its moan to that sobbing lump under the lace frills that Popsy envied. 'At least you were man enough to take me,' her body cried. 'You didn't play doll with me. You wanted me, me down in here, me to the bottom of hell. And that made me weak, and you got me, got me and gave me Lovie! You were a man anyhow, you old devil! You didn’t care how I fought. You didn’t care if you did get my nail-marks under your wig.’ Oh, but it would burst, that lump in her throat, in another second.

‘Good-bye, Mrs Urgan! Good-bye, Popsy, old sport! Good-bye, you over there! Can’t you take a girl’s hand, then, who hates you so, and who’ll never, never forgive you? That’s all you can do, is it — sit on your bed and shut your eyes? I wish I could shut my eyes and see nothing — see nothing forever! Good-bye, good-bye, all! Mr No-man’s waiting for me. My husband, Mr D. No-man, is waiting for me with Lovie.’

She was out of the caravan and down the steps before Popsy had time to utter a word, before Mummy Urgan had time to shake Old Funky by the arm and tell him the fiver anyway was safe. She was out and down the steps just in time, just in time for the lump not to break in their sight.

‘Did I look hard and cold and cruel to him?’ she thought. ‘Did he think I was all Mrs No-man? Did he think I wouldn’t give Lovie no meat, wouldn’t let her skip and jump, wouldn’t let her turn wheels in her fine clothes? I hope he did. No, no, no, I don’t hope he did. But oh, the old filthy devil, how like a monkey he looked! But he didn’t stop because I fought. He didn’t stop because I dug my nails into his bald head. He went on. He went on till he’d given me Lovie. So I have known a man, though I am Mrs No-man!’

All this while, though she didn’t know it, she was running so fast that her little black hat was blown all to one side. But just as she reached the exit from the Fairfield, the whirligig engine stopped; and in the sudden silence, as she stood there panting and straightening her hat — for everyone was staring at her and she wanted to swallow the lump and get her breath — there did come, quite unmistakably to her trained ears, the sound of a horse’s whinny.

At this sound she swung round and started running back. Who but she knew the exact place where he was now with the show starting? As she ran, her eyes must have looked so wild and so fixed, and her face, between the new hat and the new dress, must have looked so distorted, that people nudged each other and turned to stare after her. But there, where she knew she would find him, she found him! A lad she'd never seen before was leading him out ready for the show, but her fashionable dress awed the boy, and he only drew back and gaped helplessly at what he saw.

For the great lump in her throat had burst now, burst at last, and as her tears rained down on the old horse's neck her arms were round him, her convulsed cheek against him. Her hat might hang disregarded now from her dishevelled hair, her purse might slip to the ground. Her life was her life again, as it had not been since All Souls' Day. The old horse kept making a pitiful bowing movement with his head, but from tail to ears he knew her, gave himself up absolutely to her, while long shivering spasms of contentment trembled through his frame. No barrier divided her girl's body from the horse's body. Her pretty clothes were nothing. His gay trappings were nothing. Her shaking sobs were his, her flowing tears were his, and the wetness of her mouth, as with lips apart she pressed her face against him, mingled with the moisture and warmth of his hide.

But the lad who was watching all this suddenly seized his bridle. 'Miss Popsy! Miss Popsy!' he cried. 'Coom 'ee here quick, miss! Coom 'ee here quick! Here be a lady loving thee's hoss like 'a were human! Coom quick, missy! Coom quick!'

Wizzie's hat as well as her purse was on the ground by this time, and the lad, still shouting to Popsy, picked them up and thrust them hurriedly into her vacant hands. But the sight of the glittering Popsy's approach brought her to her senses. With one quick movement she pressed her wet face against her friend’s nose; then, letting the lad drag him round towards his approaching rider, she readjusted her hat, squeezed her purse against her breast, waved her hand to the girl, and walked steadily away without once looking back.

But to her own surprise it was a strangely passive sadness she now felt as she walked back towards the town. She had suffered violently before; she had been rent and torn before. This was a different feeling altogether. This was not despair. She didn’t feel any wild or desperate emotion. She had felt much worse that day when they got the Yeovil letter and she’d flung herself across the bed.

‘ Will this last?’ she wondered as she gave herself up to what was almost a sweet sadness. She walked very slowly by the station gates, by the brewery gates.

It was a queer feeling she had, but she remembered having it once before, in the circus-ring, when she was on her horse’s back, balanced on one leg, with bare thighs and bare upraised arms, and the crowd holding its breath. It was a feeling as if she were crossing a tight-rope between two worlds, her past world and her future world, and as long as she was balanced there, free of all responsibility, absolved from doing, thinking, deciding, she felt only a sort of winnowed essence of both her past and her future. Not that she could analyse all this. She always told Jenny that she wasn’t one for brooding, but there were two things that kept rocking up and down on the wave of her mood. One of them was the way Old Funky had shut his eyes. ‘That wasn’t only for Lovie,’ she said to herself. The other was the way the horse had whinnied. ‘He couldn’t have heard my voice,’ she thought. ‘He must just have known.’

It was not till she reached the cenotaph — and how like No-man it was to wait for her there, when she might easily have gone straight up South

No-man was seated on a bench about a hundred yards up the avenue, and Lovie was playing on the grass border by his side. ‘He must have taken for granted, the fool,’ she thought, ‘that because we came by his damned Itching Street we’d have to go back by it! Couldn’t he have had the wit to think I’d want to get a few things on our way, in the town? I can see already how it’s going to be. I’m going to have all the bother of Lovie, and he’s going to pet her and spoil her and make her troublesome!’

She got fairly close to them without being seen, for No-man’s head was turned as he watched the little girl, who was on the further side of him; but when she came near, it was the child who saw her first.

With one glance in her direction, Lovie, with both her small fists full of blades of grass that she had been picking, bolted helter-skelter to the man’s knees, where she promptly hid her face.

‘Don’t be so silly, Lovie! It’s only me! You’re not afraid of me, are you?’

Such were Miss Ravelston’s first words in her new role of maternal authority, and Lovie, hearing this querulous feminine voice behind her in place of the indulgent chuckles of her elderly playmate, only buried her face the deeper between the man’s knees, while her thin bare arms, each hand clutching its own handful of grass, lay stretched out along his thighs.

But No-man took the child by the waist with both his hands, and, lifting her from him, struggled to his feet, and held her high up in the air.

This abrupt action of his, in place of disturbing the small creature or making her angry, obviously delighted her. As a matter of fact it was the kind of thing Old Funky had done with her from her infancy; and Wizzie was soon to discover that all such rough-and-tumble games, especially when there was a touch of acrobatic daring in them, always quieted the child's nerves, quelled her naughtiness, and threw her into a trance of happiness.

On this occasion the man finished by perching her on his shoulder, but he was prevented from carrying her in this position by the sharp tone in which Wizzie bade him put her down, and also by the fact that he had left his great stick on the bench.

Once on the ground, however, Lovie fell into a grave and silent mood — Wizzie suspected she was beginning to feel the pinch of home-sickness for the caravan and the whimsies of Old Funky — and offered no objection to walking solemnly between them, a hand in the hand of each. They advanced peacefully enough in this manner till they reached the end of the South Walks and turned down No-man's favourite Icen Way. Here the little girl dragged a good deal, for, though accustomed to rough-and-tumble games, she was evidently not used to walking, and it was to the accompaniment of forlorn little whinings such as 'Lovie's tired', 'Lovie wants to go home', 'Man carry Lovie', that they finally reached the street door of No-man's lodging.

Here — though Wizzie fancied he gave her an almost threatening look, as much as to say, 'You just dare to treat her badly!' — he brought out his latch-key.

'Don't forget to have something to eat, yourself,' he said gently, 'when you and Jenny are getting her dinner. I'll do a little work, have a bit of a walk, and be with you for tea. About the usual time, eh? Well, good-bye, Lovie, my pretty! See you again soon.'

So, for no more than the third time since she had become a mother, Wizzie found herself alone with the child of her womb. Queer how angry it made her feel to note the trembling lip and the wide-open frightened eyes with which the small creature saw the door shut upon D. No-man.

'I've got to pull myself together,' she thought. 'I'm in for it now, and must carry it through. Jenny'll be surprised how pretty she is. I'll take her over to Glymes in the pram as soon as I've got her some clothes. Why did he make me come this way? I meant to buy—'

But she decided, since they were so near home, to give up buying anything now till after Lovie had had a good meal. She had forgotten her door-key; and so, like D. No-man on a recent occasion, she was compelled to knock at the door and stand there in the narrow lane till someone should come.

She waited so long that she came to the conclusion that Mrs Dearth must be out. 'She's run out to get something for Lovie's lunch,' she said to herself. But what was she to do with the kid? It would be silly to go to a café when Jenny must be back any minute.

But her thoughts were interrupted by Claudius opening the door. 'What — Mr Cask!' she murmured. 'Is anything wrong? I thought you were at the coal-yard. This is my little girl Lovie, Mr Cask. Say "How do you do?" to Uncle Claudius, Lovie.'

Claudius, who was looking disturbed and upset, bowed gravely to the child as if she had been sixteen instead of three. 'No,' he replied, glancing nervously up and down the lane. 'It's early closing, and he lets me go when he goes. He closes the yard on Thursdays, and goes to Weymouth with his wife. She's a very nice person, his wife is; she—' Once more he threw one of his most searching glances up and down Friary Lane, for he was evidently extremely unwilling to be caught by Jenny in her house, though the connection between the two abodes was still kept open. 'She', he went on, ' is very interested in goldfish. She keeps them in a tank. They know her. They come to her. You would like to see some golden fish, wouldn't you, little girl? The Romans had aquariums of goldfish. Did you know that? And the Americans too, I understand, are very fond of them.'

When they were inside and the street door was shut, Wizzie saw that the back door at the end of the passage was wide open. This door led into the yard between their houses, and it was clear that Jenny, in spite of their quarrel, had refrained from fastening it.

'I saw you from my front window', he murmured, whispering the words as if he were in church, and looking wistfully through the half-open dining-room door at his old place by the fire, 'and I knew she wasn't in, for I'd watched her go out.'

Wizzie, holding her child tightly by the hand, and anxious to get her safe upstairs, was all the same not quite impervious to this picture of Mr Cask taking advantage of the early closing to watch his old friend's outgoings and incomings from his bachelor window. She surveyed the Roman physiognomy before her with more sympathy than usual. The horse-smell and horse-warmth that were still in her nostrils seemed to lend themselves to intercourse with this simple-minded man.

'He's got no one, now Jenny's turned against him,' the girl thought, and in her present softened mood she was aware of a faint impulse to be nicer to Claudius than she'd been before. She felt he caught this softening in her, but she was unprepared for his next move.

'Come in a minute while you're waiting for her,' he whispered earnestly; and then added humbly: 'I'd like this little miss to see my airplane.'

Normally Wizzie would have made an excuse and taken the child upstairs; but her experiences that morning had left her tender to any emotional appeal. Holding Lovie by the hand, she submissively followed the man out of the house, across the little intervening yard, and into his desolate front room.

There was his chair by the window! He had evidently been sitting at that point of observation for some time, waiting to get a glimpse of the wrathful Jenny, for the Daily Worker lay on the floor, and Wizzie noticed the end, reduced to the smallest possible dimensions, of this ascetic smoker's latest cigarette lying on the window-sill.

Claudius brushed hurriedly with the flap of his coat the only other chair in the room and begged his visitors to be seated; and in her new mood of docility Wizzie sat obediently where he placed her and took Lovie on her lap.

Lovie stared wonderingly about her from this position; and well she might, for even Wizzie herself was shocked by the spectacle of this private parlour of the candidate for the Communist Party. Nothing but maps and plans and drawings, of factories and dynamos and every new type of airplane and electrical machine, adorned the walls. Books were scattered indiscriminately everywhere, and the floor was littered with magazines and papers. A wide-open door led straight out of this wretched room into the kitchen, and on the kitchen stove Wizzie's eye marked vaguely — although everything she saw just then seemed to be seen through a vision of Old Funky crouched on the bed with his eyes tight shut, and a vision of her old horse dragged away towards Popsy — a bubbling pot from which came an unappetizing smell of cabbage.

But the neglected forlornness of the man's sitting-room was what shocked her most. Wizzie was the very opposite of a domestic person, but after all she was a woman, and a woman who had her own child on her lap, and what she saw here outraged something in her that lay deeper than her egotism, deeper than her disdain, deeper than her cynical indifference.

She suddenly became aware of a violent rush of indignation against Mrs Dearth. What was the matter with Jenny that she could let a man, any man, live so near to her, and with no door locked between them, in such a way as this?

Meanwhile, Claudius shuffled across his littered room and came back with a model of an airplane in his arms. ‘Isn’t this pretty?’ he said, addressing Lovie and waving the airplane up and down before the child’s face so as to resemble a flight through the air.

But the little girl pushed it away with her hands. ‘The goldfishes!’ she cried. ‘Want the goldfishes!’

Wizzie’s natural instinct was to shake her for this rudeness; but into such a queer mood of soft-hearted tenderness to the whole human race had her encounter with the horse thrown her that all she did was to apologize to Claudius. ‘Lovie forgets where she is,’ she said quietly.

Now whether Claudius’s attitude to the little girl was one of Communistic principle, or whether it was the sort of old-fashioned chivalry that would have been displayed by Duke Jonathal of Dorchester, mentioned by William of Malmesbury, is a delicate point; but standing in front of the little girl as she sat on Wizzie’s lap, he compelled his airplane to perform such a series of astonishing gyrations that even a child’s obstinacy could not resist the seduction of the spectacle.

Before very long, in fact, Lovie had slipped off her mother’s lap and was seated cross-legged on the floor playing some silent game of her own with the airplane, while Claudius was taking advantage of a woman’s presence in his retreat to put various crucial questions to her about the preparation of cabbage, so that it should not be too unpalatable, and the washing of men’s shirts, so that they should not lose altogether the shapes of their collars.

Wizzie moved about with him through the rooms, putting salt into his cabbage and hanging his laundry so that it should not be hopelessly remote from the warmth of the stove, and, as she did so, the magnificent simplicity and humility of the man, combined with the absence in him of all self-pity, affected her as human goodness had never affected her before. Wizzie had never had the luck to encounter much of what we mean by ‘simple goodness’, and, as we have hinted, whatever elements of it may have existed in D. No-man had been obscured for her by the constant pressure of that worthy’s self-centred egoism.

Something about Claudius’s freedom from normal human guile kept reminding her of her horse, and she thought, ‘I’ll slip in here tomorrow when he’s out, if that yard door is not locked, and clean up for him.’

D. No-man would indeed have opened his eyes had he caught this resolution passing through his girl’s small head. As so often happens with a man and woman who live together and are forced to humour one another’s less pleasing peculiarities, there were aspects of each of these friends of ours that were completely unknown to the other one.

‘There she is!’ cried Claudius suddenly, drawing quickly back from the window, out of which, for all his politeness, he had been constantly stealing anxious glances. ‘You’d better go,’ he added hurriedly and bluntly. ‘I don’t want her to—’ He stooped down, and picking up his airplane from the floor with one hand, gave the other to Lovie to help the child to her feet.

Wizzie smiled at his trepidation; and even Lovie, with one of those inexplicable flashes of clairvoyance that children display when you least expect it, looked straight into his eyes as soon as she was on her feet, and said with intense deliberation, ‘My Mummy likes it here, and I likes it here, though there isn’t no goldfishes.’

Once more Claudius made the child a quaint little formal bow, such as he might have given to Wizzie herself. This gesture appeared eminently satisfactory to Lovie, who gave him a smile that made her small countenance resemble that of a fairy queen, and Wizzie thought, ‘She likes Claudius for just the opposite reason from D. No-man. He tumbled her about, while this one treats her like a princess. It must be one extreme or the other with her. Well! Perhaps I’m like that too. D. No-man’s never tumbled me about.’

Back again in Mrs Dearth’s quarters, Wizzie was quickly made aware, though no immediate reference was made to it, that Jenny knew perfectly well where they had been.

Jenny’s behaviour to Lovie was as different from D. No-man’s as it was from Claudius’s. She treated the child in a calm matter-of-fact way, as if little girls were as common as hips and haws, patting her hair, glancing suspiciously at her finery, picking up and dropping again between finger and thumb her chain of beads, and repeating in a rather reproachful voice, as if the child had done it herself out of malice to her elders, that she was very big to be only three.

Lovie had never met anyone in the least resembling Mrs Dearth, nor had she ever seen a woman before who was always busy about something and never enjoying herself, and as for Jenny's calm, matter-of-fact way of treating her, it struck Wizzie that the small creature was waiting and watching to see what appalling adult vice this unemotional behaviour concealed.

What it concealed for Wizzie's own experienced observation was a gathering storm; nor had the mother and daughter been long upstairs together when Mrs Dearth appeared at their door, her arms full of clothes.

These clothes, when they had been carefully laid out upon the bed, turned out to be a complete outfit for a little girl of three; and it soon transpired that it was to make these purchases, and with no thought at all of the child's meal, that Jenny had been shopping for so long.

It was the clothes that precipitated the storm, for, mingled with all Wizzie's emotional reactions since the events in the circus-field, and underlying all her softenings towards Claudius, had been the pleasurable anticipation of dressing up her daughter in pretty and suitable things. And now, out of kindness of heart, but also, Wizzie suspected, out of a jealous desire to be the first to buy things for her friend's child, Jenny had taken the edge off this innocent pleasure.

In her vexation Wizzie's athletic hands were more hasty and brusque than they ought to have been in removing from her daughter's person all the garish Urgan finery, and it was a pathetic little figure, with bare white arms and thin white petticoat, who was now plumped down in D. No-man's arm-chair by the fire.

There Lovie sat, with her legs hanging very straight and her round eyes fixed on the flames; there she sat, through all that followed between 'Mummy' and 'the lady'; there she sat, remembering sadly what funny faces Old Funk, as she had learnt to call him, used to make to keep her amused when she was waiting for dinner. Her great hope now was that the polite gentleman who played with airplanes might be persuaded to substitute goldfish once in a way. But it had long passed the time for that happy moment when Old Funk and Popsy would come in, laughing and hungry, and the caravan would grow warm and snug and full of nice smells, and when Grummer would tie on her bib and set her on her highchair.

Her new Mummy had very grand clothes. She would like to wear clothes like her new Mummy. And she longed to see ‘them golden fishes’. But ‘Lovie wants her dinner, and Lovie wants to go home,’ she thought; and, though she also thought, ‘Mummy’ll be cross if Lovie cries,’ before she knew what was happening big, slow, quiet tears were running down her cheeks and dropping from her chin into her small lap.

‘I thought you’d forget about early closing’, Jenny was saying, ‘and so I got these things before the shop shut. I made sure you’d be pleased with them! Don’t you like them? Would you have got different ones? You told me you didn’t know — and I thought—’

‘Oh, yes, they’re very nice, Jenny. It was only that I wanted — But I can get others later. These will do nicely now. But wouldn’t white socks have been better? I never thought of stockings for her, but of course—’

‘Oh, if you’re only thinking of the modern fashion—’

‘Yes, I know what you feel about all that — but I thought — and isn’t this vest too long? She’s got some sort of woollen thing on now under that little slip. Wouldn’t it have been better — and I had thought of blue for her — though of course pink will do, just for now — but oughtn’t her sash to go with...’

All the while this talk was going on, and the two women were picking up and laying down these little objects spread out on the bed, their nervous vexation against each other was mounting up.

‘I thought I’d find you here’, Mrs Dearth murmured presently, ‘but I saw where you were. He was on the look-out and made you go in. He spies on me all the time. He can’t rest till he’s got round everyone, and has everyone on his side. He’s done it with D. No-man. D. No-man and he are thick as thieves now, whereas they used, if anything, to dislike each other. “Anything to keep women down” is their motto. It’s funny how little anyone knows! I thought you were the last person in the world to join with him against me — but there it is! I was a fool to think what I did! It’s natural enough — when a man pities himself so, and is so sure he’s in the right — that he should try to wheedle a person’s best friend away from them — but I did think — though of course I knew what D. No-man was — that you were different. I’ve just been a fool — that’s what I’ve been.’

As Jenny spoke, she mechanically held up in both her hands, against the light, the small vest she’d bought that morning; and Wizzie, even while she retorted, pinched it carefully with her fingers, thinking to herself, ‘It’s not all wool. It’s wool and cotton. I’m sure Grummer Urgan’s put all wool against her skin.’

‘What put me wrong’, Mrs Dearth went on, ‘was not realizing all it meant, your being so sweet and submissive to D. No-man. Just because he takes his side, you must go and take his side! It’s just as if you and D. No-man were married; that’s what I’ve got to learn to say to myself now. “She’s acting”, I must say to myself, “as my Tom wanted me to act, only I never would. I had too much spirit! She’s acting like a good, patient, gentle little wife!”‘

The two women were now examining the out-of-door jacket and woollen cap that Jenny had purchased, and Wizzie, as she approached her offspring to satisfy herself that both these things were, as she felt sure they were, a good deal too small, was worried to see the child’s silent tears.

‘She’s hungry, the poor little mite,’ she thought. ‘I made sure Jenny would cook us a nice lunch. Instead of that—’

‘Yes, it must be a funny feeling’, Jenny continued, ‘to feel as afraid of a man and as slavish to a man as you’ve grown lately. But that’s what a woman with any independence has to face. Her own friends desert her the minute she shows spirit.’

‘Well,’ said Wizzie with a sigh, ‘now that you have been so good, Jenny, as to buy these things for her, I think, if you don’t mind, I’ll take her out to that tea-shop in High East Street just below No-man’s place. I believe I’ll go with her and see Thel this afternoon. If you say I’m too good to No-man, I may as well tell you what I think I’ll do after we’ve had a bite to eat. I think I’ll run up to that room of his and tell him Lovie and I are going out to Glymes if it stays fine, and may stay there for tea.’

Jenny Dearth laid down on the bed the sash she held in her hands, and, impervious to the fact that the child was just going to put the thing on, she began scrupulously folding it as if it were to be deposited in a cedar chest for fifty years.

Wizzie’s decision to take her daughter out was a bitter blow to her. Lovie’s appearance on the scene had been more than an exciting event to Jenny. It had given her a solid new interest, independent of her grievance against Claudius. Thus the idea of being left alone for the rest of the day in Friary Lane, with Claudius free to spy on her from his solitary quarters, filled her with a sense of desolation.

Knowing well what her friend was feeling, but not at all inclined to spare her, Wizzie now went over to the fire, lifted Lovie out of her arm-chair, and began to dress her on the hearth-rug in all her new clothes.

But it was Lovie herself who answered this objection by a piteous request to be dressed like her new Mummy. It would evidently have been the last straw to what she was enduring had she been compelled to put on again the Urgan clothes that had just been taken off.

‘I don’t think it’ll matter for once,’ said Wizzie in a tone as practical and assured as if she had been dressing her fifth child instead of her first and for the first time too; and she couldn’t help noticing, as in the process of turning Lovie round so as to get the new attire over her head she caught a glimpse of herself in the mirror, how the lines about her mouth and the creases under her chin assumed that air of preoccupied complacency that she had often noticed in the expression of women handling their children but had never expected to catch upon her own countenance.

‘I must say I can’t quite understand’, she now said to Jenny, leaving Lovie to stare for a moment into the flames while she crossed over to her dressing-table to get her big white comb for the child’s curls, ‘what you have against Mr Cask. I don’t know anything about politics, but I can’t see myself quarrelling with D. No-man even if he started calling himself an Anarchist. I know how teasing men can be. Gracious! I’ve heard D. arguing with Mr Quirm till you’d have thought it was a matter of life and death whether Maiden Castle was a town or a fort. Why do you look at me like that, Jenny? I’m not saying anything very awful, am I? No! I’m not going to hold my tongue! It’s time someone should tell you what everybody’s saying. Thel said it to me when I was last with her, and Mrs Quirm’s always saying it. They think you’re hard and unforgiving to Mr Cask. They can’t understand, any more than I can, any more than anyone can, a person quarrelling with a man about politics. Thel says it’s because you’re a suffragette, and that suffragettes quarrel with everybody, but I thought all that was all over now. Besides, Jenny, dear, if you’ll allow me to say so, I think women ought to have more sense than to bother about men's opinions. No! Don't look like that.'

As she spoke, she smoothed out the new frock round the little girl's waist, and, placing her again in the chair, knelt down to put on her stockings, conveying in the quick sideways glance she gave her friend as she did this a clear intimation that it was a thousand pities she hadn't bought socks.

Jenny, erect by the table, folding and unfolding in her fingers the sash for the child's waist, had already assumed the look of indignant grievance which according to D. No-man made her face at once handsomer and more human.

'I'm not saying this because he was nice to me and Lovie. I'm saying it because — because we're friends, Jenny. I used to hear in the circus, especially when they'd been drinking — and Mr Cask never touches a drop — terrible rows all the time over politics; but it never bothered me! They like having their ideas, men do. It makes them feel — you know! And if you contradict them, like you must have contradicted him, it makes them obstinate, and they go and do just what he's done, to make you feel — you know!'

It indeed seemed difficult for Jenny even to begin to say all she knew, and her tragic expression ruffled the maternal complacency of her friend's face.

'Neither you', she began, 'nor anyone else know anything about Claudius and me, so the sooner this silly talk stops, the better! We've worked together for years, helping — oh! no one will ever know how many people! It's been my life to carry out his plans — all for helping people, and helping them in sensible, practical ways. He's been silly about it sometimes, I know, and people have been ungrateful, but we've gone on, gone on for years and years, steadily and in spite of everybody. It's — brought — us — nearer — together — than anyone has any idea of. And now, for a mere fancy, and to spite Dumbell, whom nobody, not even his wife, takes seriously, he goes and throws it all up! Do you know what he says now? No, you don't know; and none of you know, and none of you want to know! He says that charity's no good, that helping people's no good, that the only cure for everything is to become a Communist. And it isn't as if the Communists want him. They don't! I know them. I've heard them talking to him. They're all for destroying things, for changing everything, and they stick at nothing! They don't want a man like Claudius who wouldn't hurt a fly. I tell you I know them, and they're only playing with him and using him. Think of their letting him — a man like that and with a position like his — work in a coal-yard till he ruins his health. Is that their way of changing things? It'll kill him. That's all it will do. And — everything — will — be — the same — and he'll be dead. That's their precious Movement, as they call it. Oh! it makes me sick to talk of it. Here were we two, working to help people, not for any silly idea like what your drunken circus-men quarrel about, but just to help them, and then Dumbell must come with his nonsense that none of us have ever taken seriously — and — so — it — all happened — but what none of you understand is what it broke up. It — broke up — the most — pure — and — and spiritual friendship that's ever been. It wasn't — like — what — what people thought. We were more than just a man and a woman — we were equals, I tell you! He always listened to what I said. We were different from the rest of you. We were like one person! And now — just to get an advantage over a little idiot like Dumbell — all this ended! Sometimes I feel as if I couldn't —'

She broke off with a choking sound in her throat, and fell into a deep gulf of intense and miserable thinking, during which she kept winding the child’s sash like a bandage round and round her arm.

She suddenly felt older than everyone she knew, older even than Old Funky! Her present mood of acceptance of fate, her renunciation of her work, of the horse, of her life, seemed to put her outside all these narrow, bitter misunderstandings. Her feelings were less obscure to herself than usual, as she stared at her friend’s brightly decorated arm. The familiar Dorchester landmarks she had recently seen — the brewery, the cenotaph, the spire of All Saints’, the South Walks chestnuts in their bloom — came back to her now like a row of diminishing milestones in the long perspective of the road she had to follow. All she had seen in that momentous retreat from the circus-field seemed to have lodged itself in her mind like the solemn syllables of a materialized paternoster or Hail Mary, bringing a dim voluptuous detachment from human complications.

It had never been her way to draw back from the pressure of her fate; rather, save for the crushing fever of Lovie’s birth, she had submitted with a sort of stoic sensuality to whatever came. ‘I am dead now’ had been her feeling when she went back alone to the convent; and something of the same nature, though softer and gentler, had been her mood when she allowed that boy to lead the horse away. The hands with which she now struggled with Lovie’s stockings, trying to turn them into socks, were the hands of the ghost of Wizzie Ravelston, a resigned and patient ghost that even Old Funky could hurt no more.

That bright bandage round Jenny’s arm became at this moment the focus-point of two women’s souls, each living in her thought; but whereas

Jenny's thought was one reiterated 'How could he do it? How could he deliberately hurt me so?', Wizzie's mind used that twisted sash as if it were only one more milestone on the way of her fate, a sad though a shining milestone, reminding her that, though she might be a ghost without a heart, she had a child to take care of. 'Thel doesn't know', she said to herself, 'what it is to have a baby.'

But a difference of opinion between herself and the little girl now broke up this voluptuous detachment. 'No, leave them like that! Don't you dare to touch them!'

'But — them be socks now — and Lovie wants stockings!'

'What have you gone and done with that child's clothes, you ignorant circus-girl?' Thus, and not otherwise, did Wizzie interpret the look which Jenny gave her when that lady too was roused from her bitter thoughts by Lovie's obstinacy. 'I've turned them down,' Wizzie replied to this unspoken challenge. 'They're too short for stockings and too long for socks. I've turned them — No! I won't have you meddling with them any more, Lovie! Sit still now and let me talk quietly to Aunt Jenny.'

But if Wizzie could interpret a glance from her friend, she could also interpret a glance from her daughter; and Lovie's indignant look said, as plainly as if the child's shrill voice had been raised to its highest pitch, 'I've lived too long, you silly new Mummy, and I've seen too much of life, not to know what talking quietly to Aunt Jenny means. It means making little girls be good so that grown-up people can be as bad as they want to be!'

'Sit still, I tell you, child! I suppose, Jenny — you haven't — ever — had — any suspicions, have you?'

Jenny came towards her, unwinding as she did so the sash from her arm, and the two women proceeded to fix it round the child's waist. Lifted hurriedly out of her chair, Lovie displayed in this transaction a good deal more concentration of mind than either of her elders. The escape of the slippery syllables ‘suspicions’ into that thickly charged air caused the two pairs of eyes that encountered each other across the small figure standing on the rug to burn with a dangerous animation.

‘What do you mean? Have you heard anything? I tell you if I caught anyone breathing a single word about him in that way, I’d soon let them know—’

These strong words from the lips of ‘Mummy’s lady-friend’ passed over the little girl’s bent head as naturally and easily as the smoke of a fire over a sleeping dog. Lovie was used to much less elegant outbursts and to their utterance in much more violent altercations. The two antagonists would indeed have had to resort to something more emphatic than words to make Lovie at that absorbing moment stop smoothing out with her small fingers the front part of her sash.

‘I may have heard things, and I may not have heard things,’ retorted Lovie’s mother, tying and untying the sash at the child’s back. ‘What I did was just to ask you what you knew; so you needn’t flare up so.’

‘I know what you’re talking about,’ said Jenny in a low tense voice, and Wizzie could see it was not easy for her to say the words. ‘You’re talking about those Communist girls he meets at their crazy gatherings. Yes, I have sometimes—’ Here she lowered her voice so much and spoke with such suppressed emotion that even Lovie lifted her eyes from her sash and stared at her. ‘Have sometimes thought that it was one of them that had got round him. But none of them come here. That I know, for I’m — and it’s only right I should be — always on the watch. I’ve made up my mind — though I’ve told him I won’t speak to him till he breaks with these people, and he knows I’ll keep my word — that if I do see one of those women hanging round here, I’ll tell her what I think of her, coming between me and him!

No! You and your Glymes friends have no idea what he's done to me. He's taken his money away from me — did you know that? — to give to these people! I sometimes feel as if I couldn't bear it, as if I should do — something — I don't know what — but something — that'll show him — when it's too late...'

Wizzie, after tying the little girl's sash in a big bow, had followed her friend's words, but only with a part of her mind. She was struggling to retain her acceptance of things in spite of the fact that the image of Old Funky crouching on the bed with his eyes shut kept coming between her and her child's form.

As this crucial dialogue between her elders went on, however, Lovie's interest waned. It was the sort of thing she had listened to so often in the caravan between Grummy and Popsy; and now, looking about for something to play with — for the first thrill of the new clothes had passed — she picked up from the floor one of the torn halves of Old Funky's letter, and, scrambling back into the chair, began tearing it into a faint resemblance to a doll. Lovie had never had a doll. The nearest approach to such a thing had been a sorrowful ape swinging in a wire cage, but though, tearing the wires asunder, she had made something of this, pretending sometimes it was Grummy and sometimes Old Funk, she had never committed her heart to it. But at this moment, weary of these human voices going on and on, she did sigh for Monkey, and very soon, in a thin simulacrum scrawled with Old Funky's writing, she apprehended the presence on her lap of an entity she promptly christened Gwendolly, herself and this bit of paper becoming mother and child.

It is interesting to note the physical positions that women instinctively take when their interest is absorbed, and D. No-man would have been amused to observe how Wizzie at this crucial moment stood in his own most spontaneous pose, her arm propped on the mantelpiece opposite Lovie's chair and beneath the picture of Teucer Wye.

It being early-closing day in Durnovaria, quite a different set of noises floated into that upper room than were usual on a weekday; nor were they Sunday's noises. They suggested secular activity but not business activity; and just as our Wessex novelist has differentiated the sounds of the winds as they pass through various species of vegetation, so at this moment an experienced native, with his eyes as tightly shut as Old Funky had shut his, could have divined the early-closing temper of the citizens of Dorchester merely through the sounds that entered that room.

Watching her child with its new-born charge on its lap, and listening to these early-closing sounds, Wizzie, from her position by the mantelpiece, felt not only twice as old as the black-gowned woman against whose wrong-headedness she was protesting, but morally and spiritually superior to her.

'I have changed my opinion of you!' she thought, and she recalled how at first she had been quite embarrassed by her friend's infatuation and by her passionate desire to make her assert herself against No-man.

'Mr Cask', she thought, 'had good reason to be jealous of me, but he never was. You're a nice woman gone crazy,' she thought, and, from the height of her resigned detachment from all these wearisome human quarrels, she wondered if it was because Jenny had never had a child that she was so difficult.

'To anyone who's gone through all I have,' she thought, 'and has a baby to look after, it seems just silly waste of time to make a quarrel when there needn't be a quarrel.'

'Why don't you get your father to come and live with you?' she was now emboldened — perhaps by her position under Mr Wye's picture — to fling out.

‘Has No-man asked you to leave me?’ was the retort to this.

‘No, of course not — not yet anyway — but you’re always saying you’d like to have your father here, and Thel always says she’d like to be rid of him.’

Wizzie was ashamed of herself the moment she had said this. She could feel her spiritual vision of that long self-lacerating road of her life, with the police station and the brewery chimney and the cenotaph and the chestnut walk, calling on her to accept, accept, accept, receding into the distance, while this malicious remark brought her back to the very atmosphere she had renounced.

‘I’m not tired of being here.’

‘What do you mean by my bringing Father here, then? The only room he’d endure to be in is this one.’

‘I’m sorry, Jenny. You misunderstood me. I thought—’

But Jenny made no answer; and Wizzie recalled how a priest at the convent had told her once that she must never say anything that she couldn’t imagine the Blessed Virgin saying. ‘It would have been better’, she said to herself, ‘if he’d said “feeling”; but what I feel now, my good Jenny, is a longing to shake you out of all this nonsense!’

‘He hasn’t changed one bit to you. It’s you who’ve changed to him,’ she remarked.

Jenny stared wildly at her. ‘Sometimes’, she said, ‘I wish he would kill himself at that yard, and then we’d be at the worst!’

Wizzie removed her elbow from the mantelpiece and glanced at the girl among the water-lilies over their bed. She remembered looking at this picture that first night when she waited so long for No-man to come upstairs. How uneasy Mrs Dearth's infatuation had made her at first! It had reminded her of Grummer's mania for younger women. In her case it had gradually been transferred to Popsy, though she was sure it had never quite died out, not even after all that with Old Funky, but in Jenny's case this quarrel with Claudius was what had ended it.

'It's my figure they like!' she said to herself, as she contemplated the very different figure of the young woman among the lilies. 'It's the way I'm made, and the way I carry myself, and all that business that he put me through. It's not my face, for that's only passable once in a blue moon. Women certainly do like girls whose bodies have been trained, even when they're not like old Grummer was.

'But what tragedy airs you do give yourself, Jenny, sitting on that table and swinging those old boots of yours as if you'd like to kick the house down!' And then, in spite of herself, Wizzie suddenly felt a stab of pitiful pathos, a stab that went through her like a bare bodkin, for she remembered how, when she'd teased her friend, as long ago as Christmas, about these old-fashioned boots of hers, which were the kind that had elastic at the sides and might have belonged to her grandmother, Jenny had confessed that neither she nor Claudius ever bought new boots. 'We get second-hand ones at sales', she told her, 'and we try them on at home. He hasn't been into a shoemaker's for years, and the last I went into was with Dad, and that's ages ago. He once came back in a pair of tramp's boots that he'd exchanged on the Bridport road. I made him throw them away; but he wouldn't do it till I'd promised I'd stop wearing these.'

'These' were the boots with elastic at the sides that were now being so viciously swayed up and down under the table, and something about their particular kind of middle-aged shabbiness, combined with the black scowl on Mrs Dearth's rugged face, gave Wizzie a feeling as if, in some way she couldn’t understand, Claudius had been cruel to her. ‘Perhaps all men are cruel to all women,’ she thought.

‘He doesn’t care now what I wear,’ Jenny had said, ‘so I thought I’d wear these boots with elastic sides — so as to save my others.’

The two women, as they exchanged glances, now seemed to be trying desperately to plumb the depths of each other’s real thoughts. In the silence between them little Lovie looked up from her extempore doll, and it was clear that her instinct told her that whatever their thoughts were she was left in the cold, for she suddenly burst out, in an evident rush of self-pity, ‘I want to go home. I want my dinner. I want Grummy.’

‘In a minute, Lovie,’ said her mother. ‘We’re going out in a minute.’ And then, thrown into an unsympathetic mood once more by the thought of Jenny’s neglect to prepare them a nice lunch, she ostentatiously stretched herself and yawned. ‘What I think is,’ she remarked carelessly, ‘Mr Cask has spoilt you! If D. was as unselfish as he is, I’d never have thought of going back to the circus.’

‘I might have known it,’ said the other. ‘I was a fool to talk to you! Your life’s been so different from ours, and lived with such different people, that you can’t understand a love like ours. Love to you means only one thing, whereas to him and me, until he did this terrible thing—’

‘But I can’t see, Jenny, what he’s done that’s so terrible. Men have to have their ideas. It’s like that bit of paper to Lovie. You were lucky in keeping him sensible so long, and managing him so well, but why you have to pick such a quarrel with him the moment he does anything—’

Jenny’s eyes flashed. ‘Well! Go off to your restaurant, and go quick!’ She uttered the word ‘restaurant’ with as much contempt as if she’d said, ‘You’re a flighty circus-girl bent on dragging this poor little thing over to your precious friends at Glymes!’ But she closed with a yet more palpable hit. ‘Why, if you’ve any spirit at all, you don’t get a proper job on a proper stage, and show them that a woman’s something better than a man’s pet doll, is beyond me!’

This turning of the tables upon her own life confounded Wizzie, but curiously enough it made her feel troubled rather than angry. Was it possible that this noble resignation of hers was just weakness — just fear of making a struggle?

Seeing that she had made a hit with her last retort, Jenny slid down from her perch on the edge of the table, and, sinking into a chair opposite Lovie’s, covered her face with her hands.

Her attack had one unexpected effect upon Wizzie, for that young woman, either in an instinctive desire to prove to herself that her detachment from her career was no mere negation, or actuated by a dim awakening in her of some long-suppressed feminine response to domestic life, grew suddenly aware that this room of hers, which she had hitherto treated so cavalierly and taken so much for granted, was a disgrace to the mother of a child in a new sash. How well she knew every aspect of it, but only as she might have known a casual lodging in a town where she was working!

Hardly conscious of the complicated pressure of motives behind such a natural act, she moved over to the bed, and, picking up Lovie’s cast-off clothes that had been thrown across the head of it, began piling them in a little heap and tidying up the disarranged pillows. Catching sight of her own slippers, thrown down carelessly in the middle of the floor, she picked up these also, and placed them neatly side by side under the bed, on the very spot where, in one of their morning disagreements, she had kicked No-man’s stick out of his reach. Then she went over to the child and, bending down, gave another twist to the folds of one of her stockings, now converted into rather clumsy-looking socks. 'Mummy's got you to take care of now, hasn't she, love?' she murmured, with her head bowed over the child's knees. 'You tell Aunt Jenny that Mummy can't ride horses and wear tights and jump through hoops now she's got a little girl to look after.'

'I — simply — can't — understand you,' groaned Mrs Dearth, removing her hands from her face; and her tone had more sorrow in it this time than anger. 'But no one seems to care any more what I think! You used to agree to every word I said about your work and about not letting D. No-man thwart it. But of course we were friends then' — her voice became bitter again— 'and of course that was before you went over to Ella. Well, take the pram I chose for you, put on the hat I found for you, carry your child to Ella in the clothes I spent a whole morning getting for you! It's just like what I've had to get used to in this place! He and I used always to say it took the Romans to keep the devils out of this town. He and I have always known that that Quirm man over there brings bad luck to everyone he comes near by stirring up the old devils of this place. But go on — take your child to Ella and Quirm! Claudius and I used to say that if it hadn't been for that man, Nance's boy would never have died. You'll find your precious Ella with him. Ella's always with him. That's what's making poor Nance run after D. No-man. But I'll say this much. If you're going to give up your life's work to look after children, you'd better look after them. And the way to look after them in Dorchester is to keep them from people who stir up devils!'

With this as her final word, and not waiting for her friend's answer, the woman rose from her chair, moved to the door, opened and shut it quietly, and went heavily and wearily down the stairs.

With the new pram waiting for them outside the shop, Wizzie and her little daughter partook of their belated refreshment in the bow-window of an upstairs tea-room almost directly opposite the house in High East Street where No-man had his attic. They shared an omelette and several pieces of bread and butter. Wizzie drank coffee, Lovie ginger-beer; and they rounded off their meal by enjoying a full plateful each of bottled pears and cream.

Wizzie finished her dessert some while sooner than Lovie, and, lighting a cigarette, set herself to contemplate the attic window at which the man was now sitting who had bought her from Old Funky for eighteen pounds.

What a simpleton D. No-man was! An actual smile, though it was only a faint one, crossed the girl's lips as she thought of various outstanding examples of the incredible simplicity of D. No-man's selfishness. She thought of all the nights — and there seemed five or six years of them instead of five or six months — during which, at intervals that seemed to her as regular as clockwork, she had submitted to D. No-man's excited caresses. She remembered with special vividness how one night, after a love-making so protracted that she had actually fallen asleep before he left her alone, he had awakened her to listen to a long-winded and roundabout explanation of the various manias, as he called them, which made it impossible for him even so much as to attempt to consummate their union. She remembered how she had said to herself, as she listened to this rigmarole, that it was a very simple mania in her case that made it impossible for her to be anything but passive under these prolonged caresses, the mania, in plain words, of not being able to feel the least stirring of anything in her towards D. No-man except a friendly indulgence and a qualified gratitude!

She did not smile when she thought of his reiterated words about their recognizing each other, about their having belonged to each other in some previous incarnation. She was too much of a woman to be able to regard any profession of love, however extravagant, as a humorous thing or a thing to be laughed at; but though she took his sentimental sensuality very gravely, it never crossed the threshold of her consciousness that there could be a grain of truth in his fantastic notions.

She extinguished her cigarette and lit another.

The window of her tea-shop was not quite opposite D. No-man's house, and therefore, unless he actually leaned his head pretty far out, it was impossible to catch a glimpse of him.

'Think of his never once having asked me to go up to his rooms! Of course I don't want to go. It's nothing to me what his rooms are like. But it does seem odd, and Jenny once said it proved beyond question that he didn't really love me. Jenny said that men, when they really love us, always want us in their rooms so as to have the scent of us left there, and the feeling of us, and the thought of how we looked and what we said and did.

'Goodness, but he's a funy one, old D. No-man! I can't believe that it doesn't hurt him like hell, my having lain with Old Funky, and yet he won't admit it. Never once since we opened that Yeovil letter has he given a sign of minding. But he must mind in his heart! He must just cover it up, thinking it's grand to be like that, as men so often do. Of course it may be true, and not just in talk — the kind he soothes everybody with — that he's glad to have Lovie. There are men — Popsy used to tell me of a case she knew well — who like having their girl's child to live with them, especially, so Popsy said, when the kid's a bastard, but D. No-man's not that kind of a fellow at all, not a fellow who doesn't give a damn as long as his girl hugs him and messes about with him.

'What D. No-man's like is that polar bear they took me and Popsy to see, who walked up and down, without stopping once, over a single slippery rock, and didn't make a sound of sniffing or stretching, only went up and down by its dirty pool.'

At this point Wizzie's thoughts were interrupted by observing that Lovie, having finished her pears and licked her fingers, had brought out from between her sash and her frock that crumpled simulacrum of a paper doll she had been playing with in the arm-chair. She now was deriving unbelievable satisfaction from pretending to make this forlorn substitute for a second Lovie — this Lovie once-removed, whose new Mummy was the real Lovie — lick up whatever drops of pear-juice sweetness might be supposed to remain on that extremely bare plate. 'How the child makes herself at home wherever she is!' Wizzie thought. 'She might be in the caravan, with Grummy stirring the pot for supper, or she might be in...' And the girl's fancy called up, as she contemplated D. No-man's attic window, the pleasant warmth, on that grey afternoon, of a snug little parlour of her own. Why hadn't D. No-man made an attempt to get a little home for her? Never once since that first night in November had he suggested such a thing! It couldn't be because they weren't married. Lots of unmarried couples called themselves Mr and Mrs, and established themselves in conventional little homes. There would have been no need to bother about gossip. It was nobody's business but their own. And it wasn't the expense! She knew, none better than she, how much they were spending month by month. They could have afforded a little place of their own — if not a whole house, at least a flat to themselves. Why hadn't D. No-man at least thought of it? He seemed to take for granted that she'd be ready to on living indefinitely in this half-and-half way, neither with him nor without him.

Yes, there was reason enough for Jenny's perpetual harping on his selfishness! But why hadn't Jenny herself encouraged her to press him to give her a place of her own? Simply because she wanted to keep her in Friary Lane. That was life. Everybody wanted what suited them best! Jenny had been as bad as D. No-man in that respect. It would have been nothing less than desolation to her if they'd thrown up their room and moved.

She pushed back her plate now with a gesture that she knew was an unladylike one, and made signs to the young woman who had waited on them to give her the bill.

Once in the busy street, she found herself to her bewildered amusement one of a crowd of young mothers who were pushing their offspring in parcel-crammed perambulators up and down the pavements of that ancient thoroughfare. She pushed her little vehicle across the street and hesitated for a moment in front of D. No-man's house. How surprised he'd be if she rang the bell, got admitted, climbed all those stairs with Lovie, and knocked at his door! She knew he had the whole top of the house to himself. She had only to get in!

While she was hesitating, the master of the house came out and stood in the doorway talking to someone. The sight of this elderly man's placid countenance, every line and curve of which said 'Thou shalt not' to all the back-eddies of existence, dissipated in a second this reckless impulse. Hurriedly she pushed her perambulator away from the door and up the street; nor did she pause again till she had turned down Friary Lane, passed her own door, descended the hill, and crossed the little bridge by Claudius's coal-yard.

All the way along the path under the steep prison bank she suffered from the feeling of being an outcast and an outlaw. To Lovie's excited interest in the ducks, who, as they floated in the stream, kept making frantic efforts to remain head downwards long enough to reach the mud at the bottom, she responded with vague automatic monosyllables.

'No one knows how proud I am,' she thought, and a look of hard, bitter satisfaction came into her face as she thought how she had completely hidden from D. No-man the fact of her mother having been ‘a lady’. The whole scene of her mother’s death came back to her now, as she remorselessly quickened her pace. She became once more that white-faced young girl, with unweeping eyes and set mouth, who had deliberately buried her old life in her mother’s grave and gone back with the heavily veiled sister to the convent school.

As she pushed her perambulator now round the turn of Hangman’s Cottage, she experienced a moment of sick dizziness so vividly there returned on her the cold, savage, insane hardening of her young heart under the desolation of that time. She had gone through terrible things after that, things such as few young women, brought up as she had been, have to face; and many of these were due, as she well recognized, to a half-crazy recklessness in her own character, a passionate and almost sensual recklessness driving her to plunge headlong into self-laceration, but she had never, not even when she realized the pass to which her training by the Urgans had brought her, felt again the despair in her soul that she’d endured in that convent till the numbing power of the Mass wove a new skin over the wedge of iron.

But they were near the Frome now, and she had forgotten that it would be necessary to lift the pram over the little swing-gates on what D. No-man insisted on calling the Blue Bridge. This obstacle all the same would have been easily left behind if Lovie, who had had to cross the bridge on foot, hadn’t suddenly become naughty about being lifted back into her seat. There was, indeed, a tense and disturbing struggle between the two feminine wills at that point, for the little girl, passionately bent on reaching a patch of buttercups between the railings, clung indignantly to one of these rails and refused to budge.

Wizzie had already seized her in a rush of nervous anger when the sight of a horse placidly feeding on the other side of the field swept the taste and smell of her horse's warm neck into every fibre of her body. 'Lovie, listen!' she gasped, and her tone at once quieted the child, who turned startled eyes upon her. 'If Mummy ever hits you, you must pretend you're a horse, and do this.' And leaning over the top of the railing, she emitted, from a face so contorted with conflicting emotions that it was fortunate the child couldn't see it, a husky and rather ghastly parody of a horse's whinny.

This sound, projected from Wizzie's agitated throat across the field, had but small resemblance to any conceivable equine utterance, and the grazing animal didn't even raise its head, but the proceeding had an instantaneous effect upon the little girl, who stood transfixed with remorse, staring at her mother in mingled terror and puzzled commiseration.

'Don't cry, Mummy!' she burst out at last; and then, actually running to the perambulator and trying to scramble into it, she murmured, more to herself than to her mother, 'Lovie hates buttercups. Lovie's going to have hundreds of goldfishes!'

Wizzie felt, as she pushed the perambulator on through the mud at the back gate of Frome House and up the wide avenue of freshly green elm-trees, such a sense of overwhelming relief that she hadn't hit the child or shaken her savagely — for she had come near to doing both — that she actually reverted in the depths of her soul to her old convent religion, and, hardly conscious of what she did, murmured in Latin an incoherent Hail Mary as an outward sign of pardon and peace.

Meanwhile, Lovie, producing from somewhere about her small person the crumpled paper doll, sank back in her seat and began pretending that both she and it were riding to London in a circus-carriage to find the Queen.

The sight of certain scattered windrows by the roadside, composed of tiny fruit-seed wings that had been shaken down from the elm-tops by the pressure of the budding leaves — minute gauzy life-sails, as it were, each with its own germinal centre: air-perambulators of innumerable vegetation-Lovies voyaging through space — started our friend's thoughts off now on a different track. Something about the lavish and wasteful fertility of Nature on this grey spring day stirred up in the girl's senses — far down below that hardened place where with the body of her mother she had buried her young heart — an unexpected fount of natural feminine sensuality.

At that moment she found herself longing for embraces of a passionate lover. The feeling was so unexpected and so irresistible that it sent through her a long sweet shuddering spasm. It tossed up and shook away from her, while it lasted, that lodged and settled loathing of Old Funky, that shocking memory of the madness of her submission to him; but it was not of the violence to her youth of the old man's lechery that she thought, still less of the sterile caresses of her present bedfellow: it was of some unknown lover, some ardent lover of her own age to whom she could give herself up as these tiny vessels of life, tossed on the air from the budding elm-trees, gave themselves up to the warm breath of this cloudy day!

By the time she had propelled the now entirely content and preoccupied Lovie into the narrow road that led to Glymes, the whole brooding essence of that dark spring afternoon fell upon her and sank into her as if it itself, the non-human presence of one unique day among all the days of her life, had become the lover she longed for! And then by degrees, as she pushed her abstracted child along the winding lane and grew vaguely conscious of the white patches of stitchwort in the hedges and the diffused scent of hidden primroses on the air, this sweet spasm of sensual craving, this craving not for sterile lust but for equal passion, for life-creating passion, mounted so strongly to her head that it swept into its train other desires.

She imagined herself back again in tights and spangles, not the old lavender-coloured ones of which D. No-man used to murmur as he made love to her — as if the actual touch of her flesh was not in itself enough to stimulate his senses, just as he had to whisper ‘I bought you, I bought you!’ to turn her into what he called his Bronze Age girl before he could get his pleasure — but in fresh, new, beautiful, sky-blue ones, radiant as the supple limbs they covered, as she would balance herself on her old horse’s back (for she would buy the horse from Old Funky) or would leap like a shooting star, as no girl had ever leapt before, through a rainbow circle of dazzlement and wild applause!

She even went so far, as they drew near the pond where she had to open the gate, as actually to visualize a little house of her own, with things in it like those she faintly remembered as surrounding her infancy, and a porch covered with — but at this point, it must be confessed, our friend’s imagination began to debouch into a picture-show region that to D. No-man’s severe taste would have seemed the acme of false sentiment — at any rate, a porch at which Lovie stood waiting for her (a tall, extravagantly beautiful Lovie, dressed in clothes like those she had once seen worn by Lady Betty Millefleurs, who had come to the circus with her governess), waiting to welcome her return in her lover’s car from a bewitched and spell-bound hippodrome!

But there was such a lot of mud on both sides of this gate, and the gate itself was so hard to open, and there were such formidable-looking cows — and Wizzie was always afraid of cows — close to the hedgeless road on the further side, and the pond itself, by whose edge they had to pass when they’d got through the gate, looked so grey and gaping, so like the face of Grummer Urgan when she came upon her once with Old Funky, that her heart sank just as her shoes were sinking. There! The wet mud had splashed her ankles, splashed the bright new wheels of the perambulator, while Lovie, as frightened as she was herself at the cows, began to set up a piteous sequence of tearful protests. These protests became a shrill cry when the girl turned to get the gate closed and the cows, in place of retreating, began advancing a step or two.

It is always hard for women to believe that it is pure curiosity in these speculative beasts that makes them advance in this manner with such a formidable stare in their liquid eyes; and as she took hold of the perambulator again to force its wheels through the mud in full face of this array of horned countenances, she felt tempted to join her voice to that of her offspring and send up a wail of hopelessness.

Things were in this condition, and Wizzie was wildly gathering her forces together with the intention of leaving the perambulator and rushing at the cows as if they had been geese, when the figure of Mr Quirm, who, unknown to both of them, had been slyly surveying this scene from the recess of a gate to their right leading to the farm-house known as Coker’s Frome, leisurely advanced into the road between them and the row of horns.

Whether he realized the depth of her relief at his appearance at that moment Wizzie did not know, did not ever know, but with his presence at their side the cows seemed to change their whole position in the cosmos, and, whether in retreat or not, became merely a harmless addition to a warm grey day and a moist green landscape.

Mr Quirm wore no hat or coat and carried no stick. He had evidently drifted out, dazed and confused from an afternoon’s reading or writing, to get a breath of air before tea.

‘Hullo!’ he murmured, addressing the child in the perambulator after he’d given Wizzie a friendly smile and nod. ‘Hullo! Whom have we got here? Riding in state, eh? Riding to London to visit the Queen? And what’s this? Another little girl in the equipage? She’s fallen out of her carriage, this one has, as if I were a highwayman! Hold tight to your little mother, now you’re safe back!’

These last words were addressed to the tiny paper doll, which, at the moment he approached the vehicle, had fluttered down from Lovie’s lap into a puddle at his feet; but it was not only his recovery of that crumpled bit of paper that endeared him at once to the child’s heart; it was something that she alone knew, she alone, not Mummy nor anybody else, namely that she was playing at visiting the Queen just as the man had said!

It never entered her thoughts to wonder how this heavy, dirty, sallow, black-headed intruder in a woollen jersey knew about this secret game between herself and the paper doll. With an instinct beyond the instinct of any of his intimates, beyond that of Nance herself, and far beyond that of his son, Lovie had divined the fact, after one glance at that majestic, nebulous, sickly-looking face bending down to pick up that bit of paper, that here was someone who treated existence exactly as she did, that is to say, who regarded what you were pretending as the only real reality in your life. This being the case, it hardly required explanation that he should have jumped to the right conclusion about her doll, namely that she was the troublesome Gwendolly going to Court in a circus-carriage with her severe mother Lovie.

And as for Wizzie herself, perhaps never since that first day with the Urgans, when she had realized with a young girl’s penetration that Old Funky liked her so well that nothing would stop him from giving her the best training he could, had she felt so rejoiced to meet anyone as she felt now to meet Mr Quirm. She liked him for his evident admiration of Lovie, she liked him for saving them from the cows, and above all she liked him for looking at her as if he found her beautiful and desirable.

With D. No-man she always felt, when he looked at her, as if he were trying to think up something fantastic that would make him want to make love to her, whereas Nance's husband looked at her as if the sight of her, just as she was, warmed, as Grummer would have put it, the cockles of his heart.

She felt indeed, as she allowed him to wheel the perambulator and walked by his side, that he got as much elation from just being near her as D. No-man got when, by calling up her lavender-coloured tights, or by imagining she was his Neolithic captive, or by reminding himself that he had bought her for eighteen pounds, he worked himself up into a mood to take his pleasure of her as she lay staring at Thel's picture of Mr Wye or listening to the paper-boys selling the Echo.

'I suppose', he remarked presently, in a voice so casual that Wizzie thought he must be referring to that ridiculous bed-post that D. No-man made such a fuss about, 'your good man hasn't yet told you what we discovered that day at Maiden Castle?'

'Oh dear, no, Mr Quirm. D.'s never one for talking about his walks! He adores walking. I've never heard of a man who loves it more than he does, but I suppose I don't seem interested enough. He's very proud, you know, though he pretends not to be. But I can't help growing a bit tired of the same old thing in the same old way. You'd think, to listen to him, that no one had anything else to do but to call a lesser willow-wren a lesser willow-wren, or a dead-red-nettle a dead-red-nettle! But D. certainly adores walking.'

As with her mental picture of a beautiful daughter awaiting her in a jasmin-covered porch there was a touch of the influence of the cinema, so in the particular tone in which she uttered the word ‘adores’ there was a peculiar girlish archness that betrayed the influence of Thuella. Neither in the convent nor in the caravan had Wizzie been permitted to establish her self-expression on a firm personal ground. Both from the sisters and from Grummer she had learnt reticence and self-control, but no one had warned her against copy-cat intonations when she wanted to make a favourable impression in conversation.

‘Oh, yes, he told me he had walked all round the Ancient British camp with you; but he said you hadn’t had time to visit the excavations.’

‘Then he didn’t tell you what we excavated?’

‘No. He said nothing more. Was it a Roman relic, Mr Quirm?’

But in her heart Wizzie sighed with consternation, fearing that her sympathetic friend would now launch out into one of those interminable and quarrelsome diatribes that the mere word ‘excavations’ always seemed to evoke from men in this town.

Mr Quirm turned his lack-lustre eyes upon her with what seemed an almost quizzical look. ‘Not a relic, my dear,’ he said softly. ‘No, not a relic, nor Roman either! What your friend and I discovered together was more of the nature of — well! perhaps I might call it a biological discovery.’

Wizzie was silent; but her silence was not the silence of interest. She took it for granted that D. No-man had shown this friendly person some plant, or moss, or fungus, or even bird, such as he never failed to enlarge upon when he came home from his walks and they sat opposite each other at tea in Friary Lane.

‘But you haven’t told me’, Mr Quirm now blurted out, ‘where you picked up this little one. Is she a relation of yours?’

Wizzie replied to this by leaning over the edge of the perambulator and asking Lovie, as she laid her hand on the child’s shoulder, to tell the kind gentleman what her name was.

Wizzie’s heart was beating fast under her Antelope-luncheon dress as she glanced at him to see the effect of Lovie’s words. But Mr Quirm displayed perfect composure. ‘Your own, eh?’ he said, smiling. ‘I guessed as much! And how does our friend No-man hit it off with his new daughter?’

‘You’d better ask her,’ brought out Wizzie with much relief; and they both looked at the little girl.

‘She’s mixing up D. No-man with Mr Cask,’ Wizzie hastened to explain. ‘He called us into his place this morning when Mrs Dearth was out.’

Mr Quirm, who was now steering the perambulator into the common entrance of Glymes, looked puzzled. ‘I thought Cask was at work,’ he said. ‘Over here we feel your friend Jenny’s being a bit contankerous with her old Roman; but you know more about that, of course, than we do. By the way, it’s Thel, I take it, you’ve come to call on, not Nance by any chance? Nance would love to see this little lady of yours. What did you say your name was, my sweet?’

Lovie fixed on him a somewhat dubious and hesitant eye, and several shades of expression crossed her face with extraordinary rapidity. It was clear to Wizzie, who was watching her with interest, that the child didn't feel as sure of Mr Quirm now as she had felt when he picked up her doll. An indefinable unction in the tone of his voice when he said 'my sweet' must have put the little thing on her guard. She turned away from her questioner and murmured a casual answer to the general purlieus of Glymes. 'Gwendolly's 'tending that Lovie isn't her mummy. Gwendolly's playing this be workhouse, but Lovie bain't going to be put—'

Wizzie sharply interrupted her. 'She doesn't know what she's saying, Mr Quirm. Lovie, I'm ashamed of you! You mustn't play "Workhouse" here. This is Mr Quirm's nice home, and Auntie Thel's nice home. You'll soon see Auntie Thel, won't she, Mr Quirm? And then—'

But Urien had such a sardonic expression in his dead eyes when she caught his glance that she stopped abruptly.

'No, not the workhouse exactly, darling,' he said, 'but your mother's quite right in calling it a home. We call a place a home where people live whose play doesn't suit the rest. But you and Gwendolly will be all right here. He won't hurt you, any more than I will. But I ought to warn you—' Here he straightened his back, looked significantly at Wizzie, and jerked his thumb in the direction of his neighbour's house. 'There's been a fine rumpus in there this morning,' he whispered. 'Thel had to fetch Nance, so as to—'

'And who is this? And what is here?' she cried when she released her.

But Wizzie, resolute not to enter into further explanations till she was alone with her friend, offered her hand to her rescuer, thanked him for his help over the cows, and added airily: ‘If I can, I’ll look in on Nance, tell her, before I go. But you know how it is when a person’s with Thel: it’s hard to tear yourself away!’

‘Oh, you lovely thing!’ cried Thuella, surveying her friend’s attire and touching its grey flounces with the tips of her fingers. ‘I must give you one more kiss before we go in. Don’t let’s keep you, Urien. I know Nance is in the kitchen getting tea.’

Mr Quirm obediently moved to his own door, but made no bones about turning round, when once his fingers were on the handle, to throw upon the whole little group, even down to the sacred scrap of paper cradled in Lovie’s lap, a look that Thuella, in the act of embracing her friend, missed altogether, but that Wizzie, who was the passive one, and whose eyes wandered to the man as the girl kissed her, intercepted with a glow of satisfaction.

‘He wouldn’t mind’, she said to herself, as she lifted Lovie from her carriage, ‘doing that to me! He likes me. I believe he likes me more than Thel!’

She held her child tightly by the hand as she followed Thuella into the house, while the child herself held more tightly still in her hand what had once been a piece of writing-paper taken from a box with a picture of Shakespeare on it that Popsy’s grandmother had given to Popsy at Christmas, but what now, having once emerged from that small chamber of Limbo — for everything with the inanimate is as relative as it is with ourselves — had been permitted by fate a dim sub-reality of livingness under the creative imagination of Lovie.

‘Dad’s been terrible today,’ Thuella whispered, as they entered the kitchen. ‘The ingratitude of men, my dear, especially of fathers, passes all bearing! I bet your man’s just the same, but it’s worse in a man like Dad.

Urien's the only one I know who's different. Don't you think so? I'm always telling Nance how lucky she is!'

Wizzie only caught the general drift of her friend's grievance, for she was occupied in removing Lovie's coat, a proceeding that was rendered difficult by the clenched fingers of the small hand clutching the crumpled and wet bit of paper.

'Oh, she is a darling!' the tall girl cried, with forced enthusiasm, when the coat was removed and the sash displayed. 'But what funny socks you've put on her, my dear! Is this a new style?'

Wizzie bit her lip. She had looked for something much more than this. Why didn't Thuella comment on the child's beauty? But the girl was off again now in a voluble torrent of tell-tale revelations. Mr Wye's ways were growing daily more intolerable.

At last there was a pause, and it became clear that in Thuella's opinion Wizzie's attitude to the Glymes situation had been perverted by the wrong-headedness of Jenny Dearth. 'She'd take his side', the girl broke out, 'if he drove me to giving up painting altogether! And where would he be then? He's always threatening to live with her, but gracious! he couldn't stand it for a week in Friary Lane!'

'Would he like to see Lovie?' our friend enquired.

'Oh, I dare say!' was the answer. 'He'd like to see you anyway, but I'm not sure that he shall. Oh yes, I suppose he must, for I've got to show you the thing I'm doing now! It's that that makes me so nervous — but it's the best thing I've done yet. It's got more — but you'll see in a minute. Urien helped me a lot in it. It was really his inspiration. It's the clouds over Maiden Castle when the wind — his particular wind, you know! — is getting up. I sketched it out there with him. He says it's like the spirits of the place when — but you know the thrilling way he talks!'

Wizzie nodded, thinking to herself, 'I believe he's dead tired of Thel and her clouds. I know it was me and not her he longed to kiss just now.'

'But how selfish I'm getting!' interjected the tall girl, bending her shining head a little to one side and smiling at her visitor while she negligently passed her fingers through Lovie's curls.

The child was now warming an attenuated and weather-beaten Gwendolly against the front of the stove, and, annoyed at this interruption, she made a peevish little movement as much as to say, 'Go on with your chatter, you frivolous creature, and let a busy person alone!'

'Selfish?' echoed Wizzie vaguely, wondering whether she would be allowed to run in and see Nance before they had to go, and wondering too whether, if Nance invited her to tea, she would dare to leave D. No-man alone for once at this ritualistic hour.

'Talking about my painting and my father', the other went on, 'and stupid things like that, instead of asking you a word about your pretty self!'

Both the girls were on their feet at this point, and Thuella threw one of her arms round Wizzie's waist and drew her towards her, running her fingers caressingly down the girl's side.

'What a lovely dress!' she murmured softly. 'D. No-man must like this dress! It's so well-made and it fits so perfectly. You darling! You don't know what it means to me to have got you again at Glymes!'

Wizzie's thoughts were extremely detached as she submitted to these endearments. For one thing, she became conscious that Lovie was watching them with eyes as round as her own were wont to grow when something serious was happening. For another thing, she couldn't help an uneasy feelling that all Glymes, and every room in Glymes, was dominated by the personality of Urien. ‘He looked at me,’ she thought, ‘not at Thel at all.’ And she found herself glancing towards the window of the kitchen, even though it was at the back of the house and there was no earthly reason why Urien should be walking about out there.

So thin was the tall girl’s figure, and so Aphrodisian in their softness were the curves of her own bosom, that our friend felt as if she were being embraced by a swaying willow-tree rather than by a mortal woman. She said to herself, before Thuella released her: ‘Grummer used to hold me like this and hug me like this, till she caught me that day with Old Funky. But what’s natural with an old woman like her, without children or anything... Goodness! It’s funny when Thel does it. I don’t think girls ought to be so demonstrative. I wonder if I remind her of some boy she’s lost. She never talks of those things. I must ask Jenny what boys she’s had. Oh, I don’t understand her! I wonder if she ever lets Mr Quirm kiss her? But I know — I know he likes me the best!’

The tall girl seemed as if she couldn’t let Wizzie go. She was dressed in a long painter’s smock smeared with stains from her palette, and our friend felt as if she had nothing on under this thin garment, such feverish electricity shivered through her lithe body.

What she was doing now was explaining to Wizzie the picture she had been painting; but it struck our friend that she used her eloquence as a sort of wavering screen to conceal the intensity of her feelings. She kept talking of the response of Maiden Castle to some mad dance of cloud-shapes she had painted above it; but Wizzie soon began to feel as if in her disturbed imagination the excited girl were identifying herself with these clouds.

‘There, Thel, dear,’ she murmured at last. ‘I’m not Maiden Castle! You’ll make Lovie jealous if you make such a fuss of her Mummy — won’t she, my pet?’

Something in the tone in which she said this served as a chilling non-conductor to Thuella's infatuation. She let her go, and a strained silence fell upon them both.

She had always told everyone, and it was the way she regarded herself, that she wasn't one for brooding, but at this moment she felt as if some other Wizzie in the depths of her being were holding a candle to her most secret thoughts.

With an austere and savage honesty that would have even satisfied her old confessor in the convent, she asked herself why it was that she felt as she did about Mr Quirm. On the way to Glymes it was a lover of her own age she had imagined, with a real passion for her, a lover who would love her for herself and not just for that!

With a vividness that displeased her, though she couldn't resist it, she called up occasion after occasion when the vicious sterility, the tantalizing detachment of D. No-man's caresses had made her loathing for Old Funky seem like something alive. How cruel fate had been to her! What she wanted was the most natural thing a girl could want: to be passionately loved for herself, to give herself up to passion, to drown herself in the act of love! And yet all that fate had given her was the savage lechery of one man and the sentimental lechery of another. This other Wizzie, with her candle of sad sardonic knowledge, hinted to her now that even her loathing, her revengeful hatred of Lovie's absurd father, was a less hopeless thing, just because it was more intense, than the passive respect mingled with cold indifference that she felt for D. No-man.

But the worst thing this terrible other did to her at this moment was to whisper that she was doing a dangerous and wicked thing to let this sudden rousing of her benumbed senses betray her for the third time. Her perfect teacher had turned into a satyrish goblin, her romantic rescuer had turned into D. No-man — and was she now going to fool herself again with the Black Man of Glymes? (That is how the other Wizzie thought of Mr Quirm — ‘the Black Man of Glymes’ — and it wasn’t a reassuring thought!)

Nor did this terrible other self stop its drastic commentary even there. It tried to force her to confess that in her reaction against the Urgans her heart had been stirred at first by D. No-man. ‘And are you’, it said, ‘such a slave of your woman’s nature that you can let dry up this spring of love for a good man simply because —? Why, even the ignorant Popsy would have more heart than that! And haven’t you enjoyed, in your own way, the poor man’s idolatry? It may leave you cold; but — confess, confess! — you haven’t altogether disliked it! At least it hasn’t got on your nerves. And why haven’t you done what Jenny has so often told you to do: gone off and got work in another circus? The truth is, my good girl, like all women, you really adapt yourself to your life and take for granted that it will go on the same, even while with your surface-nerves you’re cursing and damning it. You’ve got more affection, my friend, for D. No-man than you’ll admit. You’d like to be loved, as you say, to the limit; but you don’t really consider leaving D. No-man any more than you consider leaving Lovie!’

‘Yes, I do!’ answered the normal, the natural Wizzie, with indignation. ‘And I’ll show you I do, if you say much more!’

It was Thuella who broke the spell of this prolonged soliloquy, and she did it by a series of hurried questions as to the manner in which D. No-man had accepted Lovie. ‘Did he mind’, she enquired, ‘when you had to tell him about her? Did he make a fuss at your wanting to have her? Did those Urgan people make trouble? Did they get money out of him?’

‘What an actress you are!’ Wizzie thought. ‘You don’t care a damn whether they got money out of D. No-man or not, or whether D. No-man was beside himself with rage or gentle as a lamb! But on the other hand, I don’t care how much your father spoils your happiness. That’s how life is, I suppose!’ Then aloud: ‘You remember how I decided to tell him nothing even if I did have to take the child in the end? Well, do you know, my dear, I wish now I had told him! He was so nice about it. You can’t think how nice he was. And the extraordinary thing was he didn’t seem surprised when that letter came. Listen, Thel! — you didn’t breathe a word to him, did you? But of course you didn’t! Well, then, I simply can’t understand it. I made sure he’d throw me out. Any other man would — wouldn’t he? I thought, when I read that letter, “Well, young woman, out you’ll have to go, bag and baggage, you and your bastard!” — but he didn’t even sulk. He completely astonished me. You’d have thought Lovie was his child and he was telling me about her, not me telling him!’

She paused, and then with a glance at the window and a little sigh, ‘Does Mr Quirm’, she asked, ‘help you a lot with your painting?’

The moment she had asked this question, she thought in her heart, ‘I know what you feel about me with all that sort of thing—” a little outsider like her, with an acrobat’s training, can’t really understand such things “ — but still, all the same...’

Thuella gave her a quick searching glance and shrugged her shoulders; and Wizzie deemed it wiser to revert to D. No-man. ‘Wasn’t it extraordinary, Thel, his acting the way he did? Would you have thought he’d have acted like that?’

‘What did you do when you first read the letter?’

Wizzie shot at her a very straight glance, and one of those curious looks passed between them that will be a trouble to men till the end of days.

‘You got hysterical and drew the lightning on yourself?’

Wizzie frowned. This sophisticated tone in her friend displeased her. In a flash she became defensive of her man. ‘He acted splendidly,’ she said. ‘I needn’t have made any fuss.’

‘But wasn’t he scared at having the child? I take it you two must long ago have decided against—’ And Thuella made a little gesture of disgust at the thought of maternal responsibility.

Wizzie couldn’t restrain the glow of satisfaction with which she let this natural implication pass as the truth. She knew her friend well enough by now to realize the wisdom of tempering frankness with certain basic reservations. ‘No, he wasn’t scared. He doesn’t want children of his own, but he likes children, and he thinks it’s only right that I should look after mine.’

Thuella shrugged her shoulders, and to Lovie’s relief ceased her perfunctory toying with that busy young woman’s person. ‘Thinks it right,’ the tall girl echoed with bitter sarcasm. ‘Oh, they’re all the same. Dad thinks it right to keep reminding me that I’m his housekeeper first and foremost, and his bread-winner afterwards! By the way, has Jin made it up yet with her old man? Does he still think it right to torment her with his coal-yard? That’s what I can’t make Nance see — that she’s the only lucky one of all of you! Urien’s like me. He doesn’t bother about what’s right. He just goes ahead and does what he wants to do.’

‘Not always,’ thought Wizzie, remembering the glance she had encountered across her friend’s fair hair; but aloud she said, ‘Jenny’s cruel to that man, and I’ve told her so. It’ll serve her right if he makes friends with—’

Thuella laughed aloud. ‘Old Claudius? Gracious! They must be hard up. Forgive my laughing; but I can’t imagine what Dorchester girl Communists are like, or where they live. And why doesn’t Jenny turn Communist herself? It’s in her line, I should have thought. But I don’t care what these crazy people do. It comes of having a conscience. People with consciences are always unhappy. But come along, you sweet, troubled, responsible thing, I want to show you what I’m doing. If it’s worth anything, it’ll be worth a hundred consciences. You won’t be interested a bit, of course, but that doesn’t matter!’

She moved to the door, but, instead of opening it, turned sharply round, her fingers on the handle.

‘Do you know, my dear,’ she said, ‘I’d give up’ — and she raised both her arms to the back of her fair head and clasped them behind her neck— ‘every pretension to good looks I’ve got, if I could do some really good work!’

From between her lifted elbows her eyes gleamed wildly and desperately round that little kitchen as if it had been transformed with all its pots and pans into one large empty canvas. ‘You don’t know what it is to want anything as much as I want to be a real painter! I come near it. Yes, I do, now and then! But just as I’m on the edge of something good, something really great, Dad’s damned sneering contempt drags me back.’ She stopped, let her hands fall to her sides, and stood silent for a second, gazing on the ground.

Then she raised her eyes. ‘How you’ve given up your work, as you have, passes my comprehension! I’ve never forgotten how you looked in those things you had on when you sat on that bed and hated me so. You looked like — oh, I don't know what! — and now here you are — with that little thing — and a pram at the door! You looked beautiful then, child, beautiful and terrible, like a woman who could dance on a bare sword — and now — I hope D. No-man enjoys the change — that's all I can say! Well, come on. I want you to see what I'm doing. I don't talk like this to everybody. But though you've put on petticoats and thrown your soul to the fishes, you've got it in you, Wizz, and don't think I don't know it!'

A week ago Wizzie would have been impressed and even a little awed by this outburst, but she had had so many emotional shocks of late that it was only with a narrowing of her screwed-up eyes and a contracting of her straight eyebrows that she responded to her friend's words.

More reluctantly still was Lovie dragged away to see these pictures and these philosophers. The miracle was still going on at that warm stove — a scrawled-over bit of paper becoming a person with a past and a future! Just four hours — four drops of conspiring time — had this creation occupied. And now the paper doll, like the rest of us, had to pay the penalty of being something rather than nothing. Clutched in Lovie's hot fingers, this poor entity was now compelled, as were its young mother and her mother, to follow that tide of destiny that sweeps earth and Heaven and men and gods along, the moment they emerge from Nirvana. And, like ourselves, the paper doll had had no choice. Snatched from the trunk in the caravan — where it lay between Popsy's underclothes and a volume entitled The Book of Beauty, given to the girl by her first sweetheart — it had been forced to submit to Old Funky's scrawls, forced to submit to being torn in half by Wizzie, and now, without question asked as to whether it would prefer to remain warm and quiescent by a kitchen fire, it was destined to be conveyed into the presence of a Platonic thinker at the end of his tether.

The desperate state of poor Mr Wye must have been divined by Lovie, if not by her doll, at first glance. He had evidently just come in from a long walk, in which no doubt he had sought to recover from the turbulent scene referred to by Mr Quirm. He had thrown down his overcoat and hat on one of Thuella's sofas and was now engaged in taking off his boots by the fire. He rose at their entrance and shuffled forward to greet the visitor with one boot on and one boot off.

The silky white fringe across his high narrow brow was all dishevelled, and one lock of grey hair hung down almost as low as his left eyebrow and looked damp with sweat. His thin lips were sucked in in a forced grimace, and from the cavity of this Voltairian leer, as he gave his limp hand to Wizzie and stared in amazement at the child, there emerged a whistling series of half-articulate interjections: 'Whew! — What a pleasure! — Whew! — What a surprise! — Whew, whew! — What little girl have we got here?'

Thuella's face hardened with disgust as she surveyed the trailing laces of the boot he still had on and the muddy aggressiveness of the one befouling the hearth-rug.

'So you've come to tea with us?' he said, looking reproachfully at his daughter. 'I must say I don't see any sign of it yet! Kettle boiling, Thuella? Bread and butter cut? I expect — whew, whew! — our little girl here is hungry. I know I am.' He skipped back to his place by the fire. 'Sit down, Miss Ravelston. Forgive me a minute—' Here he resumed his own seat, and, drawing his breath unevenly, mingled his 'whews' with long-drawn groans as he struggled to get off his other boot.

Wizzie, after a bewildered glance at the big easel in the centre of the room, pulled the child towards a chair opposite the old man, and sat down submissively, drawing Lovie against her knees and keeping one of her arms tightly round her.

The clock on the mantelpiece, making a laborious clicking in its interior — which at once brought back to the visitor her long evening in this singular apartment on Candlemas Night — began to strike four o'clock. It achieved this task not only with some effort but with a kind of genteel hesitation, as if it were apologizing for reminding the daughter of the house of the existence of the kettle, and the master of the house of un-Platonic hunger.

'We have tea at half past four, Miss Ravelston. I like my tea as soon as I get back from my walk. But of course I try not to be impatient. Is the kettle boiling, Thuella? Is the bread and butter cut? I expect this little one likes cake. Come over here and let me look at you, child! No, no, don't hide you pretty face! Don't be shy. Have you got any cake for the child, Thuella?'

Wizzie risked a hurried glance at her friend; but the tall girl, taking absolutely no more notice of Mr Wye's words than if they had been another clock — some old hall-clock that was always wrong — was standing in front of her easel lost in critical contemplation.

Wizzie herself began to grow more and more ill at ease. She felt thoroughly unsympathetic towards Mr Wye. 'He's selfish and he's silly,' she thought, and in her mind she turned to old Claudius, in his desolate littered house, going backwards and forwards to the window to peer out for his cruel Jenny. 'I'll go in there tomorrow, if he leaves the door open,' she said to herself, 'and tidy the place up — and I don't care if Jenny does catch me at it. She ought to be ashamed of herself, with a kind man like that! How nicely he played with Lovie! He saw how pretty she is. I wish I hadn't brought her here. Thel hasn't taken any real notice of her; and all this old man thinks about is his tea. D. No-man's like that too, only he hides it up.

They're just selfish — that's what they are! I'd like to get out of this place. If I can't see Mr Quirm again, I'm not going to keep D. No-man waiting.'

She allowed Lovie to establish herself on the floor, where the child became at once gravely occupied in arranging her sacred bit of paper so that what passed for its head should rest on a particular square in the pattern of the rug.

Mr Wye, evidently suffering acutely from this delay in the preparation of his meal, kept glancing alternately at the clock and at his daughter. At last, with an angry effort to emphasize his patient impatience, he settled himself in his chair and produced, one from each pocket, his cherished volumes. Wizzie could see he didn't read a word but opened first one book and then the other, balancing them on his thin knees, while little drops of perspiration trickled down his brow, causing his errant lock of hair to droop in damp misery.

But Thuella now turned her easel round so that Wizzie might see the picture. The tall girl's bright head hung sideways in intense absorption, and, with each broken sentence of explanation of her purpose, her flexible body seemed to quiver in sympathetic response.

'She's feeling', thought Wizzie, 'like I feel when I'm on the horse and I don't care who sees me!'

All that our friend could make out from the picture was a wrack of tormented clouds piled up in the wildest confusion above what looked like a towering dark green wave.

'I've made the hill conscious — if you understand what I mean,' she was saying, while from the curves of her figure, as she hovered over her work, magnetic shivers kept following one another in a series of spasmodic vibrations that seemed to pass into the canvas. 'I mean I've made the hill alive, don't you see? Not just grass and chalk, but the breasts of the earth.'

What Wizzie saw was that Thuella's own small breasts were responding far more obviously than Maiden Castle to that cloud orgy in the sky.

'It was Urien — saying — it came — alive — on — certain — nights — that set me off,' the artist went on, uttering her words in short gasps.

The mention of Urien's name broke up Wizzie's feeling that this tension above those cloud-wraiths was like herself on her horse, and once more she found herself recalling the peculiar look Urien had fixed upon them when Thuella was kissing her. 'He wants me! He wants me!' her thoughts repeated, and a revival of something like that delicious throb of warm sensuality trembled through her that she had felt when she imagined herself embraced by a passionate lover of her own age.

The girls were now startled by Mr Wye letting both his books slide down upon the floor while he rose with a bound. 'You're doing this to torture me!' he burst out, glaring like a demon at his daughter. 'You know it's tea-time. You know, when I come back from my walk, what I want is my tea, and you're just hanging round that damned picture to torment me! And do you know where I went for my walk, you girl that I've fed and clothed and — and worked for — yes! worked for — as long as my health allowed? I went to Maumbury Rings — yes, I did! — and I went further too — I went along that road that leads to your friend's damned place. And I tell you this, since you're bent on making my old — life — a hell—' Here Mr Wye's throat began to emit a sound like the wind through telegraph wires, a sound that accompanied all his words and seemed to lift them up and scatter them down like shrill-wailing gnats. 'Those human mole-hills you people make such a fuss about are nothing.' Here, in his impotent fury, Mr Wye made a gesture with his fingers as if flicking Maiden Castle into the air. 'Nothing to a man who is raising his soul's wings above the whole stellar system! He says' — and Wizzie thought, 'He says "He" just as Sister Bridget used to say “The Holy Father” ‘—’ that when the soul’s shaken itself free of your damned illusions, what it sees — is — is—’ But here a rush of renewed self-pity broke up his words, and the whistling in his throat became a sob, and he turned directly to Wizzie. ‘You wouldn’t think it,’ he panted, ‘but that girl over there is my daughter. Yes, she is! She’s bone of my bone! You wouldn’t think it, would you, now that she makes such a fuss about doing the least thing for me — for me who gave her all! She thinks, because I had to give up my work and live on her bounty, that all the thoughts of my life are nothing. You’re a woman, you’re a mother—’ And he glanced at Lovie on the floor. ‘And mightn’t it be supposed to be at least natural’— ‘Don’t get sarcastic, now, old boy,’ thought Wizzie, ‘for it doesn’t suit you’— ‘for a child, who wouldn’t be in the world at all except for you, to listen for a moment, just now and then, to the conclusions of a lifetime?’

What Thuella was doing now struck Wizzie as proving most definitely that the man was right in calling her bone of his bone, for she was pressing her fingers into her ears. Wizzie sighed with vexation. Was it for this she had come to Glymes and risked keeping D. No-man waiting for his tea?

The sight of his daughter still surveying her picture with absorbed attention while she kept her knuckles pressed against her ears caused the indignant old man to devote himself exclusively to Wizzie, who groaned as she saw all chance of seeing Mr Quirm again vanishing away.

‘You wouldn’t believe it,’ the man went on, ‘but your — your husband’s the only person round here who takes the least interest in what I say!’ He passed his hand over his forehead, pushing back his forelock, and sat up straight in his chair. ‘I’ve been a professor in my time. My unnatural child forgets that! Perhaps Mr No-man doesn’t realize that I was a professor of Greek in one of our Midland colleges. Will you tell him that from me, Miss Ravelston? For I think it will interest him. Tell him — what he certainly wouldn't know from the way I'm treated in my own house — that in Derbyshire they still call me Professor! That's what the girl over there forgets when she behaves in the way she's doing now. Professor Teucer Wye: that's what I was when I made my wife choose "Thuella" as the name of our second child; that's what I was when I bought for her, in the main street of a well-known Midland town, her first paint-box.' Here, to Wizzie's consternation, the furious little man skipped across the room to Thuella's side, and, seizing her by one of her elbows, tried to pull her fingers from her ear. 'Yes, a paint-box, you unnatural girl!' he shouted. 'A paint-box! A paint-box!'

But Wizzie was on her feet by this time. 'Good-bye, Mr Wye!' she said in a clear emphatic voice that had, all the same, something of an uncomfortable tremor. Our friend was no longer in the tender mood she had been in in Claudius's house, but the sight of the contemptuous loathing in Thuella's face as she tried to shake off her father's fingers, and the view of the back of Mr Wye's head, which looked so pathetically calm and scholarly as he struggled with her, made her feel what she later described to D. No-man as 'funny in my inside'.

'Good-bye, Mr Wye! I'm afraid I've got to go now. Mr No-man is waiting tea for me.' As soon as she had spoken, she felt ashamed of having uttered the dangerous word 'tea'; and when afterwards she told D. No-man what she had said, he maintained that she'd done it with malicious intent; but her speech had at least the effect of causing that grotesque struggle in front of the picture of Maiden Castle to come to an end.

Mr Wye hurried up to her at once and became the normally polite gentleman. Thuella too came forward. And as it worked out, the visitor's departure was attended by unexpected ease and geniality on the part of the father, and unexpected awkwardness and embarrassment on the part of the daughter.

Wizzie herself was overwhelmed with shame at the end, for, when the moment arrived to disturb Lovie's game on the floor and get her into her jacket, it was found that her extremely good behaviour during all this unpleasant scene was due to the fact that she had pulled towards her the Phaedrus and Timaeus from where Mr Wye had dropped them, and converted them into a tunnel in and out of which it gave her a grave ecstasy to propel the two-dimensional form of the recumbent Gwendolly.

Wizzie had a momentary glimpse of Mr Wye's face as she stooped to pick up the books for him, and she was amazed to observe that the event pleased him rather than the reverse. He opened his mouth and sucked in his lips in such a gargoylish grin that at first she was afraid he was going to have a fit of hysterical fury; but all he said was, 'A professor at one of the smaller Midland colleges — in Greek, of course — you won't forget to tell Mr No-man that?' And then, seeing tears come into Lovie's eyes at the loss of her tunnel, 'You'd think', he said, 'she knew the value of these books. One of the smaller Midland colleges, tell him, for I don't want to boast. Yes, little one, you made them into a gateway — that was what they were, wasn't it, a gateway? Not just a doctor, tell him, for they're as common as dirt nowadays — and in the Midlands, tell him, where they stand no nonsense and have their wits about them. Yes, a gateway, little one. I must put them back where they live now, mustn't I? For they wouldn't be happy anywhere else. There they go — there, there, there — back to bed! No, they can't come out any more. They've gone now — see?' And Teucer Wye, with a terrifying smile, held his hands out towards the child with all the fingers outspread.

It was at his face, however, not at his antics, that Lovie stared; and she stared at him all the time her mother was forcing the clenched fingers of the most obstinate of sturdy little hands into the proper sleeve.

‘But you see what he is,’ concluded the Professor to Wizzie, who was again reminded of the revered ‘He’ in the talk at her old convent school. ‘He can show us how all the great things in the world, like Quirm’s precious Maiden Castle, are vapour and smoke compared with the progress of the soul; and he can at the same time keep a little girl quiet for more than an hour by the mere touch of his pages!’

It was to Lovie herself — for he seemed to treat the child’s contact with the mere binding of the Phaedrus and the Timaeus as a species of initiation — that his final words were uttered. He muttered quite a lot into the little creature’s ear as he saw them off the premises, and Wizzie wondered, as she watched him turn back at the garden gate, whether he had told Lovie that in Derbyshire he was still known as Professor Teucer Wye.

The door of the southern portion of Glymes had, however, hardly closed on the troubled Platonist, and Wizzie was formulating in her mind a lively account of him for the benefit of D. No-man, when the gate of the northern garden opened and both Mr and Mrs Quirm hurried after her.

‘Urien told me about the cows, my dear,’ panted Nance hurriedly, ‘and I thought I must just see this little person.’ She bent over the perambulator as she spoke, and began to make warm hovering overtures to its occupant.

But Lovie was tired and irritable by this time, and replied to her approaches by drawing rudely back and acting like a little hawk of whose distance from its nest a benevolent and maternal hen is trying to take advantage. But the warm soft pressure of the friendly lady’s purpose did not cease. It seemed difficult for Nancy Quirm to regard it as possible that a child rescued from those people should refuse to respond to the glow of her interest if only she could express it warmly enough.

But the mother was as unresponsive as the daughter. ‘Sorry not to stop,’ murmured Wizzie, pushing the perambulator forward so fast as almost to trip up the poor lady, ‘but I must get back as quick as I can. D. No-man’s waiting for me in Friary Lane. Don’t make that noise, Lovie! We’re going home. Look! The cows have all gone home!’

‘Have you seen his attic in High East Street yet?’ enquired Nance, hurrying along on one side of the small conveyance while her husband walked on the other. ‘I’m always so interested — as Enoch knows — in a writer’s study. Has he a warm fire up there? Does he have any of his meals up there? Has he got a nice view from his window?’

Pushing the perambulator faster still, and acutely conscious in every part of her person of a magnetic pull reaching her from the dark figure on the other side of her whimpering charge, Wizzie was faintly conscious of an instinctive stiffening against these interrogations. She made up her mind in a flash not to admit that she had never ascended those stairs above the shop.

‘You don’t know D. No-man’, she brought out, ‘if you think he doesn’t take care of himself.’

‘There — there — don’t ‘ee cry, little one!’ came the husky voice of the man on her left, and Wizzie became aware, as she hurried on, that he had laid his hand on Lovie’s shoulder.

The spring sky had grown dark with heavy clouds; and a mist coming up from the river was now crossing their path with a palpable chilling of the air.

Her reply to Nancy seemed to have reduced that friendly lady to silence, and all the way down the hill till they reached the pond Urien kept murmuring consoling words to Lovie.

To him the girl felt she couldn’t utter a syllable — no! not if all the cows in the Frome meadows were obstructing their way! That warm wave of delicious response to anonymous human passion which had swept over her on her approach to Glymes began to flow more and more consciously into the channel of her contact with this living man at her side.

Little Lovie, whose pathetic whimperings had completely ceased, like the trouble of a small bird soothed in a magnetic hand, now became a medium for the electric current between him and her, a current which she could feel tingling irresistibly through every nerve of her body.

It was out of an exquisite trance that she suddenly grew conscious that they had reached the gate by the pond, that there were no cows to be seen, and that, with the opening of the gate to let her through, her companions were intending to turn back. So strangely elated and yet so numb and passive was her mood that the withdrawal of the Quirms hardly seemed to touch the deeper levels of her feeling. She couldn’t be quite clear, indeed — as she pushed the perambulator on and muttered mechanically to herself, ‘I must be quick; I mustn’t keep him waiting’ — how they had left her, or even whether she had thanked them or said good-bye to them. All she knew was that she felt happier than she had felt for years, happier than she had felt since the last time with a free heart she had balanced herself on her old horse’s back!

When she reached the turn leading to the back entrance of Frome House, an impulse that she would have found hard to explain compelled her to pause and let go for a minute the handle of her little vehicle. Stepping hurriedly to her child’s side, she bent down and gave Lovie an impassioned hug and the first kiss, the first real kiss, her offspring had ever received from her.

‘Don’t, Mummy!’ the little girl spluttered, under this unexpected embrace. ‘Don’t, Mummy! You’ve — made me — pinch Gwendolly.’ And then, without warning, something in her small bewildered heart broke down, something that reacted obscurely and wildly from all the troubled impressions of this long day, and the little girl lifted up her voice and wept. ‘Lovie wants to go back to Old Funk and Grummy,’ she wailed. ‘Lovie wants to go home!’

CHAPTER 8. Midsummer's Eve

THE EVE OF St John the Baptist, the twenty-third of June, fell this year on a Sunday, and turned out to be one of the hottest days of one of the hottest Junes that the West of England had known for a long time.

Dorchester was full of visitors. The unusually warm weather had stimulated the archaeological society engaged in the Maiden Castle excavations to begin their summer work earlier than was expected; and in the afternoon of Saturday the twenty-second the local Echo announced a momentous discovery.

In a portion of the earthworks, in a place where digging had been undertaken for the first time, the remains of an extensive stone building had been discovered, of greater antiquity than the well-known Roman Temple on the high table-land in the centre of the ramparted hill.

So important was the discovery, the Echo hinted, that the head people in the work had halted all further meddling with the spot until several experienced authorities could be brought to the scene, and the paper went on to predict that there would be a rush to the place from all parts of the country.

The day following this exciting announcement being Sunday, and the weather remaining as auspicious as ever, there was a pronounced tendency among local persons interested in such matters to make their way as soon as possible to the scene of action.

The astute Mr Cumber, from his publicity watch-tower in a remote town, lost no time in making sure that the chain of papers connected with his office should have first-hand information of what was going on. With this in view, he hurriedly dispatched to Dorchester his son-in-law and his daughter, in his own private car, with explicit orders to remain at the Antelope till every aspect of the new find had been thoroughly investigated. They were bidden to keep in touch with him over the telephone, and he declared his intention of coming down in person when things had gone a little further. Meanwhile, he instructed them to get into immediate contact with both his local correspondents, Mr No-man and Mr Quirm, and obtain a general article on the situation from the former and a special one on the mythological implications of the discovery from the latter.

The task given to Dunbar Wye on this occasion was the first among all the labours undertaken for his father-in-law from which he could derive any personal pleasure. Dumbell hated office work. He was the worst possible reporter. Everyone had been amazed when Mr Cumber consented to his only child's marriage with so unpromising a youth, though the explanation was simple, namely that the famous widower was completely under his daughter's thumb. How the girl herself yielded to the candid innocence of such a lad no one inquired. Her own quality of intelligence was obviously of so thin a texture that, whatever her friends said, in their hearts they thought, 'She's lucky to have found such a good-tempered, quiet lad, free from all vice.'

For Dunbar Wye was certainly untempted by either the world or the flesh. Whether the devil left him alone too was a question dependent on one's view of the metaphysics of Fascism; but if not to flirt, or to whore, or to drink, or to smoke, or to give way in the luxury of solitude to lascivious thoughts, was to be a good catch for a petted little shrew, Dunbar was the man. That to top all this he was an incredible fool was not perhaps a paradox. Many ere now have held the view that simple virtue and extreme foolishness are blood-brothers and that it is as hard to be clever and good as it is to be rich and good.

At any rate, what the Cumber girl suffered from in Dumbell was not his virtue, was not his Fascist devotion; it was his mania for collecting, and drying, and keeping in portfolios, endless specimens of the larger-growing vegetation of the United Kingdom. In plants, in ferns, in mosses, in mushrooms, Dunbar took less interest. His passion was for trees and bushes.

Mr Cumber approved of this mania in his daughter's husband. He took the point of view that it was better to make love to trees than to ladies; and he used to derive a proud satisfaction from being able to say to his colleagues, 'That lad of my girl's knows every damned shrub in the Garden of Eden!'

But Mr Cumber's offspring came, after five weeks of life with Dumbell, to loathe the sight of a bush. Their little suburban garden was all bushes. You couldn't plant a pansy in it, much less a row of poppies. And Dumbell's study — as the girl strove to make her servant call the apartment where his specimens were arranged — had the peculiarity of leaking all over the house. The young woman had told herself the prettiest stories of the way she was going to run her establishment and decorate it and show it to her admiring friends; but Providence had other plans.

In excusing Dunbar's lack of the lighter touches of sociability, she would always say, 'Well, at any rate Dun isn't a writer. He won't mess up the house with books and things!' Her forecast was correct. The only books in Beulah Lodge were presentation sets of standard authors; but what no girl could have predicted, from such harmless evidence as a habit of plucking leaves and twigs wherever he went, was that she and her little servant, neither of whom was in any sense a devotee of Nature, should come to be faced with a positive plague of vegetable débris.

The two young women in Beulah Lodge — and even the tradesmen noticed this — grew week by week, under this deciduous affliction, more and more alike in their ways. By contending against the same obsession they acquired a secret code of unspoken understanding, an identical pattern, you might call it, of protective colouring, so that they even began, after a year of Dumbell’s arboreal researches, to resemble each other in facial expression.

Young Mr Wye soon found it was no use to enquire of the maid what had happened to a rare specimen of a certain blackberry, or to a treasure-trove among willows — for of these simple growths, contrary to received opinion, there seemed to be unending varieties — if the mistress declared she had never seen it!

Dumbell’s passionate acceptance of the Fascist hostility to feminism may have had nothing to do with his obstinate pursuit of a hobby so incompatible with a tidy house, but he made no more successful attempts to get into the mind of his womenfolk the importance of collecting willows than he did to make them realize the catastrophic menace of Communism.

It was therefore a triumphant relief to the Cumber girl to carry her dogmatic botanist to Dorchester, knowing that in her absence her other self, in the person of Lottie Day, would dust most vigorously and with most thoroughness where dusting was most forbidden.

It cannot be said that this son of ‘the Professor in a small Midland college’ was in the least interested in excavations; but since he had well-nigh exhausted both the indigenous and the exotic vegetation in the environs of Beulah Lodge, he accepted his commission with alacrity, bearing with him not only reams of Blackshirt propaganda but the most capacious of all possible botanizing tins.

Early as was the start of the Cumber pair, however, it was impossible for them to reach Dorchester till midday; and long before that — in fact before most of the inhabitants of the old town were stirring — considerable numbers of interested people were already on the way to Maiden Castle. Among these might have been seen, while the Corn-Exchange clock was striking ten and the bells of Fordington Church were already ringing, quite a large group of our particular acquaintances setting out from Friary Lane. Both the Glymes ménages were represented — Nancy alone, by an arrangement with Thuella, having stayed behind to cook a combined Sunday dinner. 'Don't hurry back, now!' had been her last word to them all. 'I'll manage somehow, however late you are.' D. No-man and Wizzie had privately arranged for Claudius to accompany them to the scene of action; and this meant — for the idealistic neighbours were still unreconciled — that Jenny Dearth found her own reasons for staying at home. And since she was at home, Wizzie entrusted her with the care of Lovie.

It was no surprise to Wizzie, as they all met at Jenny's door, to see the portentous face of her Glymes man, for No-man had received a telegram, and they took it for granted that the other Cumber correspondent would be stirred up in the same way. But it was a most startling surprise to them both to see the dapper and even dandified form of old Teucer Wye, swinging an ash-coloured cane as slender and straight as himself, and prepared to be amiable and polite to everybody, not even excepting his younger daughter.

Both the pockets of the Professor's light tweed coat bulged a little, for he evidently anticipated interludes in the proceedings wherein a word of the greatest of all philosophers might be appropriately snatched; but his mood was as unruffled as the weather, and he skipped about from one to another of the party with a lively volubility that astonished them all.

In the general confusion of the start there was quite a conclave outside Jenny's house, while Thuella, dutiful for once in her life, ran in to have a word with her sister.

Wizzie noticed that No-man began at once arguing with Claudius, and she gathered that it was the old topic they were debating, the topic she had heard till she was utterly weary of it, the topic that seemed to demand that you had to pit the word 'subjective' against the word 'objective', as if these expressions, totally meaningless to her mind, had been a pair of fighting-cocks.

The elated Professor — for it was soon clear to Wizzie that the whole Glymes party were in high spirits — had stopped an impatient member of the Salvation Army, whose band always gathered in that part of the town for their march to chapel, and was telling him — as far as she could catch his words — that Midsummer Eve ought to be a great occasion with a sect like his, which had revived under the Christian symbols of blood and fire the old Dionysian ecstasy of salvation. The Salvation Army man rested his weight, and the weight of his musical instrument, which the Professor called by some Greek name Wizzie couldn't catch, first on one leg and then on the other while he struggled to escape; and if the girl didn't wonder what that college in the Midlands could have derived from such fantastic studies, it was only because what she heard from Mr Wye kept being interrupted by what she heard from D. No-man as he argued with Claudius.

'It isn't just sensation that I live for,' D. was saying. 'It's something that has behind it more than you think — the feelings of our race for thousands of years. For instance, this morning, warm though it was, I lit a fire in the grate to celebrate Midsummer's Eve. What are all your electrical apparatuses compared with a fire that I light with my own hands? It isn't only a sensual pleasure; it's a religion, it's an ecstasy of life.'

Wizzie couldn't prevent an amused feminine smile — irreligious as the famous laughter of Sarah in the presence of the angel — when she heard this word 'ecstasy' repeated on both sides of her. 'I wouldn't be a man for anything,' she thought. ' They talk; but I feel. Old Teucer Wye's beating the dust up now with his stick and letting himself be happy just because they lit bonfires on Midsummer Eve thousands of years ago!'

But if the humorous feeling that might be called a recognition of the eternal limitations of homo sapiens was on her side over Mr Wye and D. it was on No-man's side when Urien came up to where she stood and began to talk to her.

'I didn't dress like this for you,' she kept saying to herself as she gave herself up to the man's formidable magnetism. But though she repeated these chaste words in her brain, she could not prevent all her girlish senses, from the tips of her breasts to every nerve in her body, from responding with 'linked sweetness long drawn out' as she felt his dead-looking eyes stray over her figure's provocative curves.

It was the first time she had put on what she was wearing now, and she knew well that never — certainly not in the days of those old lavender-coloured tights — had the loveliness of her form had such complete justice done to it.

More than a month had passed since that day in early May when Urien had rescued Lovie and her from the cows, and, though she had only seen him about half-a-dozen times since then, their attraction to each other — or at any rate her submission to his spell — had gone a good long way. It had not yet led to their being alone together, or even to her going, as he had asked her several times to do, with Thel and him to Maiden Castle. Nor had it — at least she told herself it had not — roused D.'s jealousy, though at this very moment she could not help being aware that No-man was keeping watch on her and Urien.

'I wish Thel would come,' she said to herself. 'D. is watching us. I must put a stop to this.' But even while she talked to herself in this strain, the sweetness of yielding to Urien's magnetism began to assume an intensity that made her tremble. He was talking, like the rest of these excited men today, about the old heathen customs of Midsummer; but she knew, as well as anything, that his words were only an excuse, and that all the time, in some queer spiritual way, he was making love to her. It was entirely a mental seduction, and that was why she was able to give herself up to it without more of a sense of guilt — that, and because it seemed to her a perfectly wicked waste for her figure to be looking so lovely and only old No-man allowed to enjoy it!

It was all done just by his nearness, just by the way he looked at her, but she remembered very well how a girl at her convent school had assured her once that it wasn't impossible for a woman actually to conceive from the mere look of a man with a strong spiritual personality. And this psychic yielding to him, she said to herself, was almost as sweet as if he had been actually ravishing her.

Indeed, she risked everything, it was so sweet, so much what she had longed for all her life and never come near enjoying. She risked the danger of D. seeing the rapt expression of her face; she risked the danger of committing herself irretrievably to her Black Man of Glymes; she risked the danger of killing his interest forever by abandoning herself so precipitously.

'Yes, yes!' she murmured to this huge dark wave of magnetism that was overpowering her. 'Yes,' she kept murmuring, just as the god-ravished mother of Otus and Ephialtes murmured her gasping acquiescence to the tide that took her. 'Yes, yes!' And she felt an indescribable exultation that her figure did please him. But there, Lordy! — as Grummer used to cry when things were at sixes and sevens — D. No-man had seen! Well, she must brazen it out. But she knew he'd leave Claudius at the first chance he got — well did she know him! — and come lurching over to where she stood by Urien's side.

Urien himself seemed entirely unperturbed, though he must have seen, just as she had, the savage look of jealousy that No-man had cast on them. But so unperturbed was he that he told her quite quietly, turning his dead-alive eyes to the door of the house to watch for Thuella's reappearance, that he didn't think she realized how passionately Thuella admired her. 'It's a rare thing,' he whispered, keeping his eyes on the door, 'and it can be a very tragic thing, for one girl to admire another as much as our friend admires you; and the truth is—'

'The truth is,' he went on, 'Thuella's so self-distrusting that she's got the idea she's unloved and unlovable. Don't be angry with me for what I'm saying, but if you could bring yourself to respond a little more, you'd be doing — But if you feel you absolutely can't, never mind — forget I've spoken of it. Sometimes it's the best we can do, to beat on the impenetrable; and if we go on doing that—' Here he suddenly raised his voice and addressed D. No-man, who had left Claudius, as she knew he would, and was already at their side. 'Wizzie and I are getting impatient to start,' he said. 'Can't you go in and get hold of Thuella?'

No-man made a queer little bow. 'Gladly,' he threw out in a high-pitched artificial tone that evidently covered a spasm of irritation; and he kept repeating the word 'gladly' as he disappeared into the house.

But they were off at last; and as they passed under the projecting windows of the King's Arms, Wizzie grew aware of a wish leaping up within her that she had, after all, brought Lovie with them. Her spirits rose high as she walked by No-man's side behind Urien and Thuella. She had at least been spared any awkward crisis this time. But the sun was so warm, the traffic so quiescent, the streets so deserted, that it seemed a shame for little Lovie not to be getting the benefit of it all, particularly as Jenny, who, like Nance, was going to cook an elaborate Sunday dinner, would have to keep the child with her in the hot kitchen.

'I'm half-inclined', she murmured to D. No-man, 'to go back for Lovie. It wouldn't take long. I'd soon catch you up.'

But No-man scouted the idea. 'You ought to have a holiday now and then,' he said, 'and besides, I like to see you so free and so charming in those things!'

Wizzie cast a complacent glance downward. Yes, the thin grey jersey she was wearing, the little grey cap, and above all the tight-fitting flannel trousers, were by far the most becoming attire she had ever put on! She felt deliciously at ease in them as she advanced with her springy step. If it hadn't been for thinking of Lovie in the kitchen, her elated mood, now that D. had got over his spasm of jealousy, would have been without alloy this perfect morning.

Oh, how superior she felt to Thuella! Thuella, in her yellow frock and absurdly flapping hat, which at the slightest breeze she had to clutch with her hand, was acting silly to put on that affected way of walking, swaying her hips and flanks like that. That was the way girls walked when they wanted to attract men. There was nothing in it but the obvious fact that you had a slim waist and a woman's back. It was all very well to sway like that on the stage. Thel ought to know better than to do it on the street. Oh, how she longed to jump on a horse just as she was! She would have shown them what a girl's body could do.

How slow they were to get off! They were all at the Corn-Exchange now, and were waiting, before crossing over into South Street, to watch some soldiers, still some way off, who were marching down the hill from the barracks.

Suddenly D. No-man turned to her with a troubled face. 'I've left my stick,' he said. 'I've left my stick in my room.'

The babyish way he announced this, and his gravity about such a trifle, annoyed Wizzie. 'Well, if you've left it, you've left it,' she said. 'You can't keep everyone waiting.'

He looked at her with an expression of outrage. 'But you know perfectly well—' he began. The worst of it was that the others all seemed aware of the situation, for they glanced with amusement from No-man to her and from her to No-man.

At that moment the Salvation Army band, which had been collecting its forces at the end of North Square, began to advance to where they were standing, striking up, as it did so, a gay, beautifully conducted tune, whose stirring sound, rolling over them and gathering weight against the tower of St Peter's, brought a dark flush of pleasure to Claudius's face, and even caused Teucer Wye to open his mouth and tap his cane on the stones in sympathetic rhythm.

No-man made a move to be off under cover of this distraction, but she caught him by his sleeve.

'What does it matter, once in a way?' she whispered. 'Claudius hasn't got a stick. Mr Quirm hasn't got a stick. These manias of yours can't always come first. You can't keep all these people waiting. You just can't! I've never heard of such a thing.'

‘Oh, I want the Observer!’ cried the Professor at this juncture, in a piercing voice. ‘Paper! Paper! Have you got the Observer there, young lady?’

His sharp cry caused a girl who was riding past on a bicycle with a pile of Sunday papers to stop so suddenly that if she had not been a very active and limber person she would have fallen over. Wizzie had seen her often before, and, with a connoisseur’s eye in these delicate matters, considered her to possess the most beautiful figure, second to her own, in all Dorchester. ‘She likes the feeling of riding her bicycle’, she said to herself, as she watched her extract the required paper for Mr Wye, ‘just as I did my horse. And she’s got an interesting face too. Oh, so No-man must get his paper too — and how silly when we’re going to Maiden Castle! But I hope he’ll forget about the stick. I shan’t wait for him.’ And her thoughts took on, with regard to No-man’s stick, that curious substitute for maternal irritability which the youngest woman can acquire when she’s grown used to the sharing of bed and board.

‘Yes, she has a lovely figure,’ she said to herself, as the girl jumped lightly on her bicycle and rode away. ‘No wonder No-man’s watching her. I wonder if he always buys his Sunday paper from her.’ And then, as they all fixed on the departing bicyclist the sort of vague stare that a group on an esplanade might fix upon a vanishing yacht, she heard Teucer Wye say, ‘I wouldn’t bother to go back now, No-man. What happened was probably intended. If you’d brought your stick you’d no doubt have lost it. I took this stick once to Chesil Beach, and if it hadn’t been for Thuella, who ran down between the waves, I shouldn’t have it now.’

‘Would you like me to go back with you, No-man?’ put in Claudius, approaching them. ‘I’m not so necessary up there on the hill as these people, and I’d be glad—’

But a new encounter had just been effected which kept them still standing in uncertainty on the curb-stones of St Peter's. This was Thuella's accosting of a stalwart and robust old man, bearded like the pictures of Sir John Falstaff, and looking as if he could confute a whole consistory of lawn-sleeved bishops, like Falstaff's prototype, Oldcastle the Lollard.

It was this old gentleman's pastime, in the later hours of his well-earned retirement, to aid informally in the distribution of the Echo; but on Sunday morning, bereft of this distraction, he could only watch from a respectful distance the lively proceedings of the young purveyor of metropolitan news as she glided in and out of the old squares and alleys.

Thuella was a friend of this aged man whose heroic Gargantuan laugh, disposing sardonically of all human weakness, would resound from above his sheaf of Echoes as they exchanged their badinage.

It was this old man's reiterated laugh, a laugh that certainly refused to be bothered with any nice punctilios of sentiment, that now blent with the tramp of the soldiers from the barracks and the intermittent drum of the band from North Square.

'I wish Lovie was here!' our friend thought, her fingers still clutched tight to the sleeve of No-man's coat. 'It's nice in this town on Sunday.' And while they all waited for the soldiers to pass into the church and for the band to disappear down High East Street, there stole into Wizzie's heart, forcing its way through her irritation with No-man's fuss about his stick, a new and curious feeling.

The girl herself, with a feminine instinct to reduce all lovely sensations to something personal, linked it at once with the fact that, though he remained by Thuella's side in her colloquy with the laughing philosopher, Nancy Quirm's husband kept turning his great black head — the man wore his usual dirty clothes and in spite of the hot day had no hat — in her direction.

‘He likes me better than Thuella,’ she said to herself. ‘He talks and walks with her, but he looks at me.’ And it was the delicious perception of a growing attraction between herself and this singular person that she took for granted must explain the sudden rush of happiness that so unexpectedly warmed her blood.

But it had, she admitted to herself, something to do, too, with the day and the hour. Never had the old town seemed so friendly to her as it did just then! It was partly the absence of the weekday crowds. It was partly the soldiers and the Salvation Army. Her physical sympathy with the tender contours of that young woman on the bicycle, and even the white-bearded old man’s stentorian laughter, may have had something to do with it, too.

But what she felt was beyond all these. It was a sensation she had never had since her mother died, a sensation of being at home in the world and not an outcast. Dorchester seemed full of nice, kind, warm-hearted people, whose presence — most of them, it was true, hidden in the depths of these old stone houses — radiated a pleasant warmth that rose like unseen incense into the warm air. The silence too, now that the marching feet were gone and the drums departed, seemed to her like Lovie’s breathing when she was asleep!

Was there, after all, a chance — one in a thousand — that she might, without deserting Lovie, without an agitating break with D. No-man, get back into her circus life?

‘He likes me! He likes me!’ her nerves kept chanting, as she glanced shyly at Nancy’s husband. She was unwilling — just as No-man himself had once been, only for a very different reason — to let her thoughts about the Black Man of Glymes go far, go an inch beyond the vague stirring in her senses which the feeling that they were aware of each other produced.

What was going on, she wondered, between D. No-man and her mysterious Black Man that had made them so much more intimate during the last month? It must have to do, she decided, with the fact that they were both working for Mr Cumber. Buy why was D. No-man always so funny when she questioned him about Urien? She hadn't questioned him much. She had been shy herself over that. But there always seemed some queer barrier that rose up between them when his name was mentioned.

Was there any truth in what Jenny had said about Nance being too fond of D. No-man? Oh, Nance was a silly! You couldn't tell with people like that. Nance was one of those women who rub themselves like a cat against men's elbows. But she couldn't imagine herself being jealous of Nance. She knew her old D. too well. He didn't like warm soft women. He liked them thin and he liked them boyish and hard and with slender legs. She knew well what he liked, for she'd noticed the type he always stared after on the street. Thel came near it. She knew he'd like to make love to Thel; but she wasn't jealous — not really jealous — of Thel over him. It was Thel's friendship with the Black Man that got on her nerves. But she was sure all that talk about painting wearied Urien.

'All right, then! I'll come without it. I could have caught you up; but if you feel like that about it — let it go! There, my dear, take my arm. I won't run away.'

Why did D. No-man have to say all this so loudly? Did he want everyone to know how trying he could be? But she took his arm, and tried to be as sweet to him as she could. She smiled at him, as much as to say: 'Look at Thel fussing over that old man!' And with her free hand, while she leant on him with the other, she pushed her jersey under her broad leather belt, calling his attention to the prancing horse on its polished buckle, and hoping all the while that Urien was watching these intimacies.

The little party walked down South Street in a loose casual group. They could really have walked side by side down the middle of the road, so quiet was the town and so few were the people visible. The Fordington bells had stopped; but those in St Peter's tower were ringing beautifully, and their sound made Wizzie's mood grow tenderer and tenderer. 'It's funny how I like holding D.'s arm', she thought, 'and looking at Urien! It makes me feel safe. I really don't know whether I'd want to hold Urien's arm. I'd be so nervous, it would spoil everything.'

Up and down on the sound of St Peter's bells her spirit floated like a boat on a brimming tide. How massive and compact all the houses were in this old town! How they seemed to settle their patient stones into the solid earth, just as if they were searching for the foundations of older buildings, who, in their turn, were reaching down to yet older ones.

'Mercy! I believe I'd even enjoy Icen Way today,' she thought. 'I must be getting soft like Nance. What a lot of people there must be just out of bed and having breakfast! The houses have a look as if they were full of people.' And the fancy came to her, as she walked along clutching D.'s arm, that what made the town so still was purely the sound of these bells. Everything was listening to them. Not only the people, but their furniture; and not only the furniture, but the geraniums and calceolarias in the window-boxes!

'I used to feel like this', she thought, 'waking up in that house in London when I was little. I used to feel like it when I played with my doll's house on the landing where the blue vase stood, as if everything was yours and you belonged to everything — to the stones outside and the chairs and tables inside, and the playthings in their boxes, and the fires in their kitchens, and the cats on their rugs, and the canaries in their cages, and the pots on their kitchen-ranges! It's like the air and the warmth in the air knowing about you, and everything being nice because of that, and because of the rooks cawing, and because of those milk-bottles being outside that door! It's the quietness of it, with these crowded houses listening to every step, and the pavements hot with sunshine, and the roads all still, enjoying themselves, enjoying a little peace.'

Her mounting happiness became so intense as she went along — gazing at Urien's huge slouching back and dusky head, and thinking to herself, 'He isn't listening to what Thel's saying. He's thinking of me!' — that, when they reached the South Walks, she felt, since Lovie wasn't here to be hugged, she'd have to do something to please D. No-man!

'I don't mind waiting for you here, D.' she said. 'I couldn't in the town. Beside, it bothered them all, your going back. But I'll sit down over there. You can run round by your Icen Way. I don't mind! I really honestly don't. We'll soon overtake them. I do wish to goodness we had brought Lovie!'

No-man removed his cap and wiped his forehead with his hand. He dropped her arm and stood still. He looked perplexed and worried, hesitating what to do, miserable without his great cudgel, but evidently unwilling to leave her.

'Well?' she repeated. 'Aren't you going? There's a seat over there. You won't be long. We'll soon catch them up.'

She looked steadily at him, and their eyes clung to each other. They were standing by the railings, close to the cenotaph. The others were already crossing the road, Claudius and Mr Wye in front, Urien and Thuella following them.

A faint scent of sun-warmed foliage reached them from the avenue, while a middle-aged citizen with a rose in his button-hole and a big hymn-book in his hand cast what he evidently hoped appeared a brotherly and a Christian glance at Wizzie's leather belt and tight boy's trousers.

The bells of St Peter's were still audible, but their sound diffused itself here in the warm dusty sunshine and became at once more than a sound and less than a sound.

Neither of the two seemed to wish to be the first to look away; but the girl didn't feel as if either of them were thinking solely of the other. They each seemed to be looking through the other, down some long receding vista of future days.

Almost as instinctively as if No-man had been Lovie, the girl suddenly put out her hand to straighten the collar of his coat. There must have been something about this natural gesture that struck the man as unusual, for the character of the expression in his eyes completely changed, and in its changing caused a change in hers too. They no longer looked through each other, thinking of their own lives. They looked at each other, wondering, confused, embarrassed, and with a sort of tentative shyness.

The bells at this point changed their tempo, no doubt to indicate that there were only five minutes left before the beginning of the morning service, while a couple of tall choir-boys, hurrying past them, cast the same sort of covetous look at Wizzie's perfectly modelled hips and flanks as the older church-goer had done.

The girl herself, so accustomed had she grown in the circus to these anonymous recognitions of the desirability of her person, didn't give the boys' clinging glance a thought, but she detected in a second how a magnetic current passed into No-man's erotic nerve, and well did the girl know the appraising look with which he surveyed her from the collar of her jersey to her belt and thence down her side. She knew that at that moment he would have been ready to burn a whole page of Mary Channing on condition that he might fondle her then and there to his heart's content!

But she frowned and sighed and looked away. Their significant moment had quite gone, killed by those choir-boys' effrontery, but the very last thing she wanted just then was to give him an opportunity for that cold-blooded dalliance which seemed the only passion of which he was capable.

Oh, she knew him so well! For then, after a nervous opening and shutting of the fingers of his right hand, as if to grasp the handle of that stick he had forgotten, he gave a little jerk to her wrist and whispered hurriedly: 'Come back with me, sweetheart! They'll not worry; they'll just go on; and we'll catch them up before they get to Maiden Castle; or, if we don't, we'll find them there. Come along, my pet!'

The dark wave of anger that mounted up in her against him at this moment showed itself in her eyes. Was this the way he was going to take her to his lodging in High East Street for the first time? Just because he hadn't seen her before in jersey and trousers!

He had hardly touched her hand when he dropped it hurriedly, catching sight of her face. 'You don't want to? Oh well, oh well — then I won't go myself. To the devil with my stick, sweetheart! Don't 'ee look like that. I won't go at all! Come on, we'll soon catch them up. I didn't mean to spoil the day like this — and such a perfect day as it is! Come on, old girl.'

Wizzie turned with him in silence, and they followed the path beside the row of villas that border the Weymouth road as far as the brewery.

It was impossible for them to avoid turning to look at the familiar Fairfield when they came opposite to it. There was a great show of some kind there; but it was one of the ordinary big English circuses, and the name of its proprietor — a thoroughly English name — was displayed in large letters on its whirligigs and caravans. A curious Sunday calm hung over the glittering engine and the great show-tent, a somewhat desolate calm, characteristic of most places of human entertainment when under a temporary religious ban. A few men were strolling about among the closed booths, and a group of children was peering at them through the rails, hoping evidently to snatch some unofficial glimpse of the open-mouthed lions and tigers advertised on the bill-board.

‘I expect our friends have left that foreigner’, said D. No-man, ‘and gone back to a gypsy life again. I expect your foreign circus itself has gone back where it came from — to Prague perhaps!’

Wizzie quickened her steps. She could just see, a good way ahead, over against the railings of Maumbury Rings, the slouching form of the bare-headed Urien and Thuella’s yellow dress and big-brimmed hat.

The sight of the Fairfield and the familiar circus erections brought back to her her insane desperation at Lovie’s birth. But these things couldn’t hurt her as they had done once. Away with them into the furnace of foul memories!

Her anger against D. No-man ebbed away rapidly as they went on; and they gradually drew nearer to Urien and Thuella.

They were at the Amphitheatre now, and the sunshine lay warm and bright on the slope of the near bank of that ancient circle of cruel sport and inhuman punishment. The man at her side gave the place a hurried excited glance, and then turned sharp upon her, thrusting his hands deep into his pockets in an obvious effort to forget the absence of his familiar stick.

‘Do you know, Wizz,’ he began, and then, as he always did when his mind was full of something — and she sighed as he did it now — he stood stock still, so that she was forced to pause too. ‘I’m going to make this old place of cruelty’, he went on, ‘such a wound on the conscience of everyone that the ripples of what I say’ll go on expanding till — till—’

‘Till they touch a few horrors of our time, my dear, such as—’ He stopped, while an expression she had never noticed before came into his face. ‘Do you know’, he went on slowly, and as if it wasn’t easy for him to say the words, ‘that these mad scientists torture animals in their laboratories for what they call knowledge, just as the Romans did for what they called pleasure?’

It was the tone of his voice rather than the gist of his words that made the girl’s eyes grow startled and round. ‘Yes, and our stupid public opinion is just as indifferent — just as gulled into indifference — as it was then, and as it was when ten thousand people came here to see my Mary burnt!’

It was curious how she couldn’t help the skin under a part of her boy’s clothes turning into what is called goose-flesh under his words. He had talked to her about vivisection before, but never quite in this tone. Not that her mind was impressed. It was her body that felt that spasm of shivering. In her mind she reassured herself. She remembered the extravagant heroics that the girl in her story-book had to put up with from her eloquent lover.

Wizzie’s conscience in these things was not, it must be admitted, any striking compliment to the influence of that early bringing-up of which she was so proud. She was no fool, but in certain directions her mind was almost as undeveloped as Popsy’s.

D. No-man sighed. He had evidently transgressed in this outburst some long-standing rule of his, and the girl felt vaguely that she hadn’t distinguished herself in his eyes by the feeble ‘Yes, D. yes, I see!’ with which she received his words.

They moved on again, but their delay had put a considerable distance between them and that slouching figure and the yellow dress by its side.

Indeed, by the time they reached the cemetery gates Urien and Thuella had turned into the Maiden Castle road and were out of sight.

Opposite the entrance to the cemetery, however, her incorrigible companion stopped again. ‘If he mentions Mary Channing now’, the girl thought, ‘I’ll just run on after Urien, and he’ll have to catch me by running!’

But it was about Urien, not Mary Channing, that the man wanted to talk to her; and she listened with some apprehension. ‘Have you noticed anything...’ he began very gravely, while the irrelevant thought flitted like a swift bird through the girl’s head: ‘He’s never taken me to see his mother’s grave, any more than he’s taken me to his room! He treats me like his tart, not like his wife.’

‘Anything about me and Enoch Quirm?’

‘You and Urien?’

‘Yes.’

‘What about you and Urien?’

‘Have you noticed anything lately, very lately — anything different?’

‘You’ve gone about a lot together. You’ve taken a fancy to each other. But why not? You gave him a share of the Cumber work. You got him out of a ticklish place. He’s grateful, I expect.’

‘I don’t mean that. I mean something else, Wizz.’

There was no need for him to take her by the wrist now, for she had lifted up her face with breathless interest and was giving him a tremulous and concentrated hearing. ‘Is he’, she thought, ‘going to warn me that Urien and I are too thick? Is he going to tell me that those Glymes people have begun to talk? I don’t care if they have! I’ll tell him what Jenny says about Nance and him.’

‘You remember that time in February, Wizz, when we went to Glymes and he gave me that head for my bed — the thing you hated so when I put it on our chimney-piece?’

‘Yes, yes, of course. Go on, for pity’s sake!’ For some reason she felt a fantastic alarm at what he might say. The idea that he was going to scold her about Urien died down. But she still felt a tension of her nerves that made her extremely uncomfortable. ‘Tell me, tell me quick! Don’t torment me, D.! What is it?’

‘You remember how I’ve said that you and I are so like each other in so many ways?’

The girl nodded. She would have made a wry face at this point if she hadn’t been so intensely interested, for it was to the tune of these precious resemblances that he made love to her in the way she disliked most.

‘And that it seems like a kind of fate bringing us together that we both should have lost our mothers and never seen our fathers?’

‘I saw my father!’ she cried; and at the word she felt an almost complete liberation from the nervous tension that had been mounting up in her. In her relief she permitted her eyes to wander over the crowded cemetery at their side, wondering where D.’s mother’s grave was, among such a multitude, and what her mother would have thought of D. had she ever met him!

‘But you don’t remember seeing him,’ argued No-man stubbornly, evidently prepared to let the most life-and-death subject go when the question arose of his ideal resemblance to his Bronze Age captive.

Wizzie shook her head and smiled at him happily. She felt so relieved that what he was making all this fuss about had only to do with their parents, and had no connection with her interest in Urien, that she no longer hung on his words. In fact, as he went on to tell her about his mother, and about some affair his mother had had with Urien before Nance came on the scene, her attention began to wander.

All sorts of odd people were drifting past them now, coming out of the town while their families were in church, to see what was to be seen of this famous discovery. Even to Wizzie's unspeculative eye it seemed as if this discovery, whatever it might be, was attracting all the queerest, all the most eccentric, all the least respectable Dorchester people towards Maiden Castle! Whatever it was that had been discovered, it was certainly something that was stirring the dregs, so to speak, of the old town.

The warm day, no doubt, had a lot to do with it. The warm day had a lot to do, too, with the longing glances that so many of the young men who passed them by allowed to rest as long as they decently might, and even longer, upon her soft tight flannel trousers. It had pleased her to buy those boy's trousers on Saturday night and to pull them on before the looking-glass this morning while D. was taking his walk. He hadn't seen her in them alone for one second, for when he came back from his walk the Glymes party had arrived, and they had all had breakfast in Jenny's kitchen.

But she hadn't worn them to tantalize D. or to make men follow her with their eyes. They pleased her because they made her feel like she used to when balanced on her old horse's back. The nearer her clothes resembled tights, the more was she conscious of her body as the instrument of her art. It was partly because her jersey and trousers showed off her figure to such perfection that she'd felt so happy this morning. Not for men's eyes — or for women's eyes either — had she worn them, but to feel herself, to feel the leap and bound and balance and poise of her musical instrument, even if fate didn't let her play it!

went droning on about Urien having lain with Cornelia Smith, and about old Smith having known of it, and about Mrs Smith and Urien being cousins, and how both of them were natives of Wales, and how — But the ‘how’ she would have liked explained was how men’s way of talking managed to bring down a pall of dulness on women’s minds.

But men were all like that! The nuns had looked at each other when their priest was talking. She and Grummer had looked at each other a thousand times when Old Funky was talking. She and Jenny had looked at each other when Claudius was talking, and how often must Thel and Nance have looked at each other in that dirty study at Glymes!

While she kept saying ‘yes... yes... yes’ as D. went on — and he seemed surprised she wasn’t more astonished when he told her so solemnly about his mother having let Urien embrace her in the bed with the heraldic heads — she was more interested in the people who passed just then than in Urien’s early love-affairs; and she noticed how silent these young men became in the intensity of their desire for her. She noticed how they stopped talking and laughing — just stared in dazed absorption till they had passed. None of them, however, dared to look back; and it wasn’t as if D. had his great stick! No, she couldn’t understand their not looking back — but let them go! It wasn’t for men, not for any man, she’d put on these things — not even for her Black Man of Glymes. For herself, alone!

It must have been because it was Sunday that all these men were in their best clothes. But they looked as if they were going to a wedding! They seemed solemn and yet excited. What could there be in these tedious excavations to attract so many? And they were mostly Dorchester people. She knew many of them by sight.

But what was this? Mercy! What was D. telling her now? Her mouth as well as her eyes opened as the import of his words reached her, and her hands, which had been rather awkwardly pressed low down into her boy's pockets, began unconsciously to clasp each other, squeezing her knuckles white.

'But — you are — sure, D.?' she gasped in a low voice. 'They may have had a child, but are you sure it was you?'

No-man, who had been astonished and a little hurt at her previous calmness, couldn't prevent a flicker of satisfaction in the presence of her agitation, the satisfaction a person naturally feels when startling news produces its proper effect.

'There can be no possible doubt,' he said dryly. 'The man's my father. I've got to make the best of it.'

'Do you — like him?'

No-man gave vent to a grim chuckle. 'It's not a question of that, my dear. It's a question of — It's a — different question, Wizz.'

'And Jenny says Nance has got fond of you; and I—'

He caught her up. 'And you, I suppose, have got, as you say, fond of him! It seems a peculiarity of girls to do that. Thuella appears altogether—'

He stopped abruptly, aware of the deep trouble in her face. Then he laid his hand on her shoulder. 'Don't 'ee take it too hard, old girl,' he whispered gently. 'Perhaps it's just as well you do like him since I'm his son.'

'Oh, why, why didn't you tell me this before?'

He made a vague gesture of helplessness.

'You knew in February, didn't you?' she said sharply.

'No, I didn't know then.'

'But that was when — wasn't it?'

'I didn't know then.'

She was silent, letting her eyes wander to the headstones that were visible through the iron gates.

‘I don’t see’, he said slowly, ‘why you should take this so hard. It’s me — it’s I — not you — who’s got to deal with it.’

Her reply came quickly. ‘You ought to have told me from the start. You’re not open with me, D. — not only about him, but about everything. Oh, why did I ever—’ And her mouth drew down ominously. ‘You’ve not been open with me,’ she repeated, swallowing the lump in her throat.

‘Were you so open with me, then, my girl? A lot you ever told me about —’

‘Stop!’ she cried sharply. ‘No more of that! I won’t have it — do you understand? If I agreed to live with you — if I went on living with you after I found—’

‘Found what? Go on! We may as well have it all out, now we’ve begun. This isn’t a bad place for you and me to come to an understanding. I don’t know whether I ever told you, but it was here — by their graves down there — that I first met Nance, before we found you — and those people — behind the tent—’

She gave him one startled outraged look, a look from the depths of her woman’s nature. ‘D.!’ she murmured in a different voice, a subdued, weak, unsteady voice. ‘I never thought you would speak of that in this tone.’

His face became drawn and tense, and his mouth twitched. ‘You’ve never talked freely to me,’ he said. You’ve never taken me into your confidence. You’ve kept that for your friend Jenny. Even now I don’t know — I’ve not the least idea — what’s really going on in your mind. You keep yourself as far from me as if — as if our room — our bed — our life together, were no more to you than — than your life with them, before I took you away.’

A spectator of this scene would have found it pathetic, the way in which in her boy’s costume she made the little movements that a woman makes at a moment of stress. She herself was unconscious of what she did with her hands, feeling for her pockets, fumbling at her belt, plucking at the front of her jersey.

She knew him so little that her ignorance closed in upon her self-pity, narrowing its channel, building a barrier between them. She didn't even know — since in her self-colloquies she had got into the habit of assuming that the only bond between them was his cold-blooded sensuality — why it was that his words, his tone, hurt her like this, or why, beneath her anger and grievance, a strange cold lost feeling began to invade her heart. Some deep instinctive assumption she had slipped into with him, far below her nervous irritations, began to crack and fall apart, as if that familiar Weymouth road under her feet had broken into fissures and yawning crevices.

It never occurred to her to suspect that the sweet exciting glow about Urien's interest in her was like the dallying of a rock-plant with the caresses of the wooing sun — dalliance that was impossible save for its root in the stone out of which it grew.

Her pride was so much greater than her knowledge, her conscious understanding so far inferior to her blind feminine instincts, that even now, in spite of the deathly chill that invaded her under his unexpected attack, she clung obstinately with her story-book intelligence to the fixed idea that there was no real love between them, that real love belonged to that picture-show world of her imagination, that world of magnetic glances from mysterious personages like the Glymes man, that world where she was brought back from her circus triumphs by a passionate admirer's limousine to a resplendent Lovie under a rosy porch.

'So Nance is fond of me, is she?' he brought out with bitter sarcasm, 'and you find yourself quite upset when you know who the man is you're so attracted to. And don’t think I’ve not seen it — I saw it on Candlemas Night, when he made that stuff you and Thel liked drinking! It’s unlucky, isn’t it, that he likes Thuella so much? But come on; let’s hurry and catch them up! I’ve known, all the time, how annoyed you’ve been to hang back for me, with such exciting people ahead. I saw why you didn’t want me to get my stick. Come on; let’s catch them up! He’ll love to have you with him as well as Thuella.’

No-man might just as well have been repeating his own name— ‘Dud, Dud, Dud, Dud, Dud’ — over and over again as indulging in all this elaborate sarcasm. Since his first words, she hadn’t listened to a thing he said. That deadly chill air from the crack in the security under her feet had numbed her whole being. She didn’t care what he thought, or what he said, or for any reasonings he used. All she wanted was for the ground under her feet to stop swaying and cracking, to stop letting through those death-airs. So she kept staring and staring at him, her eyes brimming, her throat swelling, her lips sucked in against her teeth, and her nose, for all the sunshine that played upon it, showing white and pinched.

He must have seen that his sarcasms were paper darts sinking into a wooden post, for he suddenly changed his tune. He began talking to her in a low whisper, a whisper into which he threw every grievance against her that had been accumulating since November.

‘How far have you gone with him, you and Thuella? Or perhaps I ought to say: how far have you let him go? It’s a shame I don’t feel proud of a father — isn’t it? — who likes ’em in pairs, like partridges. But how far has this thing gone? I knew there was something. You didn’t fool me altogether. But all these things are so laughable, aren’t they, that it’s hard to be serious about them. But you didn’t fool me altogether! But what’s so amusing about it is to think that he was just the same to Mother as he is to you! That’s what

I’ve been thinking about lately — the amusingness of it all — his body and hers, and now yours — and how funny that both Mother and you should like men with hairy chests, and men who aren’t particularly keen on washing. Can’t you speak? I know it’s a shock to you to find out how old he is — well over sixty, anyway — I’m the one to know that much — but can’t you speak?’

Perhaps it did begin now to reach her wits, through the miserable numbness into which that death-cold air — that feeling of being lost, of being left outside, of having no place in the system of things — had plunged her, that if her D. really had no room for her any more, that if she’d killed something that she had all along taken for granted without knowing that she took it so (something to which in her thoughts she had even denied existence), it was queer that he should be in such a towering passion! Perhaps it did begin to reach the woman in her, the mother of Lovie, that a man didn’t grow suddenly frantic like this, or see red, as they said at the circus, unless you were pretty important to him.

At any rate, she straightened herself where she stood, clasped her hands behind her back, swallowed her tears, and faced him boldly. ‘I — simply — don’t — know — what you’re — talking about, D.’ she said slowly. ‘There’s nothing at all between Urien and me, and let me tell you this too: you’ve no right to say that there’s anything between him and Thel! He’s a peculiar man, he’s a wonderful man; and I don’t deny he’s been kind to me and to Thel too. What’s the matter with you, D.? What’s come over you, that you act like this? You’ve never done it before. You’ve never before interfered with me. You’ve let me have everything I wanted. And now you suddenly turn on me like a madman! If you didn’t want me to go to Glymes, if you didn’t want me to see Mr Quirm, why didn’t you tell me so? I was happy enough in Friary Lane with Jenny. I didn’t need to go to Glymes, or to take Lovie to Glymes. What is it? What's come over you? You must know perfectly well in your heart that I've not let any man but you — old or young — touch me since I've belonged to you. Has Jenny been putting things into your head? Do be sensible, D. Don't get such wild ideas!'

And Wizzie, whose penetration into the depths of human feeling had sharpened a good deal during this agitating scene, had the wit to see that he believed her, and the wit, too, to see that this reassurance was an incredible relief to him! Who on earth had put it into his head that she had gone such lengths with the Black Man of Glymes? As to what he told her about Urien and him and their being father and son, she simply didn't believe it. D. couldn't be so much younger than Urien. In all his ways D. was like an old man. Secretly she'd suspected from the first that he was much older than he pretended, just as Old Funky was much younger. No — no. Urien was up to something with D. like everybody else was! D. was the most hopelessly stupid man in the whole world. Even Mr Wye, that silly old pantaloon, was as clever as Dan Leno, compared to D.

Each one of these thoughts, as she watched No-man's recovery of his normal self-control, carried a margin with it, a nimbus, a moon-circle of shy evasive feelings, much more tenuous than thought. Among these subtle feelings there began to predominate a certain protective instinct towards this easily deceived man, as if he were a sort of elderly Lovie.

'Well, kid, let's go now, anyway. We can talk as we go,' he had murmured awkwardly; and it was to the rhythm of their two pairs of feet on the Maiden Castle road that he gave her the rest of his evidence about the Glymes man and tried to show her that there could be no mistake in his conclusion. To all this she scarcely listened. What she kept wondering was how he had got it lodged in his mind that there was something between her and Urien.

With her fixed idea of his pathetic stupidity it seemed to her unthinkable that he could really have noticed her girlish tremors in Urien's presence. Her relief at his faith in her denial, the closing up of that terrible crack in the ground under her feet, her surprised recognition that he could get angry with her in the jealous fashion of an ordinary lover, all these things so restored her good spirits that she began to feel not only much wiser and cleverer than her old D. but easier in her mind about the excited feelings that the Glymes man had aroused.

The heroine of her magazine story found it perfectly natural to be interested in two men at the same time. But she had not thought of old D. as a man at all in that sense! She had lived in her irritations with him, in her grievances against him. She had just taken him as an inevitable background. But this sudden outburst of his had brought her background to life, had revealed it as being more to her than she thought. She shuddered even yet when she recalled that lost sensation, that cold draught out of empty space which had come when this basis of her life had heaved and trembled. When she was standing just now by those cemetery gates, she had had a revelation as to herself. Not even now, not even after the shock of that weird panic, did she say to herself that she loved her old D. It was still different from that. In some queer way what she felt about him was mixed up with her feeling for Lovie.

Indeed, if Wizzie's chronicler were to be absolutely veracious, he would have to convey the curious fact that not only did she link up D. No-man with Old Funky's child but — such was the realism of her mind — with the familiar feel of the handle of the child's perambulator!

For the space of a few seconds — and her memory of it took the form of two small headstones and a squat cypress — the shock of the ground yawning beneath her feet had frozen to dead ice the sensual glow of her excitement about Urien. But now, with the bad moment over, and D. No-man apparently reassured, that perilous sweetness in her veins began slowly to make its presence felt again. It began to come back even while she gave her absent-minded replies to what her companion was saying, and, as usual, he was talking about the excavations; but though she did her best to show interest, the sight of those two figures they were now gradually overtaking kept distracting her, do what she could to follow his words.

It worried her, the tricks her mind played, as she gazed at those two forms, the lumbering dark one and the slender swaying light one, outlined against the distant promontory of sun-misted turf.

She kept trying to remember what Urien had said when he begged her to be kind to Thuella, something about beating against the impenetrable; but No-man's rambling allusions to these eternal excavations projected an image of a jagged hole in a great slope of darkness, out of which the two forms in front of them kept rising up, like the clouds in Thuella's picture, luridly entwined with each other, while she was out in the cold.

It was not long, however, before No-man, captivated as he had been all that morning by the appeal of her boy's clothes, slipped his arm about her waist and began a sort of perambulatory love-making as they moved forward. She soon felt his fingers sliding from her waist to her side, and under his touch the swing of her limbs as she walked became a mechanical response to his amorous pressure. Cold as she was left as a rule by No-man's caresses, there was something in the impregnating warmth of this June day that made her feel abnormally receptive, and thus it came about, for what was really the first time in all these months, that this pressure of his hand against her side as she moved proved to be what no toyings or dallyings in the secure retreat of their Friary Lane room had ever been — a real provocation to her senses.

To the end of her life she never forgot that walk to the foot of Maiden Castle. All the way along that straight white hedgeless road, as it crossed the unenclosed pasture-lands and arable lands which rolled off on both sides to their remote upland horizons, she yielded herself to a delicious orgy of nervous sensuality. Her relief in escaping from that ice-cold feeling of being an outcast in the world endowed the pressure of No-man's satyrish fingers with an unwonted human warmth.

And now that the danger had passed, or seemed to have passed, she allowed free scope to the relaxed sensations that Urien seemed to have the power of creating. She lay back upon No-man's support, upon No-man's reliability, just as night by night since last November she had lain in his arms in that room at Jenny's; but from the snug security of this easy asylum, just as if No-man's had been the 'everlasting arms' of her childhood's deity, she gave herself up without the least flicker of remorse to her obsession for Enoch Quirm.

But what was that? Her companion's voice, piercing the languorous trance of her wanton feelings, was talking now about something different from these diggings for dead idols.

'May I ask you something, something very particular, my precious?' he whispered, pulling her so close to him that she had to skip a step or two to get into rhythm with his strides. And then, taking her yielding person as a symbol of a yielded personality, he admitted that what he would give a great deal to know, if she didn't mind telling him — but if she did, she must just say so, and he wouldn't be offended — was whether, if she had by any chance got fond of Urien or had had what they call an affair with Urien, she would have felt a curious loathing for such an entanglement now he'd told her who the man was.

'You mean, who you are,' she said with rather a silly little laugh, but, feeling reassured as she did now, she felt it hard to be serious.

'Don't 'ee try and be funny, child!' he retorted. 'If it isn't as sickening to me as it would be to some, it isn't very nice. You mustn't think I'm entirely philosophical about it — I mean, that I'm his son and he's my father.'

'No, dear. I know how you feel.'

'But would you have felt upset over it, Wizz, if you had — I know you haven't, but if you had — let him make love to you?'

'I don't see—'

'You mean you'd feel the same as if we weren't related at all?'

'I don't see—'

'You don't see that it makes any difference?' He looked at her gravely, half-humorously. 'I always thought I was pretty detached in things like this, but on my soul, old girl, you beat me at it! I suppose it's only my bookishness, but when I think of those old Greek plays making so much of —'

'Of what, D.? What on earth are you talking about now? Gracious! I've never read a Greek play in my life. You'd better talk to Mr Wye! Popsy told me she knew a father and son who lived with the same girl for years. She was his stepmother, of course, and there used to be rows; but in the end, when the father died, he left them all his money, and Popsy said the girl wasn't so nice to him when the old man was gone as she was before; and she never would marry him.'

No-man couldn't help smiling at this. 'But what would your convent people have thought, Wizz?'

'I'm sure I don't know! Not the same as your old Greeks anyway!'

A flock of starlings swept down upon the edge of the field at their side where there was some newly sprouting corn, and then, disturbed by their advance, whirled away again with a confused chattering, the sunshine heavy on their swaying mass of clumsy wings.

A man whose occupation it was impossible to guess, but whose attire was neutral, his expression impenetrable, his tie modest, his boots polished, his hands in his pockets, overtook them at this juncture, walking with brisk steps, his eyes on the road. No sooner had he passed them than he began whistling, in a faint flat monotone, a few bars from the familiar song: ‘Daisy, Daisy, give me your answer, do! I’m half-crazy, all for the love of you!’

No-man’s arm fell incontinently to his side; and Wizzie could see from the savage wrinkling of his profile, which seemed snarling like a dog whose bone is taken away, that he could hardly restrain his anger.

A dead rook, with a look in its eye as if it were thankful to be dead and its few remaining feathers discoloured by dust, offered itself, however, as a humble distraction; and No-man, stooping down, picked it up by its tail, muttered some gibberish over it that she couldn’t catch, and flung it into the young green wheat. To her present mood, the neutral pedestrian with his half-hearted whistling was a pleasing episode, while her companion’s fuss over those dusty bones struck her as a most dreary affectation, but she could see that his face had resumed its equanimity as he paused to let the impertinent personage get ahead.

‘What I mean is, Wizz,’ he went on, ‘suppose you had started an affair with my father, would it have weighed on your mind when I told you who he was?’

She tried submissively to catch his drift, but she tried in vain. His own obvious absorption in the irresistible appeal of her figure in those tight trousers added the last note to the exultant trance of well-being in which she moved, and this matter of Urien and him being father and son seemed totally irrelevant, even if it were true, to her relation to either the one or the other.

There was a groan of real trouble in the sigh with which he received her vague expression of uncertainty, her feeble 'I don't see, D. why it would have been so awful', but he let the matter drop after that, and they moved on slowly, keeping well to the rear of the brisk-stepping citizen with his hands in his pockets.

It was not long before No-man expressed his feelings about this easy gentleman in plain words: 'God damn this chap! Why can't he go slower or faster? What does a person like that, anyway, think is going on at Maiden Castle?'

'Oh, shut up, D. do!' she protested. 'We don't own the whole road.' Womanlike, she accepted this neutral person's presence as she accepted the dead rook and the hovering starlings; but the presence of a low bank at their side with an amazing variety of feathery grasses made her think how Lovie would have liked this walk. 'She'd have wanted to get out and run along that bank,' she thought, and she longed to be able to share her good spirits with her offspring.

'I'd like to know', said No-man presently, when they had nearly reached the gate where the road ended and nothing but a lightly trodden field-track led up to the sacred earthworks, 'what that fellow gets out of coming here.'

'Much the same as ourselves,' she retorted, turning to glance behind them. 'There are people all the way along the road now! Dorchester people love an excuse to come out on Sunday.'

But they both instinctively paused at this point, for the man in front of them had taken off his new bowler-hat and was apparently examining the label inside it, as he leaned over the gate.

‘I can’t understand how anyone like you who’s writing books about people’ — Wizzie had no idea she was going to blurt this out, but the thought seemed to have got so heavy in her mind that it slipped out and fell of its own accord, like a ripe pear— ‘can hate everyone like you do, D.! The world has to have all sorts, hasn’t it? I know you don’t think you’re like anyone else, but really you’re just like those patronizing upper-class people who want to keep everyone at a distance.’

She felt his blank astonishment at her audacity in the way he looked at her; but he only said, ‘Come on, child! We must hurry up. They’re waiting for us up there.’

They had to pass the man at the gate; and in place of opening it to let them through, he stepped back a pace or two and stared intently as they opened it for themselves. No-man haughtily averted his eyes from the irrelevant personage as he closed the gate after them, but Wizzie met the fellow’s glance, and no sooner had she done so than she realized that all this manoeuvring was simply to get a good, undisturbed stare at herself in her jersey and trousers. The normal set expression of the man’s face changed, as his eyes met hers, into a relaxed and maudlin leer — not so much a leer, perhaps, as a fatuous, desire-drunk spasm of obsessed gazing — and afterwards, as they proceeded towards the entrance of the mysterious polis, she knew perfectly well that the besotted individual was walking as closely as he dared behind them! She could even hear him pant — for he was not an athletic figure — and tap his knees, as he walked, with the hard brim of his bowler-hat.

But there were all their four friends, waiting for them on the extreme top of the first rampart of turf! No-man waved his arm to greet them, and Wizzie was struck by the solemn and dramatic manner in which he did this — not just perfunctorily and casually but exaggeratedly, just as Popsy used to do to the circus audience when, after some difficulty with her balancing, she had at last got through her turn.

‘I ought to have let him go back for his stick,’ she said to herself; and she felt the same sort of twinge, only not quite so acutely, as she had felt a few days ago when by an unpardonable accident she had thrown Gwendolly into the fire.

But though her waving at those four figures was more like the negligent manner in which a grown-up person waves at a group of children from a train window than any conceivable gesture of Popsy’s, she did experience some incredible sensations as she climbed the slope towards them.

But she felt his eyes following every step of her rapid ascent as he scrambled after her, and, when she turned to wave to him in the middle of her ascent, she was aware that the bowler-hatted man, still lower down the slope, was ascending the hill with such an impetus that it looked as if he would soon overtake him.

None of the four at the crest of the highest ridge could see anything of her as she climbed, but in her mind she saw them — at least she saw Urien and Thel.

It was no great distance from the foot of Mai-Dun to the summit, but the final slope was steep, and not even in the circus had Wizzie’s spirits risen to the pitch they rose to now, or the exultant power of her body been more ready for anything. Her boy’s attire offered no feminine impediment to her breathless rush as she climbed the face of the final bulwark, but though the distance was negligible and her speed was beyond the power of any ordinary girl, she experienced for that brief epoch — for nothing is less of an absolute than time — some of the most radiant and exultant moments in her whole life.

Light-winged butterflies — but since neither at the convent nor at the circus had Wizzie learnt any natural history, their names were nothing to her — fluttered against her face. Tiny little moths of various shades of pallid brown appeared and disappeared under her very fingers. There was a scent in her nostrils as of grass upon which the sun had been shining so long that from every particular blade above the ground and from every rooty fibre beneath the ground something of the earth's most intimate sweat seemed to evaporate in the hot amorous air. She derived a curious sensual pleasure, every time she stooped in her ascent, from contact with the sun-warmed grass; and once or twice, as she bent down, she actually dug her nails into the thick-growing, honey-sweet turf. 'I want to be myself,' she thought as she scrambled up the slope with that hay-sweet scent in her nostrils. 'I don't want to belong to either of them!'

But in the play of her limbs as she climbed she found it impossible not to yield more and more to that dangerous magnetic pull of Urien's personality. 'I may have a funny face', she thought, 'but I am beautiful today.'

And the whole bulk of that steep turf rampart seemed to acknowledge this beauty and to make it its own. She had the feeling that her youthful body was growing more lithe, more pliant, more desirable, with every step she took; and before she emerged over the crest of the rampart she told herself, not bitterly or cynically but quite deliberately and with a calm, non-moral, feminine snatching at the essential, that, after what she had gone through, it was silly not to take all that was offered. 'If Urien were D.'s grandfather', she concluded, 'and he loved me for myself, what would it matter?'

Had the spirit of Jenny Dearth been at her side at that moment, reading her thoughts, the poor Horse-Head's view of the matter — more philosophical in another woman's predicament than in her own — would no doubt have been that her friend's experience with both Old Funky and No-man had so corrupted her that she had no idea what being loved for herself meant; but subtler psychologists than Jenny might have taken a different view of what was going on just then in the heart under that grey jersey. At any rate, her appearance, hot and breathing hard after her rapid climb, but charmingly flushed and radiant, produced an electric effect upon the four persons seated on the top of the ridge.

Thuella jumped up at once. 'We were waiting for you, my dear,' she cried. 'We thought you and D. might be totally lost! But sit down and rest yourself. We'll wait for D. here. Urien has to go on now, to see what's happening at the excavations; but when he's found out how things are over there he'll come back and tell us. What are you doing, Father?' This last remark was addressed to Teucer Wye, who was trying to catch a languid butterfly in his thin fingers.

'I'm going with Mr Quirm,' the Professor brought out, letting the butterfly escape. 'Won't you come too, Cask?'

'Hadn't we better wait for No-man?' said Claudius, with no sign of rising.

But Teucer Wye scrambled up at once and laid his hand on his shoulder. 'Come along, Cask,' he said. 'They can follow us, if they want to. No-man'll need a rest after his climb. We can report progress when we get back.'

Wizzie noticed that Thuella gave her father an appreciative glance as Claudius rose stiffly to his feet. She seemed in as good a temper with her parent today as he was with her. 'There, my dear, there!' she said to Wizzie.

‘Do as you’re told, like a good child.’ And, collapsing again upon the turf, she pulled her down at her side.

Almost everything that our friend had hoped for was in the quick exchange of looks that now passed between Urien and herself as she stretched herself, still breathing hard, by the prostrate girl. The man’s glance seemed to her to say, ‘Do as they tell you. Don’t worry about me. We understand each other perfectly.’ And, when the three of them went off at a leisurely pace, she deliberately refrained from following them with her eyes, but turned, with more sympathy in her flushed face than usual, to the wearer of the yellow dress.

‘You darling,’ Thuella murmured, ‘now at last I’ve got you to myself!’ And then, with the particular look of narrow-lidded concentrated mischief with which from time immemorial the harem has conspired against its possessor, she whispered in hurried eagerness, ‘How far did you leave him behind? How soon will he be here?’

For answer Wizzie merely shrugged her shoulders and, rolling over with her face against the sweet-scented turf, began plucking little blades of grass and drawing them negligently between her teeth. She knew exactly how Thel was sitting — for the girl too had changed her pose after that furtive question — by the feel of a foot against her side and a hand on her shoulder. Clearly she could visualize that upright cross-legged figure in the yellow dress, the long limbs bent beneath the flimsy skirt and the flapping hat concealing the bright hair. She felt wonderfully older than Thel as she tasted the bitter-sweetness of those small grass-blades. Somehow she felt as if her own unfulfilled and perhaps never to be fulfilled ambitions, that image of herself balanced in radiant poise on her old horse’s back and leaping forward, with that strong back always beneath her, through all the starry hoops of the world, placed her, even in her very renunciation, on a higher level than Thel's cloud-creating claims.

But had D. or Urien himself perhaps, told the girl, long before this, of their men's astonishing relationship? And, if Thel did know, did it set up in her eyes, as apparently it had done in his, some shocking barrier, a barrier only to be passed by an unthinkable sacrilege, between Urien and any girl who lived with D.? No, no. Thel was no more like an ordinary woman than she was herself! These artists were free of such scruples, and the wild clouds on Thel's canvas were like the glittering spangles of her own starry rush through the air — something that crossed these things on a magic tight-rope!

But Thel was talking to her now, talking in a low excited voice, and Wizzie could feel not only those electric fingers through her jersey, as the girl's hand caressed her shoulder, but the troubled intensity with which she was looking down upon her prostrate form.

'Yes,' she was saying, 'and I'm not a bit jealous of you with him, and never shall be; but I am — oh, Wizzie, darling, and you know it, only you don't want to know it — terribly jealous of him with you! I'm jealous of everybody with you, of old D. even, silly though that may sound, and I'm wickedly — do you hear, you dangerous, silent girl? — I'm wickedly jealous of Lovie.'

Still drawing the little grasses through her teeth and making a faint sound that only she herself could hear as she drew a drop of sweetness from each of them before she threw it away, Wizzie continued to feel so much older than the breather of these impassioned sentences that she found it impossible to take them seriously. Her convent school and her circus school had set such a gulf between men and women, and she herself — for all Jenny's talk of her corruption — was so eminently normal in these things, that all she said to herself was, 'Thel's too demonstrative. I must make her tell me which of her boys I remind her of!'

'It's Urien's ideas that fascinate me,' Thuella went on. 'I can't bear the smelly clothes. He's more like a Chinaman than a Welshman. How on earth Nance can bear it when he takes off—'

'Don't be disgusting, Thel!' our friend protested, spitting out a fragment of chalk grit that had got into her mouth. 'Of course you'll say it's my circus life; but it isn't that at all. I don't care a damn how dirty a man is, or what his ideas are either! It's something quite different. By the way, Thel, what are Urien's ideas? I've heard him talk, and I like listening to him, but it seems to me it's all perfectly crazy. If Lovie were a man instead of a baby-girl, she'd have ideas exactly like—'

' Who would Lovie have ideas like?'

Both the girls gave a start, and Thuella uttered a shrill little noise like the cry of a frightened moor-hen. But their disturber was only D. No-man, reaching them from an angle rather different from the one where they would naturally have looked for him.

'Well? Who has got Lovie's ideas?' he repeated brusquely, sitting down on Wizzie's further side. He was evidently delighted to come upon them like this; and to Wizzie, though she still continued lying on her stomach sucking grasses, it was a pleasant surprise that he was so gratified. 'He can't like Thuella very much', she thought, 'or he'd be annoyed by finding us together.'

'Wizzie says', began Thuella, removing as she did so her big hat and tossing it on the grass, 'that though she respects Urien very much she thinks nothing of his ideas. She thinks his ideas are childish. What do you think about that, Master?'

He mumbled some incoherent sentence in reply to this, which Wizzie thought was a quotation from Shakespeare, but it left the younger girl as much in the dark as before as to whether Thel knew, or did not know, about D. and Urien.

There was a silence after that between the three of them, till the man enquired what had happened to the rest of the party.

‘It was Claudius,’ threw in Thuella. ‘He couldn’t wait; and he dragged Father and Urien with him.’

Another silence ensued, which was broken by a noisy group of young people passing just below their resting-place. Of these new-comers it was possible only to see the heads and the hats, objects that belonged, it seemed, to three lads and a couple of women. It amused Wizzie to note the effect of this bodiless cortège, advancing with mechanical jerks along her line of vision, and disappearing one by one. It made her think of a certain peep-hole in the circus-tent through which she had often peered out while waiting her turn. She used to try and distinguish their faces later, but never could! And now, in the same way, her mind — floating on the happy reassurance of the look which the Glymes man had given her — wondered whether the hat with a red ribbon on it had been chosen as carefully for this Maiden Castle outing as her own boy’s suit had been, and whether it would bring its chooser the luck hers had brought her.

‘Did you have a good breakfast in your attic, D.?’ enquired Thuella. ‘Or did you get cross with the Royal Martyr this morning?’

The effect of this question upon Wizzie’s mind surprised her, and while No-man began some long-winded rigmarole about what he’d seen from his kitchen window yesterday or the day before, she rolled over and lay on her back between them, her head raised a little and her hands clasped behind it. ‘What’s this?’ she thought. ‘He never tells me these things. But I’m not going to ask him what she’s talking about.’

She had scarcely made this wise resolution, however, when she heard herself saying, ‘I wouldn’t cross the threshold of D.’s room up there, Thel, for fifty pounds! He brought one of those monsters — the one he got from Glymes — into our room, and I made him take it away. He’s got a pair of them up there now! I wouldn’t sleep with such things at the foot of my bed — not if he paid me!’

She was certain she saw No-man, at that second, dodge a look that swept across her from the sunlit figure at her side. But he hurriedly began talking to them both in his most tiresome vein.

‘You women are too practical,’ he told them, his eyes turning hastily from one to the other. ‘When Wizz wakes up, she only thinks of what she’s done or is going to do, or what Lovie’s done or is going to do. I keep my mind—’ He paused for a second under the look Wizzie gave him. ‘I’ll pay you out for this,’ was what her look said.

And then her thoughts went back to Urien and his being this tedious man’s father. ‘It’s all nonsense! Urien can’t be as old as that. But if he is, I don’t care! I wouldn’t care if the devil was the father of both of them!’

But as she cogitated in this way, with her eyes half-closed, it began to dawn on her that some sort of emotional drama was going on across her grey trousers. No-man kept fidgeting uneasily as he talked, and through the dazzling sun-spangles that did not so much hide the two of them from her as metamorphose them into a blinding transfiguration, she seemed to detect — for she compensated for her want of responsiveness to symbolic figures like D.’s ditch-digger by being abnormally alive to the psychic currents between men and women — that Thuella was exercising some kind of sensual witchcraft over No-man. The second she realized this, she became vividly alert to every word he was uttering, and not only so but she gave him one of those inspired smiles that women have the power of conjuring up, a smile whose falsity no man can fathom, for it has behind it the treachery of Nature herself.

But it must not be supposed that Wizzie for one second shared the sardonic masculine view that there was anything ironic in all these criss-cross love-makings. Like most women — moving, as we all have to do, in the midst of a flickering cat's-cradle of erotic currents — she took the most fantastic complications, that life so delights to improvise, in a spirit of practical and literal simplicity. Left to herself — a natural daughter, as Urien might have put it, of the earth-goddess Caridwen — it would never have occurred to her that any emotion, as long as it could somehow be squeezed into the category of love, could be regarded as piquant or ironic or grotesque. It was as much a part of life, this gypsy emotion, as a stickleback among minnows or a puff-ball among cowslips, and to regard it as a mixture of the monstrous and the humorous, instead of taking it simply and sadly as the way life was, struck her as childish.

A logical statement of what she now obscurely felt would be, perhaps, that — though she could hear the voice of No-man, or the voice of Mr Wye, or even the voice of Urien himself, calling it an ironic situation that Thuella, so passionately fond of her, could tempt D. across her body, or that she herself could be interested in D.'s father while Nancy was interested in D. — to her mind these situations were simple facts, lucky or unlucky facts, not ironic at all; and you had to accept them and make what you could of them, just as you had to accept the fact that Lovie was harder to manage when D. was in the room than when you had the child alone.

She could tell from D.'s tone at this moment that he was in some deep internal excitement, though he was talking in his habitual vein. But there was a hollow space, full of an undercurrent of feeling that had nothing to do with his words, between his words and what they served to screen.

'What I can't get you people to see', D. was saying, 'is that when, in that bit of road, for instance, between the barracks and Poundbury, which is now one of my favourite walks, I come on a patch of green moss on a grey wall, or catch the peculiar scent of trodden grass, I get a sensation that's more important than what you call love, or anything else — nearer the secret of things too! It is love, in a certain sense; but it's love of life itself and of something that comes to us through life! I don't know about Nancy or Jenny, but I've an idea that neither of you get these feelings, or you wouldn't look like you do when I talk about them. But of course you're an artist, Thel, and Wizz is too, in her way, I suppose; but I'm not talking about that. I'm talking — Hullo! There you are! Well? What news? Have you seen the grand discovery?'

As he spoke, he scrambled to his feet, and the young women rose too; but for a moment the old gentleman — for it was Teucer Wye who had caught them napping — could only make whistling sounds through his toothless gums. He was panting and exhausted, and he had apparently been running, but he waved Thuella aside when she tried to make him sit down. 'Whew! Whew! I'll tell — you — whew! — as — we go. It's there — they're showing it to everybody! They're quarrelling about it — but come — whew! whew! I've come to get you — you'll — whew! — see — for — yourselves.'

Wizzie saw No-man, who had a dazed and shame-faced look as he rose to his feet, like a boy caught in the act of cribbing, contemplating with evident astonishment the dutiful way Thuella offered her parent her arm, which the panting Mr Wye was only too thankful to take.

‘How stupid D. is!’ she thought. ‘He can’t understand the simplest event. He thinks a miracle has happened because Thel and her father are friendly. Can’t he see that when a person’s free of her home and getting a little pleasure, a father becomes a different thing?’

But the Professor of Greek at the small Midland college did seem different enough to justify No-man’s surprise, even if he had no explanation of the phenomenon. The old man hopped along so happily on Thuella’s arm, flourishing his cane so gaily, and digging it so wantonly into the mole-hills, that he resembled a sprightly wagtail under the escort of a considerate yellow-hammer. Out of breath though he was, he discoursed volubly all the way; and Wizzie — who advanced with her arm in that of D. side by side with the father and daughter — could hear all he was saying. The fact that she was being hurried to a spot where she would see Urien again put her into such good spirits that even when No-man, taking advantage of the situation, began to squeeze her wrist against his ribs it didn’t get on her nerves.

Old Teucer Wye was so excited that he forgot to give his side-pockets, where his precious text-books were, the usual reassuring pats. But he talked shrilly on the topic of how this great discovery appeared in the eyes of a true Platonist. And as far as Wizzie could gather, it appeared very small and unimportant indeed, which was so exactly her own view that her heart warmed to the gesticulating little man. To her mind, as to the intelligence of one who was still called Professor in Derbyshire, these broken images from the dust-bins of antiquity meant nothing but desolate bits of pottery labelled with paper tags. Wizzie had been taken once by Sister Bridget to visit a provincial museum, and she remembered how, as she followed the heavy black robes of the nun, the whole place had smelt of a sepulchre and had suggested at the same time a conspiracy of one's godfathers and godmothers to take away even what excitement the bones of death possessed by putting them under glass cases. Thus, our friend, buoyed up by the thought that in a minute or two she'd be seeing Urien, kept smiling and nodding to old Teucer across the agitated D. who himself all this while was atoning for his recent shame by squeezing her arm with ferocious remorse.

'It's a beautiful image,' Mr Wye was saying. 'It reminds me of the enthroned Demeter in the British Museum; and Quirm himself admits that the cult of the chthonian divinities from Samothrace certainly spread to these islands; but what I feel' — and here he permitted to the handle of his dark-coloured cane the privilege of tapping against one of the faded volumes hidden in his tweed-cloth pocket— 'is that it's all so utterly unimportant! They weren't so wonderful in their lifetime, these religious rituals — only reflections in water, only flickering shapes on the faces of clouds — but now, when they're historical curiosities or bits of doubtful evidence in support of questionable theories, they've no serious power over our souls. No, no, my boys — I mean, my girls — the soul feeds on invisible, not visible things! The soul is a wayfarer through matter only to learn the trick of shaking matter off! Of course matter affords symbols of the soul and of the soul's journey from one level of spiritual beauty to another, but there's nothing divine in matter except the divine! The symbols that matter casts up are like the bubbles cast up to the surface of a stream when a glittering fish passes by. It's because of the passage of the soul through its inert resistance that matter produces symbols at all! No, no, this image isn't really important to us, not to our souls, you understand, for our souls are off and away, like — like a shoal — like a shoal of — of — of—'

‘Well — why not? That’s not a bad image of yours, Thuella. That wasn’t a bad simile of Thuella’s, was it, No-man? Did you catch what my daughter said, Miss Ravelston? Shoals of white whales? Yes, my dear, why not? Shoals of whales voyaging on and on and on, over seas and seas, and beyond all seas, till they reach — whew! whew! But where have we got to? I wasn’t looking! This isn’t the way.’

Thus speaking, the excited little man stopped, jerked his arm away from Thuella’s support, and, leaning on his cane, looked about him. Instead of the excavations, what he saw before him was the deep trench to the east of Mai-Dun, the identical trench in which D. and Urien had lingered when the latter revealed to the former those weird ideas that Wizzie so lightly discounted.

‘We’ve gone the wrong way. I wasn’t looking,’ the little man repeated. ‘I think it must be — more — more over there.’ And he lifted his cane and waved it vaguely in a northerly direction.

‘This way — this is the way,’ threw in No-man. ‘I’m sure we shall soon —’ And dragging Wizzie off, in advance this time of the others, he began to ascend the slope leading to the northern extremity of the earthworks.

As they moved over the hot sweet-scented turf, the metallic sky above them quivering with distant lark-music, and the air about them disturbed by no nearer sound than the occasional droning flight of a bluebottle fly, whose passage across her ear-drum seemed to Wizzie charged with memories of her childhood, they came upon an ancient dew-pond in whose dry circular hollow the delicate grass had been burnt by the heat to a faint sedge-colour. In the centre of this tawny bowl, which resembled a hollow concave shield, they noticed a heap of firewood, only barely charred by fire and evidently left in haste by persons interrupted in some projected picnic.

‘We must tell them about this,’ murmured D. pausing on the brink of the hollow place. ‘It would be nice to celebrate Midsummer Eve in the old heathen way.’

Wizzie made no comment on this, but she thought in her heart, ‘They’re all the same, these men! They can’t take things as they are. They have to link them up with what other men have done and said and fussed about in the olden days. I’m getting sick of it.’ And with the weight of the burning sun on her head there came over her a fierce revulsion against all these thick, crushing, heavy burdens of cruel antiquity. She recalled what D. had said to her on their first night in that upper room, when in order to enjoy his love-making — that love-making which always left her cold because it wasn’t her as she was in herself that he caressed — he had imagined them both as living God knows how long ago!

This burning sun seemed to be thick today with the accumulated weight of all these Dorchester antiquities. She felt as if not only the place where they were but Maumbury Rings too, that D. was always talking about in connection with his dreary book, and the ancient ridges of Poundbury he had now got such a mania for, and the Roman wall by the gardens, and the spirit of that damned Icen road he must always be going out of his way to traverse, were all diffused in this heady, dizzy heat, and pressing down upon her.

‘I’m for Claudius’, she thought, ‘and his free airplanes. They’re what we want to clear the air!’ And then she recalled what Thuella’s father had just said about souls shaking things off and floating free away. ‘He’s a silly old fool’, she thought, ‘and half-dotty; but he’s right about people’s souls. I know just what he means. I have that feeling often. I shall have it again in a second when D. grabs my arm!’

Suddenly without warning the girl was seized with a wild rush of emotion from some deep part of her being that she had been successfully suppressing for some time. ‘I’d like’, she thought, ‘to fly to America in one of Claudius’s airplanes, and leave them all — yes, leave even Lovie! As it is, she’s fonder of D. than she is of me. I’d get a job in a real great circus over there — the greatest of all! And then — and then — hard and clear and free — and with a body limber and bare, untouched by any man, and on a horse just like my old horse — no! my old horse himself, come over the sea like a white whale — I’d show them, I’d show them!’

No-man turned out to be a better guide than Teucer Wye, and it was not long before they were all four jostling and pushing and arguing along with the rest of their party in the crowded interior of a little wooden shed where the overseer of Maiden Castle, assisted on this particular occasion by a couple of uniformed policemen, was having all he could do to keep people from touching with their hands an object that rested on a rough wooden bench at the back of the hut. The small building was packed with people, most of them young, some of them passionately interested in the object before them, and all eager to propound their own especial theories as to the identity of this extraordinary thing.

D. kept Wizzie by his side, retaining a tight hold on her arm, while Urien, who had easily and naturally joined them at their first appearance, was now wedged in against the girl’s other side.

The packed little crowd in the shed kept heaving this way and that, while new people came and others pushed their way out. Everybody was talking at once, so that there was a hubbub of excited voices, some of which were listened to by a larger group than others, but save for the overseer and the two policemen there was no authority present — none, that is, at that mid-morning hour, of the principal chiefs of the excavation work.

One disturbing element was present in the form of a large and extremely ugly Irish terrier, whose owner, a lanky youth not much more amiable in aspect than the beast itself, hovered about at the entrance, deriving an imbecile and apparently a malicious satisfaction from the confusion caused by the dog's proceedings. Something about the great discovery, as it — or they — rested there on that crude bench, evidently excited a fearful but fascinated frenzy in this unappealing animal, for he kept making short runs towards the thing, between the legs and skirts around him, barking furiously and then retiring in terror. Now and then his tail would wag with extreme delight as if the whole matter were a lively game; then he would be seized with panic, real or assumed, and would back away, or sink down on his hind legs.

Wizzie was too absorbed in watching Urien's face to pay much attention to the thing before her. She gave it one quick surprised glance, and then, twisting her head round away from D. who was too preoccupied to notice what she was doing, stared in wonder, and something like awe, at the great dark countenance by her side. The Glymes man's massive lineaments seemed to her absolutely transformed by the object on that rude wooden stand. His eyes blazed with an interior emotion that held the girl spell-bound; but unlike No-man, who seemed completely to have forgotten her, though he held her arm in an almost savage grip, she felt sure that Urien was not only conscious of her presence — had he not moved up to her the second they came in? — but was making various impatient movements to arrange matters according to some overpowering secret intention of his own.

What this intention was became speedily clear to her, for, after several shufflings of his unwieldy frame and blundering gestures with his arms, he succeeded in inducing Thuella, who had deserted her father on entering the shed, to wedge herself in between himself and Wizzie. This manoeuvre accomplished, he fell back a step — they were all being jostled and crowded against one another by the strangers about them — so that he now stood immediately behind them both; and Wizzie was soon aware that, in the general crushing and squeezing of all of them together, he had taken the opportunity of resting one hand on Thuella's shoulder and one on her own.

The effect of the mysterious object before them upon Thuella's consciousness seemed, as far as she could make out, as negligible as it was upon hers, unless a tendency to be especially affectionate towards her could be regarded as connected with the thing. The young cloud-painter was indeed embracing her now with a clinging intensity that considerably got on her nerves and certainly met with the very opposite of a friendly response. Wizzie couldn't shake her off, partly because of the pressure from the packed crowd about and partly because of Urien. This latter seemed at that moment to transform himself into a magnetic thunder-cloud behind them and around them, a hovering influence that seemed feeding, from its own formidable battery of electric force, the wave of passionate yearning with which the slender creature enveloped her. Thus pressed against the girl, she felt herself — what she had so often scolded Lovie for becoming — as stiff as a poker, but she managed to give her body a twist so that it was to her side and not to her bosom that the other clung.

Amid the loud excited voices arguing, disputing, exclaiming round her, she felt nothing but Urien's presence. It was he, it was his hand upon her shoulder, that was sending these delicious shivers through her, not the extraordinary image about which that roomful of people was gathered. But, mingled with the sweet and disturbing elation that filled her because of Urien's proximity, she was not unaware of a jealous trouble in her heart which rose from the fact that he had wanted both of them near him in this mystical crisis. It was therefore with a feeling that was almost relief that she caught Claudius's familiar voice saying something to Teucer Wye above the hubbub.

'No! I don't call it at all like the Demeter,' she heard the coal-yard amateur say. 'The expression's much rougher, and the features less correct; but it's a wonderful achievement. I've no doubt it was done by some Roman soldier from the East, from some Greek colony that the Empire had civilized.'

'What are you talking about, Cask?' she heard the shrill voice of Teucer Wye protesting. 'A Greek colony civilized by the Romans? My dear man, look at the moulding of that brow, look at those deep-hollowed eye-sockets. The thing's from Samothrace; there's no doubt about it! It's earlier than Scopas, though, earlier than Praxiteles, but it's Greek through and through! It's one of those "alloi theoi" that Socrates invoked on the bank of the Ilissus along with Pan.'

'But it's a group, Mr Wye,' she heard Claudius protesting. 'The local authorities wanted to take it away — these officers tell me they watched it by turns all night — only they were afraid to touch it till an expert from London had seen it. That torso without a head — are you going to tell us that that's Persephone? It's a man, Mr Wye, it's a man! And from his bust I would certainly say a Roman emperor, one of those great civilizing Caesars who—'

He was interrupted from the threshold of the place by the voice of Dunbar Wye, who, with Mrs Dunbar, had been standing outside the crowd for several minutes. They had reached Maiden Castle thus early by reason of Madam's desire to give her maid at least sixteen hours in which to dust and scrub and bustle about where it was torture to Dumbell to catch the swish of a skirt.

‘Mr Cask! Mr Cask! Do I hear you mention the Caesars, Mr Cask? It’s a Caesar we want in England today, Mr Cask. Just glance, any of you people, at this — and this — and this. No, they cost nothing, my lad. They cost nothing, sir, nothing at all. And you’ll soon see the danger of all this Communistic—’

Here Dumbell hesitated, and for two good reasons. For one thing, his wife, with a shrewd Cumber instinct for season and occasion, figuratively clapped her hand over his mouth, and for another, he couldn’t recall the latest Blackshirt slogan. Guileless but obscure syllables burst the barrier of Dumbell’s teeth; but with his lady’s help he got his leaflets back into the botanical tin that hung round his shoulders, and they both tried to push their way toward Urien, who had turned quickly round at the voice of Mr Cumber’s son-in-law.

Though she could only just catch his profile, Wizzie was amazed at the change in Urien’s face. It was as if he were applying the whole machinery of his personality to the business of burying his intellect, his pride, his very soul at the bottom of an interior pit! He allowed his chin to sink down upon his chest. His eyes grew so dead as to resemble opaque pieces of glass in the eyes of a South Sea idol; and removing his hands from both the girls’ shoulders, he let them hang loose by his side like the hands of an idiot.

Wizzie was not a little shocked by this transformation in her formidable Black Man. What was the cause of it? It was inconceivable that Dumbell Wye — the greatest simpleton she had ever met — could scare Urien Quirm. She came to the conclusion that it was Cumber himself, represented by the practical Mrs Wye, who had the power to take the magnetic heart out of her hero. She had plenty of time to ponder on the matter, for the shed was so packed that it took quite a while for the Wyes to reach him.

'It must be the money he gets from them,' she shrewdly surmised. 'I know exactly how he feels. It's how I used to feel after I surpassed myself in the ring and Old Funky would send the hat round. Yes, it's money! Wherever money enters, it kills life! That's really what's the matter with D. and me. If I were working, and coming home every night to Lovie and him, how different it would be! It isn't Dumbell; it isn't you either, you fuzzy-wuzzy chit of a pin-head! It's the Cumber purse that's done it.' And she gazed up at Urien's great hang-dog face, with her own features all pinched and strained in sympathy and her eyes brimming with tears. 'Oh, you great one, you mysterious one,' her heart groaned, 'I know you because I love you; and when you started writing those articles for Cumber you blew your soul away like dandelion seed — yes — no — yes — no — yes — no! You gave him your ideas, one by one for his money, and now, when you see those two fools squeezing through to get at you, you feel — oh, I know how you feel!'

Her cheeks went hot and cold, and she found herself pressing the hand which No-man had left free against one of her breasts. For the first time in her life Wizzie knew what love meant in a woman. Those warm sensual feelings she had felt at first under Urien's spell had transformed themselves completely. Strange and wild thoughts rushed through her brain. 'If he is D.'s father,' she said to herself, 'why can't we go — all three of us — and live with him and Nance at Glymes? Jenny says Nance has got fond of D. so she'd be happy; and I wouldn't want anything but to see him every day, to be near him, to watch him, to comfort him about the Cumbers, to tell him it doesn't matter, to tell him to think — like I did in the circus — that it's for life we work, not for Old Funky, not for those staring boys, not for the Cumbers — because they're all outside! Oh, my great one, my wonderful one, I don't mind your not washing! I don't mind your dirty clothes! It's you yourself I love — inside all that. Yes, yes, if you are D.'s father, I'll be your girl, your daughter — I'll be your servant — I'll be anything to you you like!'

She kept making little unconscious movements with her free hand as she gazed up at that great, lowering, unhappy, drooping head, and finally she found herself, as the pressure increased around her due to the Wyes' squeezing themselves forward, holding tight to a fold of the man's jersey.

She had to swallow desperately to keep back her emotion. 'He's unhappy; he's misunderstood by them all,' she thought. 'He's like my old horse.'

All this while, it never entered her head to wonder what these ideas were which were the man's soul and which he was selling to the Cumbers. The extreme feminity of Wizzie's mind in regard to philosophical notions and all moral or immoral habits of thought had been left incredibly pure and unperverted by both convent and circus.

She now became aware that No-man had at last come back to life from his trance of absorption in the treasure that the two policemen and the overseer were guarding so carefully. He swung round, clumsily separating her from Thuella, and dropped his hold on her arm. Glancing at his face, she watched him while he took in both the gloomy collapse of his father's spirits and its obvious occasion in the imminent encounter with the young Wyes. Never had she seen No-man embrace a situation with more detached and humorous indulgence. He seemed like a man who has returned to the pell-mell of human existence from some high remote watch-tower.

'What can he have seen', she thought, 'in that idol's head, and those headless shoulders, and that thing at their feet, to make him look like that?' Glancing for the first time with a flicker of interest at the strange group before her, round which the chalky rubble clung so thick and had been left so intact that it still obscured their outlines, she seemed to trace an odd resemblance between the rough-hewn object at the two figures' knees and that bed-post carving that had repulsed her so when D. put it on their chimney-piece. 'So that's it,' she thought. 'That's what's put him into such a good temper!'

'Is it a great find?' blurted out Dumbell breathlessly, nodding violently to No-man but addressing Mr Quirm. 'Is it important? Do you know what it is? Mr Cumber wants you to write at once, as much as you like, and make it — you know — rather sensational.'

Here Mrs Wye put in her word. 'How do you do, Mr No-man? How do you do, Mr Quirm? Dun's to talk to Father presently, over the long-distance. Father wants an outline of what you'll write, and then he'll suggest the line to take. He wants you, Mr No-man, to do the human part of it — these people, for instance, and whether they're local, and whether Lord Fordington is here. Is Lord Fordington here?' And she lifted her head like a bird looking for a crumb.

Dumbell's anxious fish-mouth, too, turned enquiringly round, while the persons nearest him nudged each other and gazed about them and stared at the policemen, as if the well-known personage referred to might pop out at any moment from some official pocket.

Wizzie herself received a greeting from Mrs Wye as that young housewife followed her husband, a greeting which took her up between the little woman's finger and thumb, as if she'd been a flea on a counterpane, and placed her in the exact psychological niche proper to a well-meaning lady assistant of an elderly historian.

'Are those all there is?' was Dumbell's salute to the sacred discovery as he peered critically at the confused mass of unearthed rubble and stone. 'What — did — you — say it was, Dad?' And heedless of the intervening crowd — among whom Wizzie could see her persistent admirer of the Maiden Castle road, who was even now fidgeting this way and that to keep her in sight, while his eyes clung in maudlin rapture to every curve of her figure — the young botanist hailed his parent with such a mumble-jumble of mispronounced names that the old gentleman couldn't have been put to greater shame. 'Did you say it was De-met-rea with Dion-issius, Dad?' But what's that thing at their knees? A devil? A dragon? A hound with scurvy? What do you say it is, Dad? Mr Quirm says Mr No-man knows what it is, and ought to be the one to write about it. What do you say it is, Dad?'

Wizzie felt really sorry for old Teucer Wye at that moment, for all the heads in the place were craning towards him and he had got himself wedged in among a group of noisy young prentices who displayed a tendency to push him to the front.

'Give us a speech, Professor!' one of them shouted. 'Tell us what kind of a dog it is that the angel's kneeling on!'

'Thank you, Mr Quirm,' said Dumbell gravely, as Urien muttered a few words in his ear. 'It's all right, Dad!' he called out. 'Don't disturb yourself. Stay where you are. Mr Quirm says it's not Demetrea but the same thing in Welsh.'

But Teucer Wye continued to disturb himself and allowed himself to be pushed forward towards the policemen, until at last, dared, defied, hustled, and with his own excitement at fever pitch, he actually began, to Thuella's horrified disgust, a sort of public harangue.

Few of those present could see the speaker, so diminutive was his stature, but his shrill voice carried such a vibrating quiver of emotion that most of them stopped talking and set themselves to listen.

'My friends,' cried the Midland Professor, 'oh, my dear Dorchester friends, this is an occasion—'

‘Three cheers for the Mayor!’ interrupted a child’s voice, repeating a lesson learnt for a quite different group of persons.

‘An occasion when we ought to take stock of ourselves and of our lives. My friends, these figures represent the religion of people four thousand years ago, and today is Sunday, a day we owe to our religion. But what I want to say to you is this. On the top of this ancient earthwork, in this amazing weather, on the eve of the greatest of all heathen celebrations, the mysterious day which our Church has dedicated to Saint John the Baptist, we must remember — oh, my friends, we must remember! — that our souls are bound by no tradition, by no religion; that our souls have the power of separating themselves from matter altogether, the power of shaking off altogether this whole astronomical world, and of entering that higher, that purer level of existence where dwells the eternal’ — here the little man whistled through his gums— ‘and the — and the unspeakable! These precious discoveries must not bind us to earth. We must not think that because it is Sunday—’

But Thuella, who had been pushing and squeezing all this time to get near him, now indignantly seized him by the arm and soon reduced him to sulky and shame-faced silence.

But ‘Three cheers for Mr Wye!’ cried one of the boys, the one who had been the worst in badgering the old man, but who now was profoundly impressed by the tone if not by the substance of these earnest words; but the elder of the two policemen intervened. Making a step in the boys’ direction, he gravely raised his hand. This was enough. The eyes that had been turned towards that shrill impassioned voice now returned guiltily and self-consciously towards the unearthed objects. Official decorum, on the top of Maiden Castle, had indicated that the path of discretion for the obedient commonality of Durnovaria lay in the direction of discreet idol-worship rather than of spiritual exaltation. To raise a cheer for an old gentleman whistling ‘Whew! whew!’ through his gums, and talking of the flight of the soul, presented itself now as a serious lapse in good manners.

The only person present who disregarded the policeman was the supposed goddess from Samothrace. Her hollow eyes continued to stare straight in front of them as they had done under the chalk for four thousand years.

Wizzie, on the contrary, felt that if she and Thuella looked at each other they would have a giggling fit. That gravely uplifted hand seemed to say, ‘Everything dug up belongs to the Crown. This is not the place for a rumpus.’

Then she heard the policeman whisper to No-man, who happened to be the person nearest to him, and she strained her ears to catch his words. ‘His Lordship may be here any minute,’ she heard, ‘and ’twould scarry the good gentleman for them girt oneyers from Lunnon to find a uproar when they comes to open these here exkivations.’

The man was communicating something else to No-man now, that she couldn’t catch so clearly, though she saw D. shake his head with something like a smile. It seemed to her that he was expressing a fear lest the figure that had been dug up should crumble to bits when exposed to the air. His grandfather, she thought she heard him say, had been present at the exhuming of a Roman soldier, and he seemed to anticipate a similar fate for the object before them.

But whatever he was whispering was interrupted by an event which, trifling though it was, raised almost as much commotion around her as the Platonist’s speech. The Irish terrier, having been quiescent for a long time, considered this a dedicated moment to bestir himself once more. He consequently resumed his game of hurried rushes and agitated retirements, and, not content with this, what must the profane animal do but, in the sight of them all, advance to the bench whereon the discovery reposed, and, deliberately lifting a shameless leg, proceed in all calmness to relieve nature.

The confusion coincident with the ejection of this animal distracted our friends of Glymes and Friary Lane from one another; and Wizzie by pure accident was led for a moment to take stock herself of the treasure-trove on the bench. The woman's head was certainly a remarkable piece of work. Carved in some hard stone whose texture was rendered uneven by the patches of chalk dust, the face yet retained a strange grandeur. While the girl confronted its faraway stare, a certain formidable tenderness in it, not exactly maternal or pitiful — for it was too superhuman for that — began to hold and dominate her.

And the headless bust by this figure's side — was it, as Claudius had said, the bust of a man, and of a man wrapped in the dignified folds of what in her ignorance Wizzie might well take for a Roman toga? Mercy! But what was this? It came over her suddenly, and with a warm rush of excited recognition, that the shoulders and rather fleshy chest of this headless trunk bore a marked resemblance to the torso of Urien as she had been recently watching it beneath the man's sunken chin. She drew nearer, and heedless of the fact that Thuella was at her side, twitching at her belt to get her away, and that the eyes of the Maiden Castle overseer — for the elder policeman was still talking to No-man, while the younger one was expostulating with the owner of the dog — were following every move she made with deep suspicion, she bent down over this headless bust, attracted by what seemed to her some sort of pattern or engraved medallion standing out in relief, quite distinct from the folds of the garment, on the figure's massive chest.

Forgetting everything but her interest in this curious pattern, which, save that it stood out in relief, resembled the tattoo on the breast of a sailor, she raised her hand to brush away the chalk dust that blurred it, when the man in charge, his honest countenance expressing the extremity of shocked dismay, pounced down on her.

‘Miss! Miss!’ he cried with horrified reproach, though not without a glint of pride in his honest face that he had had the foresight to expect exactly this from a young lady so indecorously attired. ‘Nobody bain’t allowed to touch one of they things! They things be waiting till His Lordship and the gents from London be here, to make speeches over ’em, and christen ’em afore they goes to museum. Me and Sergeant Bool has orders to keep all and sundry off of ’em. This here dog—’

But his further explanations were lost on Wizzie, who, drawing hurriedly back, turned to Thuella, and both the young people relieved the long tension of their nervous restraint in all this antiquity-worship by a burst of girlish merriment.

One last glance did Wizzie give at the third of these heathen apparitions awaiting their christening by His Lordship. ‘It’s not the bed-post head,’ she said to herself, ‘though it’s the same sort of thing. How disappointed old D. must be!’ And with a shrug of her shoulders she let herself be dragged away.

The gathering of all our friends from Glymes and Friary Lane outside the excavation shed was Dumbell’s grand opportunity; and he hastened to disburden himself to both Urien and No-man of the instructions he had brought from Mr Cumber.

Wizzie’s heart, as she overheard all this, was torn for the father and full of wonder at the son’s self-possession. Urien seemed overwhelmed with shame and gloom. He struck the girl as a man who had sold his soul by a secret impulse and now was called upon to receive the price in public. D. on the contrary, seemed to have imbibed some psychic emanation from that weird stone group that had given him such peace of mind that he was prepared to do anything required of him without question, like a happy automaton. He seemed to Wizzie like a man whom a spring of interior exultation detached from everybody round him; and this, instead of pleasing the girl, proved profoundly annoying to her.

It soon transpired that the young Wyes were anxious now to carry off both the son and the father to the rooms they had taken at the Antelope — there, doubtless, to apportion them both the exact limits of the aspect of the great discovery which it would be their task to handle.

D. at once suggested that instead of doing this they should all seek that dried-up dew-pond he and she had found, and there, ‘in situ’, have a thorough blood-and-iron discussion of what was to be telephoned. To this proposal Mr and Mrs Wye willingly consented, not so much — as Wizzie saw — with the idea of calling in the elder Mr Wye to their discussion as of avoiding any risk of their evasive correspondents escaping or their impressions cooling off before they were officially registered.

It was a cruel disappointment to the girl when she found herself once more led off by No-man, in advance of the rest, across the central plateau of Mai-Dun. She tried to hang back, casting sympathetic looks at Urien as he slouched wearily along between the two Wyes; but it was no use. No-man remorselessly dragged her on. Her only comfort was that Thuella was a good way behind, walking with her father again, and accompanied by the silent Claudius.

The thought of going back to Friary Lane after all this, the thought of resuming her normal life, of wheeling Lovie in the perambulator, of listening to Jenny’s piled-up wrongs, of submitting to No-man’s caresses night after night, seemed just then more than she could endure. How that image had stared past her, out and away, beyond them all! Yes, that stone woman's stare seemed to have broken up her resolution to be docile to fate. How could she leave him to that Glymes life with Nance? Oh, what was going to be the upshot of it all? 'No, I can't stand it!' she said to herself. 'I know he knows how much I care. But day will follow day, just as they always do. I shall be a good mother to Lovie, and a docile plaything for D. and you, my strange one, my unhappy one, my wonderful one, you'll try to console yourself with Thel! Oh, oh, oh! What a thing, what a thing life is!'

Damn D.! What possessed him to hold her so tight and drag her so fast? And all the time he seemed only half-conscious of her existence. That was how he always was! He never talked about his ideas like Urien did — only about his wretched sensations, only about what he saw on his walks or out of that attic window, or about that murderess they burnt in Maumbury Rings. It was as if he wouldn't share his thoughts with any but dead women, either with that dead bitch or with his dead wife. And why did he never speak a single word to her about that woman? It was only by accident she'd found out what her name was. Mona? It sounded like the wind over a grave! All he cared for were his walks, and his book — and to play with her body when she wanted to go to sleep.

And this was to be her life! To be dragged about by a man — by a no-man! — as he was dragging her now, with his thoughts far away, just to make sure she'd be there when he grew tired of his writing and walking, and wanted a different sensation. Oh, it was too much! How he enjoyed the pretence that he'd bought her from Old Funky! Of course he hadn't bought her. Any woman would know it was she who'd done it all, she who'd decided to use him to escape from the Urgans, she who'd summed him up, the sentimental fool that he was!

As she now rubbed her knuckles together against her jersey, treating his arm as if it were a fetter she'd got so used to that she could reduce it to non-existence, she felt an intense longing to bring down this mood of self-satisfied complacency in which he strode along. Oh, she knew him through and through! His happiness just now was partly caused by that stone woman's head, with which he'd no doubt fallen in love simply because she'd been buried for a thousand years, and partly by a childish longing — D. was much more childish than Lovie, for Lovie played at serious things — to light a bonfire in a dew-pond!

But whatever was the cause of his complacency, oh, how she longed to bring it down with a jerk! She longed to trouble it, to agitate it, to break it up, for she knew exactly how it made him feel from the look of his profile. It made him feel superior to Urien, to Mr Wye, to Claudius, and of course to herself.

'I told Jenny', she began, feeling almost as irritated by the noise the larks made over her head as by the heat of the burning sunshine, 'that I didn't believe Nance was really so infatuated with you as she made out. What do you think yourself?'

No-man evidently regarded this question as of absurdly minor importance, and of no interest at all between him and her, for instead of stopping — that teasing trick of his when he wanted to think — he only went faster. 'What's that?' he said. 'What do I think about Nance and me?' He turned his eyes away from her to watch a butterfly. 'Well, old girl, to tell you the truth, I think I'd feel a bit funny if I were to make love to Nance. I wouldn't mind doing it! I've always thought there was something about Nance like a great soft white musk-rose with hardly a thorn on its twigs. But — God! — my dear, it's too late. I might once have enjoyed making my little Stone Age girl jealous; but I've got too fond of her now.'

Wizzie almost drew blood from her lower lip, so fiercely did she bite it; but he went on, totally oblivious.

‘Besides, I’d feel funny, and that’s the plain truth — I’d have an unpleasant sensation — if I made up to my father’s wife.’

Wizzie could hardly contain herself any longer, and the gall of her restraint transformed itself into the most corrosive sarcasm that he had ever brought down upon his head. She felt, herself, as if all the poison with which Mary Channing killed her old man were condensed into the syllables. ‘What a good thing you’ve only got your sensations to think of, as against your funny feelings, D.! It must make everything so wonderfully simple.’

Her bitter words did bring his stride to a pause then, and, swinging round her, he looked her up and down. ‘What is it, kid?’ he asked gravely. ‘You’re upset about something.’

A look of real outrage came into his face, which in her anger she felt a malicious pleasure to have caused. She could hurt him where his book was concerned. She’d found that out anyway!

But now, driven by the demon that possessed her, she tried another track. ‘He — your father — doesn’t seem to like this work for Cumber. It doesn’t bother you much, I see.’

‘Still harping on him, then?’

‘Why not, if he is your father?’

‘Wizz, Wizz, what on earth’s the matter with you? Have I done anything? Have I annoyed you?’

‘Annoyed me!’ The savage stress she laid upon this made him drop her arm. ‘Come on,’ she cried. ‘For God’s sake, shut up and come on! Do you think I want him to hear us wrangling?’

As she spoke, she started off at such a pace that he was hard put to it to keep up with her.

‘I hope Lovie’s all right with Jenny,’ he murmured, as they approached the empty dew-pond with its unused heap of wood and kindling.

The girl was silent; and he tried again, for Old Funky’s child still seemed to him the only safe topic with her in her present mood. ‘It’s certainly a shame, as you said,’ he went on, ‘that we couldn’t bring her with us, but it would never have done.’

‘That’s a word you love, isn’t it? “Never would do”! “Never would have done”! Well — don’t mind me — set a match to your Midsummer fire! I know how much you’ve been looking forward to that sensation!’

‘Damn you, Wizz!’ The words were out before he could hold them back; but immediately afterwards she could see how ashamed and remorseful he was. ‘Forgive me, sweetheart!’ he whispered. ‘I don’t know how we’ve slipped into all this. There, there, my treasure, don’t ‘ee be cross any more with your old kidnapper.’ As he spoke, he laid both hands on her shoulders. ‘Wizz,’ he said, ‘little Wizz. I don’t believe you’ve the smallest idea how fond I am of you. And you’re really — down in your deep heart — just as fond of me. We didn’t meet in that caravan and recognize each other at once for nothing. There! I won’t say another word. You’re just being childish about him. You must really feel, just as I do, that if he is my father, it’s sheer madness to be silly like this. You don’t know him as well as I do. Neither of us knows him as well as poor Nance does. That boy of hers—’ But he broke off suddenly and allowed his hands to sink down from her shoulders. She knew he had caught a look on her face that she had never let him see there before, a look of actual physical shrinking from his touch.

‘All right, my dear,’ he said hurriedly, ‘I won’t bother you now. We’ll talk of this later.’

If she had longed to make him suffer, she got little satisfaction from the grim hardening process through which his features now passed.

But leaving her side without further words, he ran down to the dew-pond, knelt on the grass by the heap of wood, and, producing matches and some crumpled papers from his pocket, set himself to start a blaze.

This evidently proved more difficult than he anticipated; and, sitting down on the edge of the grassy hollow, she watched his clumsy fumblings, with lack-lustre eyes.

But no sooner had these thoughts raced through her brain than she heard the voices of the Wyes approaching. ‘He’s coming,’ she said to herself. ‘He’ll be here in a minute. If I go to America, I may never see him again. He’ll be with Thel, and he’ll never know!’

No-man succeeded at last in getting his Midsummer Eve bonfire lit. When once it started, the flames rose high, for there was enough wind stirring to help the blaze and yet, since the whole thing took place in so deep a concavity, not enough to disturb or carry away the burning pieces of wood.

It was not long before the whole party was grouped on the northerly rim of this grassy basin, from the centre of which, like some gigantic spike of fiery blossoms from a sunburnt calyx, the red flames wavered upward.

Most of the time while No-man kept tossing fuel upon the heap — and he went on till he had exhausted all there was — the fire retained its original pyramidal shape; but there did come moments when the wind blew strong enough across this small crater to sweep the whole living mass, the red flames along with the clouds of ash-grey smoke, towards the particular segment of the enclosing circle where our friends were sitting. When this happened, they were all completely hidden in smoke, not only hidden from any passing stranger but hidden from one another — a state of things which, curiously enough, seemed to lend itself to the mood of all of them, except young Mrs Wye, whose lively little screams, alternating with Dumbell's solemn protestations, made up a sort of comic-opera orchestration to the excited murmurings of the rest.

Wizzie had been to picnics before in full daylight when a fire had to be lit to boil a kettle, but those little gypsy flames were nothing to this flare. It was impossible not to be interested in the spectacle; and though she made up her mind not to bestow on D.'s silly idea the least word of commendation, she found herself deriving an unexpected satisfaction from the crackling of sticks, the roaring of flames, the eddying of smoke, and the weird alternations of illumination and obscurity.

Urien was separated from her by both Thuella and her father, while between Thel and herself reclined old Claudius, who was now gazing at her and talking to her with infinite content after the hubbub in that excavation shed.

'What a thing fire is, Miss Wizzie!' he was murmuring now. 'And doesn't it give you a queer feeling to see it in this blazing sunshine? I can see Thuella is absorbed in it all, and we mustn't disturb her' — here his voice became so low that Wizzie could scarcely hear it in the roaring of the flames— 'or I'd like to ask her, and I warrant we all would, if there exists in the world any really good picture of this weird struggle between sun and fire. Some would say the fire was defeated; but I don't think so. It's not as yellow as at night but I think it’s redder in some odd way, and I think it has a more supernatural and impossible look, if you can follow me, as if it really had the personality of one of those old four elements they worshipped, before the Romans used—’

‘Well done for you, Claudius!’ came the voice of No-man from out of the smoke, as, like some lumbering aboriginal, he moved round the bonfire he had lit. ‘If I hadn’t left my old stick behind, I’d stir up redder flames than these for you! I’m glad you’re worshipping fire for once, instead of only — Urien, here’s Mr Cask ready to worship fire!’

It was out of a thick rush of smoke that Urien’s voice came then. So thick indeed was the smoke that Teucer Wye scrambled to his feet and would have retreated; but it soon rolled away, and after coughing a little and spluttering a protest to his daughter, who continued to hug her thin knees as one impervious to such things, he turned back, and, leaning on his cane, gave an ear to what his Glymes neighbour was saying.

Wizzie couldn’t catch Urien’s first words; but it soon became clear to her that he was resuming an argument he and Claudius had already begun.

‘Not only Romans,’ she heard him say, as the cloud of smoke rolled aside. ‘All ancient busts. But what you thought was an armoured breastplate on his chest, like those on the coins of the Caesars, was something quite different. No-man knows what it was. No-man knows — No-man knows!’ There was an almost tragic appeal in his voice as he raised it then, and Wizzie glanced at D. to see if he would respond. But that gaunt figure, with his cap pulled low over his eyes, moved round and round his sinking fire, paying not the slightest heed.

The girl longed to call out, ‘Don’t ask him again! Don’t humiliate yourself before him!’ But once more the man cried out, ‘No-man knows what it was!’

‘He knows what you think it was!’ she heard D. mutter grimly.

And Dumbell must needs at that moment try to bring to the agitated man’s notice some tiny little plant he had picked on their way to the place. ‘It’s still in bud, Mr Quirm,’ she heard the man persist, ‘for it’s early for them yet. But would you call it a sheepsbit or a devilsbit? They’re not both scabiouses, you know. One is a—’

‘You mustn’t mind what I said, Quirm,’ pleaded Claudius gently, twisting his neck round and blinking from the sunshine while he still coughed from the effect of the smoke. ‘I see it hurts you to agree with me. I see that you’re vexed about it, and I think—’ He hesitated, and rubbed his face with both his hands. ‘I think there’s something else on your mind. Aye, man, man—’ And Wizzie looked sharply at him as his voice sank, for he suddenly spoke hoarsely and with deep feeling. ‘You’re not the only one! Here we are, watching our friend’s fire — and I wish your little girl could see it—’ This he threw in ‘sotto voce’ to Wizzie, catching her look. ‘But we’ve all got a hurt of some kind at the heart. It’s because we won’t — forgive me for saying it, Quirm! — shake off the past, shake off our personal feelings, and work for the future! I’ve been thinking a lot about this discovery, that goddess’s head, and that headless one, and that — other thing. And what I feel, Quirm, is — and I think I know you well enough to say this — that things like that, brought into the air after being buried so long, have an evil effect! Yes, an evil effect on all of us, Quirm. They’re full of the old self, full of the old subjective personal life that we must shake off if the world’s to go on and get better. Don’t interrupt me, Dunbar! I’m not dragging up our dispute now. The thing is, we must get rid of this perpetual “I, I, I” with all its cravings and hurt feelings! We must live in the race and in helping the race forward. Man, man’ — and once more Wizzie caught something like a groan beneath his words— ‘don’t you see it’s nothing whether I'm right or you're right about that thing? Where we're all wrong is that we live by our personal feelings instead of living...'

But Wizzie lost what he said at that point, although, in spite of many indignant whistles from Dumbell's father and an outburst of spiteful giggling from Dumbell's wife, he went on for some while in the same strain, still addressing his remarks to Urien, who stood as if sunk into a trance — not unlike the trance that was rendering Thuella so motionless and silent, as she sat hunched up on the brink of the hollow.

But what distracted Wizzie at that moment was No-man's coming up to her and throwing himself down at her side.

His fire was low and smouldering now. The smoke had vanished; and all the fuel was exhausted. The tremendous force of the midsummer sun — for it must have been at least one o'clock by this time — seemed to be sucking up, as if with a gigantic tongue, all the life, all the vitality, all the character from those dying flames. If they were red before, they were a mockery of redness now. Some of them, in fact, as they rose into a momentary flare from the fiery heap, took to themselves the colour of fading crocuses. Others became pallid as summer lightning. One or two, just because this blazing sun and this burning metallic sky had sucked all the devilry out of them, and all the piracy, and all the life-lust, became spiritualized and etherealized, became like candle-flames, those purest of all forms of fire, those guileless sisterhoods of fire. There were even some — but this may have had to do with the wavering edge between the grass that had been burned by the sun, that shaped itself into little straw-coloured estuaries and promontories round the place of burning, and the grass that had been burned black by the fire — that presented the appearance of invisible fire, fire that was almost as colourless as water.

Maiden Castle was undoubtedly doing what she must have done more than four thousand years ago when that woman's head, along with those other things, looked into eternity across the land of the Durotriges: lifting up this blackened circle of burnt grass, the work of the fire substance produced by man, towards the far-off living body of the greatest fire mystery we know.

Round the dying flames of No-man's bonfire, on the rim of a dew-pond that now offered itself as a target for the sun's rays with what must soon be a bull's-eye of black annihilation, sat and stood, each with his own peculiar sense of the significance of the occasion, our group of enemy-friends. None of them could shake off a vague impression of something momentous in this death of fire beneath this majesty of burning light; none of them, unless it were Mr Cumber's daughter, could dismiss the image of what the excavators had unearthed. That woman's head, that headless torso, that eyeless and earless beast-god — these things had been under the chalk when Caesar landed, under the chalk when the Conqueror landed, under the chalk when Victoria was crowned! They had been storing up in that long darkness all the wild prayers, all the desperate imprecations that had been addressed to them on the summit of Mai-Dun before the last stone had been added to Stonehenge.

And yet descendants of the same feathered tribes as had dashed their wings against the temple that housed these entities hovered still about the spot where, after their long sojourn in darkness, they saw the light again. And the great turf promontory, lifting up to the burning sun this blackened bowl of smouldering flame, lifted up also to the metallic sky the invisible thoughts about those weird 'revenants' that each of these human skulls concealed. It is hard to believe that objects of frantic human invocation, however weird and monstrous, do not release, when freed from their long imprisonment, something of the magnetic potency that the minds of their far-off worshippers communicated to them as they prayed.

But whether due to what they had lately seen, or simply to the hypnotism of what they saw before them now, it remained that this whole group of men and women felt as if something had heightened, transformed, held in a strange suspension, their thoughts about themselves and about one another.

Claudius alone among them seemed to keep his normal energy, his habitual mood, and his voice rose and fell between the dying bonfire and the burning sky like the voice of some tremendous future, some catastrophic renewal of all things, lifted up in a low, terrible, ominous, blasphemous menace against the whole weight of the past, and lifted up where the past bore its heaviest burden, and when the gods of the past had just been dragged up from the dead! Not a person there but knew how completely Claudius had sacrificed for this new objective hope all that magical self-life, of which he seemed to regard those disfigured objects in the shed as perilous symbols; but, between sun and fire, between Mai-Dun and that burning sky, his voice sounded to most of them there like the voice of some remorseless anti-man, threatening with destruction the foundations of their life.

It was not only No-man's lying down by her side that made Wizzie stop listening. Heedless of the blazing exposure of the least move that any of them made in that tremendous glare, D. laid his hand familiarly and possessively on the girl's thigh, just above the knee that was nearest him. 'Don't 'ee be cross with me, my treasure!' he whispered. 'I swear I won't be jealous with him any more.'

She didn't dare to make a proclamation of their quarrel by shaking off his hand, for, though Claudius, as he talked, had turned away his head, almost everyone there could see them clearly. But she cast about for a diversion so as to avoid answering him; nor had she any difficulty in finding what she wanted. To her absolute amazement, as she glanced at Thuella, who was sitting bolt upright in her yellow dress hugging her knees, she saw that the tall girl’s face was convulsed with sobs, and big tears were rolling down her cheeks. No one else but she and No-man could see this, for they alone were between the girl and the smouldering flames at which she was staring, but the sight of her tears filled Wizzie with astonishment, for it was the first time since she had known Thuella that she had ever seen her weep.

‘Look at Thel, D.!’ she whispered to him. No-man was evidently as much amazed as she was, and he leapt instantly to his feet and, offering his hand to Wizzie, pulled her up too. They hurried past Claudius, who scarcely glanced at them from where he sat, and both sank down at the girl’s side.

‘What is it, Thel?’ whispered Wizzie in a low voice. Low as her voice was, she would certainly have been overheard by Claudius if he had not been absolutely absorbed in his discourse to Urien. Even as she spoke, she glanced anxiously round, aware of an instinctive hope that no one else in that little group had noticed the girl’s distress. Her father certainly was oblivious! What was he thinking about, that funny little man? In a flash, as her eyes took him in, his thin haunches propped on a mole-hill that might easily have been an ant-hill, she saw that he had taken one of his little school-texts from his pocket and was holding it unopened in his hand. ‘Thel might cry her eyes out,’ she thought, ‘and he’d never see. But I know what he feels. He feels like I do when D.’s talking and I’ve got my story under the pillow. It’s his way out, and I don’t blame him.’ Thus did Wizzie interpret the escape from the great sun above, and the dying bonfire beneath, that a dead philosopher was able to achieve for an ex-professor.

The weeping girl was so slow in answering, and the deep shadow of her big hat made it so hard to see with what expression she regarded her would-be comforter, that our friend had time, as she still felt the imprint of D.'s fingers on her thigh, to turn her pity into a fierce pulse of revolt against masculine possessiveness. How dared he lay his hand on her like that in this exposed place? It was therefore with a malicious sympathy that she heard Thel murmur at last, in a choking voice, and evidently addressing No-man rather than herself: 'Not — one — of you — cares — anything! I — I could — paint such — pictures — if I had one single person who — who — None of you know, none! I'm — I'm more alone than if I'd been buried for four thousand years!'

Then Wizzie saw No-man, who had sat down a little further from the agitated girl than she had done herself, shuffle across the grass till he could touch her and lay his hand on her knee. 'I hope she'll enjoy that,' she thought angrily.

But Thuella seemed totally indifferent. 'Not one of you know,' she gasped again. 'Not one of you care! I go on — working — in a void. It — was — it was this fire — in the sun — and I thought — I thought — what I could make of it — and then I thought — but no one cares!' And once more her sobs choked her.

For a second, Wizzie was really touched by the spectacle of this passionate grief emerging from beneath that great flapping hat. 'Thel, darling, don't you—' she began.

'It's like poisoned blood!' cried the girl, pointing at the bonfire, whose flames, rising up before they died, had caught the last fragment of unburnt fuel.

But Claudius, who had at last grown aware of what was happening, was now on his feet looking down at the three of them.

This of course brought about the very contingency that Wizzie had dreaded most for her friend; and she glanced upward angrily at Claudius. What a fool the man was! Who but an idiot would call one’s father to the scene when one was upset? For, of course, they all crowded round now.

But Dumbell could only open his botanical tin, look inside, and close it carefully again. ‘She’ll be better soon,’ he remarked, as if the opening and shutting of his collector’s tin had been the removing of a thermometer from a patient’s mouth.

‘Don’t be silly, Thuella,’ protested Teucer Wye peevishly, making an effort to drag her to her feet with one hand, while with the other he squeezed his book back into his side-pocket.

Very slowly, Urien, following the rest, stood sombre and gloomy behind the girl, where it was impossible for her to see him.

‘The great mistake you make, child,’ said No-man calmly, pressing his fingers still more closely round her curved knee, ’is to change the current of your way of taking life. Concentrate on your own mind, my friend, instead of on your work. It’s your mind that’s important, not what you do!’

Something about the tone in which he uttered these words seemed to fill Thuella with fury. She scrambled hurriedly to her feet, gave her yellow skirt an angry shake, and, pointing a quivering finger at No-man, careless of the presence of the others, burst into a bitter invective.

The man rose too, and so did Wizzie; and Wizzie herself was astonished at the uprush of evil pleasure that flooded her being as she watched D.’s babyish bewilderment under the girl’s torrent of words. ‘She’s not well today. That’s what it is,’ she thought. ‘She oughtn’t to have come. I could see she wasn’t herself. But all the better! If she’d been herself, she’d never have said these things. Oh, I'm so glad she came. He'll hear something anyway!'

And then, as Thuella went on, while her father, who had caught hold of her arm again, kept giving feeble tugs to drag her away, Wizzie had a savage impulse. 'I'd like everyone here to attack D.!' she thought. 'I hope Urien does. I hope Claudius does, and Dumbell too! Oh, I know so well what D.'s thinking now. He's thinking, "I'm a good, quiet man, working at my book, going on my walks, enjoying my sensations, being kind to the girl I rescued. I am strong. I am self-controlled. I am dependent on nobody. I can get my own breakfast in my own attic. I am happy in myself, especially when I have a harmless amusement like making a bonfire. Wizz can kick and scream. Thel can kick and scream. I'm the quiet, strong man who can listen to their wild nonsense and never say a word!"'

'Concentrate on my own mind?' Thuella was now screaming in hysterical shrillness, as with the brim of her hat pushed back, and her eyes gleaming like a demon's, she poured out her pent-up feelings on the bewildered D. 'His own mind, my own mind, all our own minds! Why, it would be like that stream by your coal-yard, Mr Cask, where those ducks stand on their heads all day long to get at the mud! My mind, of my mind, to my mind, by, with, or from my mind! I know what you think — What contemptible teaching! You talk as if our minds were cheeses. I agree with you entirely, Mr Cask. Let's burn our cheese-like minds clean of these maggoty sensations! Every noble person has ideas beyond himself, ideas that are dangerous to himself; but you dodge all that! It's round and round with you, isn't it? Count on your fingers; count on your toes; canter and caper and down he goes! Oh, how I despise you — how I despise you!' She stopped, exhausted, staring at D. with flashing eyes.

By some chance, No-man had been isolated from the rest as they crowded round; and he now stood close to his bonfire, whose flames, pale red — like poisoned blood, as Thuella had said — and looking shockingly unnatural in the bright sunshine, emphasized in some queer way the leanness and gauntness of his figure.

‘How babyish he looks without his stick!’ Wizzie thought. ‘With it he looks like a selfish old man; without it like a selfish child! But that’s all his mind does when it gets out of itself. It goes into his stick!’

The dew-pond where No-man had made his bonfire was well out of the track to the excavation shed, so that only a few strangers came even within sight of this group of friends, and those who did were in too much fear of missing His Lordship’s christening of the great discovery to yield to their curiosity.

Thus it was brought about, either by the great goddess Chance, or by those occult fatalities of character that are often stronger than Chance, that while that southern promontory of Maiden Castle held up to the burning sun this unnatural bonfire whose flame looked like poisoned blood, it also held up a half-circle of highly-strung men and women, their nerves wrought upon by the weird images that had been unearthed, who, through the medium of a girl in a yellow dress, were swept forward by some sudden psychic wave of irrational hostility towards their lonely bonfire-maker.

Any collection of human beings, however casually gathered, takes upon itself the nature of a living entity, but when the component members of such an entity have not been gathered casually, when there has been a united and premeditated object in such a gathering, and above all when the separate units making up the resultant entity are well-acquainted with one another and have been previously linked to one another by endless subtle relations, the most surprising and unpredictable behaviour may be expected of the multiple being thus created.

Individually there was not a member of this group, except perhaps Dumbell and his young wife, who was not friendly to D. No-man. Urien was more than friendly to him; and it was alien to the whole nature of Claudius to be seized with sudden malice against anyone. Teucer Wye had been all that day only waiting for an opportunity to tell No-man about the respectful memory of people in Derbyshire. And yet, as they all listened now to Thuella's indignant reproaches — and it was only a woman friend who could know anything about the part played in such an outburst by sick nerves — it was easy for Wizzie to detect that her malevolent wish was actually, beyond her hope, being fulfilled.

Had they been contemporaries of those images, No-man at that moment would probably have been flung into his own flames; and, civilized as they were, it was still plain that some morbid magnetic sympathy with Thuella's emotion had isolated the bonfire-maker. They had all been long without food. The unusual heat of the sun in that exposed spot had fevered their blood; and that staring stone head, that headless torso, that shapeless beast-form, though interpreted so differently by all of them, were still at work in the secret places of their minds, and anyone could see that the disturbing and even shocking sight of these flames in sunlight was rousing some sort of devilry in them.

What Wizzie felt herself just then, and she felt it with a sort of evil triumph, was that they couldn't help sharing Thuella's feelings, couldn't help feeling just as she did at that moment towards D. And though it was all instinct with her, and she would have been puzzled to explain it, she had an obscure sense that something she had always been aware of in D. was itself drawing towards him this psychic wave of hostility. It was his habitual propitiation, his curious love of putting himself in the wrong, of bringing down on himself reproaches and abuse. Other people, men who were men, hit back openly and honestly when they were attacked. D. never did. Never once, till that scene today by the cemetery gate, had she known him to stand up for himself as people should! He led you on to make a fool of him. He seemed to like looking a fool with you.

In the depths of her mind Wizzie knew that one of her chief grievances against him was that she couldn't make him angry. It was like living with a tree, rather than a man, to live with D. — a tree that enjoyed having its branches mauled and cut! And now at this moment the man looked as if nothing would please him more than for them all to leap on him and throw him into those red embers.

'He's like a malicious scapegoat!' she thought, remembering the old scriptural phrase from her convent lessons. 'And how silly he looks,' she said to herself, 'just like Lovie when I burnt her paper doll. And yet how pleased with himself he looks, just like he did that first night when he found me undressed by the fire! He's got nothing on his mind, as Thel says, but his walks and his sensations. All the rest of us are unhappy — Urien most of all. And there he stands, enjoying himself, enjoying — oh, how well I know him! — even being shown up by Thel! Yes, you may look at me. It's true, it's true what I've told you. I hate you. Do you understand that? Put that among your sensations! I hate you; and I hate your book and both your dead bitches! And I'm glad Thel's cursing you, and I'm glad the others feel the same.'

Meanwhile, Thuella, irritated rather than quieted by No-man's mock-submissive silence, and relieved at last from her father's feeble tugs at her arm, began afresh. She told her victim that it was because all the rest of them were wrestling with life— 'She's got that from Urien,' Wizzie thought — and he alone was just enjoying life, that he could talk as he did about the mind.

But at that point Wizzie experienced the weird impression that with a wild tumultuous rush as of beating wings the tragic souls of all of them — old Wye's trying to escape from everything with his learned books, Claudius's with his airplanes, Urien's with his unhappy ideas, Thel's with her unintelligible pictures — were hurling themselves forward, out of all their tormented brains, in one furious invisible rush, to make a real Guy Fawkes of this bonfire idiot!

'Yes, that's what you are, and now you know!' she muttered under her breath in a burst of savage inspiration. 'You're the Guy Fawkes of Maiden Castle!' And then, while she saw D. looking foolishly north and south and east and west as he stood there: 'Is it for your stick you're looking, you great baby, or is it for your dear Nancy, for the sweet clinging Nancy, who loves you so?'

It was at that moment that Urien, who had been standing gloomily between the young Wyes, suddenly moved forward till he was just behind Thuella. Here he paused, while the girl, quite oblivious of his proximity, went on, though more faintly now, with her vindictive tirade.

But the eyes of the Glymes man had met Wizzie's eyes, and she felt herself being drawn towards him, or rather, strictly speaking, towards the girl in front of him, who, the moment she approached, began clinging frantically to her, sobbing hysterically, and twining herself about her, till Wizzie, already troubled by the burning sunshine, staggered under her weight.

At the very moment she was thus supporting and soothing her friend, there reached her ears, carried over the great hill on the midsummer breeze, the sound of lively cheering. She saw Dumbell and his wife swinging round to listen. A cheering crowd was evidently more to their taste than the hysterical scene before them; and they even moved a step or two in the direction of so comfortable a sound.

Wizzie had just time, as she too listened and watched their movement over Thel's shoulder, to say to herself, 'Those two are getting sick of all the fuss we're making,' when Urien, stepping forward, took her by one hand and Thuella by the other. In a voice of forced facetiousness that jarred oddly on Wizzie's ears, he cried out to No-man, 'Get out of the way, lad! These girls and I want to pass through your fire!' And heedless of the indignant protests of the ex-professor, whose countenance at that moment assumed an almost shocking resemblance to Dumbell's, the unwieldy man, pulling the two girls with him, actually plunged down the slope of the pond, passed No-man in the descent, and rushed with his startled companions clear through the fiery embers.

Wizzie, who had never been in contact with the man before, except for a few conventional handshakes, gave herself up to the magnetism of his grasp with the elation of a little girl; and when they were safe on the other side, and he released them both, she gasped with delight and uttered a quaint little circus cry, the cry with which she was wont to respond to applause in the old Urgan tent.

Thuella, on the contrary, seemed ashamed and sobered; and when No-man, who negligently followed them across his fire, trampling, as he went, on what was still smouldering, bent down to brush some sparks from her yellow skirt, the girl laid her hand on his head. 'Sorry, my friend,' Wizzie heard her whisper. 'You didn't mind so terribly much, did you? It was everybody I was cross with — not particularly you.'

Scarcely three-quarters of an hour after the extinction of No-man's fire, our whole party was passing the cemetery on their way back to Dorchester.

It was now a little after two, but Wizzie was aware that Mrs Dearth hadn't expected her and D. much sooner; and neither the Wye family nor Mr Quirm seemed inclined to hurry back to Glymes, where they knew Nance would have some sort of meal for them, however late they appeared. From various whispers exchanged between Dumbell and his wife as they went along, Wizzie gathered that the Cumber girl was inclined to share the Quirms' hospitality rather than go to the expense of treating her husband's relations at the Antelope.

The return down the Weymouth road coincided with the hour in which the burgesses of the town were lingering over their Sunday dinner, so that there was nothing to distract our friends from one another as they drifted en masse past the railings of the Amphitheatre. The massively built old town, surrounded four-square by her umbrageous avenues, seemed to welcome their approach with her promise of shady coolness and bodily refreshment. The absence of the weekly traffic had the effect of attenuating to a minimum all the usual vibrations interposed between humanity and the mellow identity of the place. Like the balmy air of a placid valley drifting over the grazing backs of multitudinous cattle all feeding like one, the combined scent of foliage and flowers, of dust and chimney-smoke, of sun-warmed masonry and mossy walls, came forth to meet them. But it was as if this Sunday smell of Dorchester contained something quite beyond all these familiar scents. It seemed to bring with it — as if the whole ancient place had been one deep vase of thick-pressed pot-pourri — a subtle perfume that was like the sweet dust of long-buried generations, a consecrated secular dust from which all that was foul in mortality had long since evaporated, leaving only a thrice-purged residue, a holy deposit, the dust of what was inviolable in ashes, indestructible in embers, destined to perish only with our human senses.

‘Well, never mind about my bed-posts,’ No-man was saying when they reached the Amphitheatre. ‘That thing at their feet was some sort of a totem-god, some sort of a symbol of subhuman life. You must admit that, at any rate, Claudius.’

Wizzie was glad to see that Claudius was too occupied in watching Urien to respond to this. She also was troubled about the Glymes man, but, along with her concern, a new element had entered her feelings towards that brooding figure, who had not spoken a word to anyone since the episode of the fire — an indefinable suspicion, a sense of danger.

But the man broke his silence now, and, as if realizing what the girl was feeling, his words were calm and practical. ‘You’ll come to Glymes with us, won’t you, Cask?’ he enquired. ‘Nance will be ready for all who come. She loves a lot of people.’

‘Thank you, Quirm,’ the other replied. ‘No, I’m afraid I can’t do that now. Another day, perhaps — but I must tidy things up a bit. It’s too good a —’

‘What was the name of that Celtic goddess you mentioned, Mr Quirm?’ interrupted Dumbell. ‘If you don’t mind spelling it for me, I think I’ll run into the station and send Mr Cumber a wire. He wanted us to telephone to him, but—’

But at that point Mrs Dunbar whispered something to the young man that made him close his mouth with a snap and relinquish this project. ‘Oh, very well,’ he muttered. ‘I was only thinking that some other paper...’

In a straggling shifting group they moved on until they reached the bottom of South Street. Here, after a brief discussion between Thuella and Urien, the suggestion was made that to finish their discussion and avoid the town they should all go together by Bowling Alley and the West Walks to Hangman’s Cottage, and separate there. Turning to the left, therefore, the whole cortège drifted down the shady seclusion of the Alley, and made their way, still through a branching aisle of trees, to where, near the top of High West Street, is the railed-in fragment of Roman wall.

'You and Quirm', said Claudius to No-man, turning round as he spoke, and sweeping his hawk's eye over the whole company to make sure Wizzie as well as the other two women heard him, 'are agreed, then, that what we saw is a pre-Roman image representing three mythological figures: a woman, a man, and a beast. Urien suggests that the woman is the goddess Caridwen; that the headless man, which I took for a Roman emperor, is—'

Here Urien himself hurriedly interrupted him, though Wizzie received the impression that her Black Man of Glymes only broke his gloomy silence under some strong interior compulsion. 'I don't suggest,' the man almost groaned. 'I know.'

'Who do you say it is?' enquired the Cumber girl sharply. And, turning upon No-man, she added in the brisk tone in which she had told her maid to dust Dumbell's treasures, 'Father won't like it if you and Mr Quirm take different views!'

'Who is the headless one?' cried Dumbell, taking the cue from his wife and precipitating himself towards Urien in such haste that his botanical tin emitted a metallic tinkle. 'Who is the headless one?'

For the first time in her knowledge of him, Wizzie saw a flash of real anger in Enoch Quirm's eyes. Heavily he swung round and faced poor Dumbell. ' "Who?" ' he growled. 'Did you say "Who?" "Who, who, who" — that's the word — and "Who cares?" is another word!'

'But who is he?' repeated the searcher after the hundred-and-twentieth variety of British blackberry. 'Who is he, Mr Quirm?'

At that, the Glymes man lost all control of himself. 'He's the devil!' he roared out, and, turning away, began hitting his chest and mumbling something in Welsh. This outcry of Urien's, made more resonant by the presence of that ancient wall, caused a general disturbance.

Teucer Wye impatiently drew his cane along the railings that protected the imperial masonry, causing an unpleasant 'tick-tick-tick' as the ferule struck each iron bar. Then he looked his Glymes neighbour up and down, as if he would have liked to have extracted the same sound from that lumbering body by a similar method.

Wizzie caught this look in Mr Wye's face, and it made her dislike him more than ever. For her own part, when her Glymes man cried 'He's the devil!' she would have done anything for him, anything to comfort him! Her sense of fear was still there, but, had the man been seated at that moment, she would have willingly slid down upon his knees.

Thuella, when she heard this unhappy outburst, impatiently pushed her brother aside and began tucking in with her fingers the big man's baggy jersey, which was protruding in an unseemly fashion from his belt.

This, it may well be believed, caused Wizzie a spasm of jealousy, but it was upon No-man that her anger fell. She caught on D.'s face, as he too approached Urien, a look she had come especially to loathe. It was a look that to her mind seemed to say, 'I am made of granite. These nervous attacks are beyond my comprehension.' So strong was her feeling that she jerked him back by the arm. 'Leave him alone! Can't you see we're only making him worse?'

Neither the emotion in her voice, nor the violence with which she pulled him back, had any effect on No-man; but they had an immediate effect on Thuella, who, swinging round, gave vent to a ringing peal of shrill malicious laughter, after which, clutching at her hat — for a hot dusty wind was now blowing on them from the road up to the barracks — she cried out impatiently: 'Come on, Urien! Come on, all of you! I want to show you something I've discovered in the Hardy statue. I told you about it, Wizz; but the others don't know.'

It was an added blow to Wizzie when she saw Urien shake himself like a great sick bear and stride off at a great pace by Thuella's side. Her feeling was clearly shared by Teucer Wye, for the little man clutched helplessly at Dumbell's arm and dragged him in pursuit, while Claudius, seeing the Cumber girl unsupported and evidently in a huff, went straight to her side and began a polite discourse on the superiority of engineering over architecture, to which Mrs Wye, giving Wizzie the kind of spiteful look one schoolgirl might give another, answered with an insolent shrug of her thin shoulders.

When Wizzie and No-man reached the cross-roads at the top of High West Street, they were forced to wait, before following the others, while a number of newly enlisted recruits, led by a middle-aged corporal, marched past.

'Doesn't it look heavenly on a hot day like this?' said No-man, pointing out to her the tower of St Peter's at the bottom of the street. 'I always like to think', he went on, 'how old Barnes, standing down there in his knee-breeches, must enjoy a day like this.'

'Barnes?' murmured Wizzie absent-mindedly.

'His statue, my sweet. It must feel so miserable in bad weather.'

Wizzie sighed. Her thoughts at that moment had taken a wild and strange flight. She had been trying to recall what she had felt when the Glymes man led her and Thel through those smouldering flames, and there had suddenly come upon her a vision of that nameless beast-snout carved at the feet of those two figures. 'It was like D.'s monster', she thought, 'and yet it wasn't.' And, linking it in her mind with that passage through the fire, she gave way to the morbid fancy that it was astride of that beast-snout that Urien had dragged her over the fiery embers.

Hardly realizing why she did it, she hurriedly laid her hand on D.'s arm. It was an almost automatic gesture, and one that was natural enough now that the recruits had passed and they were free to cross the road, and it was not accompanied by any tenderness towards D.; but it was accompanied by a sudden uneasy suspicion of her Black Man of Glymes.

'I wish he hadn't pulled us like that through the fire,' she thought; and along with this uneasiness about Urien there came a longing to be safe back in Friary Lane with Lovie. 'I hope Lovie's all right,' she said to herself. And then it came to her that she felt faint from lack of food. 'I wish we were sitting down', she thought, 'to Jenny's good dinner!'

As they began to cross the road, she indicated to D. how hungry she was, and suggested that they should say good-bye to the others at Hardy's statue and go straight home down High West Street.

'I should say so!' D. responded with instant sympathy. 'You must be famished, sweetheart!'

When they were nearly across, he asked her what it was that Thuella had discovered about the statue.

'Oh, nothing,' she replied wearily. 'Only some old picture it makes her think of

They paused for a second when they got to the curb-stone, and Wizzie found herself tightening her grip on No-man's arm. In the exhaustion that had seized her she felt suddenly unequal to facing the group gathered about the statue. It had been the leap of her spirit, its fling, its escape, that had turned her to Enoch Quirm. In this feeling of deadly exhaustion, without heart for anything, she leant on D. as she would have leant against their bedroom chimney-piece.

It is one of Nature's favourite tricks with a man and a woman who live together to intermit their bitterest quarrels with moments when, contrary to their own will perhaps, they find themselves as much united against the outer world as if they were the most passionate of lovers.

'Look at Thel,' whispered No-man. 'She's taken off her hat. Look at the sun on her head against old Hardy's knee! I wonder which he'd have been most interested in — you or her?' He became silent, staring, as Wizzie could see, not at Thuella's golden head but into vacancy.

With a slow smile he returned from his interior contemplation. 'Sure, my sweet!' he said. 'Good-bye, and off we go.'

When, however, they reached the statue, they found it harder than they had expected to follow this drastic resolution. Straight towards the barracks, as if he were acting as umpire in some invisible aerial tournament, gazed with fixed stare the great sculptor in words. His bronze legs in their serviceable stockings were crossed restfully at the knee, and his compact head, poised above his upright shoulders, was held as alert and as raptorial towards the cunning masks of the Immanent Will as it had been held in life for the best part of a century.

'Hullo! You look as if you were all gathered round the figure-head of a ship!' cried No-man in his abrupt way, as they joined the others; and though as a rule Wizzie deliberately closed her mind to his off-hand imaginings, this time, in her unexpected mood of taking refuge with him, she gave herself up completely to this fancy of his. Their friends were too occupied to bother about the way he greeted them, so that she had time to feel as if the old town lying round them were actually and indeed some huge phantasmal ship, loaded to the bulkheads with the perilous cargoes of the generations, and voyaging to its unknown port behind that forward-gazing bronze figure.

‘Come here a second, No-man!’ cried Dumbell. ‘No, wait a moment, Father! Let him see it! I’m not hurting Mr Hardy.’

The ex-professor ceased his efforts to snatch from that bronze back — so characteristic still, even in metal — a blank page from one of his son’s Blackshirt tracts. This fly-leaf the sacrilegious youth had spread out on that almost living surface and was using as a note-book.

As far as Wizzie could gather, he was engaged in making a rough sketch, with hurried strokes of his pencil, of the great discovery they had just seen. Dumbell’s gift for such rough drawings was not contemptible, and Wizzie was astonished at the crude verisimilitude of the scrawl. There, if her Glymes man was right, was the great goddess Caridwen. There was the headless unknown with what looked like Egyptian hieroglyphics on his breast. And there was the eyeless, earless beast-snout!

Once more that disturbing feeling that had something to do with her passage through the bonfire came over her, but very faintly this time, for she was clinging to D.’s arm as she leaned forward. It assumed too a rather different form, due to the fact that up the deeply cut highway, flanked by houses with a rich Balzacian look of old romance, the cool airs from the river could reach her face, for she fancied herself wading through water in place of fire and being aware of this demon beast as a great slippery fish-head swimming between her knees.

It annoyed her a good deal afterwards that so much of her consciousness should have been preoccupied just then with herself, for a curious event now occurred, about every detail of which she would have liked to have been absolutely certain; but, as fate would have it, she was doomed to be uncertain about the whole business.

D. had dropped her arm. Of that at least she was sure. And, after dropping it, he had taken the pencil from Dumbell to make some alteration. Whether he too was seized with dizziness then from lack of food, or whether — well, she never knew, then or later, what really happened. D. himself always swore to her on his dying oath that the last touch he gave with Dumbell's pencil was on the snout of the beast, which he was anxious to make resemble still more closely his heraldic bed-posts. But what at any rate was certain was that, after Mr Wye or Claudius had snatched the leaflet away from the great man's back and they were all examining it, not without uneasy glances at each other, D. suddenly seized it and tore it into bits. But he had not done this before she had seen what was there: the name 'Mona', in a shaky hand, written clear across the sketch!

CHAPTER 9. Full Circle

THE UNUSUALLY FINE weather continued, with only brief intermissions, all through the summer. Indeed, it was not till the beginning of October that the rains began. When, however, they did come, they avenged the long months of drought with such a constant downpour that conditions of life in Dorchester were completely changed.

One result of this incessant rain was the collapse of Claudius, whose health, already undermined by his labours in the coal-yard, now broke down. The end of the second week in October found him laid up in his house in Friary Lane with a complication of obstinate ailments that threatened to be serious.

Mrs Dearth, however, remained obdurate. Do what they could to persuade her to forgive her old friend now that he was so ill, the indignant protests of both No-man and Wizzie were always received in the same way — by an implacable refusal to submit to what the aggrieved woman called 'putting weakness before principle'. What had fixed the final seal upon Jenny's perversity was her discovery — and our friends soon recognized that concealment was impossible — of the fact that the sick man was constantly being visited by youthful members of the Movement in Dorchester.

The relentless Horse-Head — and how cross Wizzie became when D. indulged his tedious love of nicknames! — had marked down among these young revolutionaries one or two who were not only feminine in sex but endowed with a charm that fell in most fatally with her preconceived ideas. She did once go so far as to invite the doctor who visited the ex-philanthropist into her front room to ask his opinion of the patient's condition; but, as Wizzie and No-man knew too well, the one person who might have shocked and startled her into a more generous mood was not the doctor, a laconic optimist, but the district nurse — but she, unfortunately, was almost as comely in appearance as the young revolutionaries!

Talking it over together, No-man and Wizzie came to the conclusion that their friend had obstinately closed her mind to any possible issue to Mr Cask's illness but a favourable one.

'She thinks of it', No-man would say, 'as a game of bluff between them. She feels that he would have made a fool of her if he melted her heart by taking to his bed.'

'It's the doctor,' Wizzie would reply. 'He's a first-rate man, but he'd be cheerful if the town was full of the Black Death.'

Agreed as they were about Jenny and Claudius, it cannot be said that No-man and his girl had grown any closer during these summer months. The presence of Lovie had pushed them further apart rather than brought them together, and of this the child seemed dimly aware, for they had both caught her in various irritating devices to bridge the rift.

Wizzie still brooded over the protracted wrong done to her about the attic in High East Street, and though it was plain he had to have a place to work in, and plain too that if he delayed his breakfast long enough to share it with her his morning's work would have to be curtailed, it was still a rooted grievance that this book of his always loomed up as more important than their life together.

All this summer her devotion to Enoch Quirm had been the chief outlet for that vein in her of girlish romance that was always being fed by her story-books; but something or other — some teasing obstacle — seemed always to turn up to prevent her being alone with him.

Over and over again, while the air was full of flower-pollen and grass-seed and humming insects, she had wheeled the perambulator over the Blue Bridge and up the lane to Glymes, only to find Urien away at Maiden Castle. And when she had caught him in his house, it seemed difficult to get a moment with him alone. Nance wasn't the difficulty. Nance always seemed ready to leave them together. The trouble came from Thuella. The girl invariably came out when she saw Lovie's perambulator; and Wizzie even noticed that, when she didn't join them, either Nance or Urien himself would make some excuse to bring her on the scene. It was as if it needed the presence of the two of them together to liberate him from his growing gloom.

This gloominess was a new thing, and it evidently was a worry to Nance. Wizzie suspected that Nance's warm greetings had to do with the lifting of this cloud, and she came to the conclusion that the woman must have had the wit to notice that his spirits rose to their old pitch only when both the young women were with him.

The chief reason for his gloom seemed to be a very definite one; and Nance often talked to Wizzie about it. This was some hurt to his inner nature done by his weekly articles on Welsh mythology for Mr Cumber's paper. Nance told her that she'd implored him to get out of it. She confessed that she'd offered to get some daily job in the town to keep them going, if he'd only consent to give it up.

Wizzie herself had felt from the beginning that she understood perfectly what the man suffered in having to work for Mr Cumber. She was still in the dark, and content to be in the dark, about these ideas of his, but she told herself it was as if she'd had to do her turn in the circus-ring for the pleasure and under the censorship of Lord Fordington and his private guests.

Everybody by this time, both in Friary Lane and at Glymes, knew that D. was her Black Man’s son. The story had even begun to leak out in the town; and the two tall men — both of them striking figures, the one in his faded jersey, and the other with his familiar cudgel — were followed sometimes by inquisitive looks when together in the Dorchester streets.

Her private feeling was that Urien was fonder of D. than D. was of him; but then D. though propitiatory to everyone, was fond of no one, while Urien had become more vulnerable and human since the discovery at Maiden Castle.

Of one result of his connection with the Cumbers Wizzie couldn’t help approving. The indefatigable Mrs Wye, as much without reverence as she was without fear, and with no more sense of a person’s feelings than of the feelings of a carpet that had to be beaten, drove the man into going to the barber’s, with the result that his head no longer had an African look. Older he undoubtedly became under the scissors of the barber, but he acquired a more normal and natural appearance, and his head ceased to resemble the woolly topknot of a mammoth ram. The little autocrat of Beulah Lodge hadn’t scrupled to badger him about his clothes too, but here he proved incorrigible.

‘If she takes away his jersey’, D. told Wizzie one night by their upper room fire, ‘he’ll go dotty, just as I would if you took away my stick.’

All the first week of October it rained incessantly; but the heaviest rain Wizzie had ever known in her life was the rain that swept down the panes of Claudius’s room when she and D. went in to see him on the afternoon of the eleventh.

Claudius confessed to them he had been worse in the night. He told them he had had a violent shivering-fit just before dawn and had tried to reach his fire, which the district nurse had made up in the hope that it might last till she came back in the morning.

'She rated me well, you may believe,' he told them, 'when she did come. She wouldn't have known about it, though, if Katie and Edith hadn't looked in on their way to work.'

'Known about what?' enquired Wizzie anxiously. 'You don't mean to say you couldn't get back to bed?'

Claudius worked himself up a bit higher on his pillows and chuckled. 'I'm right as a trivet now,' he said. 'I'm far better than yesterday afternoon. Look at the rain! Listen to it.' He was silent for a moment, watching the streaming pane. Then, with a change of expression: 'She doesn't know about last night, does she?'

'We don't know about last night,' cried Wizzie, very much perturbed. 'Did your Katies and Ediths find you out of bed?'

He surveyed her troubled face with a look of childish satisfaction. 'How kind you are!' he murmured, stretching out his arm and touching her sleeve. Then, drawing his hand back, he sighed heavily. 'No-man, my friend,' he said, 'this business must end well this time' — the rest of the sentence came slowly and emphatically— 'for it wouldn't do for me to kick the bucket till she came round.'

'But you are better today,' said Wizzie gravely. 'Your face shows it. Did the nurse let you have that stuff that I made D. buy at Boon's?'

But the man closed his eyes with a worried frown. His childish pleasure in frightening her about last night changed to weariness as her question about his food hung in the air. 'It must end well this time,' he repeated, without opening his eyes, 'but after she's come round and we're happy again...'

‘She’s not the only one, Claudius,’ broke from the girl’s lips; but No-man took him up in a tone that was almost argumentative. ‘I don’t blame you, old man, for wanting to be out of it all, when you lay such burdens on yourself; but how on earth can a way of life be right when it makes a fellow like you talk of your end in that tone?’

The man on the bed opened his eyes and fixed them gravely on the speaker. ‘You — don’t — understand — No-man,’ he said slowly. ‘A person can find life hard and look forward to being released just as a — as a soldier —’ He hesitated a moment, while a charming and quaintly deprecatory smile flickered over his mouth. ‘A Roman soldier — might — want — his — discharge — even though...’ And he closed his eyes again.

Wizzie gave D. a quick reproachful look, and, bending over the bed, pulled the counterpane more closely round the man’s shoulders. Then, while No-man, moving to the window, stared at the streaming rain, she went into the kitchen and opened the stove to see how the fire was. Putting on some coal, she lifted the kettle, made a little clicking sound between her tongue and her teeth when she found it empty, filled it at the sink, and, taking up a tin of invalid’s food that stood unopened on the shelf, proceeded to open it and transfer some of its contents to a saucepan.

She hurried to his side, where he was craning his neck round to discover what she was doing.

‘I don’t — want — you to do anything in there,’ he murmured peevishly. ‘Nurse is a good nurse. She brings me broth from over the way. There’s no need for you to do anything in there.’

‘All right,’ she replied. ‘I was only looking at the fire. I won’t touch a thing if it worries you.’

‘Listen to me, Wizzie!’

She saw that it had become an effort to him to talk, and she bent down till her head was close to his.

‘The doctor said yesterday’, he whispered, ‘that if I didn’t get someone to be with me at night I’d have to go to the hospital. I told him how good the nurse was; but he said she had other cases and couldn’t give me enough time. Wizzie, listen! I don’t want to go to the hospital. In fact, I won’t go; and that’s the truth. But I’m afraid he may get an ambulance when I’m too weak to resist. Wizzie! If I went there, she would be shy of coming to see me, and I — know — she — may — take — into her head — to come any minute! So — get me some woman — an old woman, mind! — she wouldn’t like it if it wasn’t an old woman — will you, Wizzie? You will? You promise? Oh, how good you are to me, Wizzie!’ And he sank back with his eyes shut and an expression of blissful satisfaction on his face.

The girl left him and went over to D. at the window. No-man began whispering to her at once. ‘But you do everything as it is, Wizz! You’re always in here. He doesn’t know half you do! Besides, there aren’t old women like that. He’s thinking of years ago.’

Wizzie pondered, staring through the window at the torrents of rain. It was as if she were looking through two windows, both made of some substance less transparent than glass, and both in the state in which the whole universe was to the eye of Heraclitus. And if the window of glass and the mock window of water were both of them, in the grey corpse-flesh pallor that had substituted itself for daylight, spectral epitomes of the flowing away of all things, the wall of the King’s Arms stables opposite, usually so mellow and friendly, showed like the side of a drowning galleon, while the path beneath the wall was no longer a road for solid people to walk upon but a phantasmal river for ghosts to gather at, a river where a crowd of Limbo-weary spirits might wave beseeching arms. The only substantial thing Wizzie could see as she looked out was a tradesman's boy wearing a man's mackintosh who was pushing his bicycle against the torrential flood. This lad's face — for the boy didn't know he was being overlooked or he would have pulled himself together — wore an expression of woebegone desolation.

Following that piteous white face with her eyes as it melted into the rain, she felt as if it were drifting on the same fatal tide that was bearing her own life into the unknown. D. had always told her that the first syllable of the word 'Dorchester' meant 'water'. He had always said that there came moments in the place when the waters under the firmament rose to meet the waters above the firmament, and deep called to deep. Only a night or two ago, in intervals of that love-making which left her so stiff and cold, she had had to listen, till she hated these things as much as she hated the touch of his bony fingers, to vague murmurings from him about difficulties between people having to do with the opposition of the elements to which they were attracted — fire against air, water against earth, and so forth.

'I hope *I s*han't die on a night like this!' she thought, as she turned to No-man, who, judging by his expression, was deriving some weird pleasure of his own from the corpse-grey deluge.

'I shall do for him myself,' she whispered. 'He won't know! He doesn't know now who empties his slops or fills his hot bottle. He thinks it's the nurse. Lovie will be all right with Jenny. You must look in in the morning to see how he is; and I'll get up earlier. What are you smiling at?'

No-man became grave at once. 'But the nights, the nights, sweetheart,' he whispered. 'He oughtn't to be left alone at night. You heard what he said about those girls finding him? He ought to have a trained nurse. I'll talk to the doctor.'

Wizzie frowned. She saw in her mind's eye, clear as a map, the upshot of this talk of D.'s with the doctor. They'd take him straight off to the hospital — the one thing she'd promised to prevent.

'What', she whispered, after listening intently for a second to the patient's loud and troubled breathing, 'could a person sleep on here, if they did stay all night?'

No-man gave her a quick, surprised look. He was evidently being shown an aspect of his Neolithic captive's character that was new to him. Nor did Wizzie miss the full significance of this look. What it said to her was, 'Can this be my selfish, touchy, spoilt, wayward Wizz, this practical helper of broken-down eccentrics?'

In a flash it shot through her head, while her frown deepened till it deformed her whole face, 'He has no idea that it's only him — him and his ways — that I can't—'

'He's got a room upstairs, hasn't he?' No-man whispered.

They both gazed hopelessly round the littered room, which might have been the office of some overworked agent of a foreign airways company in Bangkok or Honolulu. To Wizzie's mind the only friendly objects to be seen in the whole place were the steaming kettle, visible through the open kitchen door, and Claudius's own head on his pillow.

She was now seized with an inspiration. 'I'll bring down his mattress from upstairs,' she whispered, 'just for tonight, and I'll take the rug and a blanket from our bed. I don't want to speak of it to Jenny if I can help — but she's bound to find out. Well, there it is! We must do what we can, day by day. If he gets worse he'll have to go to the hospital.'

No-man nodded; and it was her turn now to feel surprised. She had supposed that at the mere idea of having to sleep alone he would have raised the devil.

'The rain's stopping!' he now whispered eagerly. 'Look at that gutter, look at those drops, look at that roof!'

But while the girl obediently considered these objects, what No-man looked at was his watch. 'It's nearly four,' he announced softly. 'I think I'll go for an hour's walk and come back here for tea. You get tea ready for us all three; and I'll tell Jenny to give Lovie hers. I'll tell her we're going out. She'll guess where we are — but nothing said, nothing felt!'

Wizzie's face brightened. She knew that Claudius would be overjoyed at this arrangement. 'All right. Get a few buns at Mrs Major's, will you? You know? Those old Dorchester ones. Don't get soaking wet, now! I won't have this place dripping with water. And clean your boots on Jenny's door-mat. Do you understand? Don't forget, now, and come rushing straight in here from your drowner's ditches! I'll be—' And she looked round, clicking her tongue against her teeth. 'I'll be clearing up some of this clutter.'

No-man began hurriedly putting on his overcoat. It was absurdly obvious to Wizzie that his chief anxiety now was to get well away before she changed her mind. But nothing, as she knew — hardly the torrential deluge that had just ceased — could stop him from snatching a walk before tea. This particular contrast, the tension of his walk and the relaxation of his tea, was, next to his pleasure in caressing her in bed, his greatest daily sensation. She watched him, therefore, with feelings that were only too familiar, as, clutching his cudgel in a hand that was not yet lodged in the sleeve of his great-coat, and with that garment trailing loosely over his shoulder and the stick colliding against the door, he took himself off.

‘I can’t stand it! I can’t stand it!’ she repeated to herself in a kind of desperate chant as she went to get the broom from the kitchen.

Her thoughts became less hopeless but more drastic after she had lit a couple of candles, for, as they had begun to say in the Dorchester shops with that curious satisfaction in all weather changes that townsfolk have, the evenings were closing in. By the light of these candles, which, as she saw them reflected in the grey desolation outside, looked to her like what Grummer used to call a ‘copsy’ fire, she set herself to make the place a little more cheerful.

But the grate was such a small one that, though the coal was good — for no doubt his indulgent boss provided him with the best — Claudius’s fire gave forth nothing like the warmth of the familiar one in Jenny’s dining-room; and, as the girl moved about, piling up the sleeping man’s magazines almost as ruthlessly as if she’d been Mrs Wye with her husband’s botanical specimens, the reflection of the two candles in the greyness outside kept taking a curious share in her thoughts. They became, indeed, an objectified image of the one really warm interior glow in her life-feeling just then, the glow that the thought of Urien still provoked.

She smiled to herself, a queer little contortion of her thin lips, as she told herself how silly and girlish this feeling was. Well! It was no good pretending. She had become like so many of her story-book heroines. She had all the symptoms — every one of them! She was shy of meeting him, and yet she was always trying to meet him. She didn’t want anything from him. She wanted all from him. Her whole body felt different when she was near him; and any allusion to him, or even to Glymes, or to Nance, made a flame rise up and waver and flicker in the grey monotony of her days!

How funnily Claudius breathed when he was asleep! She paused in her work — she was now laying the table for tea by his bedside, and she had to put her own cup on a plate instead of a saucer, his pantry was so meagre — to stare at his open mouth and high-bridged nose. What hollows he had round his prominent eyes with the white lids so tightly drawn! How sunken his cheeks were! She surveyed him closely, drawing in her own lips and wrinkling her forehead. Watching him lying there, she began to doubt of his recovery. Suppose he was to die tonight while she was lying by his side on that mattress from upstairs and under Jenny's blanket? Would she know it if he did die? Would she wake up and feel for the matches? She must make up a good fire before she lay down. Little had she guessed last autumn, when she left the circus, that in less than a year she'd be spending the night by the side of a dying man while her man looked after Old Funky's child! Would she be scared in the night? She must have their rug and one of their blankets, and tell D. to put his great overcoat on the bed. How queer it would seem, waking up in this room with those airplane pictures all about! Would D. miss her in the night? Well! He'd better practise missing her, for she certainly wasn't going to stay with him forever!

In total unconsciousness that she was doing such a thing, she began whistling a faint little tune as she went back to the kitchen. She found a loaf — a miserably stale one, but there was an untouched pat of butter — and she set herself to spread a few slices, at first rather thinly, half-thinking they were for Lovie, and then thickly, as she remembered how fond D. was of butter.

As she stood in the kitchen occupied in this way, she caught sight of Claudius's shaving-brush beside a little cheap mirror like the one left by Tom Dearth that Jenny kept in her kitchen. 'Does he manage to shave himself still?' she thought. 'No! He must get the nurse to do it when she comes in the morning.'

With her hand on her knife, which was half-way through the thickly buttered side of the loaf, she leaned forward and stared into the mirror. This action of hers led to the discovery that her blouse, which had of late grown too tight for her, had burst its brooch and was displaying more than her neck.

Before refastening the brooch, which she did with her left hand, she pulled down her blouse an inch further, revealing the upper curve of her left breast. It is not an uncommon thing with women to make a fetish of a particular portion of their person; and though Wizzie was, as girls go, rather humble than otherwise as to her feminine charms — taking what Lovie's incorrigible father called her ' 'lurin' figure' very much as Thuella took her palette of pigments, as the mere medium of her art — she did admire her breasts, which certainly were exquisitely moulded; and from her earliest girlhood, even as far back as the old convent days when her spirit was at its lowest ebb, she would surreptitiously contemplate a tiny mole on her left breast, a mark like that which betrayed the heroine of Cymbeline, and tell herself romantic stories of its being pressed by a lover's lips.

What came into her mind at this moment, as she leaned forward over her half-cut loaf, staring at herself in Claudius's shaving-glass, was a recent occasion at Glymes when this same brooch had come loose and Nance without a word had fastened it for her. Her Black Man must have seen this gesture of his wife's, but whether he had noticed her disarray before Nance rectified it, she had no idea; but the incident, carrying all manner of vague, voluptuous broodings in its train, had played of late the sort of part in her thoughts that a perilous strain of music might play, so that she never fastened up her blouse with that brooch without a secret thrill.

Their patient did not awaken that afternoon till No-man had been back for nearly half an hour. She decided to let him sleep as long as possible, though she caught D. in several shame-faced glances at his watch.

To make up to her pedestrian for this delay, she permitted him to relate to her in a whisper, as they stood by the stove, all the events of his walk. This was such a rare privilege to No-man that he soon became voluble, forgetting where they were, forgetting Claudius, forgetting everything except to move the kettle and stir up the flames in the stove with the iron poker.

'He's enjoying his damned elements today, anyway,' thought Wizzie, as she saw him refrain from replacing the kettle and extend his bony fingers over the fiery aperture.

'I went clear round Poundbury,' he whispered proudly, and she thought to herself: 'He talks of Poundbury as if it were the Cape of Good Hope.'

'You know that steep copse on the other side, before you get to the old farm?'

Wizzie nodded smilingly, as much as to say, 'Oh, yes, dear D. I am as familiar with that spot as I am with my own bedroom.' But in her heart she sighed, 'Oh, what is he talking about?' And she tried to conjure up this umbrageous precipice where all she had ever seen were grassy banks like those of Maiden Castle.

'It's on a day like this', he went on, 'that I can imagine the Roman sentries challenging any stray wanderer. Coming back along the south of the hill, where there's a row of old thorn-bushes, I actually got a shock, and thought—'

'Well, no! Not quite that. But do you know what it was?'

'What D.?'

‘A black heifer! They like lying down under those old bushes. The trunks are worn smooth by the way they rub against them. You can believe how dripping wet it all was — and the grey mist — and the mud — and the dung under those bushes.’

She pretended to give a little shudder. Oh, how well she knew his childlike desire to enhance the contrast between her cosy warmth in Claudius’s kitchen and his own encounters with thorn-bushes and heifers. She could humour him at these moments, especially on an evening like this, just as she did Lovie when the child was pretending there was a wolf behind the curtain.

‘Yes, it’s an odd thing, but I feel a much stronger Roman aura on Poundbury than at Maiden Castle, or even at Maumbury Rings. They must have used Poundbury more consecutively, I think. It must have been a permanent camp, whereas—’

He was interrupted by Claudius’s voice. ‘Who’s there?’ came from the bed in the front room.

‘Why, you said that’, cried No-man, hurrying to his side, ‘exactly like my Roman sentry on Poundbury! I’ve just come back from up there,’ he added in a lower voice, ashamed of having forgotten the man’s state and spoken so loudly.

But Claudius was evidently refreshed by his sleep; and the pleasure with which she found him contemplating her preparations for tea gave the girl a pang as she joined her friend at his side. She had got the little fire to burn more brightly too, and its pleasant blaze, combined with the light of the candles, made a delicious contrast with the premature twilight framed in the uncurtained window.

‘Shall I pull down the blind?’ she asked. Claudius nodded, and, while No-man shut out the moribund day, he whispered to Wizzie, ‘If only the door were to open now, and she...'

Wizzie helped him to raise himself up on his pillows, made No-man retire into the kitchen while she aided him in a yet more personal way, and then, long before the familiar cry of 'Ech-o! Ech-o!' sounded from the entrance to the King's Arms tap, they were all enjoying themselves, just as if he had not been ill at all, over their tea and their talk and the buns from Mrs Major's.

For a while, their conversation remained peaceful and unexciting; but, do what the girl could, it was impossible with these two to keep them from the wretched topics that had become the bane of her life. D. of course, like the fool that he was, was the first to begin it all; but the sick man caught it up in a flash, and very soon began getting flushed and feverish and staring-eyed, one long arm thrust straight out from the bed-clothes as he gesticulated, and both his wrists displaying the white sleeves of the old-fashioned night-gown he wore under his woollen jacket.

'I know very well', No-man was saying, 'that working-men can't yet afford the walks I enjoy except on Sundays. But they will, when their hours are shortened. They will, Claudius! It's the deepest life-instinct in us, I tell you, that makes us struggle for solitude and to enjoy Nature alone.'

'You're wrong, man, you're absolutely wrong!' cried the invalid, beating the air above his counterpane with his hands, as if scattering a cloud of contemplative midges. 'What the world wants is a completely new set of values! You don't suppose it's been easy to give up all my old ideals, all my old doctrines of righteousness and benevolence? Jenny knows better than you do, No-man, how much I've changed! I've changed abominably. I've changed devilishly. I'm a different man, with different ideas of good and evil, from the ground up, and, what's more, I've—'

But No-man burst in at this point, swallowing half of one of Mrs Major's buns in the strength of his emotion. 'The old values can never change! God must always be good, and evil evil! Even if mankind left the earth altogether and flew to another planet on one of your damned—'

But the sick man's voice rose so high that they both glanced at the window, fearful lest the passers-by should hear him.

'Good and evil must change,' he shouted, 'like everything else. Our art must change; our poetry and philosophy must change; our morals must change. A year ago I was a pacifist and a reformer. Now I'm a Communist and a person born again! All that old notion of yours, No-man, about the superior man living for contemplation — I tell you we've had enough of it! The poor, the working-people, have always been as I am now. What is this precious personal life you make such a fuss about compared with the great living spontaneous forces that move and stir in the crowded masses? I tell you the life of the working classes today anticipates the noblest life of the future. With what sardonic humour must a miner or a quarryman or a factory-hand today watch your poetical gentleman going for a walk with his stick and his dog and his love of Nature! It's the human beings who sleep ten in a room, fighting, laughing, weeping, loving, hating, who know what Nature is! The rabbit in a trap knows what Nature is; and a man and a woman making love in the presence of their grown children, or beside themselves with hatred in the presence of three other families, know what Nature is. Oh, you poetical people with your simple life, I could curse you as Jesus cursed the Pharisees! I tell you, No-man, it costs money to live a simple life. A simple life's the luxury of the comfortable. Your benevolent poetical gentleman feeds on the poverty of others. He sucks blood like a flea, he cracks bones like an hyaena. He hates the radio, the cinema, the circus, because he can afford to hate them! I've found out this, my dears, from the little real work I've done already: that if you can't sink into the midst of a crowd, into the midst of ordinary people, loving, hating, chattering, suffering, enjoying themselves, being bad, being good, being swayed by all the natural human passions, and with no pride in themselves as superior to average humanity, and with no time to be fastidious, it's no good pretending that you've got the secret of life!'

He paused for breath and fixed on D. an annihilating hawk's eye. Then suddenly a sweet smile flickered over his face. 'Sorry, No-man!' he whispered. 'I got carried away.'

Wizzie, on the other hand, biting one of Mrs Major's buns as fiercely as if it was D.'s inhumanity, felt a malicious joy in the prospect of her man's discomfiture. But No-man didn't look discomfited. He sat with his legs stretched out towards the bed, and his eye on the teapot rather than on his companions' faces. From his muddy boots arose a faint smell of manure, and his face had the happy, stupid, healthily dull look of a person relaxing in warmth after rapid exercise.

Wizzie had only vaguely followed the drift of Claudius's words; but her heart leapt eagerly towards the old fanatic, for she felt by instinct that he was attacking in D. what to herself, in her rooted grievance, seemed his monstrous selfishness. 'Well, now,' she would have liked her look to say to him, 'stop thinking about the teapot and about whether there's any more boiling water, and see if you can answer that! Doesn't that shake your self-satisfaction?'

'No, old friend,' No-man replied slowly, after breathing a faint sigh — a sigh that merely signified, Wizzie said to herself, his reluctant relinquishing of more hot water— 'I can't agree with you. I do agree that everyone ought to share the world's drudgery. I do agree that it's unfair that some should have more time than others. But if we had all to live, like you describe, without privacy or solitude, I would still feel I had a right to snatch every moment I could for being alone. However much my neighbours or fellow-lodgers in this life-in-common of yours bullied me for walking round Poundbury when I'd done my job, I'd still feel I had a right to walk round Poundbury — and alone too! But I do agree that it would be wrong to feel grand or superior about it.'

Suddenly Claudius hoisted himself up from his pillows, and, thrusting out a long arm in the direction of the two candles, which now were burning low, lifted up his voice like a prophet. 'I tell you,' he cried, 'none of you can stop it. It's coming on the world like shock after shock of electric light! Our candles will burn out, our pride will fall, our personal life will dissolve away; but the new order is coming! Strong and terrible and impersonal, it's coming — a new good, a new evil, a new hope! Let those who cling to what they call Nature look to it! The new age is the age of man conquering Nature. And to you beauty-mongers let me say this. Your beauty is cruelty; your beauty is evil; your beauty must be destroyed! This is the age of man, not of men; of the mass life, not of the individual life. It's the age of the mocked-at, scoffed-at, despised crowd. The age of superior poetical persons, the age of Nature-worship, the age of the gods, is gone forever. Its stale echoes, its guttering candles, its hollow repetitions, they're only waiting their next electric shock! The new world of evolution is no more worship of Nature, no more worship of great men. It is power over Nature, it is power over great men. It's the life — it's the life of the masses! And I say to you, No-man, just as those candles—'

He stopped with a sudden quiver of all his body. He uttered a low, sobbing gasp, while his outstretched arm dropped down like a cut branch, and his head fell on the pillow. His eyes seemed now to double-shut themselves, as if not only their outward flame, but the inner flame that had gleamed through them, had become extinct. And following that first gasp there came a sound from his throat that made Wizzie's heart grow cold.

They both rose to their feet. Wizzie gave No-man one fierce reproachful look, and, pushing back the tea-table, moved close up to Claudius's side. Here she stood for a second, gazing at him with round eyes and open mouth, in frozen immobility. Then she swung round and gave No-man such a look of concentrated hatred that she could see him wince under it and turn his eyes away. Very slowly and softly, having whispered to him not to stir, she moved on tip-toe towards the door.

Before she reached it, however, she caught a sound from the bed and turned back quickly. That terrifying sound in the man's throat had ceased, and his eyes had opened. Not only so, but he was smiling reassuringly at D. whose expression of childish dismay must have struck him.

When they were both at his side again, he looked almost quizzically from one to the other. 'How nice you two look together!' he murmured, and then he sighed heavily. ‘Do you know,’ he said, ‘I sometimes take the auspices, quite in the old Roman way, about her and me. I look out of that window and watch for birds; not sparrows — for I don’t count sparrows — but any other birds. And if the first one I see flies to the right, I say to myself, “She’ll come round in the end.” But if it flies to the left, I say to myself—’ Here that peculiarly sweet smile of which he had the secret crossed his face. ‘What I really say to myself, No-man, if it flies to the left, is, “It’s all childish nonsense!”‘

‘Oh, I’ll be all right now,’ he said, composing his face and stretching out his legs as if for a familiar ordeal. ‘But I’ll have to go through a bout of the pain now. So I’m afraid we’d better say good-bye for a while. When I get like that, it always comes — just here.’ And he jabbed with his great, spatulate thumb, a thumb that could be bent backwards further than any thumb in Dorchester, the spot in the counterpane that covered the centre of his body. ‘What I think it is,’ he said, ’is pleurisy. But the nurse won’t have it. She says it’s something else. But, whatever it is, it’s hardly weakened me at all. Do you know what I told Edith when she said I fell down from weakness? I told her I fell down from dizziness, not weakness; I told her I was strong enough to beget a child! She did laugh at that. But I always talk freely to those girls. I like to make them laugh.’

‘No, no, little one! Not as bad as all that. It takes most of my energy to cope with it. But I can cope with it. It’s sharp; but it’s not acute; it’s not unbearable. Only I can’t think of much else while it’s going on. Much better be off, you two! I don’t like having visitors when I can’t amuse them. But don’t look like that, you darling girl! I’m not going to make faces, or make noises. I swear to you it isn’t so bad.’

‘I wouldn’t think of leaving you, Claudius,’ said Wizzie quietly, ‘but don’t worry about me. I’ll find lots to do. I’ll treat your house like my own.’

‘I’ll stay — a bit — longer — too,’ murmured No-man humbly, resuming his former seat and stretching out his legs again, ‘but I won’t talk. I’ll think. I’ll think about my book.’

After carrying the tea-things away, Wizzie joined in this silent vigil. An occasional faint twinge in his face and a few spasmodic jerks of his knees were the only signs of what the sick man was enduring; but he evidently had removed his consciousness from their presence as completely as if he were a thousand miles away.

Since that look of unequivocal hatred he had caught on her face, D. had avoided Wizzie’s eyes. But with this single exception he seemed wholly himself, serene, friendly, quite at ease, and enjoying to the full the sensation of the red coals, the guttering candles, the darkening window.

‘I suppose he’d enjoy himself like this’, the girl thought, ‘if Claudius were dying, and I’d run away, and Lovie were howling with that stitch in her side!’

‘Ech-o! Ech–o!’ came distinctly now from the end of Friary Lane; and in spite of the wretchedness of the evening there was faintly audible from the top of High East Street that warm stir, that rich vibration, that glowing movement of life in Dorchester which always seems to rise to an intenser pitch when the wealthier Durnovarians have had their tea and the poorer ones are preparing to go home to theirs! The actual volume of sound, no doubt, is greater at half past four, or even at half past three, but when five o’clock strikes at the Guildhall some magnetic current of psychic sympathy seems to pour into the old place from all the country round, till, from

Piddletrenthide on the east to Martinstown on the west, a thicker smoke from human chimneys and a quicker pulse in human bodies carry into Dorchester a fresh awareness that the happiest hour in the whole Durotrigean day — the hour of tea — has come round again!

There arrive moments in all lives when the flowing of time seems mysteriously to pause, making, as it were, a little eddy in its implacable tide, wherein a person — or even a small group of persons — can detach themselves for a second or two from the onward rush of events, not so much whirling round like straws, in that mystic interruption of the tide, as lifted above its flow, and allowed for the beat of a pulse to see their life, not perhaps 'sub specie aeternitatis', but at any rate unclouded by their normal passions.

Such a moment came now to Wizzie, and as the girl gave herself up to it, an attitude to D. different from any she had yet known drifted across her consciousness. She felt towards him as if she were dead, as if she were a disembodied indulgent ghost, and in the light of this mood even those great boots of his, smelling of heifer dung, seemed harmless, pardonable, almost pathetic!

And there was more in it than that, for the feeling she experienced had something to do with those familiar cries of 'Ech–o! Ech–o!' that so monotonously and magically kept reaching her ears from the end of the street. That reiterated cry became the voice of something in this Dorchester life of hers that was just out of reach of her comprehension! It came to her like a voice that might reach the ears of a little girl in bed in a familiar nursery, not the voice of her nurse, not even the voice of her mother, but a strangely multiform voice, the voice of all the moments amid her fairy-tales and playthings that made her feel safe, made her feel as if the very wing of her guardian-angel brushed her cheek!

And the odd thing to Wizzie just then was that this unearthly reassurance borne to her on the cry 'Ech–o! Ech–o!' did not destroy a fantastic feeling she had of there being four of them in that tense vigil! This other one, this mysterious fourth, was not exactly what her old convent lessons would have named 'the Son of Man', but it had this in common with that wayfarer on our difficult road: that its substance was wrought of suffering, but of suffering with a background of indescribable peace. This fourth person of their vigil was in fact nothing less than Claudius's pain.

The man's pain — as first one candle and then the other guttered down and was extinguished — became to her a living presence in the fire-light. It was actually there among them, waiting in silence just as she and D. were waiting while the fatal tide flowed past them! It had no form or comeliness, this pain-presence, by which it could be palpably felt, and yet it was the opposite of an evil thing, as it shared their silence.

Had it created itself out of those words of Claudius to No-man about something in humanity which needed not to feel superior or to seek solitude, something that underlay, like a dim rich note transcending all differences, the human passions of our life? Whatever it was, it entered strangely into the girl's mood. It entered into her childish feeling of safety; it entered into her indulgence towards D. It was as if Claudius himself, in his struggle with what he had told them he could cope with all right, had fed this pain-presence from his own life-fount, had externalized the power of his soul in it, so that now it was not just the pain of Claudius, nor just the soul of Claudius, that hovered there between her and his pillow but a presence composed of them both.

How long they waited like this the girl could not have told. It seemed to her afterwards, judged by the sinking of the fire, to have been a good deal more than an hour. At any rate it was her practical sense that the fire must not be allowed to go out that brought that curious vigil to an end.

But she had no sooner got up and lit the kitchen lamp, and brought in a couple of fresh candles along with the coal, than No-man scrambled to his feet. ‘There are people stopping — outside!’ he said. ‘I believe they’re—’ He was interrupted by a sharp knock at the house-door.

‘Are — you — sure — it’s this house?’ murmured Wizzie, turning round as she lit the candles. ‘It may be ours!’

But a repetition of the knocking made her open the door into the passageway and stand listening. ‘It is this door,’ she cried. ‘I must go and see!’

So remote from everything outside that fire-lit room had her mind been that it gave her an almost painful shock, like being suddenly roused from a deep sleep, when she opened the door.

‘I’ve come to see Mr Roger Cask,’ said one of the three figures standing outside. ‘I’m the district—’ But another of the figures, that of a man, came forward, and it did not lessen Wizzie’s feeling of dazed confusion when she saw it was old Teucer Wye.

‘I — was — in — town’, stuttered the old man, ‘and — I — thought I’d just ask how our friend — was — but if—’

‘Oh, no! Come in, Mr Wye!’ cried Wizzie. ‘Come in, Nurse!’ And she stared almost impolitely — so dazed she felt — at the third of the visitors. This was a tall, excessively plain woman, with a big nose surmounted by glasses, and with something queer — at least so it seemed to Wizzie in that faint light — about her chin.

‘Constancia,’ said the nurse abruptly, turning to this person with the vague intention of introducing her, ‘this is, I feel sure, Miss Ravelston, from next door, who’s been so kind to our patient. This is Miss Ferneau, Miss

Ravelston, who's come to look after Mr Cask. They are, I believe, well-acquainted already, but I think Miss Ferneau will keep him in order. You will keep him in order, won't you, Constancia?'

Wizzie kept smiling and nodding in complete bewilderment while all this went on, and then, drawing back against the wide-open door, she made way for Constancia and the nurse to enter the narrow passage.

'Won't you come in, Mr Wye?'

'No, no — whew! — no; no, my dear Miss — no, I won't come in. But you'll tell him I called? That's the chief thing, that he should know I called! Oh, no! I wouldn't disturb anyone now. Besides' — and he pulled Wizzie towards him while the nurse took Constancia into Claudius's room— 'what I've really come to do is to tell my girl Jenny that she must make it up with our friend now that he's so ill. I've been thinking what to say for a whole week; and I've got the passages marked' — here he tapped his pocket— 'that will settle it! I'm going to speak plain to her, Miss Ravelston. It's all here — and here.' And this time he tapped — though this second fountain of justice received but a feeble flick in comparison with the other — his forehead as well as his pocket.

'We'll come with you, Mr Wye — one minute!' And she called down the passage: 'D.! D.! D.!' For she said to herself, 'He'll stay there, the stupid, while the nurse is taking — But I'm glad she's brought that woman for the night. He won't think she'll carry him off to the hospital! I only hope she won't forget — but the nurse must have told her—'

'Yes, come along, D.! Here's Mr Wye come to make Jenny behave; and he wants us to hear what he'll say!'

This last remark of hers caused the old Platonist to shuffle with his feet for pride and joy. Wizzie could see how it pleased him by the way he fidgeted while he shook No-man's hand. He evidently could not wait to unburden himself of his week’s meditations, while the presence of these two witnesses made him feel as if Friary Lane did after all possess some resemblance to Athens.

Their knocking soon brought the not entirely unprepared Jenny to her door, and they all went straight into her kitchen, where Lovie, sitting in solitary state on a high chair, was having her tea.

Lovie put down her mug and held out her hands with such joy to greet No-man that Wizzie felt a momentary pang; but her spasm of jealousy was speedily forgotten in her intense curiosity, and, to confess the truth, in a malicious hope against hope concerning the plain words her friend was to hear.

Wizzie had always disliked old Teucer Wye. She completely understood the way he got upon his younger daughter’s nerves. But her recent vigil with Claudius made her feel so indignant with Jenny that she prayed to God this horrid little man would make her sit up and would say things to her that neither D. nor herself had dared to say. ‘But he won’t,’ she thought. ‘He’s one of these dreary talkers, and he’ll go on and on; and he’ll read his lesson-books to her; and Jenny will simply smile at me!’

But Wizzie soon discovered, to her delight, that she was completely wrong. In her ignorance of the ways of idealists — for neither in convent nor in circus had she met such people — she did not allow for the astonishing lapses into gross realism, into shocking materialism, that seem Nature’s revenge upon these rebels against her delicate adjustments. But this gap in our friend’s knowledge of life was destined now, in Mrs Dearth’s kitchen, to be amply filled.

The scene soon became, indeed, one of those intense domestic dramas that a wayward imagination, pondering sardonically on the lit windows of a human dwelling, so often conjures up.

Jenny’s kitchen was certainly not a luxurious one. It might indeed have been called austere. But it was scrupulously clean; and in addition to a wooden settle near the stove, a place of refuge into which No-man hastened to retreat when the storm began, there were several plain kitchen chairs arranged round the walls. On the shelf above the stove, which was a regular cooking-stove, stood a round metal clock with a broken alarum, and above this was a tiny miniature of Mrs Teucer Wye, representing a fragile girl’s face, more like Thuella’s than Jenny’s, but showing, too, a certain pathetic wistfulness suggestive of their guileless brother.

Wizzie waited till the riotous greeting between No-man and Lovie was over, and then, drawing up a chair near the child’s table, began encouraging her to get on with her meal.

But the ex-professor refused to sit down, while Mrs Dearth, after refilling Lovie’s mug, and catching the ominous trend of her father’s harangue, stood erect and defiant on the side of the stove opposite to the one where No-man had taken refuge.

‘It’s a disgrace to me as your father, and to your mother who brought you up!’ cried the old gentleman, not so much tapping as thumping the books in his pockets. ‘Do you know what I saw just now? And Miss Ravelston can bear me out.’ Here Wizzie bent low over Lovie’s bowl of bread and milk. ‘I saw some terrible person brought in by the nurse to spend the night with that poor fellow! And here are you, to all intents and purposes his wife — yes! I repeat it, his wife — refusing to lift a finger to help! Why, the man may die. I didn’t see him, but I saw enough. The man may die tonight, with no one with him but the awful individual I saw just now. It’s not my affair, you say? God help you, woman, it’s everyone’s affair! All the town knows of it — he so ill in there, and you—’

He stopped for breath, but Wizzie noticed that on this occasion — in his role of a father rebuking his favourite daughter — he kept unusual control over himself and showed no sign of hysterical weakness. He never once whistled through his gums, and after that first thump at his side he never, till the end, so much as touched his pockets.

'We're all friends here', he continued, advancing to the table and resting his hand on its edge, while Lovie, pushing her mother's fingers away, dropped her spoon and stared at him with fascinated wonder, 'and so I can speak plainly to you, my girl. The truth is — you've never grown up! You're behaving like a woman who's never lived with a man. It's — yes, I've made up my mind to say it and I will say it. You've grown into an unnatural old maid, Jenny, and it's because of that, because of your not living with him as a woman ought to live with an honest man who loves her, that you can keep up a silly quarrel with him like this! I begin to think that it was this old-maidishness of yours, and not your wild notions of women's rights, that drove Tom Dearth away. You're a bigoted old maid, Jenny — that's what you are, and I'm ashamed of you! I've been thinking of this all the week. It's because you've not lived with Cask as a woman should, I tell you, that you are acting in this obstinate, wicked way. You're only half a woman. If you'd—' Here he did give a glance round him and pull himself up. 'If you'd gone to bed with the man, Jenny, this old-maidish silliness would never have—'

But Mrs Dearth had leapt forward with her hands clenched. 'Father!' she cried; and the extremity of her indignation so scared the child at the table that she began to cry and hid her face against Wizzie's shoulder. 'How can you, how dare you, say these things to me? Isn't it you who've always told me, since I was her age' — and she pointed at the sobbing Lovie— 'that real love has no need of — of what you're talking about? Isn't it you who've always said that when two people love — oh, it's too much, it's too much, for you to turn against me. I've expected it from the rest — yes! and I've had it too, all these cruel months, from those nearest to me.' And she swept her blazing eyes across Wizzie's averted face. 'But that you, you from whom I've learnt what real, pure, spiritual love is, should now—' And she pressed her clenched fists against her mouth, while her bosom heaved with deep dry sobs.

'I — tell — you — you unhappy girl,' brought out the little man, taking his hand from the table and raising himself automatically on his toes, 'I tell you, you've misunderstood me all along — like everybody else. What I say is that we must free our souls from all these material things. While we're on earth our bodies must have their natural satisfaction, but this doesn't touch the soul. It's nothing to the soul. The soul has no part in it. We're only here, imprisoned in matter, so that our souls should learn how to be free. You do the senses too much honour, you think too much about them, when you deny them like this. The soul should be indifferent, aloof, free of the whole business! When you play the angry virgin with this good man, you're not making less of your miserable senses, you're making more! Go to bed with him, girl, in this little house, in this little lane, but let your soul rise to the eternal, rise to the—'

But Jenny suddenly snatched her fists from her mouth — and Wizzie saw she had pressed them there so savagely that there was blood on her lips — and coming straight up to her father, hissed out at him in a low terrible voice that made even D. draw up his muddy feet beneath his seat, 'If you mean what you say, Father, throw those books of yours into my stove!'

At first the old gentleman, as he sank back on his heels and withdrew a step or two from her, could only whistle through his gums in the old familiar way. Then, as Wizzie stared in wonder at what she could see, half-hidden by Jenny’s shoulder, of the man’s face, she saw an extraordinary change pass over it and a look come into it as if of another Teucer Wye, a Teucer Wye who had no daughter at all, a Teucer Wye who had never been a professor in a small Midland college, a Teucer Wye who did not know whether Glymes or Friary Lane, whether Dorchester or Athens, was his abiding-place, a Teucer Wye who had — and yet had not — slept with the woman who gazed down on them out of that little picture. And it was while this other Teucer Wye, now looking forth from his face, gave a completely different air to his high forehead, to his toothless mouth, to his diminutive frame, that the man drew from his side-pockets both of his old school-texts and, pushing his daughter aside, went straight up to her stove and moved away the kettle from the fiery-red opening.

Human gestures between four walls have the peculiarity sometimes of gathering to themselves such intense emotional magnetism that they are palpably felt, like the reaction to a physical shock, not only by the persons concerned but by alien persons and, it may chance, also by foreign substances. It was certain, at any rate, that Wizzie felt compelled to rise to her feet and move forward towards the man as he held those books. It was plain to her that No-man too was driven by the same psychic force to do the same thing. As for little Lovie, she managed to scramble down unaided from her high chair to the floor, where Jenny, not knowing in the least what she was doing, untied and took off the child’s bib.

But not only have these tense moments within human walls and under human ceilings the power of generating palpable electric force, they seem also to have the power of retarding the movement of time. Anyway, what Wizzie felt, though she couldn’t have put it into words, was a sensation as if the whole of Jenny’s kitchen — with all four of them standing there, staring and petrified — had been lowered by some eternal hand into a timeless vacuum. Her legs began to feel ice-cold, as if the passage from time to timelessness meant the ebbing away of all bodily warmth. It was as if the little man's overpowering emotion generated a shock upon the surrounding atmosphere so great that an actual displacement of electric particles occurred that not only created the sensation of cold but left a permanent impression upon that particular spot, to which sensitive or psychic natures long afterwards might respond.

It is perhaps fortunate, therefore, that both Jenny's and Claudius's houses have long since been pulled down, and that where old Teucer Wye on this October evening moved his daughter's kettle to expose the red-hot interior of her stove, the sparrows from the cheerful tap-yard of the King's Arms can hop in peace among nothing more ghostly than a few weather-beaten flagstones.

When it became clear, even to Lovie's mind, that this neatly attired little man with the well-brushed hair actually intended to throw into that fiery furnace what was more precious to him than food or drink or human affection, the little girl rushed up to him screaming, 'Not put books in fire! Not put nothing in fire!' and began tugging at his coat.

The transfigured expression on his countenance had been until then concealed from Jenny herself, but when he turned now with the books in his hands and faced her, it became clear to all of them that she suddenly began to tremble.

'It's a bargain, Jenny,' he said solemnly; and Wizzie was struck by the quiet, self-controlled tone in which he spoke. 'Give yourself to your man; throw this cruel virginity of yours into the fire, and I'll throw these books, which are my life, into your stove! Will you do it, Jenny, my girl? The word was yours. It was you who said, "Throw your books, your life, into my fire." I'm serious, my child. This is a — a covenant between us. You've always been my dearest. You know that. And now I'm giving my best for you, more than my best! Shall we take' — he spoke almost exultingly at that moment— 'the "Sortes Platonicae"? Shall we see what they say before they die? Mark you, my girl. This isn't only your father's sacrifice speaking, this is your proud virginity speaking — before we give them both to the fire!'

Little Lovie, with a face blubbered with tears, stopped pulling at his coat. Wizzie could see that the child thought the man was going to read a story from the pretty books instead of throwing them into the flames.

'O beloved Pan,' the old man translated, in a low intense voice, 'and all ye other gods of this place, grant to me that I' — here he paused and looked straight at Mrs Dearth, who was trembling violently from head to foot while her fingers plucked at the fastening of her black blouse— 'and my dear daughter here, may be made beautiful in our souls within!'

Wizzie, who was watching him intently, saw him fumble perceptibly with the second little book. 'If he waits a second longer', she thought, 'he won't do it!'

But Teucer Wye did not wait. Mumbling something that the girl couldn't catch, he rushed to the stove, flung both volumes into its fiery heart, and clamped the kettle over the opening.

There was a deep hush in that kitchen then; and for an instant even Lovie held her breath. But she only held it, as children do, before a passionate burst of sobbing; and, when this came at last, she ran not to Wizzie but to Mrs Dearth, and buried her face in the woman's dress.

'In our souls within!' repeated Teucer Wye in a whisper that was scarcely audible above the child's desperate sobbing; and touching lightly with his lips his daughter's head, which was bent low down over the clinging child, he picked up his hat — he hadn’t taken off his overcoat — made two formal little bows, one to Wizzie and one to No-man, and hurried out of the room.

Wizzie remained staring at the door he had closed behind him till the sound of the street door opening and shutting released the tension. Then she and No-man exchanged a long wordless look.

It was not till much later, not indeed till they were both of them in bed in their upper room, with the fire-light flickering reassuringly over its familiar furniture, making the girl among the water-lilies blush rosy-red and Thuella’s picture of her father look forth with the lineaments of Pico della Mirandola, that they expressed their impressions of that scene in the kitchen.

‘Do you think it will make any difference?’ murmured No-man, taking advantage of the chance that so pregnant a question gave him to slip his arm beneath her supine form.

‘How can I tell? — Don’t, D.! — She only talked about Lovie afterwards when I was helping her wash up. She’s got awfully fond of Lovie, D. If anything happened to — to me, I think she’d be almost glad.’

‘Don’t ‘ee say such things, my treasure.’

‘But she would! I know she would. At first she made — you remember? — all that fuss over me. But it’s Lovie now. He said she was an old maid; but I think she’d like to have a lot of children. She’s lonely; that’s what it is.’

‘Maybe she’ll come back to him now, and then perhaps—’

He chuckled. ‘Oh, it all depends — How unkind you are to me, Wizz! — Certainly till forty, and over that, too! She’s some years off forty yet.’

There was silence for a time between them, Wizzie meditating on the subject of women with forty in sight, and No-man trying to get the feeling that he was caressing her out of the bare fact of their inevitable contact as they lay side by side.

Then Wizzie said, ‘I didn’t much like the look of that woman the nurse brought. Do you think she’s sitting up with him? I don’t know if anyone told her about the mattress upstairs. I told the nurse. Well! he won’t be frightened about the hospital anyway! That’s one good thing.’

She paused, and it now came over her that she had heard D. greet the woman when the nurse took her in, as if he knew her. ‘Yes,’ he returned, when she brought this up. ‘And do you know when I saw her, little Wizz? On that first night, when you’d gone upstairs and I was down there with old Claudius! I almost hugged her when I saw her just now, for it brought it all back!’

Encouraged by these amorous memories, he once more tried to make love to her, and for a while, with her thoughts on this unknown woman, she made no resistance. But soon her brain, suddenly recalling one of her worst recent grievances, sent drastic orders to her obedient body to stiffen itself in frozen distaste. The luckless No-man, being neither a sadist nor an impassioned ravisher, experienced a more unpleasant shock than usual from this frosty rebuff. As a general thing, when once Wizzie was caught in a docile mood the worst she did was to fall asleep, and she had heard him explain a thousand times all the delicious sensations he got under those conditions. ‘A person would think’, she was accustomed to retort, ‘that you’d like anyone best if they were dead.’ And No-man would then launch into a passionate eulogy of the charm of girls asleep, declaring that some wondrous essence of desirability only came into being at such times when the brain ceased its normal functioning.

What she felt now, as, with her frosty distaste stretched out between them like a sword moulded of a solid icicle, they lay watching the flickering features of Mr Wye appearing and disappearing above the foot of their bed, was that a man who wouldn't confide in his girl about a woman who had died ten years ago was certainly a man who preferred them not only asleep but dead. He was the same in everything, she said to herself. Nothing as it really was had the least interest for him. Things had to be pushed back, like those unintelligible pictures Thel painted, before he seemed even to see them! He liked the whole of his life to be something in a mirror. That was what made her so furious, that she, Wizzie Ravelston, to whom life had been so appallingly solid and real, had to live in a damned second-hand mirror, if she lived with him at all. And why should she live in someone else's mirror? 'Because of love!' people would tell her. But this word 'love' struck her just then as a devilish trick, invented by the most selfish people in the world!

What was he thinking about now? He hadn't said a word since she rebuffed his love-making. Well! Popsy had often told her that nothing made men feel so humiliated and ashamed as stopping them suddenly like that; but what could you do? Her body was her own, not his, though he did like to tell himself he'd bought her from Old Funky.

It was at this point that Wizzie's drastic meditations carried her so far that they drew from her a faint smile. She thought how little this coldness of hers would have stopped Old Funky, had that unscrupulous rogue been at her side now instead of D.

It is a sad commentary on the maladjustments of sex that neither Wizzie nor No-man had ever had the experience of mutual sense-satisfaction. He had come nearest to it in his perverse relations with Thuella, but, after the Scummy Pond incident, he had successfully resisted this weakness.

His protracted silence now — for she could tell by his breathing, and by the way he lay so flat on his back, that he wasn't asleep — did begin to make her feel a little remorseful. She was, after all, an extremely normal and natural girl, and, deep down below these reasonable thoughts of hers about her body being her own, a blind, atavistic, feminine instinct began to heave up within her, an instinct old as the human race, and possibly far older; and a strange beyond-good, beyond-evil conscience within that instinct began to assert its authority, the immemorial conscience, one might say, of the feminine organism in itself, totally outside the working of any individual girl's indignant brain, the primeval conscience of the eternal feminine in matter as it yields to the embrace of the spirit.

But though this mysterious and irrational conscience in the depths of her being caused her to feel remorse with regard to the humiliated male by her side, the brain of Miss Ravelston, the angry mother of Lovie, brought at once to the surface her most romantic grievance in order to suppress this voice from the deep.

'Listen, D.!' she said, and the syllables of her voice made their own invisible vibration on that dim fire-lit air, a vibration which neither flickered nor wavered with the motion of the fire-light across the picture of Mr Wye, a vibration which, according to rigorous laws of atomic acoustics, must have passed in its entirety out of the inch or so of open window and floated away over the silent roofs of Dorchester into incredible gulfs of space. 'I don't see how you could have written your wife's name that day without knowing you did it, if you're not always thinking about her.'

'Good Lord, kid! Have we gone back to that? I tell you I didn't write it! Can't you take a plain answer? I don't know, any more than you do, how it got there.'

'I suppose you want me to believe she wrote it — after being dead for ten years!'

He was silent; and she went on. ‘Grummer used to tell of a man she knew whose dead wife never left his girl a moment’s peace. She said that in the night—’

‘Now that’s enough, Wizz! If you won’t let me touch you, you needn’t start — But you’re only saying it to tease. You know you’re not really jealous of — of those days.’

‘Who wrote it, then, on that bit of paper, and why did you tear it up so quickly?’

He made no reply to this. ‘And what’s more,’ she went on, ‘you went back there next morning to pick up those bits of paper!’

‘Wizzie!’

She certainly had roused him now, for he raised his head from the pillow and glanced at the window, where the string of the blind was making a faint tapping as the wind blew. But he sank down again with a sigh; and again there was silence in that upper front room of Friary Lane.

‘I know what you’re thinking now, D.’

‘You’re thinking, like you always say, about two skeletons lying side by side on the surface of the earth, and neither knowing a thing of what’s in the other’s head.’

‘I’m thinking of something much more to the point than that, though it proves it about our two skulls. Do you know, Wizz, I saw him today on High East Street.’

It was Wizzie’s turn to be startled now; and she did more than just lift her head from the pillow. She sat straight up in the bed.

‘My dear child’ — and he pulled the clothes round his exposed shoulder — ‘what time have I had for telling you anything? Besides, I thought we’d enjoy ourselves a little first, before we—'

'Enjoy ourselves!' She couldn't help throwing into this bitter exclamation all the complicated trouble his news brought her. She felt overpowered by a great wave of self-pity. Wasn't it just like her fate to have him reappearing, on the top of everything?

'Is the circus here?'

'I've no idea. I haven't been that way for weeks. I suppose it is, or he wouldn't be in town.'

'You don't think he's up to something new, D. wanting more money or anything?'

'Oh, I don't suppose so. Just wandering about, looking at the shops. He didn't see me. At least he pretended not to.'

'What'll you do if he speaks to you?'

'Well, find out what he wants, I suppose.'

'Yes! That's just what you would do! Talk to him till he finds out everything! I suppose you'd bring him in here to see Lovie if he asked you to?'

No-man was silent. With a feeling of absolute hopelessness she sank down again on her pillow, and, pulling the bed-clothes with a vicious twitch to her side of the bed, turned her back to her companion.

'He doesn't care what I feel,' she thought, 'any more than Old Funky does!' And she made, as she curled up on the extreme edge of the bed, with her knees almost touching her bosom — reverting, in fact, to the position in which she had lain before she was born — a vow that that very next day she would go out to Glymes and pour out all her troubles to Urien. 'Ordinary men don't understand women,' she said to herself, 'but he may, if only he lets me talk to him. But it'll be the same as it always is! He'll get Nance to fetch Thel from next door, and Thel will act silly and make a fuss of me like she always does, and he'll just sit and stare at us.'

Here Wizzie gave vent to a heavy sigh, in which she deliberately indulged her self-pity, letting it go to the uttermost reach of all that a sigh — that prelude of our last breath — can express of human misery.

It is doubtful, however, if she would have allowed quite so deep a wafture of lamentation to have passed her lips had she been alone. Like Lovie in her own presence, she found that the fact of D.'s being there caused her to exaggerate her woe — a woe for which she held him so greatly responsible — as if, by the mere act of compelling him to share it and endure its misery with her, she was enabled to revenge herself upon him. It had the further advantage of making it hard for him, without feeling a callous brute, which she knew from experience he hated feeling, to slide off to sleep in the way he usually did when she had rebuffed his love-making.

'Two skeletons?' she thought bitterly, recalling the way he loved to philosophize about a man and a woman lying side by side. 'Why, D.'s not human enough to be even a skeleton! There's nothing human about him. No wonder he prefers thorn-stumps and cow-dung to his life with me. No wonder he sneaks off to his attic and never lets me go near it. He's much happier with those bed-post monsters of his than with a natural girl.'

So thought Wizzie, hugging her rounded knees on the extreme edge of the bed; nor did the other skeleton make any attempt to disturb her, but over them both as they lay there — and it was not long before they were asleep — the wind began to shift, blowing now from south-south-west, straight across Maiden Castle from Chesil; and, as its palpable but invisible form swept inland from the beach across the earthworks, there adhered to the substance of its presence particles and flakes, atoms and motes, gathered up from the surface of that huge parapet of pebbles and from the heaps of stranded seaweed left to perish there between its shelving ridges.

These particles and flakes, sea-soaked, sea-perforated, sea-born, sea-bitten, became now as much part and parcel of the pressure of the life-mystery in Durnovaria as was the steady breathing of Miss Ravelston or as were the intermittent heavings and spasmodic jerks with which the muscles and nerves of D. No-man recovered their equilibrium after the excitement of the day.

And since what exists in the macrocosm exists also in the microcosm, it may well be that these journeying sea-particles, carried on the wind, exercised upon these two sleeping forms the same sort of influence that the sea itself exercises on conscious minds, blighting and sterilizing in one sense, curing and restoring in another.

Over many another male and female pair, in its air-voyage from the Atlantic, must that south-west wind have blown, carrying the same influence of the salt sea, rousing far-off atavistic responses, making appeals where there could be no response, over furred couples, over feathered couples, under straw, under rustling leaves, under waving grasses, till it came to these two beneath their bed-clothes.

Its effect upon the inanimate things it passed that night, we are forced in our ignorance to regard as nil: Hardy’s bronze image unaffected, the brewery chimney unaffected, the bones of Mona and Cornelia unaffected. But that (before the dawn came, at the hour when the magnetic pull of the solid earth is faintest, at the hour when all living things seem loosening their hold on the elements that sustain them) the sea wind found Wizzie’s warm body in a yielding mood — not only allowing but encouraging No-man’s caresses while neither of them was fully awake — may well have had to do with those salt-tasting atoms and the unbridled restlessness of the earth's great lover.

This salt wind from Chesil Beach must have numbed and atrophied all those touchy centres of egotism in our friends wherewith their personal minds spoilt their impersonal sensations; but when the interlude was over, and the depersonalized Wizzie, with hot cheeks and glowing limbs, had become the personal Wizzie, with tantalized nerves and unsatisfied feelings, the wind dropped, and a pallid light — a light that was neither grey nor blue nor white nor yellow, the nameless light of the first vibration of dawn that can only be described as a thinning of the thick rotundity of darkness — drew the girl's wide-opened eyes towards it in impatient longing for the day.

No-man, however, who had never been as fully awake as she, fell fast asleep now, and the girl was left to watch as calmly as she could the vast process of the earth's illumination. This huge creative act, in its detachment from all human troubles and in the implacable persistence of its cosmic cheerfulness, was far less sympathetic to her grievances and her fears than would have been the corresponding twilight of nightfall. But sympathetic or not, she had no wish just then to dwell upon it at all.

Wizzie was not of an introspective nature, nor was she the kind of person to be vividly conscious of the non-human background of our life; and although, if left to herself, she couldn't be accused — few intelligent women can — of being totally blind to these recurrent phenomena, there were especial reasons why she instinctively encouraged her insensitiveness. The truth was that No-man's attitude to these cosmic processes irritated her to such a tune that she had come to take a kind of wilful pleasure in suppressing even such natural reactions to such things as she did feel. Quite recently, for instance, on her way to Glymes, a cloud of midges, brought to life by the sun and hovering over some ditch-bank, had been blown against her face, rousing in her mind that feeling of poignance that the contrast between a girl's life and the life of a midge naturally suggested, but she had remembered D. and the fuss he made about such matters, and had flung the thought away.

If, therefore, it had entered her head, as she stared at the slowly undarkening window across the humped-up bed-clothes that were D.'s sleep-mound, to try and sink her worries in the supreme miracle of planetary life, she would have hurriedly suppressed such a thought, purely because the mere fact of indulging it would have made her feel that she resembled the man at her side.

She was not left long, however, to the risk of having to restrain any planetary emotion she might feel, for the dawn had not advanced very far before her nervously acute sense of hearing became aware of a distinct series of very human sounds in Jenny Dearth's bedroom. Jenny was certainly up and dressing herself!

Her first thought was of Lovie. It was Jenny who had begged her, very soon after they first had Lovie with them, to move the child's cot into her room. As a rule Lovie was the first in that Friary Lane house to salute the sun; but, closely as Wizzie listened now, she could not hear a sound from her daughter — nothing but the creaking of the boards and an occasional contact of glass with china that showed that Jenny was making her toilet.

What was the woman up to, getting out of bed before it was light, before Lovie had lifted her voice, before a single sparrow had chirped? Intently did Wizzie listen, and as she listened she wondered more and more. Yes! Jenny was certainly dressing, and dressing too — that her feminine eavesdropper detected from all sorts of subtle indications — with unusual nicety and care! Could it be that after sleepless hours spent in pondering on her father's gross and violent words she had decided to give up her nonsense and live with Claudius as his wife?

No sooner had this idea entered her head than she felt sure it was the true explanation of this early rising. Jenny was going to be on the watch, and the moment that woman went off duty she was going to take her place. Wizzie lay down again. If Jenny were going to wait till that woman went away, she might have to wait till breakfast-time, till the time the nurse came.

But she jumped up now, quivering and tense with electric energy, for she heard Jenny's door softly open and shut, and then the stairs creaked under the woman's tread as she went down. Wizzie didn't hesitate a second. She slipped out of bed, snatched up the first garment that presented itself in the dim light, which turned out to be her own skirt, and with this clutched like a shawl round her shoulders, and with her bare feet emerging from her long old-fashioned night-gown, she opened the door without making a sound, left it ajar for her return, and tip-toed half-way downstairs.

Here she paused and leaned over the banister. Yes! Jenny was in her kitchen now. She could tell exactly what she was doing. She was poking the coals, which, as Wizzie knew, were almost always still red in the morning, and throwing in certain bits of stick that it was her custom to keep all night close to the stove so that they might be especially dry when she came down.

Wizzie stretched as far as she could over the banister rail and listened motionless. She kept well on the 'qui vive', however, so that the moment Jenny emerged from the kitchen she could be upstairs in a flash and back in her room, but she gave herself up to this eavesdropping with unmixed delight. If there was an element of malice in it, after the long vexation of Jenny's wilfulness, there was much more of excited sympathy for a woman's defiance of her own pride and prudery.

‘She’s not going to wait any longer,’ Wizzie thought. And she could feel through the pit of her own stomach, that was now pressed tightly against the stair-rail, something of the wild beating of Jenny’s heart and Jenny’s pulses. Her instinct, which was almost telepathic, justified itself up to the hilt. She heard Jenny fill the kettle from the tap. She heard the unmistakable sound of iron on iron as the woman placed it over the orifice of the stove. Then she heard a sound that caused a smile to cross her face and made her close her fingers still more tightly on the banister, for it was the sound of the tinkle of a wine-glass against a salt-cellar. Now these objects always stood in front of a little round mirror, the shaving-mirror that had belonged to the vanished Tom; and to Wizzie, who knew by this time all the domestic recurrences in her friend’s house, this sound meant one thing and one only, namely that Jenny Dearth was surveying her own appearance in the glass.

‘She’s going to him! She’s going to him!’ the girl thought, and, drawing back from the banister, she flattened herself against the wall and waited in breathless excitement. Yes! Apparently satisfied with the way she looked, Jenny now hurried with hasty steps to the entrance of the little back-yard that connected the two houses. A breath of chilly air struck Wizzie’s thinly clad figure as this door opened, letting her friend out; but heedless of this discomfort she hurried downstairs and, rushing into the dining-room, stationed herself at the window.

‘If she’s going to stay with him,’ she thought, ‘she’ll bundle that woman into the street in no time.’ She waited for three — four — eight minutes without anything happening. Then she heard the Guildhall clock strike half past something. But it was still dim outside, and the light in the King’s Arms tap-yard was still burning. How slowly the day came, in this part of the town! It used to come much more quickly in the old Fairfield.

Oh, how cold her bare legs had begun to feel, and her feet were icy, but a desperate obstinacy kept her there, and something else too, something that she would have found it impossible to explain to anyone. For, as she stood clutching the curtain and staring across the narrow street at the stable window opposite, through which she could see a lantern moving about that every now and then threw into distinction a bundle of loose hay that was pressing against the pane, her sympathy with what she imagined going on became almost morbid.

'She's giving herself to Claudius!' she thought. 'She couldn't wait till he's well, and he'll be in a fever to respond. That crazy old man was right, and none of us thought of it. I was a fool not to think of it, and so was D.! Tom must have left her because all that suffrage talk on the top of her prudery was too much for him. And old Claudius must have been too tender and gentle, too. I suppose a woman's resistance is harder for a man to deal with than a girl's. I suppose if I'd been as old as Jenny — but then I'd never have had Lovie! Will Jenny have—'

But at this point her sympathy with Jenny's happiness transformed itself into a terrible craving for her circus life! To be on her old horse's back; to feel the tingling rapture of those balancings and leapings, those plunges and summersaults; to hear the cries — Oh, how often she had suffered from bitter cold just like this while awaiting her turn in the tent! As she hugged her skirt round her shoulders, and even went so far as to snatch up one of Jenny's woollen antimacassars and twist it round her waist, she noticed once more that moving lantern throwing a light on the wisp of hay that pressed against the stable window, and she made up her mind that come what might she would leave both Lovie and D. and go back to her work.

But she was out into the hallway again now, for she had heard a sound upstairs. Yes! it was Lovie talking to herself, but apparently quite happily. 'I declare,' thought Lovie's mother, as she began to ascend the stairs, 'that kid would be happy if it never saw a soul except when it was hungry. I — don't — believe — she'll — miss — me — one — bit!'

Each of these monosyllables was punctuated by the imprint of a bare foot on the staircase carpet, but, in spite of their consolatory implication in the face of her recent resolve, it was with some degree of peevishness that, after wrapping Jenny's bed-clothes round her and sitting down on the edge of the bed near Lovie's cot, she endeavoured to recall the child's absorbed imagination from Gwendolly's successor to herself.

Lovie's new 'Lovie' was a real doll, chosen for her by No-man with infinite care through at least half-a-dozen shops in Dorchester. She was a young doll — let us say a year old — but, having been made in the fatherland of dolls, her blue eyes and pouting lips possessed that fairy-like beauty which few English doll-makers seem able to capture.

Every morning — about the time when the first cawing of the rooks was to be heard as they flew from the elms in Frome House garden to the elms in Acland House garden — Mrs Dearth had to get out of bed to put on to the child a little woollen jacket, too thick for her to sleep in but indispensable when she sat up with 'Popsy'. It was to Popsy that she was talking now, to Popsy that she'd been talking ever since Aunt Jenny had slipped the jacket over her sleepy head.

'Mummy's cold,' said Wizzie, trying to appeal to the little girl's sympathy. 'Mummy didn't want to disturb D. so she came to see if her pretty one was all right.'

'Popsy isn't cold.'

'I should think not, with half your jacket twisted round her! You and Popsy can't wear the same clothes at the same time. There — there — that's enough clothing for a doll. Dolls aren't—'

'You've got Aunt Jenny's things on. Y*ou've* got D.'s money. You took Old Funk's life and joy away!'

'What's that?' Wizzie jumped up from the bed and, bending over the little girl, seized her by the shoulders. This she did in such a rush of agitation that Popsy, who in her turn had been seized by her parent, uttered, under pressure of the child's fingers, a squeak like that of a new-born shrew-mouse and fell on the floor, where she lay with her eyes closed and her arms extended. 'When have you seen him? Tell me now! Tell me everything.'

'When did Old Funky speak to you, Lovie? Yesterday? Remember, now!'

But Lovie's head, in spite of the hands on her shoulders, was hanging over the edge of the cot, uttering consoling words to the fallen doll.

Something might easily just then have passed between these two feminine authorities at which even Popsy, behind her diplomatically closed eyelids, might have felt surprise, had not there come through Jenny's open window the distinct sound of a sharply closed street door. Leaving the child's cot, Wizzie flew to the window just in time to see, in the now quite transparent morning light, the upright form of Miss Ferneau making its dignified and unhurried retreat down the hill towards the coal-yard.

'Is she furious? Was there a scene? Did Jenny turn her out?' These were questions that so absorbed the interest of our friend that when Miss Ferneau had vanished from her sight she picked up Popsy with her own hand and returned her to her offspring, merely remarking as she left the room, 'If you can't remember who you meet when you're out, we'll see if D. can!'

It was after ten before Wizzie was ready to set off for Glymes. Her resolution to get a glimpse of Urien that morning was finally sealed during a bitter quarrel with No-man over his allowing Old Funky to speak to his child. It had for some months been D.'s custom to take the child, without her perambulator, for little strolls down the street; but what especially hurt Wizzie's feelings in this case was that in mentioning the old man's presence in the town he had concealed the fact that he had a definite encounter with him. What had he actually said to the little girl? D. had got sulky under her anger, and would neither deny nor admit that the man had used the startling expression repeated so emphatically by Lovie. Their quarrel had ended by No-man's going off in silence to High East Street, while she herself, in Jenny's continued absence, had had to get her own and Lovie's breakfast in the deserted kitchen.

This task accomplished, she settled the child on the kitchen rug, with the table between her and the stove; and, before leaving her there, she forced herself — though her head was throbbing with a whirl of conflicting emotions — to display a lively interest in Popsy's being put to bed in a miniature Great Western truck. She soon realized, however, that Lovie was shrewd enough to divine something of the tragic tension of her mood; and every now and then, in the midst of their attendance on Popsy's siesta, she caught a pair of serious eyes fixed furtively on her face.

She got away at last; but she couldn't leave the child without telling Jenny that she was alone, and so after running upstairs to dress for going out, and after a final glance into the kitchen, she decided to visit the other house before setting forth.

Poor little Wizzie! For all her bitter experiences of what life can do to a spirited girl, she was not such an egoist as to find it altogether easy, on this particular morning, to leave Lovie by herself on the kitchen floor. What she kept repeating in her heart, as with her hand on the door-handle she watched the child putting Popsy to sleep in the truck, was that it was fear of Old

Funky that made it impossible to take her to Glymes. But, below all that, she knew perfectly well that her real reason was her passionate feeling that she must, for once and at all costs, see D.’s father alone.

It was hard, all the same, to close that door on the child! Not that Lovie — though she knew her mother was standing there — showed the smallest interest in her presence. But the child’s very lack of concern seemed to hold her all the more strongly, seemed to hold her as if, instead of being stationary on the floor, Lovie was being carried rapidly out of sight on a magic carpet. She was certainly experiencing what D.’s poor Mary called, more than two hundred years ago, ‘being torn in half, and what she suffered was not the less acute for being unexpected. She felt so totally unable to move from that threshold that her mind began wandering about, just as if she had to wait till someone released her.

One of these wandering and drifting thoughts had to do with the new dress she had just put on. She became aware of a vague tickling sensation in her left breast, and she wondered if this feeling were the result of her dress being too tight.

And now, as so often happens at these critical moments in human experience, the man-made, immortally mechanical god of civilization, that voice so comfortable to some and so dreadful to others, that our race has succeeded in installing on the pendulous point of time’s swaying pinnacle in the boundless, took upon itself to straighten out the confusion of Wizzie’s wavering mind by reminding her that though a girl has a longer life than a midge she hasn’t indefinite time for delayings on thresholds. The time-god’s jolt just now came from Jenny’s broken alarum-clock, another relic of the vanished Mr Dearth, which stared at her and ticked at her from across the stove that had consumed at a gulp the philosophy of the eternal. But gods whose voice is a tick resemble gods whose voice is thunder in the fact that their commands are at the same time definite and obscure; and when Jenny's clock repeated so emphatically 'Give up — give up — give up', it was hard for Wizzie to know whether it meant 'Give up the circus' or 'Give up D. and Lovie'.

Never had the tug in those opposite directions been so vicious as it was at this moment. It amounted to real suffering. She was wrenched apart between warmth, safety, security and all that wild rush of free, free air as she rode, dazzling and radiant, tip-toe and transported, round the dizzy ring!

The natural climax of her miserable indecision was that she began to hate both these alternatives! One was like an over-hot room with an over-hot fire and nothing but the smell of Lovie's washing and D.'s boots: the other was like the crossing of a glacier chasm on a quivering tight-rope.

She was still clinging to the door-handle and swaying from side to side on this terrible eel-bridge of destiny when the door into the yard opened and there, in the passage behind her, stood Jenny Dearth! Never in her life had she seen so transfigured a human face! It was a countenance of paradisic ecstasy. Had No-man seen her he would have been compelled to admit that extreme joy had the same effect on his Horse-Head as extreme agitation. It converted the bizarre into the extraordinary, the grotesque into the sublime.

In fact, Jenny's illuminated lineaments seemed more than human to Wizzie's startled eyes at that moment. It was like a face she had once seen outside the circus-tent, the face of a woman who had won on a lottery ticket. But the worst of it was that this illuminated woman's face hovering before her, near her, and now pressed passionately against her own, while she knew that it brought the decisive settling down to her dizzy trapeze of indecision, was prevented, by some diabolical non-conducting substance in herself, from delivering its message!

In fact, all the while her friend was hugging her to her heart, she was trying desperately, but quite in vain, to take from her some final supernatural oracle. It had been a superstition of Grummer's that the first loss of a woman's virginity endowed her with magical and prophetic insight. Grummer had given many instances from her own experience of this species of second sight. “Tis the first ’er meets be the lucky oon, but ‘tain't all as knows it, more's the pity!’ How she could hear the old woman's voice! Once Grummer had even murmured something in this connection about ‘they Vestie Virgins in them Roman times’, and, though this particular example seemed a singular one, there certainly was something in Jenny's face— ‘But very likely,’ she said to herself, as she returned her friend's hug as warmly as she could, ‘very likely it's all my fancy. They've made it up — that's the great thing! And after all Claudius is a sick man.’

One thing it certainly did, this sudden reappearance of a transformed Jenny: it made it easy for Wizzie to set out alone. She took a new umbrella D. had given her on her birthday, which was on the twenty-seventh of July. This umbrella was the first really ladylike one that she'd ever had, and she was not a little proud of it. It had a round black handle with a solid silver band upon which D. had had her initials ‘W.R.’ engraved, and she never let herself carry it unless she wore her best clothes. She had her best clothes on now, consisting of a navy-blue tailor-made suit, with a neat blue hat trimmed with grey feathers. Nor would she like it if we forgot to mention her hand-bag, which she had bought herself with Jenny's help, and which both of them considered the finest flower of Durnovarian taste. Over her pretty clothes, on a day of such doubtful prospects, she was forced to throw a not very becoming rain-coat, whose lack of style troubled her not a little; but she had bought it in her early Dorchester days, and D. was one who never noticed such things.

Thus attired, she set out; but instead of going the shortest way, which was down the hill to the coal-yard bridge, she turned, after a moment’s hesitation, into High East Street, and proceeded slowly along the near pavement towards D.’s lodgings. She was led to go this way, rather than the other, by one of those strange impulses that often remain, to the end of a person’s life, so totally inscrutable that a superstitious mind might well be pardoned if it supplied the lack of any rational explanation by the idea of a supernatural hand laid on one’s shoulder.

When she reached the door of No-man’s lodging she stopped, and under her ugly rain-coat and well-fitting blue dress her heart began to beat wildly. With a spasm of curious agitation she noticed that the door of the house had been left wide open. There before her was the flight of stairs going up to D.’s attic! She advanced into the passage and stood at the foot of the stairs, thinking desperately. Her face was puckered into a concentrated frown, and her gloved hands, fumbling at her hand-bag, seemed as if they sought, independently of her consciousness, to slip into their old habit of chafing each other’s knuckles.

Contrary to all her ways with D. — for she had long ago come to the conclusion that the more shabbily she was dressed the better he liked her — she instinctively bent her head and surveyed her appearance from head to foot. Then she twitched back the unsatisfactory ulster, and, fidgeting a little and bending sideways, gave her dress, at the place where it covered her hips, several cautious jerks. A crease in one of her stockings caught her eye next, necessitating the tightening of her suspenders, and to accomplish this manoeuvre unseen from the pavement she was forced to ascend the staircase a step or two. This small matter adjusted, she pondered again, and this time her reflections led to her slipping off the offending rain-coat and hanging it across the arm that already held the umbrella and hand-bag.

'Damn this business of being a woman!' was what she thought as she ascended the stairs. 'If D. came to surprise me, he wouldn't have to give a thought to how he looked! And I declare I wouldn't either, if I had my fling at the circus!'

Arrived at the first landing without meeting a soul, she ascended the second flight much more rapidly. But at the foot of the third, the one that led direct to the attic, she paused again and rearranged her bag in relation to her cloak and her umbrella. In fact, she shifted these objects very much as a soldier, mounting a besieged wall, might take his dagger between his teeth.

All the while she was making these preparations she kept thinking, 'What's the use? He'd be better pleased if I'd tumbled down and was all covered with mud!'

Biting her lower lip and moving so lightly that not the creak of a single step betrayed her approach, she now ascended the last flight to D.'s landing.

'What's the matter with my heart?' she said angrily to herself as she went up; and she became so aware too of that tickling sensation in her left breast that she pressed her free hand against it.

Once on the attic landing she looked about her as furtively as a thief. 'Yes, that's his room,' she thought, but she felt she must delay for a second, for half a minute, before she surprised him.

Then suddenly, and without the least possibility of a doubt, she heard the sound of a woman's voice inside the room. Her first instinct was to run down the stairs, run out of the house, run all the way to Glymes. But her second was to stand at the door and listen.

She did neither of these things. She went on tip-toe into D.'s kitchen. 'He's got a girl in there,' she told the Royal Martyr, under whose heart, though it must have been more than half past ten, a gas-flame was burning. ‘He’s got a girl in there,’ she told Henry VIII, as she mechanically bent down and tried to arrange his lid in a more decent manner. Then she went to the window, which was wide open, and, standing immobile before it, stared out over the roofs at the Frome meadows.

‘That’s the old thatched house he says he lived in in some other life; and there’s that man of his working in a ditch. A “drowner” he called him, and he said he had a smile as sweet as I don’t know what. And over there, where those trees are, must be the lane to Glymes. I’ll be in that lane soon, going to see D.’s father. D.’s got a girl in there; and I’m going to see D.’s father. In the convent they said a girl oughtn’t to let a fellow touch her if she wasn’t married to him. I’m not married to D.; but I feel as if I was.’

She told herself often afterwards that she hadn’t tried to listen a bit, not a little bit, to the voice of the woman in D.’s room.

It was only when the woman laughed at something D. said — and she could hear the low tones of his voice going on all the while — that she rushed out of the kitchen, across the landing, and into his room, with one sharp knock.

Yes! As she’d guessed from the tone of the laugh, from the low, sweet, milk-dripping, honey-oozing laugh, it was Nance who sprang away from him — Grummer would have said ‘like a cork from a bottle’ — and came slithering towards her with outstretched hand and two burning red spots on her cheeks! Yes, it was Nance who began at once, even while Wizzie was pushing her hand aside and plunging a look she would have liked to have been that wall-scaler’s dagger into what she’d have liked to have been D.’s heart: ‘Oh, that dress, my dear! I can’t help saying it, even if you don’t like to have your clothes mentioned, even if it gets on your nerves to be — Oh, that dress is the loveliest thing I’ve seen!’

Wizzie had not grown accustomed, either in convent or in circus, to the peculiar archness that passes for a light social tone in certain feminine circles. Nancy Quirm was not, it must be confessed, any great adept at this airy art, but her manner of speech came nearer it than anyone else's Wizzie knew. And now, as our friend struggled heroically to combine the opposite roles of one superior to feminine weakness and one whose silence was a steel blade, the demon of righteous anger within her almost deafened her spiritual hearing by the way it kept mocking Nance's social chatter. 'It's the loveliest thing she's ever seen, ever seen, ever seen! It's the loveliest thing she's ever seen—' And the demon ended by hurling at the poor woman one of the filthiest of the obscene wishes that Old Funky used to express when he quarrelled with Grummer.

But what she felt towards Nance was nothing to what she felt against D. Never once, in all their days together, had he shown her this retreat of his; and now that she had come of her own accord it was to find his father's wife! She didn't care what they'd been doing, she told herself. She knew what Nance was, the sick cat! But that he should share with another woman —

The truth was that Wizzie was enough of a normal girl to feel defrauded of her rights by this exclusion. It hurt something in her that lay deeper than mere sex-instinct. It was treating her like a prostitute! Of course she took no interest in his work. Why should she? But that he should have deliberately kept her out of this intimate side of his life, that he should have deliberately said to himself, 'I won't have her in my attic!' — this was something far worse than just kissing or whatever it was.

While all this bitterness surged up in her, D. was carrying the thing off with cold-blooded aplomb. In some odd way her contempt for Nance's chatter had staved off the outburst that she felt sure he had expected. She caught him looking at her as she struggled with herself — her bosom swelling under her tight bodice — with puzzled astonishment. How little he knew her! Did he think that to have caught him kissing Nance, or letting Nance kiss him, would make her make a scene, like a vulgar wife? She would show him! If she couldn't chatter like Nance, she could hold her tongue and crush people by her dignity.

She said scarce anything — she couldn't trust herself to say anything — but she sank down on the chair he pulled over to the fire, letting her discomfited rival swing her legs awkwardly from its arm as she went on with her purring cajoleries. What was it about this soft feminine body, as it leant over her, pretending to appraise the stuff of her blue suit, that made her feel sure she had interrupted something between them?

She forced herself to endure the woman's proximity the better to observe her, and she gave herself up to a cold malice as she did so, a malice that held a wicked sweetness of its own. How weary and worn, and yet how sickeningly sweet, that face was, in the pallid light of the autumn morning! 'D. doesn't really give a damn for her,' she thought, as she listened with less than half her consciousness to the rigmarole with which No-man was trying to distract her. And, indeed, in the submissive sweetness, like the scent of overblown lilies at an unhappy marriage, that emanated from the woman's presence, there was something that, though it didn't disarm our friend's contempt, did quite considerably diminish her indignation. And this irresistible feeling of something pathetic in the creature increased steadily as she remained at Wizzie's side.

No-man, with his mania for nicknaming everyone he met — which was his way of detaching them from the reality of vulgar acceptation — had called Mrs Quirm, as if conscious of something about her that was like the smell of overblown lilies, his Cemetery Woman, but he might just as well have called her his Door-step Woman. Not one of Nance's friends but must have known at some time or other that they must draw back gently or move very gingerly if they didn't want to hurt this apparition at their door. It seemed to be her destiny to be always sitting on the elbows of chairs, always hovering at the doors of rooms, always clinging to coat-sleeves and shawl-ends.

But what began now, more than anything else, to disarm the indignant Wizzie was the vein of guileless stupidity she detected in Nance. No, it wasn't with a white-faced thing like this, with such weary lines and such blurred spectacles, that a person could be angry. D. might let her kiss him as much as he liked! No, it was with D. himself! What self-respecting girl could stand being kept in one house while her man met his friends and enjoyed himself in another? And what a big fire for October! Men never grudged themselves coal, any more than they grudged themselves cigarettes.

'No, I'm not going to bear it any longer. He'll have to give up this place and find somewhere where we can live properly, or I've done with him. He can have Lovie, but I'll have my life.'

'No, my dear, I'm glad to give it back to him, tell him,' D. was now saying to Nance. 'Are you listening, Wizz?' he added, turning to her. 'Nance and I are worried about my father. Dumbell and Fuzzy-wuzzy — isn't that a good name for the minx? — appeared last night and are sleeping in Wye's room while he sleeps downstairs. They seem to have driven my father distracted. It seems they're going to chuck him. His last articles have been too much for them. Nance simply doesn't know what's going to happen. Do you see that?' And he pointed to a roundish object, rolled up in brown paper, that lay in the middle of the bed. 'That's my other head, the one he gave me, the one you hated so on your chimney-piece. It's nearly the same as my old one — see him? — but not quite. Dormarth's more like the Maiden Castle one, but they're all different. Devils differ as much as we do. It was what he said about these heads that did for him with old Cumber.'

'What did he say?'

'He linked them up with Derfel's horse, or with Derfel himself — didn't he, Nance? Derfel was a saint from the part of the country where his ancestors lived. In fact, as far as I can gather, he was a good deal more than a saint. I suppose you might call him a saint-god. And Father thinks — aren't I right, Nance? — that in the end he was confused with his beast. He said that where he and Mother's people lived there was an avenue with these heads on the gateposts — there's her picture of them, sweetheart, on that ottoman just behind you! — and people used to pray to Derfel's beast long after they burnt the image of Derfel.'

'Is that all?' said Wizzie dryly. 'I don't see what Mr Cumber could object to in that. He's not a Catholic, is he?'

'I'm afraid Enoch went a good deal further than that,' said Nancy sadly, getting up from the chair's elbow and beginning slowly to gather her belongings together. She stood for quite a while with her back to the foot of the bed, putting on her old-fashioned hat; and Wizzie could not help noticing that she treated Dormarth with quite as little respect as she showed to the bed-post that had been left vacant. 'Urien's things are nothing to her,' thought our friend, as she watched the woman's figure outlined against the attic window; and she turned her eyes to the package on the bed with a new interest, now that she realized what it meant to her Black Man of Glymes.

'What are Mr Quirm's ideas about these things?' she asked abruptly.

No-man turned to her with a sharp surprised look as he rose to help Nance on with her ulster. 'I'm afraid, my pretty one,' he said, 'you wouldn't be much the wiser if I tried to explain.'

‘I should say she wouldn’t!’ echoed Nance, turning round too, and resting her hand on the solitary head as she stooped to adjust the lower buttons of her rain-cloak. But her smile had faded when she straightened herself again and began pulling on her gloves. ‘It’s all we can do,’ she remarked to D. sadly. ‘He’s got the thing on his nerves. But he’d have never asked you if I hadn’t—’

But No-man, who had been watching Wizzie with curious interest as she lay back in her chair with her brows knit and the fingers on her lap busy at their old trick, began to speak with some eagerness. ‘It’s no secret, my dear. Besides, things have gone too far. Nance and I are worried about him. His idea is—’ Here he paused and glanced at Nance, as much as to say, ‘Stop me if I oughtn’t to tell her.’ ‘His idea is that he himself — and that’s why he calls himself Urien — is in some way connected with our old mythology. I don’t know whether you’ve ever heard of what they call reincarnation? You have? Well, what my father’s made himself believe, or come to believe, is that the supernatural power, whatever it was, that incarnated itself in the Urien of the legends — and it must have been a kind of Titan, if you know what I mean: not exactly an evil spirit, but not a good spirit either — has now, after all these centuries, come back to the world in him! In several of the old legends this power was attended by some sort of beast — the whole thing’s mixed up with sex and death and good and evil and all that’s hardest in life to understand — and, as far as I can make out, it’s with this beast, or through this beast (and that’s where the sex part of it comes in), that we touch some great secret! It all sounds crazy — or, as I put it, it does — but so do all very ancient religions. But the thing that’s worrying Nance and me now — and that’s what she came to talk to me about — is that by letting himself go for these papers, and openly discussing it, he has shaken his own faith and got all confused, troubled, uncertain, exposed in some way, not knowing what he does believe or doesn't believe. Nance says she's only sure of one thing, and that's that he wants this head back. And it looks as if that were all we could do for him just now. Of course, it may end in his shaking off the whole business; but what we're afraid of is that it's gone too far, gone so far that he couldn't go on without it. Well, old girl, that's the situation! Of course, what I've told you is between ourselves. He's my father, and I couldn't bear—'

But Wizzie interrupted him. 'D.!' she brought out; and she uttered this syllable with such outraged indignation that Mrs Quirm, who had wandered round the further side of the bed to reach for the package, paused in the act to look at her.

'Well, anyhow, that's the situation,' repeated No-man. 'I've put it badly; but what it really amounts to is my father's life. I know it sounds perfectly crazy to you, Wizz; but, as it says at the end of Faust, all life is a symbol, and I suppose no religion that doesn't deal with sex-longing in some kind of way is much use to us.'

Instead of replying, Wizzie glanced at Nance, and the two women exchanged a very complicated look in which not only quotations from Faust but all masculine philosophizing was put aside in the interest of something else.

Then, while Nance was telling No-man what shops she had to go to, Wizzie began glancing critically about the room. How big the bed was! And this was the bed where for the last ten years D. had slept — not in Dorchester, of course, but somewhere — slept, and thought of Mona! He had spoken about this bed, and about that ottoman too, only a few weeks ago, when she enquired, thinking of her ideal little house, whether his mother had left him any furniture. 'I expect', she said to herself bitterly, 'his mother wouldn't like him to let me sleep in this bed!'

And then it came over her that this was probably the very bed where Urien had seduced D.'s mother and where D. had been born.

'Well, good-bye, my dears!' murmured Nance quietly, moving to the door, with the sacred beast's head clutched as callously against her bosom as if it had been a bag of oranges. 'I've got a lot of errands before I start back.'

Wizzie jumped up at once. 'Listen, Nance! I'm coming now, straight over to your place. I haven't seen Thel for an age. You don't want to carry that thing as well as a lot of parcels! Let me take it.'

'But, darling,' interposed No-man, and then, turning from her to Nance: 'I want to show her everything, now she's here. I never would let her come before because she can't bear those heads, and it's no good — But now she's here, I'm going to show her everything.'

Wizzie glanced at Nance again, and another look, not at all resembling the one exchanged before, passed between them. Wizzie said in this look, 'He's trying to get round me. It's been a great blow to him that I've always refused to come up here,' whereas Nance's look replied, 'He wants to make you forget you found me here. I know this room as well as I know my own. It's a shame he's never let you come near it.'

But No-man intervened at this point, addressing them both with the complacent indulgence of a grown-up person putting right a couple of engaging children in an affair that required a mature mind. 'Put that down, Nance!' he commanded, taking the package from her arms and laying it on his desk. 'Wizzie shall bring it over a little later, after I've enjoyed myself with her a bit!'

The words struck Wizzie as designed to revenge something or other that Nance had done to him, or wouldn't do for him; but the woman showed no sign of taking the remark amiss. 'Very well, let's try and meet, and walk together!' she said eagerly. 'I'll be as quick as I can. I shall have a lot of parcels; so it is a comfort not to have this too. It's heavier than it looks! No, don't bother to come down. And don't forget to show Wizzie that house where you lived when you were Mary Channing's friend!' She shut the door behind her with one of her most pathetic society smiles, one of those smiles that always struck Wizzie as having something indecent about them, considering her spectacles and the weariness of the imprints in her face.

As soon as the door was closed, there occurred between them that curious suspension of the stream of events which is an almost universal phenomenon when a couple who know each other intimately are suddenly left alone by the departure of a third. It is, at such times, as though this departing third, whose vanishing swells into so portentous a recession, actually raised as he departed an invisible dam of unearthly water that now flows between the two persons left behind, across which they gaze helplessly at each other, each of them feeling as if the familiar objects round them had undergone some curious change. It is then that the pair seem suddenly grown shy of each other, gazing into each other's eyes across the last words of the departed, across his final gesture, across the diffused aura of his personality, each of them too shy to utter the magic word that shall break the spell. It even may occur that they feel a curious discomfort in looking at each other, as if something had happened to their familiar relation that had changed its quality, so that their common interests could only be referred to now in a whisper, as if the air were full of ears, or as if they were speaking before a corpse. And not only so, but each material object in this transformed spot, each chair, each rug, each cushion, each picture, gives the impression of having been drained of its customary spirit, of having been left a mere husk or mask or eidolon of itself, as though the departed one had carried away with him the living essence of these things, leaving them weary nonentities and insubstantial negations. Thus it was with our two friends while they stared blankly at each other, listening to Nance's steps descending the stairs.

But Wizzie suddenly broke the silence. 'Why!' she cried, stooping down by the bed. 'She's dropped one of her gloves. One minute, D. I'll soon catch her!' She jerked the door open and ran at top speed down the stairs. 'Nance!' she cried. 'Mrs Quirm!'

But it wasn't till she was out in the street that she overtook her. Nance turned at her voice, and she handed her the glove, and for the third time that October morning an interchange of commentary on what was happening passed without words between them.

And then, before she had the least notion of doing such a thing, an irresistible impulse of pure mischief, the sort of mischief that made the quietest sister in her convent flash out sometimes with a startling jest, forced her to fling back, as she turned to go, 'Well! So long, till later! Isn't it a shame we're not allowed to change our men — you to look after D. and me to look after Urien? We ought to make a little private plot about it, Nance Quirm! After all, we're all related now!'

Never had she seen behind poor Nance's spectacles such a look of bewildered simplicity as she caught at that moment. 'She's stupid!' she cried to herself as she ran back. 'No; I couldn't be jealous of her — even if I wanted to!'

She was confronted on her return to the attic by the sight of D. carrying a tray from the kitchen to the bedroom. On the tray was a teapot, two cups and saucers, and some milk and sugar. He looked extremely complacent and well-pleased with himself as he put down the tray on his mother's ottoman and hurried off to fetch some Osborne biscuits.

Wizzie reseated herself in the arm-chair and accepted a cup from him, with a biscuit in the saucer. She said to herself, ‘He’s glad to have me here, I declare he is! Goodness, man! Why didn’t you think of it before?’

‘A cup of tea’ll be just the thing for you, my lovely, before you walk. No! Don’t ‘ee move! Here! Put it down on this.’ He brought her a little stool, like a church hassock, and placed it carefully by her side, giving one of her legs, as he did so, a joyful squeeze.

With his own cup on the mantelpiece, she felt him looking down upon her, sitting there, with profound satisfaction. ‘Take off your hat, my sweet,’ he said. ‘God! I feel as I did last November when I first carried you off.’

She balanced her cup on the not over-attractive stool and began to lift her hands to her head. Then she changed her mind. ‘Oh, I can’t bother,’ she said, ‘not now — but’ — and there was a certain wistfulness in her tone, as if she besought him to forgive her about the hat— ‘I’ll take off my gloves — only I mustn’t forget them, like Nance!’

He stooped down, and she felt that it gave him a thrill of pleasure to help her remove even these barriers. The minute they were off he lifted one of her hands to his lips, and then, bending down in front of her, pressed her knees together with his bony fingers. ‘God!’ he mumbled again, ‘but I’m as pleased as Punch to have you up here.’ Straightening his back again, he remained opposite her, watching her drink her tea. ‘Wizz, old girl,’ he said. ‘ Think of that first time I saw you in the caravan! We weren’t long in understanding each other, were we?’

Her hand did not twitch as she held her cup, nor did the slightest vibration of response run through her, but deep in her heart this daughter of man cursed her Maker. Her curse was a woman’s curse, not as articulate as his would have been; but, if her Creator had possessed a human ear, what he would have heard would have been something like this: ‘Damn you, God, for not fitting the love to the man!’

But D. suddenly hurried to the window and began rummaging in the drawer of his writing-table. ‘Thank the Lord!’ she heard him mutter. ‘It is here.’ And when he came back to her side he thrust into her hand a tiny little roughly-taken photograph, one of the kind that beach-photographers take at the sea-side.

‘What on earth’s this, D.?’ she murmured; and, leaning forward — for the day was so cloudy that that side of his room contained but a dim light — she held the little picture so that the flames flickered upon its glazed surface.

‘Why!’ she cried, in a rush of real pleasure. ‘It’s Lovie! How did you get it taken?’

‘Oh, just the other morning,’ he answered casually; but she could see he was thrilled by her surprise. ‘I was keeping it for All Souls’ Day,’ he added in a low half-apologetic voice.

It was his tone more than anything else that upset her, and the timid hesitation with which he referred to the day they’d first met. This timidity, this fear lest unwittingly he should make her angry, had been growing upon him of late. As a rule it had just the opposite effect upon her from what he intended; as a rule it brought down on his head the very thing that, ‘if he hadn’t been so silly and hadn’t acted as if I were some kind of I don’t know what’, he would have escaped; but today, with this supernatural hand on her shoulder, with this sense that she had at last really reached the end of her endurance, with this feeling that she must go back to her spangles and her tights, to her dust and her danger, to those heavenly rushes through the air, to those hushed expectancies and wild outbursts of applause, this nervousness of his touched her as it had never done before.

‘Why, it’s lovely, D.!’ she cried. ‘It’s — it’s our — Lovie — to the life! I can’t think — what made you— ‘But here she couldn’t go on, and, with the little picture clutched between finger and thumb, she bent her head on her knees in a fit of low-voiced crying. They were silent tears, and not the breath of a sob came with them; but this only affected D. the more, for, having become a veritable expert in feminine emotion, he knew that loud sobs mean indignant self-pity, if not furious temper, whereas this silent rush of tears down a scarcely contorted face means that one more tributary has begun to flow of that unceasing flood that from before the days of Niobe and Rachel has poured down the cheeks of women.

‘What is it, my darling, my precious?’ he cried, kneeling down in front of her. ‘Tell — your — old — D. what it is!’

But the delusion, full of the bitter-sweetness of love’s treacherous sea, that she was simply weeping from the happiness of their love made No-man’s own underlip begin to quiver. To recover himself, and to give her a chance to do the same, he now rose to his feet; and walking up to his original bed-post head, which showed not the remotest sign of disturbance at being deprived of its mate, he began to tap out a tune upon its sconce. The tune, of all tunes, that he selected, and that, to effect some kind of cheerful diversion, he must needs begin to drum, was none other than that familiar evangelical hymn, ‘Shall we gather at the river?’ — a composition that he had recently heard sung by a little group of revivalists upon High East Street: ‘Shall we gather at the river, the beautiful, the beautiful river? Shall we gather at the river that flows by the throne of God?’

And, as if his tappings on Dormarth’s head were not emphatic enough to satisfy his desire for something normal and calming, he now began chanting aloud the actual words of the tune he tapped.

But Wizzie, who had not seen that quivering of his lip, at once assumed that this ‘Shall we gather at the river?’ was an impatient outburst of gross masculine ribaldry, indulged in at the expense of her silly girlish tears. In any case, even if she had seen his underlip tremble, she would still have been totally astray as to the nature of the relief he got from chanting ‘Shall we gather at the river?’ with such unnecessary vehemence. What she did, anyway, was to sit up at once, open her elegant hand-bag, take out from its silky recesses a handkerchief Popsy had given her on her twenty-second birthday, and proceed to dry her wet cheeks.

‘What was it, sweetheart?’ enquired D. tenderly; and, leaving his beast, who certainly, in the dim light of that cloudy day, looked as if it well might be what he had told Nance it was, he went over to her side and stood, after his fashion, close to the mantelpiece, with his arm extended along half the length of its bare surface.

‘God! What a brute I am!’ he suddenly cried, clapping his hand to his pocket. ‘I never gave you a cigarette.’

This lapse in his hospitality having been rectified, and what was to her a quite irrelevant explanation gone into as to why he never smoked himself in the afternoon, she slowly lifted her small head and looked straight up at him.

‘I was thinking of our life, D.’ she said. ‘It’s not what it ought to be — but I’ve never been—’ She spoke in a low and intense voice, while what colour she had slowly left her cheeks in the effort her words cost her.

She saw that his face expressed bewildered astonishment and a miserable childish disappointment, and what she saw froze the words in her throat. How could she ever explain to a man like this? It was like snatching from Lovie, without a possibility of making her understand, something that she thought was hers to keep forever!

'Tell me what it is, Wizz! For God's sake, tell me what's wrong with you today. Is it him? Is it Old Funky?'

She shook her head, and then with an impatient gesture threw her cigarette, only half-smoked, into the fire. How like him it was to drag in Old Funky — and how sick at heart it made her to have that worry brought up again! Oh, to get back to her real life, to get away from them all!

'What is it, then?' he persisted. 'Have I done anything? Is it because you found Nance here? If I thought for a minute that you were bothered about Nance, I'd—'

But she interrupted him with a weary gesture. This was worse still. Would he never understand that it was he himself, not Old Funky, not Nance, not even her feeling for his father, that was at the bottom of it all?

'Don't you see, child, how unkind it is of you to go on like this and not even give a person a hint of what's the matter? What do you mean about "something wrong with our life"?'

She felt so desperate and so driven, so torn and miserable, that her self-pity transformed itself into a rush of anger with him and his stupid badgering. 'I mean you're not a man, D. That's the whole thing, if you must have it. No! I know what you're going to say — but I'm not thinking of that. You're not a man. You may be higher or lower. You may be an angel or you may be — that beast over there! But a girl, when she's my age — though I dare say when I'm as old as Nance or Jenny it'll be different — wants a companion, wants someone she can fuss with, be silly and gay with, take sides with, share things with — yes, and quarrel with! Do you realize, D. we've never once made it up? Why haven't we? Because you're not a man! Because—'

But at this point, in the tempest and whirl of her feelings, she suddenly remembered all the times he had responded to her outbursts with a placidity that was more maddening than if he'd hit her, and a confused sense came over her that by his open mouth and stupid bewilderment he was forcing her to say things quite different from what she meant! Her hopelessness of ever saying what she meant, while he looked at her like that, made her lips tremble and her eyes fill with angry tears.

'You oughtn't to forgive me like you do!' she cried in a strange husky voice. 'You ought to shake me; you ought to curse me; you ought — Oh, D. I don't know what you are' — and her voice rose almost to a wail— 'but you're not a man!'

She never forgot what his face looked like after this cry of hers died away in the silence of that small room. It wasn't quite as tragic as the face of a wretched Guy Fawkes she once saw as it collapsed into the flames. It was more like the face of a terribly human scarecrow out of whose mouth, in one of their Sunday walks, she had seen Popsy knock the poor creature's pipe.

It was his overpowering astonishment that in a measure numbed the force of the blow, and he drew his arm from the chimney-piece as if it were something that didn't belong to his body at all. Then he stood for a second with his eyes fixed not on her face but on the hand-bag in her lap.

After that, he began, with fingers that she could see were so deadened by her words that they could hardly obey his will, to button up, slowly and carefully, all the buttons of his coat. When his coat was buttoned up, he turned half-round and for another second stared in a puzzled way at his writing-table by the window, as if he were wondering what that round package was that he had taken from Nance and put down there! Then, turning again, like one of those hooded chimney-pots that some faint wind, felt by no other neighbouring object, seems to sway at its arbitrary whim, he fixed his eyes on the bed.

Wizzie was impelled, this time, to follow the direction of his benumbed stare, and she half-expected to see the phantom shape of that wife of his, whose name had appeared so queerly on Dumbell's sketch, lying with her head on the pillow! 'If he'd only snatch me up now', she thought, 'and throw me down on that bed, it would end all this nonsense!' She drew a deep angry breath. 'But that bed's sacred to Mona — that's why he'd never let me come up here.' And once more her heart became cold as a stone.

But he moved across the room now, to where, on a hook next to the cupboard, hung his overcoat and cap, with his Cerne Giant's cudgel propped up beneath them against the panelling. 'I think I'll go for a little walk,' he murmured in a low sing-song voice, 'a little walk, a little walk; yes, I think I'll go for a little walk, as the weather's so nice and fine!'

He went to the door as soon as he'd got his overcoat and cap and taken his stick. 'Don't forget the package,' he remarked, forcing himself to give her a wry smile. 'And I won't expect you till I see you. They're certain to keep you to tea. But don't be too late — with him hanging round! Nance may overtake you, but I wouldn't stop about, waiting for her.'

He paused for a second and then added, in a voice that was like the voice of a person watching a ship go down, 'It may rain, and then again it mayn't rain. We shall know if it comes; and if it doesn't come, we shall know it hasn't come. Don't worry about Lovie.'

With that, he was gone; and she heard his heavy steps — those steps that were neither fast nor slow, neither hurried nor lingering, sounding just as they always sounded, the steps of D. No-man going for his walk, going earlier than usual, but going for his walk — deliberately descending the stairs.

‘I must be crazy, I declare!’ she murmured aloud, as she caught herself making a hurried move forward, just as if, quite apart from her reasonable decision, something in her cried, ‘Run after him! Run after him! Stop him while you can!’

But it did give her a queer feeling to be left in possession — the very first day she had entered it — of this room of his! The first thing she did was to carry the tea-things back to the kitchen. Here, finding that the Royal Martyr had still a little hot water left, she cleaned their cups and deposited the tea-leaves under the lid of Henry VIII. Then, returning to the bedroom, she approached the one Questing Beast that still remained ‘in situ’, and considered its appearance with some minuteness, running her fingers over its ambiguous physiognomy.

Still leaning forward against the bed-post, and fumbling — quite mechanically now — with the strangely carved head, her mind reverted to that inexplicable incident of the sudden scrawling of the name ‘Mona’ across Dumbell’s sketch. ‘The real Mona’, she thought, ‘can never have slept in this bed if it was his mother’s; but he’s slept in it ever since, and thought about her, too, as he turned over, like he always does, with such terrible jerks from side to side; and I bet he felt funny when he stopped sleeping here and slept with me. Dear Christ! I wish to hell I loved him like I love his father! Everything would be right then, and I wouldn’t be thinking about the circus. When he took me away, he ought to have found a job for me, like Jenny said, in another circus, not kept me with him. But that’s the way they are! They’re proud of their generosity to us as long as we give them what they want; but when it comes to helping us to be independent...’

All this while, with her eyes fixed on the pillows of that ancient bed from which so many wild human thoughts must have risen up and beaten against so many different walls, she had been vaguely conscious again of that tickling sensation in her left breast, due, she kept fancying, to the tightness of her bodice.

She had felt no pleasure from the way this new dress of hers emphasized her normal womanliness, no pleasure comparable with what she had felt that Midsummer Eve when she put on boy's trousers. All she had felt when D. had looked at her, with the look she knew too well, was a hope that Urien would be equally pleased when at last she got safe to Glymes. But, whoever a girl wants to please, she pays the same penalty in discomfort, and, hardly conscious of what she was doing, Wizzie now found herself standing on tip-toe against D.'s bed-post and pressing herself against the heraldic head in order that, as when an animal rubs itself against a tree, she might get relief from the sensation that bothered her.

But she moved away to the fire now, to pick up her gloves; and she only arrested herself in the act of putting on more coal by the thought, 'But he'll be up there with Lovie.' She contented herself, therefore, with hooking the guard carefully over what fire there was, and then, without further delay and having possessed herself of her various belongings, she picked up the paper parcel from D.'s table and ran downstairs.

Once on the pavement, she decided that this time she would go the shortest way, whether the invisible hand that seemed directing all her motions this morning approved or disapproved.

The Guildhall clock was striking half past twelve, and, as she had only nibbled at D.'s Osborne biscuits, she said to herself, 'I'll run into the sweet-shop by St Peter's and buy some of that chocolate Jenny gets.'

Possessed of the delicacy she desired, she was returning to North Square and the street leading to the little stream when she happened to glance through the iron rails of the church at the statue of William Barnes.

She had often passed this statue before, but never till this moment had its mellow charm and the majestic benignity of its expression struck her as they did now. Wizzie's aesthetic taste was totally undeveloped, but there was in this venerable old poet's look something beyond all art, an effluence of peace, a spirit of benediction, a promise of comfort and of healing, that seemed to rise up in that centre of Dorchester life as if it sprang from some level of goodness in the deep earth below the town's oldest foundations.

Unused as Wizzie was to all introspective thought, she could not but feel, as she leant against those rails and gave herself up to the influence of that calm figure with its downcast eyes, that there was some aspect of life, some way of taking life, that, with all the changes she had gone through in these last months, was still hidden from her.

A strange mood came over her, in which, though there was self-pity in it, there was much more than self-pity. She felt sorry for old D. sorry for Urien in this new trouble that had fallen upon him — and how she had foreseen it, how she had felt it coming on that Midsummer Eve at Mai-Dun! — and sorry even for Old Funky!

So deeply did the mystical benignity of this hushed figure affect her that, as she stood there frowning and pondering, with that weird wrapped-up object in her gloved hands, for one passing second she actually forgot everything in a rush of melting sympathy for all the people in her confused life.

But the moment vanished as quickly as it came, vanished indeed in a sudden dread of encountering Nance and of having her as a companion all the way to Glymes; and under the pressure of this fear, which quickly became something like a panic, she fled into North Square, hurried past the prison gate, and ran down the hill to the river-path at the bottom.

All the way to Hangman's Cottage, as she went along munching her chocolate, the image of that old poet by the church accompanied her, soothing her troubled mind. Everything she had come to like best in Dorchester seemed to be expressed in that calm figure.

'If I do go back to my life,' she thought, 'if I do leave D. and Lovie, I shan't forget what I felt just now!'

But she wasn't destined to leave the town in undisturbed peace. It had been — so she fancied — her fear of meeting Nance that had set her off at such a pace; and all the way to the Hangman's Cottage, in spite of the spiritual presence of William Barnes, she kept looking back: but oh, oh, oh! — just before she reached that familiar landmark she was seized with a flash of conviction, a conviction as certain as if she had seen him following her, that Old Funky had watched her flight and would be on the look-out for her when she returned!

'He must have been watching for me,' she thought, as she hurried on towards the Blue Bridge. 'He must have seen me run down the hill! I know I wouldn't think of him like this for nothing.'

But Wizzie was a brave and a resourceful girl, and she told herself that if Urien wasn't in a fit state she would ask Mr Wye, or even Dumbell, if he were out there still, to accompany her home. 'He wouldn't dare to speak to me then,' she told herself. 'And if he did, I'd know what to say to him!'

She had walked so fast all the way that, when she finally reached the pond where Urien had once rescued her and Lovie from the cows, she felt quite at ease in her mind about Old Funky following her. 'Let him wait for me, if he wants to!' she said to herself. 'He'll get more than he bargains for!'

As fate would have it, although neither Old Funky nor Nance beset her approach to Glymes, she was not spared a troublesome companion. This came with a sudden change of the weather and took the form of a very formidable wind, blowing from the south-west. The girl had heard so much about this wind from Maiden Castle in connection with Urien that she became at once vividly aware of its growing force and even prepared to welcome it as a sort of advance-guard of Urien himself! She remembered how it had blown against the Glymes roofs and down the Glymes chimneys on Candlemas Day, and though, being the most unsuperstitious of women, she'd never given a thought to what, out there, they called 'the ghost-wind', her attitude to what she thought of as Urien's wind was something very different from her attitude to D.'s Roman sentries on Poundbury, or his drowner in the Frome ditches, or his favourite old willow-tree in the swamp at Herringston.

D.'s talk about Nature never failed to fill her with infinite tedium. She couldn't help thinking of that very thing now, as she responded in such an excited manner to Urien's wind, shutting the gate by the pond with an exultant clatter as if it were a mystic gate of deliverance. Her heart rose higher and higher as the wind blew her along. She became aware of a sacrilegious impulse to play with the head she carried as if it were a ball!

It was a queer thing. D. had only to begin speaking of what he'd seen on one of those walks to cause a thick cloud of gloom to descend upon her. But when his father referred to the wind, or to the mist, or to the hills, she felt as if she longed to leap on her old horse, spring to her feet on his back, and tear round the ring! 'I believe', she said to herself, as, instead of playing ball with what she carried, she pressed it, because it was his now and was to do him good, tightly against her heart, 'that it's because with D. it's only his own sensations, whereas with Urien—' She concluded her definition of the difference by a burst of that touching faith that girls have, when they're in love, as to the dim grandeur of their idol's mental processes. 'I'll make him understand today,' she thought, and she beat with her umbrella, though her hand-bag was clutched in the same hand, against the thick stalks of the hogweed in the ditch by her side.

The only religion Wizzie was conscious of in herself was composed of stray tags and broken snatches of her old convent teaching; and it was possible that some obscure memory of the contempt for Nature, save as a step to the life of the spirit, that the nuns had taught her came to her aid in her reaction against D.'s selfishness. Every physical movement Wizzie made this eventful day had a psychic significance, and when she struck at the stalks of the hogweed with the end of her umbrella what she was really doing was fighting for the father's wild mysticism, of which she knew nothing, against the son's physical sensations, of which she knew too much.

But the nearer she drew to Glymes, the stronger blew the wind; and it presently became necessary for her to button up her ugly ulster, clutch all she was carrying tight against her, pray that her grey-feathered hat wouldn't blow off, and hurry forward, like a little fishing-smack with all sails but one well-furled.

When she arrived at the two houses, and had pushed open the garden gate, she paused for a minute to take her breath and gather herself together. This delay, followed by her nervous and lingering approach to the Quirms' door — for her heart had begun, as it always did at the prospect of meeting Urien, to tease her by its agitation — brought it about that her presence was observed from the front window of the Wye establishment, where the guileless Dumbell, weary of the wrangling between his wife and his father, was standing to watch the approach of the non-human storm. He must have called Thuella upon the scene at once, for, while the visitor still stood at Nance's door waiting for an answer to her hesitant tap, that young woman, her painter's smock surmounted by a shawl, burst from their house and rushed across the flower-beds to greet her.

'Oh, I'm so glad you've come! Oh, I've got such news for you, such incredible news!'

'How is Urien?' was Wizzie's reply to this. 'Has Nance come back? Will he come to the door? Is he still—'

'Hush — he's coming now. Oh, such news, my lovely one! You must come — Good-bye!' And before the man inside had got the door open the excited girl was back again in her own house.

'How do you do, Mr Quirm? I came to bring — Nance had too much to carry — I hope you don't mind—' She brought out these sentences in spasmodic jerks, while all he said was, 'Come in, child. It's warmer in than out.' This last sentence he repeated as he ushered her into their untidy room. 'Warmer in than out, in than out.'

'How are you, Mr Quirm?' she said, when the door was shut and she'd slipped off her ulster and laid down her things.

He made no attempt to help her in this, but stood with his back to the window gazing gloomily, and she fancied a little reproachfully, into her face. Without a second's hesitation she took off her hat, and, throwing it down on the nearest chair, gave him the sweetest smile she had ever given to anyone in her life. A faint gleam came into his heavy-lidded eyes.

'How — pretty — you — are,' he murmured in a low whisper; and suddenly, to her intense surprise, he moved a step nearer, and, taking her small head between his hands, bent down and kissed it.

The touch of his hands, his breath on her hair, made Wizzie's heart beat furiously. Her legs too began to feel weak and shaky; and in the pit of her stomach she had the sensation she used to have as a little girl when she was being swung too high. 'Alone — with him — at last,' the pit of her stomach said. ‘Alone — with him — at last,’ repeated the trembling breasts under her tightly drawn dress.

It was upon the latter that his eyes fell now, as he released her head. ‘Pretty,’ he muttered again, and this time his tone troubled and perplexed her. There was something in it quite different from the tone of a normal grown-up man expressing sensual interest. But this very fact, that he was so different from his son in the way he acted, gave her a vibrant quiver of tenderness towards him.

‘Pretty,’ he repeated; and, stretching out his hand, he touched with his forefinger the tip of her left breast, the one she’d been conscious of all day, the one that had teased her by that tickling sensation. His gesture was the extreme opposite of a sensual one. An onlooker who had been to Rome would have been reminded of the outstretched finger of Michelangelo’s Divinity putting life into the languid frame of the newly created parent of our race.

But just because his touch was so strangely chaste Wizzie felt under its impact such a melting response that it was impossible to bear it. From the spot where he touched her there trembled through her whole body a tension that could only find relief by being taken into his arms.

‘Let’s — sit — down,’ she stammered. ‘No — you — and I’ll—’ And pushing him into his great arm-chair, a much more capacious piece of furniture than the one in D.’s attic, she slid down upon his lap. The warmth of her body, its electric pressure, the way she cuddled up against his chest in blind contact with those garments whose state had shocked the fastidious D. the manner in which she caught up one of his hands and kissed it as reverently as if he’d been some famous sage or formidable potentate instead of a half-crazed fanatic whose work wasn’t good enough for a newspaper, all these things had a most releasing effect, not on the man’s senses but on his tongue.

But the flood of strange talk to which she now found herself half-listening — for she had never been one for taking the discourses of the sons of men with much seriousness — was nothing in intensity, or in abandonment, to her own feelings. For the first time in her life Wizzie had round her the arms of a man she loved. It was no more to her than the howling of the wind in the chimney that this man was her bedfellow’s father. It was no more to her than the lashing of the rain on the pane that another father — the father of her own child — was waiting to intercept her return.

These ironic aspects of her situation, the scandal of which even the kindest of the kind priests of Durnovaria could not have condoned, no more bothered her than the fact that all those queer ghost noises that she’d heard on Candlemas Night in the rafters of Glymes were now starting up again over her head! She had known what it was to feel herself yielding to her Black Man when she was no more than standing by his side and talking to him; but now she was between his hands; now she was lying on his knees; now her whole identity was being subdued to him, surrounded by him, dominated by him; and her emotion became so intense that his words, reaching her through a cloud of mist, through a vapour of smoke, through a medium that he would himself have compared with the sacred steam that rose from the life-giving cauldron of Caridwen, might just as well have been ‘I love you, I love you, I love you’ as anything that they actually were.

She didn’t even bother herself as to whether it gave him any pleasure to have her there like that. He pressed her tightly to him in the pauses of his talk, but he always went on again, as if to talk to her, much more than to caress her, was his grand relief. It was not that he refrained from caressing her. Sometimes his hands were on her bosom, sometimes round her hips, sometimes against her flanks, as she cuddled up to him; but his mind was far away most of the time, absorbed in what she could see was more important to him than anything else: to pour out his thoughts into an ear that was ready to hear!

And the wind howled round the house as she had never heard a wind howl, and the rain dashed itself against the window. This rain did not fall in a continuous stream, as it had done yesterday at Claudius's, but in furious intermittent gusts, under the impact of which it seemed sometimes as if the panes would be broken.

As in so many dramatic scenes that occur on this earth, there was no one there to take full cognizance of the significance of that scene: the young girl clinging so passionately to the unsightly form of an unceasing voice! Other human groups — other pairs of flesh-covered skeletons, as No-man would certainly have pointed out — must have been listening to this wild storm, which must have swept over all the roofs of Dorchester before it reached Glymes; but, if scenes between human beings are carried according to their intensity so far or not so far from our planet's surface into the enveloping atmosphere, this exchange of feeling, the man talking and the woman giving herself to the talker, made up a projectile of human emotion that like some towering psychic rocket must have come near to reaching the last circumference of troubled air that surrounds the orbit of our globe.

'I thought', he burst out, after a torrent of words that meant nothing to her, 'that I'd only to tell them clearly what I was — the new medium, after all these years, of that great power of the abyss that the bards and prophets of my race have groped for — for them — I won't say to accept — but to — to hear — to respect — not to turn what is my life into the — into the joke — oh, the devil's joke! — of what they call "scientific research".'

Here again he began to talk of things that the girl on his knees could make nothing of; but all of a sudden he stopped short, and a long terrible sigh, the sigh of a heart near its breaking-point, convulsed his whole frame. ‘You don’t think’, he said, in a very low but terrifyingly clear voice, ‘that’ — and she could feel his whole body stiffen beneath her— ‘that — they’re right — and that it’s all — that it’s all — tommy-rot?’

It may have been the combination of the tremendous gravity of his tone, the tragic desperation of that ultimate heart’s cry, with the commonplace expression ‘tommy-rot’, that hurt her so, but her nerves broke down at that point and she could bear no more. Slipping from his lap, she ran across the room, picked up the package she had brought for him, and, tearing off the paper and string as she returned, thrust the head into his hands.

His delight was touching to see! He kissed the grotesque thing, he hugged it, he mumbled incoherent gibberish over it, he examined it, he turned it first one way and then another, he scrabbled over it, he scraped at it, he slobbered over it, he tapped it, he smelt it, he held it to his eyes, to his mouth, to his forehead, and even to his ears.

Presently, as he began chuckling to himself and behaving as an idiot might do to whom someone has restored some lost and precious plaything, she became aware that there was a new sound audible somewhere that was struggling to make itself heard above the roaring of the wind and the weird noises in the roof. There was something about this extra sound, added to all the rest, that was too much for Wizzie’s nerves; and the breaking-point of her tension, as was generally the case with her, showed itself in a burst of realistic anger.

What she felt now — and it was a natural woman's instinct — was that Urien was giving way, that his loathsome fuss over a block of wood was just a fit of wilful hysterics out of which he ought to be shaken. She found herself on the point of snatching the obscene thing from him. She did lay her hand on it; but he clutched it to him and looked at her with a glance of heart-breaking supplication. There was a momentary contest between them, which was ended by Wizzie suddenly feeling that she was behaving as Mr Cumber's daughter would have behaved. So she drew away. But that was her Urien, her Black Man of Glymes, sitting there before her, and it was unbelievable that her mind couldn't get into contact with his mind through all this nonsense.

'What is this thing?' she shouted at him just as if he had been deaf, while all the while that strange new sound kept hammering at her own consciousness. 'What is this thing? What do you want with it? What good can it do you?'

She stood above him trembling with anger. She felt as if he was hugging this lump of wood out of deliberate devilishness, hugging it instead of her, hugging it to keep her away, just when fate and the storm and everything has given them this moment alone. There he was, her Glymes man, touching her, alone with her, she herself, he himself, and out of pure devilry he must play the imbecile and hug this loathsome thing!

'What are you doing with it? What is it?' she repeated hoarsely. Her hand was still on it as he clutched it against his jersey, but she no longer tried to take it from him, for somewhere at the back of her mind she could hear the voice of Dumbell's wife telling the doctor that she'd been forced to burn a horrid piece of wood.

'You — don't — understand,' he said, still shrinking back in his chair with the same supplicating look. 'It — he — I — always had some creature that was the body of our longing, of our “hiraeth”, of our desire, the incarnation of our power to break through and to pass—’

But Wizzie interrupted him. She felt like screaming at him! She felt if she could only outscream the storm, outscream those noises in the roof, outscream that new sound, which now struck her as a furious knocking at the outer door, she could get beyond this idiocy of his, back and behind it, where somewhere, in that majestic personality, abode the calm, unruffled Urien she loved.

‘To break through what?’ she shrieked, swaying up and down before him like a wounded pigeon and lowering her face till it almost touched his. ‘You can’t break through life except by dying. And what’s more, if you don’t stop this, if you don’t drop that thing, you’ll kill me!’

This last word of hers did seem to affect him, for, making an obvious effort to satisfy her, he squeezed the creature into the space between his thigh and the chair, and took her hands in his own.

‘But, child,’ he said, ‘I think there’s someone at the door. Do — you — mind — going to see?’

She straightened herself and listened. Yes, he was right. But to be heard in this wind they must be knocking with a heavy stick! And she thought of D.’s great cudgel. Was it D. come after her? She hurried to the window and looked out, and the second her back was turned to him Urien repossessed himself of the head and began to fondle it like an infant.

But there, outside the door, drenched to the skin, his long black coat clinging pitifully to his grotesque figure, without hat, without stick, without anything to mitigate the woefulness of his appearance, was Old Funky!

Driven by a kind of frenzy to get in out of the storm, Mr Urgan was striking at the door, kicking at the door, butting at the door, and raving at the door. The author of the First Gospel might have made him a symbol of the wicked man shut out of Heaven. His coat-tails were so soaked with rain that the wind, which whirled round him and seemed every minute about to lift him bodily off his feet, could do no better than hoist them up an inch or so, flap them against his rump for a minute, and then, dropping them, cause them to wrap themselves closely round his hips in the reverse way to the manner in which the parade-coats of the grenadiers of former times used to be folded back.

Wizzie gazed at him through the window with round eyes and rounder mouth. It was one of those spectacles that Chance and Nature combine to produce that are so evenly balanced between sickening pitifulness and monstrous humour that the same person could laugh or cry at the sight, according to the turn of a straw.

When the noise of the storm rose to such a pitch that the swinging of a battering-ram against the door would be no more than the tapping of a wren's beak, Mr Urgan, in his blind passion — for by this time the little man was well-nigh beside himself — would draw back from the obdurate door, only to rush at it in the next lull like a beast with a pack of hounds behind him, when he would beat at it with his fists, and kick at it with his feet, and even pound at it with his head.

Now there was something about Old Funky's frantic fury to get in that excited in Wizzie not fear — for at that moment she felt no more afraid of him than if he'd been a demented jackdaw — but a savage desire to keep him out. The sight of him there — and she felt sure the room was too dark for him to see her, even though she pressed her face against the pane — raging so obstinately and so helplessly, had a most curious effect on her. It brought back, as if by a series of livid lightning flashes, her struggle with him in the caravan. She was pressing her face now against the pane. Her thin nose, flattened at the tip, must have assumed, had Mr Urgan been able to see it, the likeness of a crooked sixpence. And as she stared she seemed to engage again in that wild struggle. 'I could keep you out!' she kept repeating through her clenched teeth, while her face, pressed yet closer against the window, enlarged the blurred whiteness of that wicked sixpence.

But the wind began gathering in force just then to a pitch that made her draw back. The noises in the Glymes roof-top were increasing too, and the whole house seemed to rock and shake.

She glanced at Urien. He was still muttering and crooning over that beast-head, and it struck her that his great swarthy face had lost its accustomed restraint and had relaxed into a maudlin abandonment. What she saw now in his expression thoroughly shocked her. It was much worse than the tragic look he had worn when she first came in.

The noises in the roof were so alarming now that she couldn't help glancing up at the ceiling. 'Don't you blow down!' she thought; and to her surprise she realized she had uttered this thought in audible words.

But there came a lull now, as if the storm were drawing back for a yet more terrible onslaught, and in that momentary cessation the frantic knocking at the door became audible to Urien. He listened a moment, and looked at her with a puzzled expression. 'There's someone out there,' he said peevishly. 'Why don't you let them in?'

'Don't you move!' she cried. 'I was keeping him out; but I'll let him in!'

She opened the door, meeting as she did so a startling rush of cold air, and ran down the passage.

Urien must have shot the bolt after he admitted her, and the pressure of the wind outside was so great that, when she'd drawn it and turned the handle, the door flew open with such a swing that it flung her against the wall and dashed Old Funky against her. She pushed him aside, however, and, using all her strength, got the thing shut and bolted. As she did this, the image of Nance rose up before her, but she said to herself, ‘She must have gone to Jenny’s. It must have begun before she started.’

‘Come, then,’ she said crossly. ‘Come in, now you’re here!’

Mr Urgan seemed too dazed to notice her crossness. He stood leaning against the wall, recovering his breath, and fumbling, so it seemed to her, in an attempt to get something out from some inside pocket.

‘Come in, now you’re here,’ she repeated; and he followed her into the room.

He showed signs of suspicious alarm when he saw Urien staring at him from above the object clutched in his hands.

But Wizzie’s nerves rendered her desperate and shameless. ‘This is Lovie’s father,’ she cried in an unnaturally high-pitched voice, ‘come to ask how his child is getting on.’

But Urien only nodded. Then he seemed to realize that something was required of him, and, with a curious stiffening of his ravaged visage till it resumed something of its normal dignity, he forced himself to speak quietly and naturally.

‘I’m — not—’ he said, in a low faraway tone, like the voice of a living soul concealed behind a mask of decomposition. ‘I’m — not — myself — just now. Don’t mind — talking — business — you two. I’m — not — very — well — today. Take — no — notice — of me.’

This said, his whole countenance seemed to change before their eyes, becoming like the face of that ancient Anarch so eloquently described by Milton, until, quite relapsed into his former condition, he fell to murmuring to himself, and finally to cuddling upon his lap the object that gave him such strange comfort.

The alarming noises in the roof above her, the tornado of wind and rain, her heart-sick consciousness of Urien’s condition, made the presence of this dripping figure, under whose boots little pools were forming on the carpet, of less consequence to Wizzie than if he had been Lovie's doll.

But it was not like a doll that he looked. Never had Mr Benjamin Urgan so closely resembled a monkey. He was like a monkey escaped in the storm from some barrel-organ that had been washed down the Frome!

All the girl's heart and soul were set on that lamentable figure in the chair. Was it a relief to her, or was it not, that his trouble took the form of this maudlin, gloating pleasure? For himself it might be better, better than the despair from which it was an escape, but for her there was something degrading and sickening, something that made her loathe the whole business of life, in seeing him like this.

She noticed, as she watched him, that his hair had grown perceptibly greyer. If in its tight negroid curls it had formerly resembled moss, it now resembled some species of lichen, lichen growing on a log that had been dead for a thousand years! 'How could Nance leave him', she thought, 'just to do some wretched shopping?' But then she remembered that, after all, the woman had come to fetch him the ghastly plaything he was now fondling with such satisfaction.

A singular peculiarity of the human mind is the power it has of hypnotizing itself, or, perhaps one should say, of anaesthetizing itself, at moments of great stress by the contemplation of small and insignificant details amid the whims and caprices of the inanimate. Thus it came about that — when Wizzie turned away sick at heart from the spectacle of her hero's degradation and began saying to herself, 'It's all those Cumbers. This would never have happened if he hadn't worked for those Cumbers' — instead of taking any notice of Mr Urgan, who was now unfolding with intense absorption some species of document he had at last extracted from the inner covering of his drenched person, she gazed with interest at the progress of a thin trickle of water that, originating in one of the pools that had formed themselves at the man’s feet, was making its way with apparent intention along the pattern in an extremely dirty carpet. For the girl’s mind at that moment, as she stood between these two fathers, feeling as little for the one as if he had been a pond-water frog that had hopped in, and so much for the other that she would have given her life’s work to heal his trouble, the immediate pressing preoccupation was to note if that trickle stopped, or didn’t stop till it reached the place where the pattern ended.

But Old Funky had now found what he sought. ‘Here — take this! Read this! ‘T is dry as a bone. I got ‘un out here, no matter for this end-o’-world ‘urry-cain, and ’tisn’t many what ‘ud ‘ave done it, not for love of a ‘ard ‘eart like the ‘eart some ‘ave got under their pretty titties!’

Lifting her eyes from the floor, Wizzie took the envelope he handed to her, and stared frowningly at it. Old Funky’s allusion to the emphatic feminine curves thrown into relief by her dress caused her bitter amusement. What an example of those tricks of fate which D. must needs call ‘irony’, that she should have put this dress on to please Urien, only to catch the libidinous eye of Lovie’s father!

What with the howling of the storm and the terrifying sounds— ‘Those aren’t ghost noises,’ she thought — that were getting worse in the roof, she could make nothing of this paper except that it was some sort of legal production and contained the word ‘whereas’ written many times in capital letters.

‘Take off your coat and lay it over that chair,’ she said to him, letting the hand in which she held his document sink down wearily against her side.

But he waved this suggestion away. ‘Ben Urgan’, he assured her, ‘bain’t woon to rin arter a female ‘ooman through a come-to-Judgment ‘urry-cain, only to dry his wold coat at her fire. What be writ in this ’ere dockymint be a matter for King’s Jury. ’Tis to save ‘ee from court and scandal I’ve a-follered ‘ee here, and back Ol’ Ben don’t stir, though the ‘eavens fall, till you’ve a-seed ‘un!’

Wizzie gave him a blank stare. Then, glancing at Urien, she found — and oh, she thanked the Lord for that! — that he’d fallen asleep, his massive head nodding and swaying over the object in his lap.

“Tis like this,’ said Mr Urgan, catching at one of his dripping coat-tails and unceremoniously squeezing the water out of it where he stood, ‘and ‘ee’ll larn to harken when ‘ee, larn me business! This ’ere dockymint, wot ‘ee treats so light, be to tell all and sundry that me missus be a-summoning of ‘ee, calling of ‘ee, that is, afore court and kingdom, to answer the charge —’ Here Old Funky shut his eyes, the better to recall what he had evidently, with the utmost difficulty, learnt by heart. ‘The charge of alienmating me affections. Her do say, nevertheless, and her lawyer do say arter her, that if your good man pay over to she summat in cash, and pay over to he summat in cash, this ’ere charge of alienmating, writ in this ’ere dockymint in King’s Court Hebrew, can be nillified. The sum she mentioned, as settling thik little job to the peace of all, were fifteen guineas, and a trifle of a fiver on top of that for they as made out the same. Her did mention summat about taking a few pounds less, for old acquaintance’ sake, but that’s ‘atween she and thee wone self! I washes me hands o’ such meddlings wi’ the course of law and government.

‘What be doing of, ‘ee mad ‘ooman? ’Ere, ’ere! Gie ‘un over to I — gie ‘un over! Darn it, wench, what’s come to ‘ee, then?’

This rush of protests was caused by the fact that Wizzie, her endurance quite at an end, was making an attempt to tear in half this formidable piece of foolscap with the clear intention of throwing it into the fire!

Two things, however, made it possible for Old Funky to rescue his ‘dockymint’, the first being that the paper was hard to tear, and the second that the fire in this house of confusion was nearly out. But the scene was a sufficiently shameful one. It would have been still more so if the uncanny creakings and groanings above and the elemental hubbub outside the walls hadn’t reduced to comparative negligibility all conflicts that were merely human. But they weren’t an engaging sight just then, the proceedings in that front room at Glymes: Old Funky, with his red wig awry — nor was it the first time that in a struggle with Wizzie this unholy topknot had been disarranged — and with his thin, black, dripping form swaying about on the wet floor, struggling frantically to get the paper away from Wizzie; and Wizzie, with a flush of dangerous anger on both cheeks, and with her ‘lurin’ figure more ‘lurin’ than her antagonist had ever seen it, tugging at the paper so as to throw it on the fire!

If indeed there is any justification for our theory that by the intensity of the magnetism released in such scenes a lasting impression is made on the chemistry of the finer air, it might well happen that, should any reader of this narrative take the trouble, on some dark stormy afternoon, to visit the ploughed-over dump-heap by the gravel-pit where the road from Piddletrenthide crosses the lane from Stinsford, he would become conscious, between pit and hedge, of the furious wrestling of a beautifully formed woman with a harlequin-like man, until with a leap and a cry a third figure, more startling than either, dissolves these eidola of emotion into the damp air around them!

For it was Enoch Quirm himself, and none other, who brought this shameful scene to an end. The shock of their physical contest must have roused him in a way their voices, however raised, were unable to do. At any rate, he awoke from his coma to see what looked to him like actual violence being offered to Wizzie by a veritable rain-goblin from whose black, tight-waisted, struggling form the water trickled to the floor.

Leaping up so suddenly that the head fell from his lap and went rolling along the carpet, Enoch Quirm — or, to be kind to him in his downfall, Urien of ‘yr Echwydd’ — came lurching towards them with such a terrible gleam in his dead eyes that Old Funky, in a paroxysm of panic, tottered backwards, tottered in fact so blindly that he tripped up over the beast’s head, which had come to rest in a pool of water, and fell to the floor. In falling, though luckily he was no heavyweight, he struck the back of his head such a violent blow on the iron fender that he lay stunned.

For a second Wizzie thought he was killed, and a queer reaction came over her. Forgetting all about her ally, she knelt down by the fallen man’s side and set herself to examine his hurt. As she bent over him and pushed back his wig, which was already bloodied into a new shade of red, she was no more conscious of Urien picking up his fallen fetish and hurrying out into the passage than she was conscious of a lull in the storm and the sound of a car in the road outside.

An emotion stranger than any she had ever had, or than she was ever destined to have, flooded her being at the sight of that white skull with the blood oozing from its wound. The past swept over her with an overwhelming rush; and it came into her mind that the last time she had touched that slippery surface it was from the marks of her own nails that the blood had come. Indescribable emotions welled up in her breast and shivered through her. Kneeling there, over that blood-stained skull, she reached the tragic level of mortal feeling where love and hate, blind savagery and infinite tenderness, melt into something for which there is no name.

What she had suffered, in shock and pain and outrage, when she yielded her maidenhood to this grotesque creature, seemed to return upon her, and to return in quite a different way from what she felt just now as she pressed her hot face against the window, watching his fury at the door. It returned softened, transformed, dissolved, no longer as a brutal violation but as something in which, with a wild self-laceration, she could even exult!

And what she felt now, as she pushed aside his repulsive wig and examined his scalp-wound, was something that never for one instant she had felt for her old D. How could a girl have any human feelings, good or bad, for a person like D. who, if you tickled him, didn't laugh, and if you pricked him, didn't bleed?

How it all came back, that wild struggle in the caravan that had ended in giving her Lovie! And, curiously enough, she now clearly remembered, as the dishevelled wig brought everything back, a detail of that scene that had sunk into complete oblivion. She remembered how, at the very moment she was digging her nails into this brittle death's-head, she was sure she heard — for he was stabled nearer to them then — the frightened neighing of her old horse!

As she thought of this, she suddenly stopped examining his cut, and, inserting her hand under his soaked clothes, groped for his heart. Her joy to feel it beating was so intense that she was deaf to the hooting of the car in the road, deaf to the sound of Urien's voice in the garden, and, thrusting her fingers into her mouth, she began to bite them.

Into this quite unconscious reversion to childhood she would never have been betrayed if the shock of Old Funky's fall and the sight of his naked skull hadn't stirred up the self within the self in the depths of her nature. Almost everyone has some childish habit to which he reverts in times of extreme stress; and this trick of biting her fingers was an earlier one with her than rubbing her knuckles. ‘Take your fingers out of your mouth!’ was an even more frequent admonishment from the convent sisters than ‘Stop doing that with your knuckles, child!’ But one of the tragedies of life is that, save for some guardian-angel in the invisible world, there is no eye to note the peculiar poignancy of the occasions when we revert to these childish gestures.

Whatever her guardian-angel, if Wizzie had one, thought of the way her mind worked as she bit her blood-stained fingers, what the girl said to herself, or rather what she said to the unconscious form beneath her, was something like this — and as the words took shape in her breast she stared at him with that intense, round-eyed look that had excited No-man when he first saw her: ‘You taught me my job. You taught me my power. You taught me my life. You recreated my body!’

The salt taste of Old Funky’s blood in her mouth still remained with her as, scrambling to her feet, she ran to where she had left her things, and, returning to his side with a clean handkerchief, folded it into a little pad and pushed it under the wig where the scalp had been injured.

Old Funky’s eyelids now began to quiver, and, by the time she’d adjusted the handkerchief and placed a cushion beneath his head, he opened his eyes and gazed into her face with the dazed confusion of someone coming round after an anaesthetic.

His first words were enough to show how much alive he was: ‘Where — be — me dockymint, wenchie?’ And then, after a pause, and a feeble effort to turn his head: ‘He ain’t a-stole ‘un, ‘ave ’e?’

But Wizzie, now that it was clear that the old rogue had suffered no serious injury, became a completely different girl. She jumped to her feet and gave him a look of disgusted contempt. ‘You stay just where you are!’ she said. ‘Wait a minute, though! I’m going to dry this at any rate.’

Thus speaking, in spite of his feeble resistance she managed to pull off his drenched coat. She then gazed round the room till she caught sight of a not over-clean rug spread out on a dingy sofa, and, having wrapped this, in spite of his protests, round the exposed person of the unfrocked Mr Urgan, she gave heed for the first time to what was going on outside the house.

The storm had abated. The noises in the roof had ceased. But other sounds — sounds that had reached her ears before, but without carrying the faintest ripple of a reflex to her brain — were now entering the house from the wide-open front door. She stood for a second, listening. Then, catching sight on the floor of Old Funky's 'dockymint', she picked it up and, tucking it under his rug, watched grimly the ecstatic delight with which the old wretch received it.

Events began now to follow one another, in this ceasing of the storm, with the precipitation of a stir in a cage of birds from which the covering has been removed.

Running out into the passage, Wizzie could see, framed in the open doorway, surrounded by a spectral afternoon light — from which the storm, ere it went, seemed to have sucked all natural livingness, leaving it wan and ghastly like the skin of a corpse — the towering figure of Enoch Quirm, assisted by a stranger, half-carrying, half-supporting the collapsed form of Nance.

'The storm frightened her,' Urien found time to call out as their eyes met, and she noticed that he had actually propped his heraldic monster on the top of the umbrella-stand, where what seemed its head lay tilted against the wall. 'It's the old trouble,' he said, when they'd got her through the door, and he spoke as naturally and quietly as Wizzie had ever heard him speak. 'It's her heart. But I'll soon get her round.'

Hearing him speak like this, Wizzie couldn't help thinking, 'He can shake it off for her, though he can't for me!' And as they carried Nance in and laid her on the wretched sofa from which she had herself just snatched the rug, it was upon him, and not upon Nance or Old Funky, that she kept her eyes fixed. She and the stranger — who was clearly the taxi-driver — now stood side by side as Urien attended to the collapsed woman. Watching him as he prepared his drug, she uttered a prayer of intense gratitude to her convent's God, for it seemed certain to her now that his malady was a temporary one.

She began talking quite garrulously to the taxi-man, so immeasurable was her relief; but alas! it didn't take long for her heart to sink again. She had scarcely been called to Nance's side by a smile and a whisper from the recovered woman, and had only just bent over her in response, when she knew by instinct, without actually seeing his face, that he was only waiting for an opportunity to slip out into the passage. Yes! When she lifted her head from her talk with Nance he had already been out to the umbrella-stand; and now, with his fetish under his arm, and craftily avoiding her eye, he was fidgeting about the room. 'He's looking for a place to put it,' she thought, as she pretended not to notice him. 'If I'd been that Cumber girl, I'd have got rid of it while he was fussing over Nance.'

Had the shameless No-man been present while his father, looking like a blasphemous sacristan, made a pile of his old Welsh books and balanced Dormarth's mate with exquisite nicety on the top of them, and while Old Funky, squatting like a baboon in shirt and braces, peeped under the rug that covered his knees to see with his own eyes that Wizzie hadn't stolen the paper he had apparently braved the storm to give her, it may well have occurred to him that these obscure abortions, the wooden heraldic one and the parchment legal one, were striking modern instances of the ancient primitive belief in what recent research has come to name ‘exteriorized souls’.

Meanwhile, Wizzie, though in a quieter and sadder key, had resumed her conversation with the elderly taxi-driver, lending a grave ear to his impressive account of his drive through the storm — and indeed of other drives through many other storms, in a receding perspective of catastrophic motoring. The man was an elderly Dorset man of not a little personal dignity, who in his day had been a family coachman; and Wizzie couldn’t help being struck by the discretion with which he suppressed the curiosity he must have felt about the singular appearance presented by Old Funky, and about the childish preoccupation of the master of the house with a pedestal of books upon which he was trying to balance a wooden idol.

‘It’s Mr Urgan, from the Fairfield,’ she explained to him at the first opportunity she got. ‘He was caught in the storm, and had a bad fall. Yes, this storm has upset us terribly. We thought the house was coming down! Mr Quirm is a nervous gentleman anyway’ — here she lowered her voice to an appropriate whisper— ‘and all this’ — and she glanced at the unfrocked ring-master— ‘has upset him. Oh, yes, and I’d be so grateful, Mr Netherby, if you’d take the old man back — his coat’s drying — you see how upset we’ve been — we’ve let the fire out — back to the fair-ground. Could you do that for me?’ She paused to open her purse and to hand him a pound note. ‘No, never mind the change, Mr Netherby! Only get him safe into his caravan. Will you do that? And if you would do something else for me?’ And she smiled confidentially. ‘We live at Mrs Dearth’s in Friary Lane — No-man the name is. And I want to send a note to Mr No-man. Could you go round that way and leave it? Mrs Dearth will give it to him if he’s not in. Sit down, won’t you? I shan’t be a moment.’

Too polite to sit down, but noticing that Nance from her sofa was nodding encouragingly to him, as much as to say, ‘Do whatever the young lady’s asking you,’ the ex-family-coachman, who in his time had seen such amazing scenes between aristocratic four walls that the spectacle of Mr Urgan in his shirt and of Mr Quirm building pedestals for beast-heads must have presented itself as a simple vignette of ordinary middle-class life, stepped forward to within a couple of yards of the sofa of his recent fare, and joined respectfully in the amiable commiserations she was extending to Old Funky.

As Wizzie sat down to compose her letter at his writing-table, Urien’s pile of books collapsed for the tenth time, and the poor man cast upon his idol a look of hopeless apology, as though he heard the very voice of this brutish image of human desire assuring him, ‘If I’m not housed to my taste in a very few minutes, the curse of Math the son of Mathonwy, and of Gwydion the son of Dôn, and of Manawyddan the son of Llŷr, be on you! May you do nothing else to your dying day but love me in place of your God, cherish me in place of your love, and look for the secret of life and death in me alone!’

In contemptuous disregard of both the prophet and his beast, Wizzie disentangled a pen and an inkpot from the litter in front of her and composed the following letter:

He followed me out here but your father frightened him and he’s gone. Am staying the night. Come over and fetch me if you like tomorrow afternoon. Not earlier though, as we shall all sleep late. I think your father’s a little better. Don’t worry. Love to Lovie.

Your escaped What’s-her-name, Wizz.

She had only just signed her name when she became aware that Urien, having given up for the nonce his struggle with the books, was watching her with an expression of diabolical cunning. She found an envelope, however, and got her letter fastened up and addressed before she betrayed that she knew he was watching her; but, when their eyes did meet, the gleam of ferocious craftiness with which he whispered his request startled her not a little.

‘Run in next door for me, will you, child, and get Thuella to come? But don’t go away yourself! I want you both. But tell Thuella to make the excuse of cooking something for Nance. Do you see? I want us all three to meet in the kitchen — it’ll be quite easy; you needn’t look like that! — while Nance is still out here.’

To say that Wizzie was startled by the treacherous cunning in the majestic features of her Black Man as he bent down and whispered these words, would be to understate it. She was outraged and made furious. The mortuary smell of his breath, which, if his wife’s was like the fragrance of cowslips, may be said to have resembled an emanation from long-dead seaweed, did not lessen her feeling; and with an expression in her face that D. knew only too well, but that Urien had never seen before, she answered coldly, and no doubt more loudly than was necessary, ‘Certainly. I’ll be seeing Thel soon; but whether we’ll come over here tonight, I’m sure I can’t say! No doubt she’ll come sooner or later. But it’s too early yet to say what we’ll do.’

With this remark she left him to his obsession, and, crossing the room, gave her letter into the care of Mr Netherby.

It is a curious weakness in human nature that the fact of a person who hurts our feelings being unsettled in his wits doesn’t prevent our injured egoism from experiencing its usual reaction. Wizzie was as angry with Urien now as if he had been as sane as Mr Cumber! And in her anger she reverted in her thoughts to the man she was resolved to leave. 'D.'s a double-dyed fool; but never once' — thus she pondered, in her ignorance of what the Scummy Pond could have told her— 'has he betrayed me with Thel.' She even found herself, in her anger with Urien, casting an indulgent eye upon Old Funky's unappealing figure as he squatted on the floor.

Women are not less but far more polygamous than men, only it is a diffused and psychic polygamy, a polygamy that doesn't require for its satisfaction any contact of flesh with flesh; and they are, for this very reason, so protected from being exposed in these spiritual infidelities that they are often able to hide them even from themselves.

Until she began to have this romantic feeling for Urien she had no idea from her own experience what it was like to be in love; and it had been her ignorance of this emotion that had tossed her first into Old Funky's arms and then into No-man's. Even now she was far more in the dark with regard to her real feelings, as the heroines in her story-books called it, towards D. and the circus-man than towards Urien.

But she could have faced all this — for Wizzie had immense reserves of spirit and vitality — faced all she was enduring between her three men, had it not been that, below it all, there was such a struggle going on in her soul between the whole lot of them and her work. It was this struggle — tragic in the strict Hegelian sense of being the encounter of almost equal antagonists — that made her fingers tremble as she handed her letter to the taxi-driver. She could have contemplated this scene — Old Funky, on his feet now and wrestling with his drenched coat, which, though she had thrown it over the coal-scuttle, had got no heat from the dead fire; Nance, watching her husband through her blurred spectacles as he fidgeted over his tower of books — and could have endured it with an unfastidious feminine acceptance of the human mêlée, had it not been for the terrible contest in her mind that was going on beneath it all.

Thus, as she turned her eyes from one to another, she felt as if she had been stripped, not only of her pretty, tight-fitting dress but of her skin. She felt raw and aching all over. A morbid minuteness of observation, a savage realism, dominated her impression of all these people. Mr Netherby had a drop of rheum hanging from his nose, and she wondered when it would fall. Old Funky's wig had got disarranged again, and she could see the edge of her blood-stained handkerchief. Nance, in the process of being restored by Urien, had suffered such a ruffling of her toilet that a couple of hairpins trailed across one of her ears at the end of a dishevelled wisp of hair. Urien's own wretched clothes, always untidy, had recently become so rumpled that there had appeared a grotesquely flapping end of a not over-clean shirt between his jersey and trousers.

To her present mind, or rather to her exposed skin in its present nervous sensitivity, each of these persons became nothing else but the particular unpleasant detail upon which her morbid eye now dwelt. The ex-coachman became a drop of rheum; Nance became a couple of hairpins suspended from a wisp of hair; Old Funky became the edge of a bloody handkerchief; Urien became the strip of a soiled shirt. And so exhausted did she feel in mind and body that when Old Funky, as he set forth under the careful escort of Mr Netherby, poked his tightly buttoned rain-soaked garment and whispered in her ear, 'For another twenty quid, wenchie, tell your good man — and that'll make a snug 'arf-'undred — I'd let 'ee have the old hoss. He ain't what 'a were, and our Pop's got afeared o' he; so 'twould be a kindness to take 'un off us,' she hadn't the heart to respond.

A dead sea of such weary distaste for the whole business of life, distaste for man and beast, distaste for the smallest effort to change the drift of fate, took possession of her that she let Mr Netherby help the little man to shuffle across to his taxi without so much as a word of farewell.

Half an hour later, leaving Nance still on her sofa and Urien back again in his chair, Wizzie did what she'd never done before: made her way alone through the passage between the two houses and knocked at the Wyes' door.

Thuella herself opened it. The girl held her finger to her lips to enjoin caution and began whispering eagerly to her. 'They're all in the studio. Let's go into the kitchen and lock the door! That's what I have to do now when I want to be alone. Father was bad enough, but — my dear! — it's far worse with these two. You know what poor old Dumbell is, but she — oh, my precious! — she — Why, I even felt sorry for Dad this morning when she went at him! And Dad came back so excited from Jenny's. He said he'd given her a proper fright. He didn't say much, because of them being here; but I've never seen him like he was last night. I really felt — oh, I don't know! — but he seemed more of a person when he came back last night. And do you know what? I took his side against her, and he was as pleased as if I'd given him a kiss! So when he went to bed I did give him a kiss, and, do you know, he gave me such a look, and then, all low and solemn, he gave me his blessing! I didn't know whether to laugh or cry. Listen, Wizz — oh, I can't wait to tell you my great news! — but do you think he did any good with Jenny?'

By this time the two young women — and Wizz began to feel her spirits rapidly coming back under the spell of her friend's excitement — were safe in Thel's cosy kitchen, where it was an indescribable relief to the younger girl to warm herself at the glowing stove. But for some reason she felt reluctant to tell her friend all she knew about the effect of Mr Wye's visit to Friary Lane. She was no sentimentalist; but there had been a note struck in her morning's encounter with Jenny that made her prefer to keep her and Claudius out of this particular conversation. So, to change the topic, as they sat facing the open stove, she asked her friend how they'd got on during the storm.

'Wasn't it awful?' replied Thuella, and then held her peace for an instant, while an almost mystical look came into her expressive face. 'But — I'll tell you — all about that — later. How's Urien now? I suppose Nance was in that taxi we heard?'

She fell into silence again; and Wizzie thought, 'She's keeping back something about Urien, just as I am about Jenny. Oh dear! What people we all are!'

But the other went on now in a low musing tone, as if talking to herself. 'It was my fault at the start. I put it into D.'s head to introduce him to the Cumbers. It all began at that Antelope party.'

Wizzie looked at her closely. 'Do you think, Thel,' she said gravely, 'that he'll be himself again, after a time? Nance came to D.'s today — did you know that? — to get him one of those damned heads. I couldn't bear to see him with it. It was like Sister Agatha, when she got queer about the image of the Blessed Infant. I wish now that D. hadn't let him have it.'

This time it was the elder girl who changed their topic of conversation. 'Yes, it was the worst storm I've ever known here. How quiet everything seems now! Dad thinks there's a chimney, or a piece of the roof, blown down. Our fire, in there, smoked terribly. We could hardly sit in the room. But Dumbell's been out, and can't see anything wrong. We've always called those noises our "Glymes ghost", and we'd look silly — oh, my sweet one, how lovely you are in that dress! — if it turns out that there's been something wrong with the roof all these years. But you wait, my angel, till you hear my great news! I've not told a soul yet. You'll be the first.'

At this, she bent down and pulled up first one and then the other of the most scarlet stockings that Wizzie had ever seen. Her stockings were the only finery Thuella had on that day. For the rest, she wore her working-smock and a long faded skirt.

‘Tell me about it now,’ whispered Wizzie, trying to throw more eagerness into her tone than she felt.

‘Listen, Thel,’ said Wizzie abruptly. ‘May I stay the night with you? I’ve told D. I might.’

The elder girl jumped to her feet and clapped her hands. ‘Have you really? Oh, what joy, what joy! We’ll talk and talk! That’s when I’ll tell you what’s happened — when we’re in bed and all’s quiet. Oh, you dear, how sweet of you!’ And she threw her arms round her.

Their embrace, to which Wizzie, in her present mood of warmth and nervous recovery, responded more sympathetically than usual, was interrupted by two distinct knocks at the door in the hallway, followed by a third, a little louder. ‘It’s Urien!’ cried Thuella. ‘That’s his signal!’

Leaving the door open behind her, so that Wizzie saw all she did, she answered the three knocks by three quick taps from her side, and, admitting the man into the hallway, led him straight into the kitchen. Here, the minute he was safely inside and they were all three together, she locked the door again.

The big man was in a terribly excited state. ‘Don’t let me—’ he gasped as soon as he was inside. ‘But it’s a good thing’ — and he lowered his voice to an inaudible whisper— ‘that I’m the...’

Wizzie felt completely at a loss what to say to him, at a loss to understand what had brought him here or what notion he’d got now into his disordered brain. She was also completely in the dark as to how far Thuella comprehended his manias. They all three hesitated for the flicker of a second, standing together in front of the warm stove; and then, in the spontaneous and instinctive way natural enough when a couple of young women are standing in a formidable man’s presence, Thuella took possession of Wizzie’s hand.

Wizzie, however, who never liked it when her friend became what she always thought of as too demonstrative, frowned nervously and pulled her hand away. For some reason this harmless gesture, which at the worst was a thing of overstrained nerves, seemed to hoist up the dam and release the sluice of their visitor’s feelings.

‘Don’t ‘ee mind her,’ he said hurriedly, laying his hand consolingly on Thuella’s shoulder. ‘It’s the same all over the world! We may beg and beg, but it’s no avail! The thing to do’ — and he bent down towards Thuella, totally disregarding Wizzie— ’is to let your love transform itself into — into the force that makes the mystery tremble!’

Urien seemed so helpless and so agitated as he stood before them there, mumbling about unreturned love, and his form seemed so unwieldy and so much too big for the little kitchen, that the two girls exchanged glances wondering where to seat him. ‘Let’s get the one in the hall,’ Thuella whispered, and, unlocking the door, she succeeded, with Wizzie’s help, in carrying in the old rusty iron garden-chair that nobody had bothered that year to drag into the garden. Unhooking from its peg her own domestic overall, she threw this over the ironwork to lessen its chill and persuaded the big man to trust the chair with his full weight.

Wizzie never forgot the tragic look of supplication that he threw — and he looked his full age tonight, looked as if he might be her grandfather — first at one of them and then at the other. He made little groping movements, too, with his hands towards them as they leaned over the backs of their chairs.

‘He wants me to sit on his knee,’ thought Wizzie; but immediately afterwards the ridiculous notion entered her tired head that he wanted both of them to sit on his knee!

It was queer how in her nervous state her consciousness of the least physical movement that anyone made became twice as intense as it would normally have been; but it was queerer still that her impressions in this unnatural condition reverted to old obscene talks between the Urgans over their caravan fire! What would those two have made of this scene in Thel’s kitchen?

Urien all this time seemed struggling against some weight upon his spirit that was pressing him down. Even those groping movements with his hands, directed first to one of them and then to the other, had ceased, and certain spasmodic shivers and jerks of his big frame — resembling what we so calmly call the ‘automatic movements’ of the animal we are killing — had taken their place.

But great incalculable Nature, who is often so much kinder to her misfits than any of their fellow-mortals, chose, in her arbitrary waywardness, that Urien should catch a quick feminine glance that now passed between the two girls. It is a mistake to assume that a mind unbalanced in one point becomes less than normal in others. It often, on the contrary, becomes ten times more penetrating! And what the unfortunate man caught in this look between them was conditioned by the difficulty, to which reference has already been made, that most of us find in suppressing our own egoism in dealing with the obsessions of others. Had Wizzie and Thuella — and they often spoke of this when it was too late — been as alive as they should have been to the man’s trouble, and alive, too, to the terrible sharpening of his wits by his very malady, they would have spared him this cruel exchange of weary sanity. As it was, the whole fury of the force within him, the monstrous craving that possessed him to find them linked to each other and to him in a particular way, shattered itself in a deadly explosion against this fatal concert of cold-blooded reason.

The thing happened naturally enough. His mind, like that of all persons with fixed ideas, was preoccupied with one thought only; theirs, on the contrary, were full of agitations of their own, totally unconnected with their relation to him. But the naturalness of the spark does not lessen the force of the conflagration that follows it; and both the girls drew back in dismay at what they now saw and heard.

Enoch leapt from his iron chair and rose towering above them, his striking lineaments convulsed with passion. His dead eyes flashed as Wizzie had never supposed they could; nor did the grotesque detail that Thuella's overall continued to cling to his unwieldy bulk bring the least flicker of amusement into their frightened faces.

'So that's it — you women!' he broke out, and the instinctive cunning of his possessed spirit was shown in the way, for all his fury, he kept his tone low so that it should not reach the Glymes parlour. 'It's nothing to you that I've put my last hope upon this moment! It's nothing to you that I've taken your' — and he fixed his flaming eyes on Thuella— 'feeling for you' — and he turned them on Wizzie— 'to break through into the mystery that maddens me!'

Speaking in a lower and lower voice as he went on, but more and more rapidly and passionately, he now bent his great head and moved his swaying bulk nearer and nearer to the two girls. Unconscious of what they did as they drew away, they pressed close to each other, Thuella clutching Wizzie's arm, and Wizzie clinging to Thuella's smock.

‘Nothing,’ he went on, his fingers closing and unclosing round the iron rim of the chair from which he had risen, and at one second actually lifting it from the ground, ‘nothing, nothing to either of you, any more than it is to them! Well! It’s over now. Between you all — you and these Cumbers and he, my own son, and Nance, my own wife — you’ve done it at last, done what you’ve all been trying to do ever since I told you — fool, fool, fool, to tell you — what I know and what I am! If John Rhŷs were alive, I’d have left you all, years ago, and gone to tell him the whole thing. He’d have understood, for he put me on the track of it. He knew how all Taliesin’s prophecies were about me. He knew how all the old bards worshipped what works through me. He knew the mysterious secret of my race, of his race — that straining, that longing, that yearning, that craving, that madness to break through! “Hiraeth” is our word for it — no other tongue on earth has a word like that! — and he knew what it meant. Desire, but not ordinary desire. Desire grown beside itself! Desire driven against custom, driven against habit, driven against the cowardice of mankind — that’s what “hiraeth” is!’

He paused; and Wizzie felt as though Thel’s hot fingers clutching her wrist had pulses in them like burning fever. She herself was having to swallow and swallow, for there was a lump in her throat that she hadn’t felt since the day she said good-bye to her horse. As is generally the case when women listen to the passionate madness of a man’s life-illusion, what both the girls were feeling, what was making Wizzie swallow that lump and Thel grip her wrist till it hurt, was their own life-burden, their own self-pity. This lump in Wizzie’s throat was called up by Enoch’s tone, but the form it took, the picture reflected in its crystal globe, had no connection with anything he was saying. It wasn’t his demented ‘hiraeth’ that brought that lump. It was her own practical, definite, professional 'hiraeth', her longing to be whirling round the ring!

'What you women can't see,' the voice of their deranged giant was now whispering, and his voice was so low and yet so intense that it was like the wind lifting the tapestry in a royal death-chamber, 'and what those fools can't see, and what my son won't see, is that the power of the Underworld that our old bards worshipped, though it was always defeated, is the power of the Golden Age! Yes, it's the power our race adored when they built Avebury and Maiden Castle and Stonehenge and Caer Drwyn, when there were no wars, no vivisection, no money, no ten thousand times accursed nations! They twisted it all round later, the sly children of gold and of burning, turning the dew of darkness into evil, and Brân the Blessed into a demon. But the power that rushes through me when I go out there' — and he gave a jerk of his shoulder towards Maiden Castle— 'the power that I am, under my name Urien, lies too deep for them to destroy. Whether I'm Urien or not— "for all my mind is clouded with a doubt" — this "hiraeth" of my race, this baffled, this thwarted, this hopeless desire, that from the beginning of things has defied morality, custom, convention, usage, comfort, and all the wise and prudent of the world, can never be destroyed out of the human heart, now it has once appeared! It moves from the impossible to the impossible. It abolishes cause and effect. It strides from world to world creating new things out of nothing! It takes Nature between its fingers and evolution in the palm of its hand. It's more than desire. It's all the defeated longing, all the baffled longing, all the forbidden longing, all the beating against the walls, that makes the wind howl and the rain cry! And it will break through. I tell you girls this, as I've told it to Nance and as I've told it to my son. It'll break through. And when it breaks through, these four thousand years wherein the world has been deceived, and has left the way, will be redeemed, and what was intended to happen will be allowed to happen, and the superstition of science will be exploded forever!'

His huge physiognomy was softening now, as the breath of his inspiration died down, but his unwieldy figure still bowed, still stooped, still swayed forwards towards them, and his hands still kept clasping and unclasping over the rim of the iron chair.

'But', he went on, 'this — fulfilment — of — my — desire — I — shall — never see. Those people' — and he jerked his shoulder towards the parlour— 'and you women and Nance and my' — here a great sob rose in his gullet— 'and my son too — even my own son — have killed my chance of ever seeing it — I mean, in my soul' — and he struck himself on his chest— 'where the only reality do bide.'

Enoch's use of words as a rule was that of the upper middle class, so that when he said 'do bide' he was proving the depth of his emotion, for 'bide' must have been a frequent expression on the lips of that Quirm family who had — unless he was lying to his son on the top of Mai-Dun — adopted him at Shaftesbury.

'Yes, I shall — never — feel that power — any — more. It came on the wind; and on the wind it has gone away. When I kept my secret here' — and again he struck himself on the chest— 'where I've had it written from my birth, as she knew, and as Nance knows, I was strong in my faith. When I told my son, I was strong in my faith. But when I wrote of it for the world, the virtue went out of me! And now — you women, you women! Your hearts may love, but it's not with "hiraeth"; they may ache, but it's not with "hiraeth"; they may break, but they can never break as mine is breaking! But listen—'

He dropped the iron chair he was tilting as he bowed himself towards them, and it was as if his whole frame crumpled, wilted, and shrank. His features, too, lost their nobility, lost their massiveness, lost their very shape, and became decomposed like the face of a corpse.

'The wind from "yr Echwydd",' he murmured in a far-off voice that seemed to come through him rather than from him, 'the wind that — made me Urien — has carried Urien away. You women, you women, you care for none of these things! The "hiraeth" of the mystery doesn't touch you, never has touched you. It's your men and your children and your play you want, not to break through, not to — to — take life by the hair of its head and wring the secret out of it!'

His last words were spoken so low as to be scarcely audible; and after uttering them he was silent. The two girls, who were now shamelessly clinging to each other in scared bewilderment, noticed that the great drops of perspiration which had been slowly forming across his forehead like bubbles of turpentine oozing from a fir-trunk had taken to themselves, by reason no doubt of the upleaping of the flames in the open stove, a curious reddish tinge.

But he turned away from them now and moved towards the door. Wizzie made a slight step forward with the feeling that she must, she must help him, but Thuella pulled her back, and she lacked the spirit to break away.

But all the human life appeared to have gone out of Enoch Quirm. He seemed to grope with his hands, as a beast might do who was standing on his hind legs. He seemed also, in some manner that was shocking to see, to be pawing with his feet, as his great slippers scraped along the floor. This trouble with his slippers was understandable enough, as he had long since trodden down their heels and it was hard for him under normal conditions to keep them on; but Wizzie had the sharpest stab she was destined to know that night, when she saw him go out in this manner.

But the strange thing was the depth of the anger she still felt against him for refusing to respond to her devotion except by this crazy dragging in of Thel. With this anger she killed her pity. She felt as if his very madness were something he deliberately put on, part of his preference for Thel! ‘You’ve been strangling my love’, she thought with a proud sob, as the door closed on him, ‘inch by inch ever since it was born; and now I’ve done with you! You’ve been playing with me from the start. You’ve always liked Thel the best! You and Thel must have a complete understanding. Let Thel take care of you! I wash my hands of you!’ And, throwing off her friend’s hand, she stood absolutely still, and did not move a step even though she heard him fumbling and groping, like an animal without hands, to open the door into the passage between the two houses.

Thuella drew a deep breath. ‘You see?’ she whispered. ‘I’ve known it was coming; and so has Nance. He’s never been right since he worked for Cumber. I don’t know what they’ll do now, though, without that money.’

Wizzie looked at her in silence; and then, like a hand striking her in the face out of the invisible, the abominable loneliness of every single person in the world, the loneliness of our pain, of our despair, of our insanity, sent a shiver through her that made her feel sick and weak. She found herself trying to say something to Thuella, but, though her lips moved, not a syllable could she utter.

She turned away and remained motionless for a second, staring at the door, her mouth open, her hands hanging loose. Then something outside the Wizzie she knew took possession of her. ‘Stay where you are!’ she said in a tone like the fall of some small heavy object into water, and, rushing to the door, she opened it and closed it, crossed the hallway, and ran down the passage after him.

The place was dim, but there was light enough to see what made her knees knock together and her heart almost stop. She saw Enoch Quirm on his hands and knees. The man was moving down the passage, slowly and heavily, on all fours.

She was too paralysed to move. She just stood there and watched him. It wasn't until he reached the door at the other end that he rose unsteadily to his feet. Then, with a sound that seemed to herself like a piercing cry but was in reality a hardly audible whistling through her teeth, she ran after him and caught him up just as he was opening the door.

Together they confronted the unperturbed figure of Nance, who was passing at that moment from kitchen to study with the tea-tray in her hands. Only partially turning her head, she said quite quietly over her shoulder, 'Oh, there you are! I was just ready for you. Come in, Wizzie, dear! I hoped he'd manage to get you. Isn't Thuella coming?'

The familiar presence of his wife, the familiar look of the tea-tray, perhaps even — Heaven knows! — the piled-up pedestal of familiar books on which rested the head, seemed to bring the man back to his normal state.

Wizzie was the victim of such a whirl of indescribable relief mixed with proud anger that she began to feel sick in her stomach. Both relief and anger must have appeared in the look she gave the man when their eyes met, for he removed his with an almost hang-dog expression.

They all sat down at once round the table, and, like a child who turns from his nurse to his mother, Enoch felt for his wife's hand and, when he got hold of it, held it so tightly that the woman had to make a sign to the girl to pour out the tea.

'But you're ill,' she gasped as soon as she saw Wizzie's face more clearly. 'You're white as a sheet!'

Wizzie obeyed, and her colour slowly came back; but in a minute or two — though she saw that he was eating and drinking greedily — she had to beg Nance to let her go out for a second; and she had hardly shut herself into their lavatory when she was violently sick. After that, she felt better, though she vomited nothing but a little chocolate-coloured fluid; and on returning, though she refused to eat anything or to smoke a cigarette, she drank several cups of strong tea.

‘I’ll have a cigarette, my chuck!’ murmured Enoch to his wife the instant he’d finished. He pushed away his cup and plate then, but, though he lit his cigarette, there was something unnatural about the manner in which he leant his arms on the table and bowed his head over them. He was like a man who began to be overpowered by some secret drug that nobody had seen him take.

Wizzie thought she could detect — though the woman’s spectacles always made it hard to catch the niceties of her expression — a look of terror in Nance’s eyes. He seemed himself to be struggling against this seizure, for every now and then he would jerk his head up and take a whiff of his cigarette, only, however, to let it sink down again, till the fingers that held it hung finally at arm’s length by his side.

At last, as the two women watched him — both of them thoroughly frightened now — the cigarette slipped from his fingers and fell on the floor, where, taking advantage of the human trouble in the air, it set itself to satisfy its own private and inanimate ‘hiraeth’ by making fiery love to the poor faded carpet.

He made a feeble gesture to raise his head.

'Enoch — my chuck!' he murmured, and then, making what was evidently an heroic effort of his will, he heaved himself up almost straight in his chair and looked at his wife with one of the most natural smiles Wizzie had ever seen on his sombre face.

'Enoch, dabchick — not Urien! "I have forgot", as it says somewhere, "that name and that name's - " ' And once more his head sank on his arms.

Both the women were at his side now in consternation.

'Let's get him to the couch,' whispered Wizzie hoarsely, growing almost as pale as she had been before.

'We — can't! He's too heavy,' cried Nance. 'Oh, my God — what shall we do?'

'Shall I run across for Dunbar?' whispered Wizzie. 'Let's try, first,' said the other. And the support of their combined weight, the pressure of their hands, along with a half-conscious craving in the man's own body to be in a horizontal position, evoked just enough impetus to get him to the sofa. Once there, however, he sank down with a weight that seemed almost superhuman, as if his form were responding to the gravitational pull of the earth's centre with a more than normal response, and lay motionless with closed eyes.

It was with a gasp of relief that Wizzie watched his massive chest under his rumpled jersey rise and fall gently with his breathing. 'He's asleep,' she whispered to Nance. 'He was just worn out with — all this.'

The older woman made a gesture as if to lay her hand on his heart, but Wizzie caught her arm. 'Don't touch him. He's all right now. For pity's sake don't wake him! It's the effect of — of the storm.'

For a while they stood by his side, watching him intently; but his breathing continued quiet and natural, and at last, turning to each other, they drew a long deep sigh of relief.

‘Shall I put this over him?’ said Nance, picking up the rug that had covered Old Funky.

But Wizzie shook her head. ‘For God’s sake,’ she whispered crossly, ‘don’t bother him! If he has a good sleep now — No! Don’t touch the fire! Let him sleep. It’s sleep he wants.’

She moved on tip-toe to one of the chairs by the table and, carrying it to the side of the sofa, settled herself there as if she intended to repeat yesterday’s vigil over the bed of Claudius.

Nance shrugged her shoulders and, taking off her spectacles, held them up between her eyes and the lamp. Then she licked her thumb and rubbed some speck or other from one of their glasses. Wizzie could see she was quite reassured now and had begun not only to feel a little ashamed of her own recent agitation but to feel that Wizzie’s present concern about him was being carried too far. Putting on her spectacles again, she began, moving quietly but without any excessive caution, to clear away the tea-things, while our friend, left on her uncomfortable seat at the unconscious man’s side, was able to sink into her own thoughts.

These took, as it may easily be imagined, a none too cheerful form. She saw again that huge beast-like figure on all fours advancing with such unnatural speed down that dim passage. She began to feel sick again in her stomach as that sight recurred. What on earth had made him do that?

In her present position she sat almost directly opposite that accursed head, propped up on its pedestal of ancient volumes, and in the stillness and warmth of the room — for Nance’s fire was now a mass of deep red coals — her fancy conjured up a sinister connection between the way he had hugged that evil thing and the way he had come down that passage.

Of his outburst against Thel and herself she did not think at all. All that she put down to his ideas, to that remote realm of masculine infatuation about which there was no need for a sensible person to trouble her mind. But she did think long and deeply, while her fingers, clasped in her lap, played undisturbed their old game, about his preference for Thel over her.

'How silly I've been!' she thought. 'I suppose that's always the way it is when you get fond of anyone. You think they must be feeling all you're feeling! But that's—' And the disillusioned young woman made a face at the unconscious Enoch. 'Well! Whether it's Thel, or whether it isn't Thel, I was a fool to think it was me! I expect it isn't us at all; no, nor Nance either! I expect' — and she gazed with a sort of humorous peevishness at the countenance at her side— 'he's like D.; and the only woman he ever really thinks about is D.'s mother!'

What began to disturb her just a little at this moment, as she tried to look humorously and indifferently at him, was the fact that in its present repose Enoch Quirm's face had once more become dignified and noble. How strange it was that her Black Man of Glymes should look so beautiful when he was asleep! But even as she pondered on those quiet lineaments, so solemn and inviolable on that filthy sofa, that other image of him took their place; she saw again that bestial figure swaying and heaving as it fled from her on all fours down that Glymes passage. Clear through those majestic features the girl now stared into remote vacancy, the man's nose, eyes, mouth, chin, all growing vaporous and unreal, until they melted quite away. And it seemed to her as if both he and she were figures in some ghastly moving picture where she could feel herself following him as he moved like a beast, following him without cessation, up one diminishing perspective and down another, until her stomach grew so sick that she was always having to stop to retch and vomit, so that she was never able to get near to him, any more than he was able to get out of sight of her.

Her thoughts had carried her so far that it came with a startling jerk to her consciousness to find that his eyes were open and looking straight into her own. She was pulled back to reality with such a shock that she couldn't even smile at him, far less utter a word; and this numbness of her faculties was not lessened when she realized that he didn't know her, that he was thinking of someone else and addressing someone else in her form.

'Cornie,' he murmured, 'I forgive you. You forgive me. That's enough, isn't it? And now they can do all.'

Once more his eyes closed; and an expression of impenetrable serenity came into his face.

'It's D.'s mother,' thought Wizzie. 'And how like D.! Yes, they're both the same! Their life, their women, their work, their love — all nothing to them unless far away, far off in the past. I declare, it makes me want to live with old Claudius! He knows what women are. He knows it's the present we've got to have — or turn into shrews like Jenny, or softies like Nance!'

It was several hours after this, having left Enoch asleep on his sofa and Nance asleep in Enoch's chair, that Wizzie herself lay unconscious by Thuella's side.

Perhaps the one point — save their love for Lovie — where Wizzie and D. were completely agreed was their loathing and contempt for dreams. Instead of 'Good-night and sweet dreams!' the most amiable wave of the hand that these two queer ones ever gave each other before they slept was 'Sleep well — and don't dream!' But the secret of that great underworld sea into the bosom of which at that hour, after the tumult, so many human consciousnesses, from Portland Bill to Stonehenge, had sunk, was independent of the demon-shoals of dreams that troubled it. It was an element ‘sui generis’, an unfathomable dimension peculiar to itself, the everlasting other side of the turmoil of life, a state of being that resembled death in one of its aspects and life in another, and was indeed life with something removed and death with something added. And though independent of those troublesome shoals of demon-fish that dart through it — wretched intruders, phantom half-lives, chaotic eidola from the muddy inland streams of consciousness — this great undersea takes many shifting lights, many variations of density and volume, from the accidents of time and place and neighbourhood.

To a girl asleep by a man those mysterious waters are not the same in their lulling flow as to a child asleep by its parent. A woman asleep by another woman draws from this mysterious sea ebbings and flowings of magnetic currents different altogether from those that reach her when she lies by a man. The same unfathomable redemption lulls and soothes her, but the mystic chemistry of that sublunary immersion, that baptism in the flow of this life-death, has its own peculiar quality, a quality as different from the other as the nearness and neighbourhood of a man is different from the nearness and neighbourhood of a woman.

It was not till after they had slept for several hours that, awake together in the darkness, Thuella told Wizzie her great secret.

‘And you haven’t let a soul know? And you’ve been arranging everything? And you’ve got the money? And you’re off tomorrow?’

And then it was that the voice out of the darkness uttered the word with which the whole of the space-gulfs round them had been palpitating for some minutes. In those deep gulfs Wizzie had felt that fatal word taking visible, though not yet audible, shape; but her heart knew, and the throbbing in her pulses knew, and the drops of sweat on her forehead knew, and her occult soul, in its instincts and premonitions, had known the longest of all, what that word was to be.

‘It’s the way they do things there,’ Thuella was whispering now. ‘They don’t write, as we do, and give people time. They cable — and you’ve got to cable back. Well? Will you come, Wizz?’

As must have happened so often in these turning-points in women’s lives, no breath from Wizzie’s lips actually formed the syllable ‘yes’. D. would have made her utter this word of fate and would have told her it was the most important word a woman could utter. Indeed, he would not have stopped there. He would have gone on to wonder which of all the affirmative syllables in the history of humanity — all equally drenched with the saliva-dew of destiny — had been the first to pass what Homer calls ‘the barrier of our teeth’. ‘Think, kid,’ he would have murmured into Wizzie’s annoyed ears, ‘just think! At some actual moment in time, in some hollow cave, somewhere on the earth’s surface, the particular sound destined to mean “yes” for the whole race who inhabited Maiden Castle must have been heard for the first time!’

But Thuella, not being a man and not having a mind for which words, as words, whether affirmative or negative, are the best indication of the way the wind blows, was quite content with other than spoken signs as to how her friend received her generous offer.

Be it enough to say that when the two girls fell asleep for the second time that night it was clearly understood between them that no weakness at the last moment, no remorseful drawing back for any conceivable reason, should interfere with their daring and audacious plan.

Wizzie was, as may be supposed, the first to awake; and she was no sooner awake than, after a wide-eyed stare at the vaguely outlined window, and with only the faintest puckering of her small face, a stream of tears began rolling down her cheeks. It was silly. It was soft. It was, she told herself, like Nance. But she couldn't help it.

Her one hope was that Thel, when she waked, as she was bound to do soon, would not try to comfort her. And it wasn't long before she became conscious that her companion was awake. And yet she was sure she hadn't made any noise. Well! It didn't matter now! Now she could lift up her voice, as the Bible says, and really weep. If only Thel would leave her alone — wouldn't ask her, now or ever, why she was crying, or for whom she was crying.

And Thel did leave her alone. She would never have thought that a girl like Thel — and what an artist she must be to have had such a thing happen to her — could be like this and just leave her to herself. Popsy couldn't have stayed so still. Sister Bridget couldn't. Only her mother! And with that thought it became impossible to keep her sobs from shaking her and even shaking their bed.

But they stopped at last, stopped before there was light enough to see Thel's face; and it was she herself and not Thel who broke the silence that followed.

'Do — you — think', she said, 'that if I do get work over there, and get on at all, I could have my old horse sent over? They'd sell him, I think, if I paid enough, for he's getting old and crotchety, and Popsy never could manage him. I don't mean at once; but later on. Do you think I could have him over?'

Thuella replied sympathetically to this question, but our friend could catch in her tone a faint ambiguity, as if she thought it very unlikely, as the world went round, that the old circus-horse would be welcome in the new hemisphere.

They lay side by side in silence then, while the outline of the window grew slowly more distinct. Like two figures on a raft of fate they lay, half-tragic, half-exultant, till the morning's tide should carry them out.

'We wouldn't go by that nine train, would we, unless he was better?'

'Oh, he'll be better! Besides — remember what you promised last night!' And Thel, who now looked, Wizzie thought, in that dawn light, like one of the coldly beautiful inhuman angels who used to prop up the austere Madonna over the doorway that led to the convent lavatory, made it clear, once and for all, that for no earthly reason — not even if Urien were much worse — could they afford to miss that train at the Southern station.

'I've got the money; and as soon as we get to Southampton we'll buy everything. Nobody here'll be up till late, and we needn't carry a thing! Don't look like that. You're not going to turn on me now, are you?'

As Wizzie looked at the white figure by her side sitting up in bed, its face a blur, its hair a blur, but the tension of its will taut as a tight-rope, it presented itself to her consciousness that the act of running away when you had a child — Thel hadn't got a child! — was like feeling yourself slipping, everything going black in front of you, when you had to jump. She began to feel sick in her stomach like she'd felt last night. Through the blur of Thel's face she could see the Great Western truck on Jenny's floor and Lovie's plump hands squeezing her doll into it.

What it was that influenced Thuella to say what she said now — and Wizzie divined she realized fully that the compass-point of the decision was quivering — she never discovered to the end of her days. Was it some devilry in the girl? Was it the bottom dregs of her contempt?

'We can't,' she must have been saying, 'we can't, can't, go back on it now.' But Wizzie was only dragged away from the truck on the floor in time to catch the end of her sentence: 'Because — don't you remember? — in the fortune we got that day in the slot-machine at Weymouth, my paper said, “What you do, do quick!” and yours said, “Don’t stop to think before you leap!” So it’s the same for both of us!’

Whatever consolation Wizzie may have derived from the fact that her flight was in harmony with the slot-machine’s prejudice against ‘the pale cast of thought’, it was not till the day after their boat sailed that Dud was able to get his thoughts about this event into any kind of order. He was helped to see matters in a clearer light by quite a long letter from Wizzie, a letter in which — though half of it consisted of a series of instructions as to his sounding the Urgans about the selling of the old horse — the girl went fully into her chief motive for running away.

‘Everything’, she wrote, ‘was too mixed-up. I simply couldn’t stand it any more. I leave you quite free. It’ll be only what I deserve if you get another girl. Only if you do, I advise you...’ Here there was a sentence crossed out on which Dud pondered in vain. ‘And if you do,’ the letter continued, ‘I think I’d let Lovie stay on with Jenny and Claudius. I don’t want to defend myself, D. I know I haven’t been as nice to you as I should, and you’ve always been’ — she had put ‘nice’ first, but, crossing it out, had substituted ‘good’ instead— ‘and considerate to me. It was my longing to get back to the Circus and my work that made me do it — and other things too, but that was the chief thing. If I’d been cleverer, about books and all, it would have been different. If I’d got work at once when you took me away it would have been different. Don’t be sorry or sad, and don’t let Lovie feel bad, or think bad of me. You were good about Lovie. No one but you would have been like that. Don’t think I don’t know it. I wouldn’t like any other girl to see my things all about. Give them to Jenny, and if she doesn’t want them, let her give them away. They know a lot of poor people. When I was in a bad mood the other night I hid all your boot-laces — those you bought from that tramp — under the mattress. And those bits of paper by the statue which you did go and pick up, for I found them in the drawer where your shirts are, I threw into the fire. I'm sorry, D. I ever said I hated you. It isn't true' — this last sentence was underlined several times— 'and perhaps some day we may meet again. But don't think about me...' Here there were more scratchings out; but No-man, after long puzzling over these erasions, concluded that the sentence went on, 'as you did about', but he could not decide whether the final word was 'Mona' or 'Mary'. '... and don't let Lovie forget me. I'm sorry I was angry that night when Claudius was talking; and I'm sorry about all the times I was angry. Thel has been sea-sick, but I haven't at all, not once. Kiss Lovie from her affectionate Mummy — And don't wish you'd never seen me. Wizz. P.S. Write me a line how your father is, to the General Post Office, New York.'

It was in Jenny's kitchen, three days after the flight of the two young women, that Dud finally deciphered all that was decipherable in this letter. Jenny was at the table giving Lovie her tea, preparatory to getting it for the rest of them in the dining-room, where Claudius was now ensconced in his old place by the fire. Dud had found himself clinging a good deal to Mrs Dearth these last days, for something had held him back from going over to Glymes; but as he thrust these crumpled and pondered-over sheets into his pocket he came to the conclusion that he really must walk over there that evening. He kept thrusting his hand into the inside pocket of his coat to make sure that Wizzie's letter, which it would be intolerable for any eyes but his own to see, was safe where he had placed it, but even while he did this he began another of the mental struggles he had been making for the last couple of days to shake off the numbness and inertia that had fallen on him.

‘I must go over to Glymes,’ he kept saying to himself. ‘I must go over to Glymes tonight. I must go directly after tea.’

They had just had a visit from Dumbell, who was unaccompanied this time by his fuzzy-headed lady, and Jenny had been revealing to Dud the direction of various straws on the life-stream at Beulah Lodge which surprised him not a little. Jenny said that Dunbar had told her himself that he was giving their servant notice. This, he told her, he had been compelled to do because of her lack of proper respect for his botanical collection. ‘And that, you may mark my words,’ said Jenny, ’is the beginning of the end. The next thing he’ll do’ll be to give Madame notice! When a man dares to go as far as to pack off a woman’s pet servant they won’t hang on much longer; and I wouldn’t wonder if it won’t be Dumbell who’ll make the move. She’s humiliated him to the limit over his Blackshirt pranks, and he’s taken it like a lamb; but botany’s a different story. I believe he’d walk over both the father and the daughter to reach a new blackberry.’

But it wasn’t of these heroic deeds of poor Dumbell, in a cause older than Fascism, that Dud was musing now. He was going over in his mind all the upheavals out there at Glymes that their ambassador had been recording. Urien was still in the same state of helpless apathy, lying all day without taking notice of anyone. Nance was still nursing him, helped now and then, much against her will, by the intrusive Mrs Wye. But the most dramatic news brought by Mrs Wye’s husband was that old Teucer Wye had decided to leave Glymes at once for good and all.

Dud had been impressed by Jenny’s reception of this news, which meant, of course, that the ex-professor was intending to plant himself on her and Claudius. ‘We’ll be glad to have him,’ she’d told Dumbell bravely. ‘After all, if it hadn’t been for him...’ And she’d explained frankly to her brother how Claudius would now give up his place next door and live altogether with her, and how Mr No-man, who couldn't bear to sleep alone in Miss Ravelston's room, was already spending his nights in his attic.

'I must get over to Glymes after tea, Jenny,' was Dud's refrain tonight, but he seemed thankful that a good long time had yet to elapse before he would have to pull himself together for this duty.

As a matter of fact, on this particular evening he never did go to Glymes, and, as the autumn went on, he found that this tendency of his to sit brooding over Jenny's kitchen fire became a recurrent habit. He had finished Mary Channing and his publishers were considering it — had been considering it for more than a month already — and he found himself unable to make the effort of beginning a new book.

He walked even more than in the old days, and further afield, but with nothing approaching his former delight in these excursions. Little as Wizzie had been interested in what he called his 'adventures', half the pleasure he got from them was to know that he would find her there when he returned, and it wasn't the same thing to tell Jenny.

As October drew to its end he rarely went to Jenny's for any meal, for by this time her father had moved from Glymes and now occupied, in visible presence and in happier reality, the room dominated by Thuella's wicked picture, and it struck Dud as unfair to inflict upon the woman a third hungry man. But this self-denying ordinance in respect to imposing on Jenny meant that if he didn't want to have his meals out he had to get all three of them in his own attic. And the result of this hugger-mugger method of feeding was that he soon began to suffer from vicious attacks of acute acid dyspepsia. In the long lonely years before he knew Wizzie he had got his meals out with normal regularity; but now, after his life with her, he found he had acquired a nervous aversion to entering the most harmless restaurant.

Less and less, too, after Teucer Wye's move into town, did Dud go out to Glymes. Unable, as we naturally are, to put down the singular behaviour of those who have had the privilege of living with us to a physical revulsion from ourselves, Dud was often tempted, as he went over and over in his mind every possible motive for Wizzie's leaving him, to attribute it in some measure to her jealousy of Nance. This thought made him extremely reluctant to have, just at present, any tête-à-tête interviews with his father's wife; and as such interviews were the only ones he could have — for in those last weeks of October Enoch seemed oblivious to everything — he made his visits to Glymes as brief and few as was compatible with a decent display of sympathy.

Urien was indeed as good as dead; and, though medical science gave a different name to his disorder, Dud agreed with Nance that by publishing his life-illusion he had killed his heart. The only exceptions to his withdrawn and comatose state during his son's visits seemed to Dud to resemble faint spasms of distaste for his presence. There were times when he thought the man knew him and deliberately, in scriptural language, turned his face to the wall. He spoke of this to Nance, suggesting that his father was concealing some mad suspicion that it was he who had spirited the girls away; but Nance wouldn't hear of this, and assured him with a sad smile that the runaways always overrated, as young girls will, the interest her husband took in them.

It was a day or two before October was over that the end came. Nance had been forced to accept financial help from him, and forced also — and here he had the doctor's support — to call in the aid of a trained nurse; but by one of those accidents that can always happen in a sick-chamber it was when he was alone with him that Enoch died.

He was thinking of Wizzie, as he kept guard while Nance and the nurse had their meal in the kitchen, and he had been staring gloomily out of the window, wondering if she would reply to a letter he had written, when a sudden movement from the sofa — for they had left the man in peace where he first fell ill — made him swing quickly round.

Enoch's great heavy-lidded eyes were wide open and fixed with clear intelligence upon his own. And it was not any self-deception in our friend's mind, for he knew at once, with every faculty he possessed, that it was death and not life that brought this change; but, as he answered his father's look, everything he was aware of — his own identity, the identity of the dying man, the untidy room, the head on the pile of books, the window through which his thoughts had flown so far, the image of Wizzie — receded, dwindled, melted, fused themselves together, reduced themselves to a faint remote pressure of something imponderable and far away! And in the place of these things thus withdrawn, thus rendered vague and tenuous, a completely new reality, a reality that was himself and yet not himself, that was his father and yet not his father, pressed upon him and surrounded him.

The mysterious 'Echwydd', of which the man was always talking, had no need now to be besieged by violence! It was here, it was around them both, it was them both, and all their accumulated experience with it. But this experience of theirs, their piled-up life-sensation, floated far off on this new reality which now undulated, as the poet says, so closely round them and absorbed them.

Dud tried to speak, but it was as if the air that carries articulate sound had suddenly been removed; and, though his lips and his tongue were ready to obey him, not a word came from his mouth.

But Enoch spoke. 'I am', he said with extraordinary naturalness and quietness, and without any particular emotion, while an expression, which neither then nor later could his hearer interpret, crossed his face, 'what I am. So it's all right. It doesn't matter.'

How the son wished afterwards that the man had been able to die as easily as those words had been spoken! But it was as if the terrible vitality that had always smouldered in that heavy frame couldn't give up its old desperation. His soul had spoken; but it was with a violent and spasmodic jerk of his prostrate frame, as if the vital spark, whether it called itself Enoch or Urien, were wrenching itself from its bondage, were really breaking with a last desperate 'hiraeth' of its whole life-essence into the secret already known to his spirit, that the man tore himself out of life.

The days that followed his death were days of labour and trouble for poor Dud. Wizzie would have been amused, if not annoyed, by the number of times — sometimes to himself and sometimes to Claudius, who was now his chief confidant — No-man used the word 'ironical' about the matter of his father's interment. He was buried on the last day of October in that very place, by the mounds of Cornelia and Mona, upon which our friend had had his eye as his own resting-place; and it was this fact, along with the chain of events connected with it, those fatal and grotesque links that bound them together, that made Dud envisage the whole business as a perfect example of Nature's humorous ways with man.

To Wizzie's mind — and it was an indignant grievance with her — this trick of his of calling events ironical was all part of his way of separating himself from life, of picking and choosing from life, for the mere pleasure of his personal sensations; and this to Wizzie, for whom life was part of oneself and, like oneself, incalculable, thrilling, and intensely serious, was a kind of sin against the Holy Ghost. But it was no more possible for Dud to stop detaching himself from life and seeing life's eventualities as ironic than it was for him to stop being excited by Wizzie 'her wone self when she appeared before him in boy's clothes. He had always seen it — and she had known this by instinct, and it never failed to make her want to strike him with her clenched hands — merely as one of his ironies that, living together as they were, they really lived in two separate worlds, whereas to her this was simply a bitter grievance, a tragic fact that had to be faced or brought to a drastic end. And she would have seen this burying of Enoch in his son's chosen spot as the same sort of fact, not at all a matter for humorous philosophizing.

When November came, however, and brought with it the anniversary of their first meeting, Dud's thoughts, as he waited for Nance in his familiar attic room, were of the grimmest and most bed-rock kind. If there was any of this ironical detachment that used to make his girl so angry left in his mood now, it had been reduced to something more like the polish upon bare bones than the glow upon flesh and blood.

As he crouched over his fire the soul within sank down to its ultimate ledge of resistant power. 'I'll hold her tight,' he thought, 'tight under my ribs, whether she hates me or not! To the end of my days, where I go she'll go, and what I do she'll do.' But even as he thought of this there came over him, like the slow drifting in of a vast, terrible, irresistible tide, the temptation to drop his personal life, to let it pass from him, to toss it overboard with all its sacred sensations, and to treat himself, as Claudius did himself, as a mere objective bridge to the world's future.

But, gathering up all his forces, No-man resisted this. 'It can take my work', he thought in his desperation, 'and my life, but my soul it shall never take!' And against that insidiously seeping tide he felt as if he were stretching forth his arms and clutching at the great cloud of witnesses that emanated from the very foundations of this old Durnovaria. How they floated round him! And how, if he only clung to them through thick and thin, they could bear him up — clouds and vapours though they were! For they were the residue, immortal, indestructible, of all the personal souls that had held to their identity in the midst of the flowing away, an identity that rested on what all the while was behind this universal flux. ‘What’s behind it is in us,’ he thought, ‘not outside us. And all this progress that old Claudius praises is only a return, a return with a difference but still a return, to the centre from which we spring!’

He thrust his fists against the pit of his stomach, for his dyspepsia became sharp at that moment, but, using his very discomfort as a ‘point d’appui’ for intenser thought, he plunged like a diver into the mystery of the old town about him, whose mellow murmur came up from the street into his ears; and, as he sank into its undersea of the long generations, he felt as if he were touching some calm undying presence down there, whose secret was that of the individual soul, not of the passing of any present into any future.

He undid the buttons of his braces now, so as the more easily to press his knuckles against his navel, and, as he did this, all his strength seemed suddenly to drain out of him, and a dull inert weariness of the whole struggle descended on him. This whoreson lethargy was the worst form that his nostalgia for Wizzie took. He missed her in every possible way. He missed her as the general background of his life, and this perhaps troubled him the most; but he also was perpetually receiving sideway thrusts of a sickening poignancy from all manner of unexpected little things.

And instead of missing her less, as day followed day, his longing for her increased. The very absence of emotional passion from his nature, his very lack of feelings that depend on a certain virile energy, made it worse for him, for it deprived him of the relief that passionate hearts find in anger and pride and thoughts of revenge, while his grand cult of sensations, though it didn’t altogether fail him, lost in some subtle way much of its finer edge.

What he discovered, in fact, was something he had never realized before: the crucial role played in this life of sensation by contrast with something else! What he had really done — and the girl had known it — was to use the living Wizzie as he had used the dead Mona. It meant nothing to her that there was in this a proof of the intensity of his feeling, a proof of its etherealized sensuality, of its all-pervasiveness and absorbing diffusion. It was no consolation to her that he thought of the modelling of her limbs as he walked round Poundbury, or that he mingled the curves of her ‘lurin’ figure with the valla and fossae of Maiden Castle! But this diffusion of her desirability through the earth he walked on, through the grass and the rocks and the stones and the trees he passed, became, now that he had lost her, a perpetual reminder of her, and an increasing craving for her presence. His Mona-wraith had not been the real Mona at all. She had been a creation of anonymous desire. But never was there a girl, he thought, more vitally alive than Wizzie.

And it wasn’t only in his walks, which she had not shared, that he pined for her. He had never believed that a girl’s body could diffuse itself as Wizzie’s did — quite apart from her mind — through the fabric of chairs, through the stuff of table-cloths, through the polish of door-handles, through the angles of looking-glasses, through the reflections on glass bottles, through the flickerings on coal-scuttles, and through all those meaningless scrolls and scrawls that the elfish artistry of time leaves upon walls and ceilings.

He missed Urien too, but not very much! He decided on general grounds that it’s impossible to miss a man as much as you miss a girl, because a girl’s body passes into everything round her whereas the body of a man stays inside its clothes. It was Enoch’s voice, Enoch’s turns of speech, Enoch’s expressions when he was speaking, that he missed in that direction. He hoped devoutly that he never would see again any of the objects in that filthy study.

But he found it was cruelly difficult to do what Wizzie had told him to in her letter and give her things to Jenny! Her things were herself. While he still had her things, something, some essence of her personality, stayed with him. In fact, so much of her stayed with him that he once found himself wondering if she mightn’t be conscious over there of how he was still clinging to her and hate him for it — no, not hate him, for she said she didn’t do that, but feel cross and angry with him for it. Would she have been pleased or annoyed — he simply had not the least idea! — had she known how her going had changed everything for him?

Less than a month ago his escapes to this attic had been moments of stolen bliss, whereas now it was hard for him to realize what on earth there was in the place that had pleased him so much. He made a mental resolution that never again would he let himself fret or rebel against the contrast that lay at the bottom of all. How heavenly had been that passing backwards and forwards between Wizzie and his attic! That was the whole secret, though there was no need to go as far as the old monks and monkish scholars, and make Wizzie and her ways a temptation of the devil. But to pass from your girl to your work, and then back again from your work to your girl — that was the way to live!

As he now sat by his fire, waiting for Nance and staring at the two bed-post heads — for she had made him take back the one Wizzie had carried away — he went over in his mind certain troublesome events that had occurred the day before, the day dedicated to All Saints. Nance had come to see him in great trouble early in the morning — that was the first thing — with the news that the workmen called in to examine the Glymes roof had announced that without extensive repairs the place was no longer safe for human habitation. Dumbell's verdict about such danger had thus proved superficial, and Urien's ghost-wind had done damage of a more material sort than generally follows such phantom visitations.

Nance's early appearance, with a suit-case in her hand, after a panic-stricken night under the condemned roof, had necessitated his finding for her some immediate lodging, and this he had done through a good-natured acquaintance of his, the landlord of the Phoenix, who caused a fire to be lit for her at once in a pleasant room of that romantic hostelry, looking out on his own High East Street.

But the disposal of Nance had only been the first of a series of sharp tests for our friend's philosophy. On returning to his attic, after leaving Nance to recover her equilibrium and possibly to get some sleep after her agitated night, he found that some relative of his landlord's, in that sagacious man's absence, had allowed an obviously questionable visitor to ascend his stairs, for no sooner had he pushed open the door of his room than he was confronted by none other that Grummer Urgan — and by Grummer in the highest feather of loquacity and greed. Her outer garment would have disgraced the most disreputable of madams, but when she threw back this piece of filthy finery her capacious bosom revealed a wealth of black satin worthy of Lord Fordington's housekeeper.

In trying afterwards to piece together in correct order of events the extraordinary interview that followed, Dud could not help giving way to that vein of Swift-like realism — or, shall we say, to that vein of naturalism charged with monstrous ferocity — that was a basic element in his consciousness, and was a thing that sometimes gave him satisfaction and sometimes tormented him with a veritable devil's dung-fork. When he tried afterwards to conjure up every detail of Grummer's victory over him, he gave full freedom to this mood, till the perversity of the images he conjured up grew monstrous. He began by trying to analyse what it was that gave to Grummer this power over a man like himself. Would a person of her bulk and volubility dominate any man in the world who wasn't a homicidal gangster? Was it that the stored-up feminine magnetism which makes any slim girl's aura so much more pervasive than the aura of the most formidable man, and which must be, in some subtle manner, allied to her potential motherhood, seethed and fermented and boiled up in Mrs Urgan to such a pitch of hypnotic power that her victim would have given more than money, might even have given both his bed-posts, to be well rid of her?

We need not enlarge on the super-Rabelaisian dance which Dud's imagination — that of an innocent child combined with that of a sensual dotard — led this satin bosom and these clinking jet beads; but, as he worked it out afterwards, a certain sympathetic pity, doubtless the inverse side of his loathing of the preposterous woman, mingled with his almost malicious eagerness to be robbed.

After all, she did reveal to him that Old Funky was dangerously ill, that Popsy had had a final quarrel with the horse, and that they had received notice from the foreign circus owner that they must quit. But what made it possible for Grummer to carry off the whole contents of the cash-box in his mother's ottoman was undoubtedly, he decided, what usually makes us submit to spoliation: just an exaggerated fear of the power of the aggressor!

He could not now recall whether he had asked her to sit down; but at one point in their extraordinary talk she certainly did sit down, for he remembered how especially headstrong his monstrous imaginations had become when he saw her in his chair.

It was congestion of the lungs, she told him, mainly that her husband suffered from; but she went into lively details about other ailments that had a less euphonious sound. She had heard, she said, of Miss Ravelston's departure, and had at once felt it to be her melancholy duty to come to assure him of her 'kindly feelin's', especially 'as that gal had rinned off'.

Remembering Wizzie's letter, Dud had interrupted at that point to murmur something about hoping, as time went on, to be able to buy their horse from them, but Grummer's eyes gleamed with such lambent avarice at this that he contented himself with adding, 'But one thing at a time, Mrs Urgan, though I see you would sell him, if we agreed on the price.'

And it was at that pregnant moment that the lady had presented him with the precious 'dockymint'. Now Dud being as ignorant of the mysterious processes of the law as was Wizzie herself, the terrifying number of 'whereases' and the still more alarming phrase 'alienation of affection' on this piece of paper very quickly caused him to open his mother's ottoman. Unfortunately he had only just withdrawn from the bank — so as to be ready for Nance's necessities — almost the whole of his balance; and if he didn't smile now to think of the ease with which this Gargamelle in satin disappeared with his savings, it was only because the third blow he received on this All Devils' Sunday, the one upon which he was pondering now, was more serious still.

But what had the shameless old trollop hinted at as she departed? He tried to remember her exact words. 'Me and me 'usband don't 'old nothink but kind feelin's,' was one of her final remarks; but her grand 'esprit d'escalier', as he bowed her out, consisted of an obscure hint as to a new form that these 'kind feelin's' might eventually take, something to the effect that if he required any further feminine society Popsy had several amiable friends in Dorchester who would be very pleased to ‘see’ such a liberal gentleman.

He had only just begun to confide to his two Questing Beasts his reaction to this handsome hint, when, as if All Saints’ had really turned into All Devils’, his eyes fell upon several unopened letters that had come by the last post on the day before. Turning these over — as he did all his letters now — with a fantastic hope that there might be another from Wizzie, he had found that the only important one was from his publishers, and, upon opening this communication, he had learned to his dismay that ‘the reports of our Readers on Mary Channing have been so unfavourable that we feel obliged, much to our regret...’ In plain words, his book was rejected. This final blow on the top of the rest, and the fact that it had fallen just when his father’s wife had become dependent on him, did come near to breaking down his fortitude.

Well! He must bestir himself. ‘I must go to the bank’, he thought, ‘after we come back from the cemetery, and find out the worst. If I am overdrawn — well, I’ll have to wire for an advance from Cumber, and just do nothing but write articles. One thing’s certain: I won’t start sponging on Claudius and Jenny!’

It occurred to him now to wonder what he would do, supposing old Cumber, in a rage with them all because of Dumbell’s revolt against the Fuzzy-Head, stopped giving him any work? He hadn’t received a word since the man had disposed so abruptly of Enoch and his mystic contributions. He would certainly be in a nice fix then, with his savings carried off by Grummer and no money left in the bank! What would he do?

What he did at the moment was to pull his chair close to the fire and rub his hands up and down his shins. This was certainly a different kind of All Souls’ Day from the one he had known a year ago! Instinctively idealizing his troubles, he began a childish and masculine attempt to make Wizzie and her running away responsible for the death of Enoch, for Nance being thrown on his hands, for Grummer's carrying off his savings, for the rejection of Mary Channing, and for his wretched dyspepsia. Closer and closer he bent over his fire, putting his trousers tightly round his shins and passing his bony fingers up and down their nearly scorched surface. 'Never has any girl', he thought, 'left such a gap behind!'

And then suddenly, without any warning, just as though it had flown across his senses with the low hum of a shard-borne beetle, came the memory of that maddening orgy of delicious viciousness that he had enjoyed with his Venetian Post by the Scummy Pond.

Even at that moment, just when his whole being was crying out for Wizzie, and Wizzie alone, the mere approach of this memory made his pulses beat and the blood rush to his head. 'It's a madness,' he thought; and he began to wonder whether he were alone in such madness, or whether, reaching out through the nerves of all the sons of man, from some electric Scummy Pond at the heart of the cosmos, there was for every man alive some peculiar impersonal lust that made the knees knock together and the hands shake.

'It's the sharing of it,' he said to himself, 'it's the sharing of this black electricity! Thuella and I must be exactly alike in that.' And he fell, while the mere contemplation of it brought back the mad excitement, to speculating as to how long this thing would have lasted had he and Thuella lived together.

'What she and I feel', he thought — and it came over him that for a whole year, ever since he had first set eyes on her, he had really known it— 'isn't passion, isn't love in any sort of sense; it's a black jet, a black spout, from the most dangerous madness there is! It's something that simply sweeps you away!’ And with one of his outrageous flights of fancy Dud allowed himself to wonder if the appalling power of this insanity didn’t spring from the fact that there was a paternity for it in the supernatural world.

He drew back now rather quickly from the bars of his small grate — he had long ago come to the conclusion that Dorchester’s possession of the nicest hearths in the country was due to ancient Rome — for he thought he detected rising from his trousers the unmistakable smell of scorched cloth.

‘I wonder if everybody’, he said to himself, ’is as immersed in the elements as I am. By God, I believe if I hadn’t wanted to carry Wizzie off I might...’ And the thought came into his head, even as the smell of the scorched trousers came into his nostrils, that in mediaeval times his dalliance with his Mona-wraith would have been regarded as an affair with an elemental.

‘But why was my conscience free over that,’ he wondered, ‘and so terribly stirred about Thuella? Does our real conscience only get roused by a madness that reduces the pleasure of life itself to cold, stale, wet ashes in comparison with it?’

Another odd thing was that for some reason — and his feeling here was very complicated — he found himself scrupulously avoiding any thought of the two girls being together. When he thought of Wizzie in America it was always as being alone, or as being alone in an American circus.

Staring into his fire, but no longer warming his shins, it came over him now with a curious chill to think of those Glymes houses completely deserted. Nance had said that it was more than likely that the whole place would be pulled down. He remembered the queer feelings he had that day of Thuella’s party, when he kept listening for Urien’s knock and imagining his figure outside the door. Damn! But it was hard to think of Glymes without Thuella! Quite against his will — for he was the old shameless Dud still — he suddenly wondered what his life would have been if he'd never seen Wizzie! He would certainly have gone far with Thuella. Maybe they'd have —

But he pulled himself up at that point and asked himself once more what he'd do, supposing Cumber didn't give him any more articles to write.

'What of that decent old chap', he thought, 'who gave Claudius work?' And it made him feel contemptible and ashamed when he realized how scared he was of manual labour.

And what of those dignified and quaint characters that he was always meeting down by the bridge by the White Hart? 'But unsuccessful novelists', he said to himself, 'don't get on the dole.'

Just then he caught from the street below his window the familiar sound of that Shakespearean mummer's dramatic voice advertising some new attraction come to town. 'I'll stick to old Durnovaria,' he said to himself, 'whatever becomes of me. By God, it's the most English town in England, and by far the best! I'd sooner be a door-keeper in Dorchester than...' And he thought of how he had felt the roots of this ancient mellow place sinking down to the very nadir of the earth, full of the magic of the generations! He thought of that refined young person who carried the Sunday papers on her bicycle. He thought of the unconquerable laugh of the old Echo-seller. He thought of the mysteriously sweet smile of his friend the drowner. He thought of his tragic Mary Channing, of whose fate he had written — probably too well! No, no, whatever happened to him, he must hang on here. Where else should he be when Wizzie returned, a famous circus star, from over the water?

'I'm not going to give up', he said to himself, 'because Wizz got bored with me. And I'm not going to become objective either, for all old

Claudius's eloquence. I've got hold of something; and if people don't want what I've got hold of now — they'll come to it — sooner or later!'

He pushed back his chair still further from the fire, and, turning round, glanced at the two heraldic heads. And the thought came to him, as he contemplated their obscene beast-faces, that all this talk of Enoch's about the prophets and their non-human familiars applied in his own case to what he got out of the inanimate. 'Yes,' he thought, 'that's what you are, you two: you're all the inanimates on earth in which man's love-longing loses itself, and in which it finds itself. There's not a stick or stone in this place into which some lonely spirit hasn't poured the tragedy of his unsatisfied desire. He thought this groaning and travailing of the longing in us could break through the barrier. But there is no barrier! We couldn't think of a barrier if there weren't something in us already outside it!

'Yes, you can leer at me, you two! If I hadn't found you out I'd be scared of you; and if I were scared of you — whether you were Mother's or not — I'd throw you into the Frome! But you can stay where you are. I'm not going to think of my girl here. I'm going to think of her in every stick and stone I pass, till she comes back. I'm alone with you again. But there are two of you now, and I'm two, wherever I go, whether she hates me or not!'

But the carved heads stinted not nor abated one jot of their inscrutable derision, and as he went on surveying them he began to feel not only a vicious twinge of his dyspepsia but the same weary and hopeless lethargy as had been weighing him down ever since Wizzie went away.

He must, indeed, have fallen asleep soon after that, for he didn't hear Nance's steps or even her knock, and, as she stood in the doorway, watching him there, her spectacles grew blurred with tears, for there was that in his unconscious pose that made her think of Enoch.

As they set out to the cemetery down Acland Road — for it was characteristic of Dud’s present mood that he lacked the heart to insist on the Icen Way — poor Nance, who was in a sufficiently shaky state herself, was shocked to see him pause so often and bend low down, supporting himself on his cudgel and thrusting his fist into the pit of his stomach.

‘It’s nothing,’ he said, when, with the tips of her gloved fingers laid with infinite gentleness, for fear of hurting his feelings, upon his arm, she begged him to tell her what was wrong. ‘It’s nothing,’ he said peevishly. ‘It’ll pass in a moment. I can’t help it. My friends’ll just have to get used to my acting like this! It’s all nerves; but nerves generate acids.’

And as they went on and turned into the South Walks opposite Rothesay House, he imagined to himself, on the high wall before them there, a grotesque and terrifying fresco in rich colours — like the Inferno on the wall at Pisa — representing the persecution of a human stomach by a demon-nerve. It was a monstrous Inferno of his own that he mentally projected upon the garden wall of that solidly built mansion of the early eighties, but it was a wondrous comfort to him to see it there, and it gave him just the spirit he needed to straighten his back and trudge on. And, as often happened with Dud, whose physical sensations, originating in the chemistry of his body, became the battle-field of his soul, this victory over the downward drag of his dyspepsia gave a zest to the more spiritual struggle of his whole identity with the present crisis in his life.

Thus he found himself able to jest quite lightly to his companion as they passed the cenotaph, reminding her of her collapse on this spot exactly a year ago.

‘Take care,’ she said with a tender smile. ‘You may make me collapse again!’

But he forced himself after that to glance boldly at the familiar circus name on the boardings along the fence where the Fairfield was. ‘Perhaps she’ll come back famous and rich,’ he said to Nance, ‘and Lovie and I will go to see her and sit in the front row.’

What did, however, give his philosophy a blow that made it stagger was the sight of Maumbury Rings. ‘How the devil’, he thought, ‘can I start another book, with Mary still unchampioned?’

But Nance had her own secret worries that she had been longing all day to confide in him. ‘What do you suppose he really did feel’, she suddenly asked him, ‘when he went to such lengths to bring those two girls together?’

Dud was nonplussed at this, not because he hadn’t thought over it himself and come to his own conclusion, but because he found it so hard to explain his conclusion to his father’s wife. He walked in silence for a little while, and then he said slowly and gravely, ‘He and I, my dear, are’ — he hesitated for a second before the word ‘are’ but brought it out firmly enough — ‘very alike in certain things. We both live at a somewhat different level from most people. Mind you, I don’t say at a higher level, but a different one. With us, if I may say so, the actual substance of our planet down to the centre of the earth, with all the elements that work on it out of space, is something — its mystery, its power for good and evil — that we can’t take, as most people do, just for granted! We think of it all the time, if you get what I mean, and to him it always meant — this vast weight of matter — something separating us from the real reality. Old Wye feels much the same, and that’s where—’ He hesitated again, and again overcame his hesitation. ‘... where Urien and he differ from Claudius. I don’t know whether you’ve read Faust, my dear, but, if you have, you’ll remember that he has to break through — and that’s the word he was always using — into the Underworld, or the Overworld, or whatever you like to call it, to reach the secret - “the Mothers”, as the book says. Enoch’s idea was, I think, that frustrated love — unreturned love, I mean — was the strongest magnetic force in the world. Mephistopheles gives Faust a key by which he breaks through. Do ‘ee see now what I’m driving at? To Enoch this key was frustrated love; and for some reason he got into his head that Thel’s love for Wizz was like that! Neither of them, of course, had the least notion of what he was up to. No sane person could have had. How he supposed he could break through, as he called it, on the strength of another person’s feelings is more than I can follow. But of course some sort of vicariousness does appear in all the old mystical cults. His mania for those damned beast-heads of my mother’s — and that I know, as I tried to explain to you and Wizz the other day — was the same sort of thing. And there I’m rather like him. It all comes from living, as he and I do, more in the great cosmic forces — forgive the way I’m talking, my dear! — than in ordinary human interests. I take these things historically — what would old Claudius say if he heard me? — but he took them literally. And it was when he read what Rhŷs says about Urien that he began pretending to himself — for he couldn’t have altogether believed it, or he wouldn’t have broken his heart when he wrote about it — that he was himself the mysterious being of those old legends.’

Dud stopped at this point. They had crossed the railway-bridge and were already at the entrance to the cemetery. Not the smallest comment did his Cemetery Woman make upon his long discourse. Whether she followed it or not he couldn’t tell, and her silence made him feel something of a fool; but the mere putting of all this into words had been a comfort to him; and now, as they threaded their way between the mounds and the cypress-trees, he couldn’t help drawing her arm through his own.

What a sequence of events in those crowded twelve months had linked him with this sad, soft, much-enduring creature!

Well, there they were, they were coming to them now, his graves and her graves. For a minute or two they stood hand in hand by the freshly turned mould. Then the woman whispered, 'I forgave him when he didn't know it. But he knows it now.' And Dud realized what was in her mind when, with a faint smile, she drew her hand from his and moved away to the grave of her son.

And an apathy, a numbness, a strange quiescence descended upon D. No-man, not the same apathy that had been weighing him down all these last days, but the apathy that comes on a person when his soul, removing itself to a distance from his body, faces without flinching but with an immense weariness the long ascending path up which it has to drag that mortal companion of its wayfaring.

Which of those two — his mother, with her inhuman egoism, or Mona, with her weird unselfishness — held the secret that prevailed?

Well! He must go on as best he could in his own way. He must be decent to Nance. He must be faithful, after his fashion, to Wizzie. He must hold fiercely to all those sensations of his! It was no good. He could not live, as this dead man had done, in a wild search for the life behind life. One life at a time! But neither would he close one single cranny or crevice of his mind to the intimations of immortality that in this place and at this hour were so thick about him.

And then a well-known sound in the air above him made him glance upwards. One of old Claudius's airplanes! 'Hold to the centre', he said to himself, 'as you move on. The future's not everything!' And he dug his stick into the earth, with his eyes on the ground.

Then, pulling it out with a jerk, he went to meet Nance.

OR THE VENGEANCE OF GOD

Morwyn: or The Vengeance of God was first published in Britain in 1937 by Cassell & Co. It is often described as one of Powys' 'Welsh Novels', alongside Owen Glendower (1941) and Porius: A Romance of the Dark Age (1951). The author had moved to Corwen, North Wales in July 1935 with the intention of connecting to his Welsh ancestry and exploring the country's rich history, literature and mythology. His father, Reverend Charles Francis Powys claimed that he was descended from Rhodri Mawr, the great ninth century Welsh king. The Reverend could trace his ancestry back centuries to the Montgomery region and both he and the author took great pride in their heritage and family origins.

This novel is an evocative work demonstrating Powys rich and expansive imagination and his broad knowledge of literature and mythology. The narrative takes place in Hell after a meteorite strikes a Welsh mountain and opens a void thrusting the protagonists down into a frightening underworld. It is subterranean realm of sadism and horror where the narrator encounters the spirits of famous figures from history, such as the Marquis de Sade, Tomás de Torquemada, Rabelais and the sixth century Welsh bard, Taliesin. A central concern of the novel is the use of scientific knowledge and in particular the practice of vivisection — a preoccupation of the author's — as an excuse for cruelty and torture.

Part One

TO YOU, MY son, and to you alone, will I tell the whole story as it actually occurred. Perhaps even to you I could not be so frank if there had not come to my ears a garbled version of what happened; and it is to prevent such false rumours from troubling you that I am writing now.

As I hinted during your recent visit, I can remember vividly every single event of the extraordinary day that ended in the devastating experience that left me as you found me.

Science no doubt would be ready to give a technical name to the extreme lucidity with which the smallest events of that time stand out, but I will only say now that what those hours finally led to was so convulsive a shock that in place of making my memory a blank with regard to all the little previous things it enabled me to envisage them with an almost intolerable distinctness, like the distinctness we used to be warned in childhood to expect from the Day of Judgment.

It is indeed appalling in what overwhelming emphasis every material circumstance, every form and figure and shape, presented itself on that day to my consciousness. Whatever planetary event it was that precipitated it all, turning the touchy personage you used to call “father” into the stranded inanimate, like an old battered figurehead washed up by the sea, that you found here a week ago, it must have cast, in advance of its descent at this particular spot, some sort of premonitory illumination.

Why this illumination should have been mental as well as electric I can make no guess. I can only assure you that when I came out of my house at sunset, on the twenty-first of this month, the eve of our shortest day, I was staggered by the devastating clearness with which I saw everything. This was the more remarkable, though at the time I gave it no thought, since twilight was already coming on and the sun had gone down in heavy clouds.

But the illumination that met me was certainly not merely physical. It was physical, but it was something else as well. I can only describe it as the presence of some source of light different from both the descended sun and the as yet unrisen moon, a light which not only counteracted the natural twilight but heightened and quickened in some startling manner my powers of observation. As you know from old days your progenitor has never been a very lively observer of what goes on round us. Indeed, I have been attacked sometimes as positively sub-human in absent-mindedness. So that, when I emphasize the mental illumination that that moment brought, you must remember that it must have taken a good deal of this inexplicable current of cosmic electricity to stir up my sluggish mentality to the normal level, not to speak of lifting it — as I really believe it did lift it — into a clarity beyond the normal.

You have not had, I'm afraid, too many occasions for congratulating yourself on being the motherless bastard of a selfish bachelor, so you must make the most of the satisfaction to be derived from the fact that no one but yourself can suffer from whatever this story of mine may contain of the sort of thing from which our flesh and blood so naturally shrinks.

Well! I was setting out as usual up the slope of the Berwyn Range — you remember how you carried my chair into that path when you were here? — and Black Peter was, as he generally is, caracoling and sniffing and relieving himself after his fashion a little way in front, when I became aware of this abnormal quickening of all my mental powers.

That this heightened condition of my faculties commenced to show itself the second I crossed my threshold I have no doubt; but it was not till I had nearly reached that house higher up the mountain where, as you must have heard though you’re so discreet, the girl lived, that I became conscious of my abnormal mental condition.

The path I was following takes us past the outbuildings of this house, which is, as you’ve seen, a good deal larger than most of the little places up here to whom the privilege has been given of contact with the miles of barbed-wire that confine this part of our mountain-range to certain plump totem-birds and their dedicated keepers.

If you hadn’t been too busy, my son, to visit me often during these last years you would have heard me speak of this old farm-house and its inhabitants, for no human abode has ever made so deep an impression on me.

It is quite true what the papers said about the girl’s affection for her father. Where they went completely off the track was in regard to the quarrel, I might say the rift, for it was more than a quarrel, that was rapidly widening between them. It was about vivisection.

Morwyn, who’s nearly twenty, though she looks much younger, couldn’t endure it in any form, and Mr. — of course was a tremendous vivisector, more passionately fond of it, I suppose, than any other man in England.

Mr. — and the girl had only been coming here for the last four or five years. In fact she wasn’t seventeen — just about what she looks now — when I first saw her. It was Mr.— ‘s peculiarity to take his annual holiday in the winter; but what first attracted his daughter to this mountain farm was its being linked up with the romantic history of Owen Glendower, who, as you may, or may not, remember, drew his name from this region.

Morwyn’s mother was Welsh — I understand she died in child-birth — and it was my interest in Welsh history that gave me my hold, such as it was, upon her imagination.

You won't, my dear boy, understand anything of what I have to tell you if you don't get the personality of Morwyn lodged in your mind.

Descriptions of women's beauty are always tedious, especially so, I suspect, when a father is writing to a son, and I'm not going to enlarge on her dark hair and dark eyes and on her willow-wand slimness. But this much I will say — I have never known such an aura — if you understand what I mean — of magnetic desirability — as emanated from this girl's figure. I can't tell you whether other men felt it — I have no idea whether you would feel it. But to me that was the chief thing!

Whether you'd call her pretty or plain I simply don't know. I only know that from the moment I first saw her I would willingly, like Faust, have sold my soul to the devil to get hold of her. And, as you have reason to know, I'm not a person totally without experience!

But it was my dog, Black Peter, who — more than my interest in Owen Glendower — was the real bond between us. I spoke glibly just now of selling my soul to the devil for Morwyn; but the truth is, after she became so fascinated by the dog, it did occur to me more than once, that Black Peter was extraordinarily like the famous poodle whose shape Mephistopheles assumed!

I don't think you ever cared very much for my spaniel. I think you regarded him as a selfish and neurotic old bachelor, extremely like his master. But Morwyn acquired a veritable passion for him; a passion to which the dog, queerly enough, was almost indifferent, but of which I, as you can well believe, took every possible advantage.

But, God help me, I can see well what I'm doing now! I am doddering on with this lingering preamble just to put off telling you my story, which, as Dante says, "nel pensier rinnova la paura," in the thought renews the fear!

As we ascended the slope of the mountain and got nearer and nearer to the out-buildings of the farm this queer illumination, that was apparently both mental and physical, seemed to increase.

All the material, all the emotional elements of that moment revealed themselves to me with a lucidity that was startling, that was, in fact, shocking.

I saw for instance with a clearness that was anything but pleasant, the unmitigated sensuality of my personal side of the relations between this girl and me.

All the pretty tags and streamers of platonic idealism with which my specious reasoning-power had tricked up my attraction, seemed to go sailing away on the northeast wind!

As Mephistopheles said of Faust— "a girl was leading me by the nose!" The "illumination" from which I suffered — for I got no joy of this insight and much grief — revealed to me, the fact that just as I was coming up the mountains with the hope of catching a glimpse of Morwyn so was Black Peter keeping a little ahead of me in the hope of getting on the trail of Bitch Bessie, my young woman's fox-terrier.

I always knew pretty well what Black Peter was thinking and feeling by the particular angle at which he held his tail. On this occasion he held his tail almost — not quite, but almost — at right angles with his broad and solid back. And he caracoled and shook his ears and galloped and cantered with all the manifestations of exquisite rapture such as he generally reserves for the moment when at the end of our walks I turn on my heel to move homeward.

We had reached the entrance to the farm-yard — for the normal farm operations weren't interrupted by these visits of the famous vivisector — and as usual I was peering into the cattle-stall where not unfrequently she would be petting one of the animals, when, under the power of this "illumination," which I had by this time come to recognize in myself but attributed it simply to erotic excitement, I saw that she was watching me from the hayloft above the shed where out of a dark square opening they used to toss down bundles of hay into the yard below.

And now I had my second shock in regard to Morwyn; for with this terrible clarity that had come upon me, and I still in my folly attributed it to the clairvoyance of "love," I saw in her face as it hovered in the opening of that hay-loft — and she must have been on her knees, in there, or she could not have peered out of that aperture — what I had never seen before in my whole life, the look of first love in a young girl's soul. I had often cursed my ignorance of women's secret thoughts, cursed myself for not being able to read the enigma of their feelings under their flickering expressions, but now — when by the accident of this meteoric illumination Morwyn's inmost self was revealed to me — instead of being gratified I was shocked and appalled!

I must have often talked to you — but no! I suppose not to you, though certainly to everybody else — about what nonsense I considered it, all the fuss that used to be made about the "purity" of unwedded girls. I've always maintained that the whole thing was just the invention of vicious old rogues like myself, anxious to retain the monopoly of melting the ice-chaste senses of these vases of innocence.

I've protested that vicious men are naturally more distrustful of this purity than their less sensual brethren, and I've always declared that the latter are completely gulled by these crafty innocents.

You can therefore understand what a shock it was to me when under this psychic "ray," from God knows what region of the cosmos, I was made aware of the terrifying purity of Morwyn's nature!

You will ask why it appalled me instead of delighting me? Simply because of the frightful responsibility it implied! Your grandmother, whom you may perhaps just remember, used always to warn me against what she would call, “meddling with a young girl’s heart.”

Consideration of that kind I regarded as old-fashioned nonsense. But, God! When I saw the look on Morwyn’s face through that loft-window, I realized that I had stirred up an emotion compared with which my romantic sensuality was an airy straw on the wind!

Is all first love in all maidens as powerful and awe-inspiring as what I saw in the face of that blurred figure at that loft-entrance? For I realized then that Morwyn’s response to my infatuation — and, mind you, I had never breathed a word to her about such things, and still less had ever given her a kiss — was a feeling so fatally strong that had she melted, as we say, in my arms it could hardly have been stronger!

The image in the hay-loft vanished as soon as I stood still at the farm-yard entrance; but I knew she would soon appear in my path through a gate out of the kitchen-garden.

Meanwhile I was disturbed, and not only disturbed but shocked in my romantic touchiness, by the flagrant overtures that Bitch Bessie was making to Black Peter. Whether Black Peter had, like his master, received from this mysterious meteoric disturbance a new and unnatural insight into the universal feminine organism, or whether he was, as I have often suspected, so cerebral in his eroticism that he preferred the pursuit of the scent of the feminine, or even the idea of such a pursuit, to the confounding reality, I cannot tell, but I know that while the gambols of Bessie round him and her excited leaping clear over his glossy, four-square back, caused his short spaniel’s tail to stand erect and to shiver like an aspen-branch, he was soon taking no more notice of her than if she’d been a fly, and was entirely occupied in devouring an old chicken-bone that he had unearthed from under some manure which lay beneath a dung-cart that had lost one of its wheels.

But there was Morwyn advancing nervously towards us from the gate into the kitchen-garden! She was wearing her out-of-doors grey jacket and her little furry Russian hat with a grey woollen tuft on the front of it, and she carried a blackthorn stick in her hand. It was clear she had come out that evening with the intention of accompanying me up the mountain. She gave me her hand as she always did and looked hurriedly aside when our eyes met as she always did, and when I began talking to her, and she felt it was impolite to stare any more at Peter's activities with the bone, instead of looking into my face, she compromised by fixing her eyes on the bottom of my old greenish-black over-coat and only left her contemplation of this to turn her gaze upon the large round-handled sycamore stick upon which I leant as I talked to her.

Never had my mind been more terribly clear than at that moment. Indeed it struck me then how unfair and unequal the contact between us had now become, considering that if I didn't actually read her thoughts I read everything else with appalling distinctness!

It soon transpired that her glances at the overturned dung-cart were not altogether due to shyness; for with a brusque determination, that contrasted oddly enough with her former embarrassment, she called to Bessie to follow her and ran off through the yard towards the house, evidently with the intention of relieving Black Peter and me from the terrier's distracting liveliness.

It was I confess rather to my relief that she came back without Bessie, but it was to my complete dismay that she informed me — and she bent low down to caress Black Peter's flopping ears as she brought out the bad news — that her father was coming out in a minute to accompany us.

The moments that followed, while she and I waited for Mr. — were moments of indescribable misery to both of us. It was lucky for her that my "illumination" gave me such insight into her heart just then, or I would undoubtedly have revenged myself upon her for this frightful contretemps by some extremely unkind words.

Instead of upon her, I "took it out," as we say, upon poor Black Peter, compelling him to let the remainder of the chicken-skeleton he had disinterred drop back in peace into its cow-dung grave.

So miserable were we both, I holding Black Peter's collar by the hook of my stick instead of troubling to put on his leash, and she poking at some tuft of lichen on a mossy stone with the ferrule of hers, that we could do nothing but chafe in silence at the devilish cruelty of this accident that on the first and only day in these precious three weeks that we had a chance to go up the mountain alone, her father must decide to come with us!

Well, he came at last, this pompous, plausible man, and I dodged shaking hands with him, as I always did, for like the good Ingersoll I would no more shake hands with a vivisector than I would shake hands with a torturer from the Inquisition. But I couldn't stop him coming; and we all three, with Black Peter making a fourth, ascended the mountain.

The winter is the only time, as I've told you before, that a mountain-climber in this place can feel absolutely secure from the interference of game-keepers, and since this fatal walk took place in the very heart of mid-winter, I knew we ran no risk of that sort of molestation. But little did I realize towards what we were advancing so blandly and casually. It is extraordinary how blinded we human beings can be at the great turning-points of our life!

Slowly up the hill we wended our way; Mr. — in front, for the path soon grew narrow, then Morwyn and finally Black Peter and myself.

Never shall I forget that ascent! I suppose you of the new generation have your own way of taking stock of your nature and your life; but I confess to my old-fashioned mind you all seem swimming on the surface like water-beetles on a pond. This easy fashion of going to work has never been natural to me, as you know too well, who have suffered so often from my long talks about myself; but never have I summed myself up to the tune I did that evening climbing the mountain behind Morwyn and her father!

I came to some most drastic conclusions about myself as I watched Black Peter roll on his back on the dead bracken and then proceed to work himself along on his belly in the way he does, like a dog-headed serpent in a cerebral ecstasy.

It was the sight of Morwyn's darling figure, as it went swaying and gliding and pausing, and springing forward in front of me, that started me off, but it was this unearthly illumination, which I keep trying to tell you about, that made my conclusions so devastating.

I decided that what the human race meant by love was totally unknown to me. I decided that I possessed the gift, or the curse if you like, of pity, to an abnormal degree; but of pity, you must remember — for otherwise I could not possibly have survived what I shall presently relate to you — for physical rather than for mental suffering.

I decided that my enjoyment of life was so narrow that no human being who didn't share my peculiarities could possibly believe that such narrowness could exist. They would say — as you, my son, are probably saying now — that I have a mania for self-laceration and for making myself out worse than I am; whereas, as a matter of fact, I have a deep suspicion that I am really far worse than I dared to conclude on that memorable ascent of the mountain!

But I will tell you frankly — though I can assure you it was a weird thing to watch Morwyn's lovely figure just in front of me while I received such revelations — what that evening's cosmic illumination showed me with regard to the insane narrowness of my pleasure in life. I came to the conclusion that I had long ago outgrown my youthful greediness for food and drink, but had substituted three other equally vicious cravings, that had to be satisfied or I should be left in a state of apathetic collapse, the craving to enjoy Nature, the craving to enjoy young women, and the craving to enjoy old broadmouthed books, especially the works of Rabelais. You will probably refuse to believe me when I say that I could satisfy all these three manias to the fullest extreme through one of my senses only, the sense of sight, but this is the exact truth. I could even enjoy the ecstasy of the climax of the Eleusinian Mysteries themselves without hearing or touching or tasting or smelling — purely by seeing!

And I came to the conclusion that though when I saw physical suffering my pity was extreme, when it was out of my sight I did not think about it at all, or only at the times when I said my prayers, prayers that I can assure you were longer and more eccentric than any invented by the Pharisees.

Now perhaps you are beginning to understand what a momentous walk this was for me up this mountain and why it gave me such a weird and uncanny feeling to watch Morwyn's lovely young back as she climbed in front of me.

For the whole nimbus of romantic sentiment, of purged and winnowed idealism, that Nature, the Old Illusionist, had hung about this girlish form in front of me was torn away by this cosmic illumination. The thousand little things, delicate, dainty, tender, quaint, touching, pathetic, mental and spiritual, for which over and over again I had told myself I was attracted to her, were smitten into thin air; and in their place I was forced to recognize the bare fact that what led, drew, dragged me towards her was simply the maddening slenderness of her figure and the irresistible seduction of the way she would sometimes look at me! This latter attraction, which was ten times stronger than her physical charm, though her figure was of the precise kind to trouble my senses, I now saw to be due to the fact that she'd fallen in love with me.

I suppose she had never been looked at by a grownup person in the way I must have looked at her; and instead of this vicious desire of mine exciting any sensual response in her it had simply made her fall in love!

I cannot tell you what a shock it was to me to discover, in the strength of this meteoric illumination how frighteningly "pure," in the strictest and most old-fashioned sense of that word, a maiden could be when she fell in love — though with my mania for Homer I was an idiot not to have recalled that infinitely poignant passage where Nausicaa waits for Odysseus by the pillar in her parents' hall.

I want you to realize, my son, though I daresay it's the last thing I'll ever persuade you to do, that though my pleasure in life is strictly limited to a mania for slender women, a mania for Homer and Rabelais, and a mania for Nature, I am terribly and most absurdly hampered in my free enjoyment of these delights by a powerful — though in my opinion a miserably distorted — scrupulousness of conscience.

This conscience of mine used, when I was young, to be a Christian one, and on the strength of it, I was wont to regard all the quivering ecstasies of Eros as equally wicked. But that view, my dear boy, I have entirely outgrown. My present view is that erotic pleasure is not only lawful but commendable save where it causes direct suffering. It must, and always will, cause indirect suffering, because of the tragic possessiveness of human nature, a possessiveness that makes us seethe and ferment with fury when we are forced to share the persons we possess; but though we shall, I suppose, always suffer from this cruel hurt, bitter as the grave, we may, I think, as time goes on cease to regard such suffering as a legitimate cause of hatred and revenge.

But though my conscience no longer considers erotic pleasure as sin, it persecutes me abominably in other ways. In fact it plays a much larger part in my life than when in my youth it confined itself to that particular sphere.

I had refrained from "making love," as we say, to Morwyn or even from kissing her, because my conscience was touchy about being the first one to stir up in her those tyrannical desires that have led me such a dance since I was her age. You can therefore, my dear boy, judge of my feelings as I followed her sweet figure up this accursed hill, when I recognized under this terrible illumination that already, without my having kissed her, she was hopelessly in love with me. How unsympathetic I felt, during that long ascent, towards Black Peter's well-known peculiarities! It was his habit, when he intended to roll on his back with his feathery legs bent so restfully and prettily inwards, to lay his snout against the ground before he sank down, turning his head a little sideways so that his left cheek, if one can speak in such terms, pushed itself along the sod like an energetic little plough. By these signs which he always came to my side to make, he was wont to indicate to me that he desired my sympathetic assistance at his orgy of wellbeing.

The moment he got my attention he would turn completely over on his back and proceed to roll in an ecstasy of joy, every now and then, however, propelling himself forward with a jerk by pressing one of his hind-paws against the earth. The moment I ceased to give him my sympathy in these manifestations he would spring up, shake himself vigorously, just as I noticed he always shook himself after indulging in the smallest erotic excitement, and run forward as usual, but if I stood still and encouraged him, using a certain grotesque jargon which we had composed for these occasions and which a good deal resembled the “little language” which Swift invented for his correspondence with Stella, he would turn over on his belly, and with his feathery legs outspread like a young crocodile, work himself forward with his stomach pressed against the ground and his head upraised, while his liquid brown eyes remained fixed in delirious rapture upon my own. At these moments I often experienced the feeling that I was watching the love-dance of the heraldic animal known as a Wyvern.

But on this fatal evening I was far too perturbed by what had been revealed to me to bother about Black Peter’s ecstasies; and when he began licking with his tongue — oh, how well I knew the strawberry-red tint of that lively little organ! — every road-side stone or tree-stump past which in some solitary stroll earlier in the day Morwyn must have taken Bitch Bessie, I began to feel a positive anger against him.

I knew Black Peter’s peculiarities as well as I knew my own. His life-pleasures, like mine, were not of a wide scope. They were indeed extremely limited; and the sharing of the embrace of love with Bitch Bessie was certainly not one of them. But sniffing along the road where Bitch Bessie had passed earlier in the day, flitting on her light butterfly feet, was one of them, and one of the most ravishing.

Of Bitch Bessie in person he never took the slightest notice. Even when in her ardour she leapt over his back he took no notice; but the impersonal trail, or track or scent of Bitch Bessie was a very different thing. This seemed to cause him thrill after thrill of that ideal aspiration to arouse which Goethe declares at the end of Faust is the cosmic prerogative of the Feminine Principle.

But the sight of Morwyn's darling figure drifting up that hill behind her father and evidently resolute to walk alone — for the Vivisector often stopped so that she could overtake him, but the moment he stopped she stopped too and made as if she were waiting for us to overtake her — caused me to feel a nervous irritation with Black Peter on no other grounds but that he was as peculiar in his reactions to the Feminine Principle as I was myself!

A little later, when I realized the meteoric cause of the quickened intelligence I was suffering from, it occurred to me to wonder whether it mightn't have affected Black Peter too, and, if so, whether it was his enlightenment, parallel to mine, that roused my anger against him?

But it is no wonder I was in a touchy state going up that hill. Here was my one chance for a walk alone with her, before they went away for another year, being snatched from me, and snatched from me at the very moment when the impregnable chastity and purity of her nature had been so clearly revealed to me that I should have had no qualms of conscience left about making love to her. It would indeed have been an ideally harmonious situation! I should have got transporting delight from touching her and nothing that I did could have altered one jot the amazing purity of her feeling for me. She would have taken my satyrish love-making lightly and tenderly; but as for it exciting any corresponding viciousness in her own nerves I could see that the magic of love had completely removed such a possibility.

If only her father hadn't selected this day, of all days, to thrust his company upon us, we would have had one of those indescribable encounters between a man and a woman that come to most of us only once or twice in a lifetime. I would have been transported by making love to her and she would have been entranced in her love for me. A man's desire would have encountered a girl's passion, and the deepest human situation, save birth or death, would have occurred between us. As for the future, I don't believe either of us would have given it a thought. You will no doubt be giving it a thought, my son; and I've no doubt you will be thinking that if ever there were a case of unpardonable depravity it would be what might have occurred that evening between the elderly rascal who begat you and this misguided young woman!

It is a sad commentary upon the prevalent human illusion that the more you know the happier you are, that this climb up the mountain behind Morwyn and her father should have been one of the most bitter of all the experiences of my life.

I tell you it was a crushing thing, that illumination! It made me realize, what at the time without any equivocation I knew to be the bare truth, every most shameless detail of every feeling of my dog, my girl, the Vivisector and myself.

Four exposed entities, three bipeds and one quadruped, were thus climbing that hill — and you must remember it was a steep hill — one after the other, in straggling Indian file.

That I should now know — from this accurst illumination that exposed the sweet girl so nakedly to my troubled mind — that I might have taken her up this hill yesterday, the day before yesterday, any day during this last week, without the possibility of hurting her more than she'd been hurt already, simply by the unpredictable movement of her heart towards me, was like a dagger in my flesh.

I suppose you, my lad, with your modern cynicism and your modern sexlessness, have never known this particular torment, the torment of "if only I'd known"; but I can assure you as I looked at that girl's form — and seven times she looked back at me and smiled a smile so inscrutable that even this damned illumination couldn't strip it of its mystery — I suffered the acutest tantalization I have ever undergone.

I was far too occupied with Morwyn and with my own agitation, to take much notice of her father; but when — and it was the merest accident that it happened — my eye did fall upon that small compact figure, its big head topped by a ridiculous shooting-cap far too small for it, I got an unpleasant shock from what my "illumination" — I have to go on using that word: for what else could I call it? — revealed to me about him. Mr. —, you must understand, wasn't a doctor — and indeed I've met many doctors who detested his practices and felt they had a pernicious rather than a good effect on the art of healing — and what shocked me now was the intensity of the emotion that surrounded his drifting thoughts, though in truth they were his habitual thoughts, as he climbed that hill. You must not think that the "illumination" I am trying to describe to you, enabled me to read Mr.— 's thoughts any more than I could read his daughter's.

What it revealed to me was the diffused reaction of his emotional nature to these thoughts. In other words, the magnetic disturbances inside this squat, goblinish personality, corresponded to the very different disturbances that were now giving me my insight into the heart of Morwyn.

The effect upon us of witnessing cruelty or of reading of cruelty is one of the most searching tests to which we can be subjected. I am of opinion that very few of us are free from some voluptuous response of the erotic nerve in the presence of cruelty — but I feel that the amount, the kind, the variety, the species, the measure, the seriousness of the particular cruelty adapted to our particular erotic nerve, differs enormously in different people.

I am not free, and I am sure you, my dear, will not claim to be free, from certain aspects of this dangerous vice, but I may tell you at once — and I'm not a squeamish person — that I was shocked by the nervous excitement into which Mr. — had been thrown by a series of "scientific" thoughts that had visited him as he ascended that hill in front of us!

Whether these thoughts had occurred to him after a glance at the somewhat curious antics of Black Peter I cannot tell, but what I felt from his nerves was a gloating response to some kind of horrible cruelty, the exact nature of which was as completely concealed from me as the thought that aroused it. I had come to realize from my instinctive knowledge of human nature and my long experience of human perversity that many of these scientists derive intense voluptuous satisfaction from their experiments on animals; but you can realize something intellectually and yet suffer a sickening shock when you approach it with your senses.

The nearer we drew to the great dusky table-land on the top of this mountain-slope the more silent and apart we seemed to grow.

Save that including Black Peter we were four entities instead of two, the sentence with which Dante begins the twenty-third canto of his Inferno would have exactly applied to us as we ascended that hill, "Tacite, soli, e senza compagnia, n'andavam l'un dinanzi e l'altro dopo, come frate minor vanno per via."

"Silent, apart, and without escort we went on, the one before and the other after, as Friars Minor go their way."

This silence between us and this instinctive keeping apart must have had to do with the fact that the "illumination" I speak of was felt by us all, so that while Morwyn realized the cruel tantalization of my senses as I watched her, her father realized how maddening to us both was the fact that he was there at all, and even Black Peter in his dim fashion realized that the Vivisector, angry with his human companions, had been visualizing at least one rebellious, wayward and sensitive body securely fastened down by those effective straps that our manufacturers hasten to supply as soon as the magic word “Science” is whispered in their ears.

That Black Peter felt instinctively shy of that squat, toad-like figure, whose big head with the little sports-cap balanced on the top of it resembled the picture of Tweedledee in the illustrations of Alice, was proved by the position of his short tail, which, though he still sniffed about and every now and then lifted his leg against a tuft of grass, remained clamped to his rump, an attitude which gave him the look of a small black louse who has smelt a whiff of carbolic acid.

How well I had come to know every curve and line of Black Peter’s expressive form! My feeling for him was the extreme opposite of that “sentimentality” of which Mr. —, earning his glory by practising on nerves and yet himself so impervious, had already begun to accuse me. Black Peter and I would quarrel and make it up just like two human beings. We would sometimes selfishly contend for a comfortable seat by the fire; while at other times, at breakfast, for example, he would jump about with disinterested joy that I should be enjoying a meal in which he had no part or lot, and of which I never gave him a crumb.

I know he’d been long aware of my secret feeling for Morwyn. I am sure he knew of it before she did, and knew it in a way she never could; for what does a girl ever really know of the desire of a man of my type?

It had before now been quite an annoyance to her the way he would sometimes utter queer little emotional cries and rush between us. I believe she put it down, though I don’t think that pleased her very much, to the presence of Bitch Bessie, whereas it was really, as I well knew, a wave of tragic jealousy at his heart’s core. In fact it was more than that. It was the human soul in Black Peter struggling to express emotions that were so blind and powerful and dark and dim and obscure that he himself did not know the cause of those wild sobs that rose up under his glossy coat.

Considering the nature of the illumination that I felt then, and that I believed both the girl and her father felt too, I soon became certain that it was because of Mr. — that the higher we got up the hill the closer was that little short tail clamped to the dog’s rump.

But it was by the girl herself all this while that my mind was obsessed. Black Peter and Mr. — could only distract my thoughts for brief intervals — I came back to her with torment and rapture like a piece of extended elastic against the hand that holds it. I could not recover from that first shock of what I now knew about her. Although the “illumination” didn’t enable me to read her thoughts, any more than those of her father, it enabled me to read with provoking vividness her emotional condition. And I kept tormenting myself with what might have happened if only I had known before. The revelation that she loved me was accompanied you see, by this other startling revelation with regard to what love could mean in a girl.

And think, my son, of my never knowing this before? Do you know it? No, I suppose not! You and all your generation talk about this “sex” of yours as if it were a kind of fairy frog-spawn — something that could be artificially preserved, artificially manipulated, artificially separated from the people who possess it, and in general treated with such a mixture of scientific pedantry and moral flippancy that it makes me feel as if you were all a set of airy explorers, bringing your “sex” with you as if it were a new kind of quinine, or iodine, in little labelled bottles!

I hate the word “sex.” It makes me want to begin rehearsing: “Common are to either sex oppifex and artefex, parens, sacerdos, custos, vindex, judex, haeres, comes, dux, princeps, municeps” — and so on! I prefer the Biblical tone, “And from the beginning of the creation God made them man and woman.”

Well! Men and women, even after all these generations, are still mysteries to each other. Certainly until I walked up that hill under the extraordinary revelations brought to me by a meteorite, I never knew what a thunder-clap of finality a woman’s love could be! I supposed that all of them chopped and changed in these motions of the blood even as we ourselves.

But now under this diabolical search-light I learnt that when a woman, well! at any rate a girl like this, once loves, her whole nature is affected. She may come to hate later, with that peculiar hatred of the heart for the Being to whom once and for all it has been given, which is the most merciless of all hatreds, but hate as she may, to the end of her life she will bear that particular signature carved on her vitals.

And now, as I ascended that rocky path behind Morwyn, pondering on the mystery of the last smile she had turned to give me, the craving that obsessed me to embrace that sweet body of hers rose like smoke into the cells of my horribly-clear brain and set up a wrestling there of the most contradictory thoughts.

Knowing now that her whole nature, every inch of her lovely flesh, every nerve in her precious being, was mine to take, it was impossible to restrain my imagination from playing upon the string — what would it have been like had we been alone together to-day!

But, against this maddening sweetness, contended the opposite thought — just as fatally clear in the cells of my brain — that the very fact of my already possessing every portion of this virgin citadel would deprive my contact with it of those indescribable raptures that attend the event of being the first to make love to a maid.

She would rest blissfully in my arms, she would accept everything. “Everything” would seem natural and right to her, since her soul was already mine and there would be nothing of what Milton — profoundly immoral as all puritans are — calls “sweet, reluctant, amorous delay.”

This thought would never have risen in me if it had not been that my illuminated vision penetrated with such fearful distinctness into all those recesses of reserved girlhood from which we are as a rule so hopelessly excluded, and from which — judging from what the genius of the old painters reveals to us in those shyly-musing, vaguely-brooding young women of their Annunciations — the full consciousness of the girl herself is excluded too.

But strange as it will no doubt seem to you, my dear son, with your light airy-fairy modern humour in these matters, this thought was a serious trouble to me as I went up the hill behind that form I so intensely desired. It was as if, by reason of that fatal illumination, she had already become, inside her clothes and her skin, just as completely mine as she would have become if we had lived together for five, or even ten years!

In a physical sense of course she was still an unpossessed maid; but my meteoric insight into these feminine secrets showed me clearly that the physical with women is far less important than we are apt to assume.

But see! She had turned and smiled at me again; and there arose, as if conjured up by magic from regions of obscurity beyond all penetration, the old unrevealed secret; and her smile hovering back to me down the slope of the mountain, threw once more over the link between us, and over her feeling about it and over her thoughts and over herself that prehistoric tremble of mystery like the quiver in the air that certain hot days call forth out of the ground, that no insight could capture or explain. But I have no doubt, my dear, that by this time you’re getting terribly impatient to reach the top of this mountain-ridge, up which I have been taking you with such lingering steps!

Indeed, I daresay you wouldn't be far wrong if you accused me of making every sort of excuse to delay my getting to the top! But we did get there at last, first Mr. —, then Morwyn, then Black Peter; and once there we all paused in a group, with Black Peter in the centre, to rest and drink in the unparalleled view. Black Peter sat straight upright, his mouth open and his red tongue hanging out. He established himself in the not very wide space between Morwyn and me; and I could see the girl was a little teased by his loud pantings.

Our heads were all turned southward, looking down towards the wide valley through which flows our deep and famous river, and Mr. — was explaining to us the correct geological names of the particular rock-formations that lay in jags and crags about us, when some electric vibration, some weird disturbance in the air above our heads, caused us all to look upwards.

Even Black Peter, who, as he sat on his rump between Morwyn and me, his short black tail resting on the dead heather like the rudder of a stranded boat, was beginning to make the curious moaning sound that was premonitory to a heart-stricken cry of jealous anguish, turned his nose upwards, his nostrils quivering frantically, as if under the impact of an absolutely unknown smell. With the intense preoccupation of a man whose whole desire is turned to a girl I glanced hurriedly sideways to see the effect of this phenomenon upon Morwyn, taking it myself to be the approach of a thunderstorm.

Never shall I forget the girl's expression! She had removed her hat and was holding it in the hand furthest away from me, swinging it carelessly against her side. Her jacket and skirt, both of them of some dark colour and some smooth texture that I am too ignorant to describe, struck me at that moment as fitting her very badly. Why this should have rushed through my head simultaneously with the idea of a thunderstorm I can’t tell you, but another thing was puzzling, for though she had always struck me as having a white skin I now visualized her little body under these loose clothes as being of a brownish tint, in fact as resembling the slippery, sunburnt form of an extremely dirty little tramp-girl I had once caught bathing in one of these mountain-streams. But, as I say, this thought of her clothes being too big for her, and of her body inside them being as brown as a gipsy’s, came and went in less than a second. What really arrested me was the look on her face. Will you believe it, my dear son, when I tell you that her expression was that of rapturous transport? That’s what it was; and I couldn’t put it to you in any other way. Her face was literally transfigured.

I didn’t think of such a thing then, I only watched her in amazement, but in the process of going over these things again and I suppose I shall do nothing else than go over them till the end of my days, it has occurred to me that her face was like that of a Madonna in a well-known Spanish picture, not a pretty face but an extremely feminine face, if you know what I mean, a face with nothing of that boyishness about it which so many English girls cultivate, but a face into which the Spanish painter — I’ve forgotten his name though I’ve heard it scores of times — has put the wildest ecstasy of unearthly love.

In my clumsy self-complacency I must confess I attributed this heavenly look to the girl’s newly-flowered love for myself, and to her happiness in our standing together on this mountain-side, but of course you must remember, my dear boy, that I had the excuse of what this curst illumination had been revealing to me all this evening about her. In fact I had that advantage over her which girls have been taught by their mothers from time immemorial to regard as the worst possible humiliation. I knew she was in love with me; though I had not confessed to her that I was in love with her!

Oh, my son, my son, as I go over all these events in my mind I am amazed at the amount of “stupid being,” as that American lady in Paris calls it, with which a man’s self-complacency muffles his natural mother-wit. Of course I know now that that look on the girl’s face had nothing at all to do with me! Her nature may have been changed by her having fallen in love with me, but it was with the whole of her nature, changed or unchanged, that she now waited in this strange rapture for what she must have felt to be — but God knows what she felt it to be!

But to the end of my days that look will remain at the back of my consciousness to be a comfort to me. It was a look I couldn’t mistake: a look of radiant pleasure. As I have said, Morwyn could not be called pretty. Her eyes were her best feature; but though their colour was a rare one, a curious grey-green that resembled certain shells in a rock-pool, they very seldom lightened or darkened, and only once had I seen tears in them. This, however, was not strange, because, as they always seemed to look out at me from under fathoms of water, she may sometimes have had tears in them without my knowing it. Her hair was dark and very straight, and always drawn back tightly from her forehead, revealing her ears, which, though delicate in modelling were decidedly large and had a tendency to stick out from her small head, detracting a good deal from the effect of her madonna-like brow and creating a somewhat elfish impression. You know — or does anyone of your sub-erotic generation, who by analysing their feelings have separated them from the terrible force of the imagination, really know? — how when you’ve got a desire for the body of a girl devouring you day and night, every little material object becomes a symbol? Well, all the way up the path till this moment, I had been finding tokens of the mystery of her appeal in certain glittering pieces of amber-and-white rock that lie embedded at intervals in our grey slaty stone. Mr. — was in the act of expounding the presence of these veins of marbly waywardness in our mass of slate rock, when the cosmogonic event, whose coming had been heralded for me, if not for the rest of us, by this damnable illumination, swept down upon us.

That look of transport on Morwyn's face was the last thing I saw; and when I die it will be the most important thing I shall have ever seen. But how can it be explained? A meteoric splendour from some exploded stellar body, crashing down into our globe and sinking into it as a stone might sink into a hollow skull — what was there about a cataclysm like that to excite rapture in a girl's breast?

And though the mental illumination by which I at any rate, and I feel pretty sure Black Peter too, had a premonition of some cosmic shock, was as psychic as it was electric, I cannot regard it as anything but a ghastly crack in the order of things and a colossal bolt hurled at our little oasis of order out of the blind tumult of the outer chaos.

And why a monstrous event of this kind — a horrible invasion of cosmos by chaos — should light up in ecstasy a thin girlish face with elfin ears was then — and is still — beyond my understanding.

You tell me, my son, that you and your cynical young friends are sick to death of the fuss and talk that this "collision with the end of a dark star" as my favourite newspaper called it, has excited throughout the country.

That's another of your suicidal analytical tricks! In my simplicity — a simplicity which I cultivate as desperately as you young people do your sophistication — I would be perfectly ready to share the popular thrill of awful but delicious terror which the newspapers caught in their dramatic way; but at the moment it was different. Anyway if you and your young people are sick of the talk about this astronomical accident you ought to listen with all the more pleasure to what I'm going to tell you now, which is not "talk," but a very grim experience.

Whatever meteoric body it was that collided with our earth it must have struck the edge of a vast solid mass of rock, hidden beneath the heather-roots, a rock upon the opposite circumference of which, without the least intimation of the peril we were incurring, we were all four standing. It can only have been because this rock was so large that we were not crushed by the impact of the falling body which bore it down. But its size saved us. The blow carried down the whole block of stone, carried it down to the centre of the earth with ourselves on it, but it was so large that it must have carried with it, if not something of its own atmosphere, at least something of its own balance, poise, and relative gravitation, so that it was really like sinking down with our feet securely planted on a solid segment of our planet and all the while being protected from the whole spatial sensation of "up and down" by some of the deepest laws of the cosmos.

We were not protected from the mental or magnetic shock of this cosmogonic fall; but as far as I can understand from what people have since told me of the look of the spot to-day the bolt — or whatever it was — that carried down the plot of ground on which we were standing, was followed, as well as preceded, by a cyclone of disturbance: and this must have choked up the crater behind us with rocks and rubble.

The first thing I recall — and you must be indulgent to me, my dear, if my memory grows shaky at the crucial moments of my story — when my consciousness returned, was the warm breath of Black Peter on my face. He was never one for licking you with his tongue; but at moments of agitation, when for instance someone closed a door between him and me, he would breathe hard at the crack under the bottom of the obstacle, puffing forth heavy breaths, so it always sounded to me, rather than inhaling. And it was of the familiar sound of Black Peter's heavy breath and its hot puffs against my cheek that I was first aware, and I believe it was my old familiarity with this trick of his that kept my mind intact at a moment when my wits might easily have been unsettled.

My first thought was of Morwyn, for this feeling of Black Peter's breath could scarcely be called a thought, and I made an effort to rise to my feet. This I found for several minutes totally beyond my power, but I did finally achieve it; and although my muscles seemed half-paralysed, I staggered towards her. But there were three figures there, two of them bending over the body of someone who lay twisted and distorted on the ground!

I was too dazed when I reached them to realize at once in its full ghastly abnormality the import of what I saw. I took it in at a glance; but I was in such an unnatural condition that I was not as disturbed and confounded by what I saw as I would have been under normal circumstances. But I expect you have noticed — only you post-war young people always take everything so coolly! — that the mind at a crisis grows conscious of a profound wonder at its own power of facing things as calmly as it does.

At any rate, when I did grow aware of the monstrousness of what I saw, I accepted it with a singular coolness. What I saw was nothing less than my precious Morwyn staring with tearless eyes at the corpse of Mr. while another Mr. —, a replica in outward aspects of the one on the ground, only this one's face was free from distortion, was trying to console her.

As far as I could make out she herself was suffering no overpowering shock from the presence of this other Mr. —. Her expression wasn't at all that of a person overcome with blank terror or struck dumb with amazement; it was simply that of a daughter whose father has been killed in a sudden and shocking accident. We might have been at the bottom of a rocky gorge in the Alps. The “second” Mr. — could not even there, have looked with more normal human concern at the frozen and tragic grief on the face of our companion. That I was not staggered by the situation, beyond all power to adjust myself to it, is proved by two little details. I noticed in her expression, and I marked it as a touching example of her impulsive goodness of heart, a longing to be left quite alone with the “first” Mr. so that her frozen feelings could melt over him in passionate grief; but along with this I noticed a perfectly well-balanced anxiety lest she should hurt the feelings of the “second” Mr. —, by being deaf to his comforting words.

And as I dragged myself to the girl’s side and stood behind her — for I did not dare to meddle with her grief — I suddenly became conscious that Black Peter had begun to utter that moaning sound he always did when he caught me making love — mental love, you understand, for consumed with desire as I was I had never touched her — and that as he made it he was jumping up against me and pawing my back with his feathery front paws.

I suppose as long as I live I shall have a certain power of standing aside from events and from my own extremest feelings under events and watching them with a diabolically detached eye, for such as you know to your cost, my dear, is my nature. I can’t not be scandalously and shamelessly conscious of every mortal experience and of myself, as the experiencer of it all!

And it shows how the human heart works, and how what we call “love” — with all its manias and perversities — makes us blind, deaf, and petrified to everything else, that not one of us, not even Black Peter, gave a thought to our astounding situation, or so much as looked round, or snuffed the air, to see where we were, or how we were to get out.

Morwyn thought only of the “first” Mr. —; while the “second” Mr. — and I, in our different ways, thought only of her, and Black Peter thought only of me.

Another peculiarity of our human consciousness struck the callous and curious eye of my detached self, namely the power which the mind has of adapting itself to conditions that you would naturally suppose would send it stark mad. And how obstinately, how fatally, we are what our passions are. Here was I gazing at Morwyn’s entrancing figure exactly as I had done all the way up that hill! No matter if we were enclosed in the bowels of the earth: no matter if the sweet girl herself was stupefied in grief at the death of her father: no matter if Black Peter was scrabbling and moaning like a crazy thing at my back: no matter if I had to overcome for the “second” Mr. — a shivering distaste that would have made it easy for me to run away with the hairs of my head standing on end: what my detached self noted, and noted with aid still forthcoming from that downpour of cosmogonic electricity, was that my consuming desire for the sweet body of Morwyn overcame both the stiffness of my limbs and my sick terror at the presence of the “second” Mr. —.

I think it was respect for her grief that kept me from approaching her and speaking to her, and no doubt terror of her father’s spirit entered too, but knowing what I am — only it’s impossible for any of you young people with your butterfly-loves, to know the madness of real sensuality — you can take for granted that I snatched this opportunity to gaze upon her as she hung over that man’s corpse, as I would have gazed upon her if she’d hung over a clump of grass.

I daresay my expression at that moment — and it must have been the same as we came up the hill and the same at every chance I’ve had for the last fortnight of watching her without her knowing it — resembled the expression of a village idiot hidden in a withy-bed where the farm-servant comes for water-cress. It would have resembled that idiot's expression if the thunderbolt that carried us down had bruised me so that I had barely a minute to live! That minute I would have spent in staring at her.

I used the expression "spirit of her father" just now, but the truth is that the expression on the face of the "second" Mr. — was entirely different from that on the countenance of the dead body over which his daughter was kneeling.

I could only bring myself to glance once or twice at the ghastly physiognomy of this new companion of ours, but the impression I received when I did steal a look was by no means a pleasant one. If, as I'm tempted to think from the way I feel, my own expression when my madness for Morwyn took possession of me was that of a village idiot, the expression of the "second" Mr. — was that of a pompous hangman. It was the queer noise Black Peter was making as he scrabbled with his paws at my back that finally made the girl turn round, and I saw at once that I had been unconscious much longer than I supposed, for she must have had time to get over — in a measure — her shock at the presence of the "second."

Mr. —, since she now deliberately asked him some question in a whisper and from the naturalness of his response I could see that they must have exchanged many words before.

All this gave me — absurd as it sounds — something of a twinge, for it looked as if she hadn't turned away, even for a moment, from the body of her father, and from communion with his spirit, so much as to find out whether I was alive or dead! I say "with his spirit," for after watching them whispering together for a second or two the form of the "second" Mr. — became so extremely transparent that I could clearly see through it a portion of the dead man's figure and even a fragment of the edge of Morwyn's jacket; but the face of the creature — even while it was conversing quite quietly with the girl — was so contracted with some interior spasm of passion that it was hard to endure to see it so close to her.

It was indeed just as I had decided that I couldn't bear to see it and was on the point of dragging myself between them that Black Peter began barking. Automatically I swung round — as I had done during our walks together for the last ten years — to see what he was barking at; and it was only then and from this you can see what my obsession was, that for the first time my brain took in our physical surroundings!

We were in a vast cavernous space, the floor of which — save for the little island of peat-mould and heather, upon which, like beetles on a burdock-leaf, we had been carried down — was of solid stone, smooth and of a very dark colour, while in a single glance you could see that the roof of our prison was of a similar dark stone, but was so high above our heads that it was much more indistinct than the vast ocean-like floor that stretched away on every side of us.

But I now recognized the cause of Black Peter's barking. Someone was rapidly approaching us. Morwyn, who also at that moment saw what Black Peter and I saw, at once made a step towards this figure. My own first impression about this stranger was a very natural one, though not a very enlightened one. I took him for the first of a rescue party already come down to help us out! But fantastic though this delusion was, it was clearly shared by Morwyn, for she at once lifted her arm and began frantically waving. It was then that I became aware that the tension of the countenance of the "second."

Mr. — had become accentuated to a degree that was shocking. The creature's face was positively twitching! Perhaps the transparency of this Being — in appearance so exactly the double of the corpse lying on our little island of heather in the midst of this boundless stone pavement — made me more aware of this movement in its face. I know I could see a portion of Morwyn's arm, as she waved to the approaching stranger, quite clearly through that contorted visage; and perhaps it was the girl's dark sleeve as it kept crossing the face — as you've seen some tiny bit of weed in the magnifying glass of a powerful microscope cross the whirling convolutions of those diminutive water-dragons that jerk about before your eyes — that threw into relief those spasmodic twitchings.

But what was this? He too, the "second" Mr. now began frantically waving! Black Peter had never ceased from barking and he was now barking furiously, as if some dog-torturer even more zealous than Mr. — himself, were coming towards us. Such was my obsession for Morwyn that I experienced at that moment a definite up-rising of anger against this unknown person whom she was so anxious to summon to our aid.

He was far off still; and it was the first indication I had of there being something decidedly weird about the properties of visibility down here, that though he was far off — a mere dot, blur, smudge, speck, on that boundless plain of level grey stone we all felt his presence — felt it as powerfully, as magnetically, as if he'd come already to within a few feet of us!

The man, if it were a man, but the presence of the "second" Mr. — had given such a jolt to the normal machinery of my habits of thought that I was prepared for anything, must have been several miles away, and we must have presented to his vision the same sort of blur on the face of this vast level surface that he presented to ours.

Satisfied that he had seen us and was coming towards us, Morwyn and the eidolon of her father ceased their frantic waving to him and once more began an impassioned conversation. I have used this phrase before to describe their communication; but to tell you the exact truth, no audible word had yet passed any of our lips! I know I am right in this, because, as we were waiting for this approaching figure, I made a superhuman effort to attract Morwyn's attention to myself and the odd thing was that in this effort I made no attempt to speak; nor did I entertain the faintest hope that she would speak to me. It was not all at once that I came to the realization that this silence of ours was forced upon us by the nature of the place into which we had come. Black Peter's barking seemed the only thing capable of breaking this terrifying silence. I suppose we could have wept. But I feel sure we couldn't have laughed; and my impression of our state as I look back to it now is that we had absolutely forgotten that such a thing as audible speech existed.

And you can imagine, my dear, how this inability even to try to speak added to the quickening of my ordinary intelligence by our meteoric fall! I became acutely conscious of the significance of every fleeting flicker of facial expression, while the most negligible gesture expressed a burden of emotion that was hardly bearable.

"You are a little glad," my appealing glance must have said to her, "that you're not the only one alive down here? It is a little comfort to you, isn't it, to have Black Peter and me with you in this appalling place?" I must have thrown into this supplicating tone such a jet of nervous desperation that our eyes did cling together for a perceptible moment. But hers were as dry as shore-pebbles beyond the sea's reach, dry and heavy-lidded and full of terrible suffering; and the fact that my "illumination" gave me less than the penetration of a wasp's sting into her most obvious thought, made it impossible for me to know anything except that she still loved me and was broken-hearted about her father.

How strange it was! As our eyes clung together for that brief space I desired her so much and I had brooded upon every portion of her sweet body for so long that it was as if I saw the whole of her Being — body, soul and spirit — in the irises of her eyes but was prohibited from so much as touching the outmost fringe of a single one of her thoughts!

I didn't go so far as to wish she didn't love me; but to see this love flowing with her maiden-blood through every vein and pulse, and yet to be held off from taking advantage of it to press her to my heart in our wild predicament, was a pitch of tantalization to which few have come, or, I hope, ever will come!

It was the approach of the stranger that broke up our exchange of — whatever it was we exchanged! She must have known before this what I felt, and I certainly knew what she felt, so that it was with no fresh understanding between us that we turned to the approaching figure. In doing this I was unable to resist a glance at the ghost of Mr. — and if I'd been shocked before by the expression on this damned phantom's face, I was absolutely outraged by what I saw there now! There was something in those convulsed nerves — and of course the transparency of the man's flesh made these spasms repulsively noticeable — that was indecent to see. They called up those alarming anatomical pictures where veins have such ghastly prominence and where ligaments and bloodvessels and muscles and tendons have such a visceral look.

I won't say to my surprise, but certainly to my rapidly accumulating dismay — for how were we going to get out? — this newcomer soon revealed himself as another of these fleshless mockeries of mortality, and one too in whose face the nerves were working so furiously that they resembled the quivering reflections thrown up upon the tree-roots of a river's bank by some trouble in the flowing waters. And as I looked at the two of them — for they were greeting each other now and talking together in the mute language of this place — I realized that there was a very strong resemblance between the shapes taken by these anatomical nerve-ganglia as they jerked and danced in these two repulsive countenances.

As I think of it now, knowing to what lengths my obsession for Morwyn was destined to carry me, I feel as if it were strange that I should have examined so coldbloodedly and in her very presence the flickering motions of this obscene nerve-dance. I can only say in excuse that the electric shock of our descent had not only taken away my normal fear of the supernatural, but had so increased my powers of perception that it was almost impossible not to make use of them! I know you have always regarded me as the most inobservant of men; but I assure you that a far more absent-minded person than I am would have stared in amazement at these unhappy wraiths.

I am very loath to confess it, but I must have felt something like a morbid fascination in these jumping nerves; for I remember I looked down to see if their bodies were as transparent as their faces. I discovered quickly enough that they were; but that the clothes they wore, although insubstantial to the touch, retained that visual opacity which the phantom-flesh they covered had lost.

The stranger who was now eagerly — though without an audible word — conversing with the "second."

Mr. — was attired in a dark-coloured habit of antique cut, and had the cast of face and the general air and demeanour of one of those austere figures that you see in the background of so many of the old paintings of Spanish masters. Morwyn seemed at first as bewildered as I was during the impassioned interview between Mr.— 's wraith and this grave shadow, but ere long they both turned towards her and I could see by her face that they were informing her of the absolute necessity of some course of action that was extremely distasteful to her.

The “second” Mr. — seemed impatient to get the affair — whatever it was — well over, so that he might be free to do something or go somewhere, the mere expectation of which threw him into a paroxysm of nervous excitement. It was clear to me that the impatience with which he was convulsed was entirely shared by the individual in black, though his nervous tension was more under control.

The “second” Mr. — kept shrugging his shoulders and making peevish gestures with his hands, as much as to say: “It’s nothing to me as long as we get it over.”

All this while Black Peter, who had now become too frightened to bark, crouched pitifully at my feet, and every now and then I could catch from him a faint, miserable whimper, very different from the tragic moans with which he uttered his love-yearnings.

At last I was forced to recognize that, between the appeals of the two of them, the pair of shadows had persuaded Morwyn that what they wanted done had to be done, for she turned to the poor distorted body on the ground, and stooping down began closing its eyes and mouth as well as she could, and brushing the dirt from its clothes. I was touched by seeing her trying to fold its hands in reverent Christian fashion, though one of them had evidently been injured in some way.

When she had done all this, and I didn’t dare to help her, for it is never good to meddle with women when they are ministering at a birth or at a death, I saw her pick a small weed that was growing amid the mass that had descended with us from the upper world and thrust its stalk between the dead man’s fingers. Then she sank on her knees and gave full vent to her grief, letting her tears rain down upon Mr.— ‘s bruised hand and disfigured face, and as I watched her I could not prevent the thought crossing my mind what a wonderful power women have of lavishing their tears, just as they do their smiles, with an infallible instinct for the permissible, the natural, the appropriate! I don't mean that they feel less than we do, but the pulse of existence in them is so close to nature that their most tragic sorrows have the rhythmic appropriateness of the motions of the salt sea; and yet at the same time the normal course of their life flows on — and must flow on, for all depends upon it, independently of these violent crises.

The Spanish stranger was, all this while, communicating something to the other; and I confess it bothered me a little to note on the phantasmal clothes of the "second" Mr. — those very same blood-marks and dirt-marks which had been just removed from his body; but the news he was now receiving clearly afforded him the most intense excitement. It was impossible to misunderstand the spasmodic quiverings and twitchings that appeared in both these two transparent countenances, and I remember wondering to myself, what topic it could be that set their nerves dancing to such a tune.

Morwyn, however, was on her feet now and was asking me to do something. For some reason, perhaps because I had always thought her voice was the most characteristic thing about her, for though gentle and low it had an odd huskiness in it and a thin roughness like the sound of an elfin nut-grater, I felt sad when I found that neither of us could utter our normal speech in this place. The girl was much quicker than I in adapting herself to this mute tongue. At first I experienced difficulty in following her; and I have no doubt even she spoke the new tongue somewhat awkwardly, but after a little practice I found I could catch her meaning.

She explained to me, hesitatingly, but, as she went on, with increasing fluency, that I must help her bury her father. Of course I obeyed at once but none of the appalling events that happened later have blotted from my mind the vivid memory of what followed then. We had nothing to work with but our hands; and how we would have managed to cover the body at all if this heathery island hadn't descended with us, I can make no guess.

As far as the eye could see in every direction the floor of the great level plain was composed entirely of grey stone, and of stone so smooth that it looked artificial just as if it had been the floor of some incredibly vast cathedral. You must remember that Morwyn and I knew, in the ordinary normal human sense, practically nothing of each other. Had we been open lovers, had we even been acquaintances of the same age, we would doubtless have been thrown intimately together in this unique crisis; but to her I must have seemed a mysterious old man, and no doubt, if she read my feelings as I read hers, a very wicked old man, and the mere fact that she found herself in love with such an ancient devil probably made her morbidly shy of me, shy of me with the peculiar shyness of a young girl in the presence of her fate.

You can believe, my son, not of course from any experience of such feelings, for I am sure you and all your young friends treat sex so lightly and scientific exploration so seriously that down here in hell your interest in such novel surroundings would have absorbed you completely, but from what I've already told you of myself, that it was a wonderful benediction to me to be allowed to accomplish this difficult task: grubbing at the heather roots with my fingers, and little by little covering the body of the Vivisector with sweet-smelling, dark-coloured earth. I suppose I shall be drifting into what to you must be the veriest dotage when I say that I've always derived an extreme sensual pleasure from watching women gardening! Is it perhaps this going back to the customs of our remote ancestors, or do you suppose — you may skip this psychological problem if it offends you — that it is the charming postures that their flexible bodies assume while engaged in this occupation that fascinate me so much; or is it conceivable that a young girl’s contact with the earth adds a bloom, a glow, a malleable and pliable sweetness to her whole being which is only attained in this historic manner?

You must remember, my son, and I have not attempted to conceal it from you, that my infatuation was anything but a pure and ideal love. It was a most satyrish and ungodly desire. But at the same time it certainly could not be called an easy-going self-indulgence. It was very different from anything of that kind. If you have ever seen the expression upon the satyr’s face in Titian’s wonderful “Antiope” you will understand me when I say there was an abandoned intensity in it that amounted to the tragic.

Well, we finished our job at last; and there lay Mr. —, deep-embedded in a mass of wholesome earth and familiar leaf-mould on the adamantine floor of this weird cathedral of Dis! I confess — though apparently Morwyn didn’t share my feeling — to a definite dread of turning round when our job was done. If I distrusted the look of Mr.— ‘s wraith, I distrusted still more the physiognomy of the personage in the dress of Old Spain.

Indeed I would have been incredibly relieved if I’d found on turning my head that both these transparent phantoms in solid-looking clothes had vanished away forever! That opacity in their clothing especially bothered me. It was that that made the transparency of their faces so villainously noticeable; and I was teased by the extremely uncomfortable feeling that just beneath those smug clothes were all the organs of our poor human frame, pumping and jumping, burning and yearning; betraying without being able to help it those physiological accompaniments to the mind’s activity the sight of which, if all men were as these were, would make hypocrisy ridiculous and decency a figure of speech.

As I made one excuse after another, even going so far as to pretend to be muttering prayers, so as to prolong the girl’s interest in Mr.— ‘s burial, the idea, I remember, rushed into my head how ironical it was that such contemptibly inanimate things as clothes — and so many of them underclothes — should be privileged to retain their opacity, if not their tangibility, while human flesh became thin as air!

But our preoccupation with the burial of the vivisector’s body was now violently interrupted by his agitated spirit; and it was my destiny to be present at a scene so painful that my whole nature shies off from the thought of it; and it is with difficulty that I can bring myself to record it.

I suppose it was natural she should understand him better than I, since they were of the same blood, but when I saw this great transparent head, with its nerves working so repulsively, thrust — the fellow was a short, toad-like man anyhow and in death he was even less prepossessing — so close to Morwyn’s tragic little face, and a passionate struggle going on between them of which I could only follow intermittent snatches, I suffered the miserable pang of feeling a complete outsider. I could see she was being driven to accept as final whatever this damned spirit was saying. I could see, too, that it was all so distressing to her that she would willingly have turned away from that convulsively-working visage and flung herself down in hysterical weeping upon the wretched mound we had made for his body.

But not being able to catch more than fragments of what they were saying to each other I was flung cruelly back on myself, and though I shirked doing so as you would shirk looking at the carcass of a sheep suspended from an iron hook in a butcher’s shop, I did glance at the stately gentleman in the garb of old Spain, and I noticed that he was hanging in quivering intensity upon every word they uttered.

Finally that horrible squat shadow left her, and at once conveyed his disgusting triumph to his fellow-demon. It was then that I decided, when I saw the two of them together, that though the Spaniard was the wickeder, my fellow-countryman was by far the meaner.

The queer part of it was that at the very moment when Morwyn yielded and these two "abominations of desolation" exchanged their repulsive glee, Black Peter leapt towards them barking furiously. Oh how comforting, how restoring, sounded that honest voice in my ears! But what a humiliation it was to my race's bewitched pride that just as the vilest rags in this Underworld turned out to be more resistant than our sacrosanct human flesh, so where our human speech, that venerable, that holy, that unique invention of humanity, was reduced to silence, a dog's barking echoed through all the corridors of Hell.

How pleased I was to see the way these wretched phantoms retreated, squeaking and gibbering, from before this honest, and reassuring sound! But I can tell you I didn't relish the look that crossed their exposed faces as they drew back — a look that seemed to be saying to Black Peter, "you wait, you wait — you only wait!" In fact I hurried after him then, and dragged him away by the collar. What happened after that comes back to me with hideous clarity. The Spaniard, in the mute language of this country, the A.B.C. of which I was now rapidly acquiring, was impatiently imploring the vivisector to leave his daughter and set out with him alone to what the Bible would have called "their own place."

Morwyn had evidently done her utmost to keep her father's spirit by her side. I could see she distrusted the look of this stranger as much as I did; and I could see, too, that even now, though her arguments had proved of no avail, she couldn't believe herself at the end of her resources.

Nor, as it turned out, was she. But I certainly thought she was; and my feeling that her defeat was inevitable, and that nothing could hinder her separation from her father was not altogether displeasing to me. If I could have kept this repulsive wraith from deserting her I should have been forced to do so. For at a crisis my obsession seemed indistinguishable from the purest love. But since this was beyond my power, I confess to you that the thought of being left alone with her, even in this place, was a blessed thought. Oh, how queerly and unexpectedly our nature reacts under the pressure of any weird concatenation of events! While Morwyn was clinging to her damned phantom — and I could see, and it was no joke to set eyes on such a thing, how, as she tried to embrace him, her arms returned to her own bosom as if through the body of a hideous cloud — and while Black Peter was cringing at my feet after his fit of barking, I suddenly experienced a terrible panic at our appalling situation. I looked up and down, staring at the place with the desperation of a trapped animal; while the thought came to me: "Surely our local authorities, up there, must have realized what's happened, and be sending down search-parties to look for us!" I remember now the sick dismay that the thought brought me: "Suppose the huge hole into the earth, down which we were carried, has closed up again?" This, as I found out later, was precisely what had happened, but at that moment it seemed a possibility too awful to contemplate.

It was while I was staring in this sudden panic round every quarter of our horizon — for the roof, or sky, of this subterranean land offered no gleam of hope, though there appeared now to be a multitude of thin wisps of vapour rushing pell-mell across it, as if driven by a wind that we could not feel down here — that I suddenly became conscious that another stranger was rapidly approaching us. As one tends automatically to do, when one has seen what others haven't seen, I rushed at once to Morwyn and indicated the approach of this new apparition. Our two phantoms promptly made as though they were going to meet the newcomer, but when they saw the extreme distress into which this move of theirs threw the girl they were civil enough to forbear. So before anything else happened this other spirit of the abyss, who came much faster than the Spaniard, was actually with us; and most curious it was to note the greeting which passed between these two habitués. This one had a cast of features far less sinister to me than the Spaniard's, but not less so, apparently, to Black Peter, who became too terrified even to bark, but began whining in a low, pitiful key that I confess sent a shiver through my veins. Morwyn, too, was grievously upset by this new Presence. The shock seemed as bad to her as to Black Peter. In fact I believe it was the thought of this newcomer's arrival that gave her the desperate courage to do what she did. I knew at once to what country and to what epoch this phantom belonged! He was a Frenchman of the end of the eighteenth century. Oh! and how his politeness to myself disgusted me, and how his attitude towards my girl filled me with fury!

Except for the fact that whenever his head was bent down between her and myself, as he made his seductive speeches, I could see Morwyn's darling figure through his elongated skull, I think I would have forgotten myself and struck him as he bowed and scraped!

As it was, I had the questionable satisfaction of learning his identity and the Spaniard's too, from their first greetings to each other; and I must own that my recent panic at being lost in the bowels of the earth came back not a little when I found that my present companions were respectively the infamous Torquemada and the hardly less infamous Marquis of Sade!

"It'll be coming in a minute. You'll be wise to cast yourselves on the earth."

These startling words were addressed to us simultaneously by both Frenchman and Spaniard, and coming so close upon my discovery of their identities they disturbed me not a little. Indeed they disturbed me so much that I felt an unworthy impulse in the pit of my stomach to behave like Black Peter, and crouch down then and there and give up all resistance to fate.

What would be “coming in a minute”?

I gazed wildly about us; but I was surprised to notice that Morwyn’s reception of this mysterious news was directly opposite to mine. For one thing I am sure she’d never heard of the Marquis of Sade; and though she may have heard of Torquemada her ideas about the Grand Inquisitor were probably even more popular than my own; and mine, I confess, were largely drawn from the imaginative tale composed by Ivan Karamazov in the novel!

But at the word of the two phantoms: “It’ll be coming in a minute,” a sudden inspiration seemed to seize the girl and she ran hurriedly to my side. “Pick him up,” she cried in the mute speech of the place. “It’s what they travel on that’s coming! I’m going with Father, and you’re coming with me! Pick him up quick; for we—”

I only just had time to obey her and to snatch up Black Peter when “What they travel on” came whirling down on us.

It was no ordinary vessel of air or land; nor was it simply a hurricane of wind. What it really was was an element quite peculiar to this region, an element that had the characteristic of gathering itself together in whirlpools of motion whose revolutions were so rapid that in whatever direction they moved they thickened out the air till it congealed into a subsistence as solid as snow. This element, unlike our electric thunderstorms, obeyed, as the planets and stars do with us, certain fixed gravitational laws. To it, in its periodic movements, were due the alternations of light down here, light that was never stronger than our twilight, but never weaker, for they had no night here, than our earliest dawns, light that resembled the fading luminousness of our longest summer days.

But in addition to supplying the inhabitants of Hell with light, this subterraqueous element also supplied them with facilities for extremely rapid travel; and this it did by reason of its power of congealing the air into what resembled moving islands. These islands were of a substance solid as drifts of snow but of a dusky colour, and in many cases almost completely black.

It was their texture, however, that made it possible to use them as vessels of transit; for they were softer than the softest velvet and as yielding as swan's-down. The typhoon-like wind that surged in eddies round the prows of these voyaging islands of black snow was wont to catch up such of the light-bodied people of the place as were in its way, and swing them up on the body of one vessel, where, for all the shock of its typhoon-like speed, they sank down luxuriously, as if upon the up-piled feathers of millions of black swans. For the first time since the cosmogonic accident that brought about our descent, and indeed for the first time in our whole acquaintance, I was now in close physical contact with Morwyn. It was she who seized me, not I her, for as the thing struck us it had been all I could do to pluck up Black Peter from where he crouched, and hug him against my stomach. She clinging to me then, and I clinging to Black Peter, we were lifted bodily off our feet, and tossed, like dead leaves, into the air. But we were flung with incredible precision; and before I had time to feel any conscious spasm of terror, we sank straight into the centre of this rushing airship of black snow!

Here for a moment I did have time to think, and what I thought caused Black Peter to utter a cry of distress, so tightly did I squeeze him. I thought we should all three sink clean through the downy substance of this Devil's Swan and be precipitated upon that adamantine pavement below, where our bones must inevitably have been broken to bits.

But the faster we were carried along, the more securely was this soft bed congealed beneath us; and, as it turned out, it was fortunate for me that our living weight did make us sink so low, for to my inexpressible comfort we were separated a little from Morwyn's father and his sinister companions.

Little had I thought, when I woke up that morning to my accustomed habit of reading a page or two of the eleventh book of the Odyssey, where the great wayfarer encounters the weary nations of the dead, that before the day was over — our day, that is, under the sweet light of the sun — I should be holding Morwyn in my arms as we voyaged, and upon no earthly wind, through that very same kingdom of the Shades!

Yes, I was holding her, holding her pressed, oh so closely! against me. Nor do I think it was only my fancy that in that tragic moment she was glad to be held as I was holding her.

The third living member of our group was the one who suffered from this beatific proximity; and if I had not been in such a “Nunc dimittis” mood of reckless rapture I should have been disturbed by the broken yelps of obscure desperation that came from this black canine body as it scrabbled and moaned at my side, so wild to share — only it knew not how! — the ecstasy of our embrace.

You can believe — though I suppose you young cool-heads would have been observing and noting everything — that in this passion of satisfied longing, content to let the whole cosmos go to smash, now that I had known such joy, I scarcely glanced at the monstrous world through which we were travelling! I did however just glance at the sky-roof above our heads from which, every now and then as we rushed along, queer phosphorescent lights kept flashing.

The place was so vast that as we whirled along I received the impression that we were not underground at all, but were travelling over some interminable plain of smooth adamantine rock such as, for some unknown reason, I have always connected with the plains of Upper Tartary. This may be a pure fancy of mine. But whether or not there is such a place as Upper Tartary this dusky roof-sky, with its intermittent radiations of phosphorescent gleaming, made me think of the fantastic theory of a weird American writer, that our familiar star-sprinkled heaven is not composed of space at all but of an unthinkably stupendous firmament of solid rock, a sort of astronomical continent, or “main-land” of the upper firmament, whereof the lights that we see glittering above our heads are the artificial evocations. I had brooded so long over this crazy theory that I had grown accustomed, at least in my private thought, to the monstrous idea that we were all moving about beneath a Cyclopean continent of solid substance.

And so though I knew with my reason that this black opacity with its phosphorescent gleams was nothing but the floor of our own earth I kept reverting to the feeling that it was “the spacious firmament” of our ordinary experience.

I think it must have been the ecstasy I felt at holding Morwyn like this — isolated from the whole living world except Black Peter — that gave me the feeling I had of being carried through the unfathomable ether rather than through the hollow interior of a metallic ball. I certainly felt so isolated with the girl, in our whirling bed of wind-created swan’s-down, that I got the impression of being the last man alive with the last woman alive, borne aloft on a mountainous sea of inhuman elements, reaching to infinity!

And so far was this sensation from diminishing the sweet madness transporting me, that it heightened and increased it. That there should be in existence at all such a creature as I now held in my arms seemed a miracle beyond miracles — so pliable was she, so yielding, so inexpressibly sweet, and yet so evasive and escaping that I felt as if the mystery of her Being were something that would lead me on forever, lead me on down avenues of pursuit compared with which the immensity of the elements around us was as nothing.

If only Black Peter had stopped “making his moan” and scrabbling feebly against my side I would say that few human entities in the history of the world have been privileged to know the entrancement that I knew then.

I suppose what is called a “good” man, or at least a “decent-minded” man, would have been so disinterested at that moment that he would have thought to himself, “this poor young girl, left friendless by the ghastly death of her father, carried on a weird and unknown wind on a bed of black snow, can I possibly feel towards her shameful and unregenerate feelings such as not even Hades itself can paralyse?”

Thus would a “good” man, of my old-fashioned time, have forced himself to feel, impelled by his self-respect as a Christian and a Gentleman. “I must get this poor child out of this as soon as possible,” he would have said to himself, calling the disturbing and agitating Being at his side “child” the better to resist temptation!

Such an old-fashioned attitude to the greatest of all problems would not, I know, have been yours, my dear son. You would have been so busy analysing the elements of that place, the black snow, the electric wind, the adamantine floor, the wisps of flying mist against the sky of stone, pondering on the question as to whether your fellow-passengers were subjective visions or objective realities that to be on a bed of the Devil’s own swan’s-down with a young girl, and a girl, too, whose youthful feelings in your favour, had been betrayed by a meteoric illumination, would have been, I do not say a negligible situation, but certainly not a transporting and absolutely absorbing one.

But “transported” is what I was, during those brief moments, though my brain was by no means so drugged with ecstasy that I couldn’t think. On the contrary I thought intensely. I thought as I had never thought before, and I thought on the subject of men and women.

It suddenly came to me as an inspiration — though Goethe hints at something like this in Faust — that my desire for Morwyn, for I will steer clear of the obscure word "love," was all the more intoxicating because it existed for itself alone and was totally unconnected with any wish for a closer physical union, or with any idea of marriage or of children; and it came into my head to retort to an imaginary antagonist, accusing me of an unhuman deviation from nature, that it may well be that sex-love, divorced from complete union and divorced from any thought of children, is so far from being reprehensible that it is the most potent of all urges in the process of the evolution of a higher race.

The longer I gave myself up to the enchantment of holding Morwyn, the more drastically did my mind obliterate all the traditional ideas of love. "If what I now feel is love," I thought, "love has nothing to do with ordinary affection. It's an impersonal ecstasy. It's the fusion of our soul with the 'eternal feminine' diffused through the entire universe."

Love such as I felt now for Morwyn as I held her like this in our deep snow-bed, is I am sure, the greatest emotion possible to a man. No complete physical union, however harmonious, could equal it.

As I held her my feeling for her diffused itself through the black snow — through the electric air — through the stone sky, until it embraced all the bowels of the earth and all the ether round the earth. The rapture I was deriving from contact with this slender little Being would have been the same if I'd been twice as old as I was and her response much more doubtful. Certainly in my whole experience I had never known anything comparable with it.

It was perhaps because of the speed of our rush through the air that my happiness stretched forth such towering wings and flew so far! I imagined myself embracing Morwyn at the unthinkable heart of the burning sun. But my ecstasy didn't stop there; and I will now tell you a very queer thing.

You know how, before Einstein conceived his mathematical idea of the circularity of space, we used to look up at the sky and think in our hearts—"How queer that that goes on, world without end, forever and ever!"

Well, from our voyaging bed of black snow my feeling for this girl shot forth like a mystic rocket till it became that "forever and ever!" I felt as if that receding space were itself the infinite yielding and the infinite withdrawing of the maiden I held. I remember so well how, as I gazed up at that sky of stone, wavering and flickering with phosphorescent light, I got the feeling that these elements of adamant and mist were in some extraordinary way the actual creation of my desire. I got the feeling that if I stopped holding her and drinking up her soul that thrice-blessed stone sky, separating us from the human race, would vanish away!

Judging by such power as I had left of calculating the lapse of time we had been about twenty minutes clinging to each other. Our voyaging couch, though resembling snow in its soft texture, produced no feeling of the chill of snow in its temperature as we lay embedded in it, and I was thinking to myself that I would like this to go on forever and be for us a kind of eternal living death, when I became aware that my companion was responding — in that mute language of the place that was so much more difficult to me than to her — to some meddling voice descending to us from above our deep-sunken refuge.

The dialogue that followed between my girl and this damned intruder — I knew at once it was the voice of the accurst spirit who has given his name to the sensuality of cruelty — remains word for word in my memory just because it was such a torture to me to have Morwyn's mind distracted from our trance-like union.

“Your father and our Spanish friend,” the Frenchman was saying, “seem to understand each other perfectly. I confess I’ve never been able myself to rise to such noble heights. Our Marshal of France down here, who was, as you know, the original of Bluebeard, justified his cruelties by declaring that it was by such black magic that he wished to prolong his life. If you will allow me to say so, young lady, I think wickedness as frank as that is more honest than the line taken by your father and his friend up there. Your father says he tortures animals to prolong the lives of women and children, and our Spanish friend is delighted with this sentimental excuse for causing extreme pain. He says he does it in order that the souls of his victims may go to Heaven. But don’t you think, young lady, that it’s more satisfactory, from an æsthetic point of view, to be quite frank in these things? To me the voluptuous delight of causing the weak to suffer is an end in itself. I took the risk of being damned for it, and I am damned for it; though I confess I never anticipated the sort of damnation it would be. But your father, young lady, and this Spanish kindred-spirit of his, really believed they were fooling the System-of-Things. Yes, they fancied, good simple souls, that as long as they could delude themselves into even a half-belief that people could be made to live longer by the torment of dogs, or that souls could be saved by the torment of human bodies, the System-of-Things would swallow so noble a subterfuge and they would escape damnation! But you can’t fool the System-of-Things. I’m a realistic Frenchman and I’ve always known that. I’ve never felt the least envy of the exalted excuses our churchmen and statesmen make, when they use torture in their prisons and plunge whole nations into the anguish of war.

“The pain suffered by my victims, I’ve always frankly admitted, was suffered purely and solely for my own voluptuous delight. Of course I know very well that among themselves many vivisectors laugh at the public Conscience, over the eyes of which they have so successfully pulled wool; but I believe a great many of them — and your lamented father among them — keep their gravity and composure unruffled as they order their straps and racks ‘for the prolonging of human life,’ just as our Spanish friend did when he ordered some special kind of fuel for his religious purpose.”

Morwyn must have been made so indignant by the Frenchman’s words that she was reduced to silence; so I had to take the liberty of joining in the conversation. In order to give it a less personal twist I inquired of Monsieur the Marquis if the beating of slaves and the historic cruelties inflicted on Jews and Africans came under the same damnation as the torture of the Inquisition. I expect my blundering use of the mute language of the place led to a misunderstanding just here; for the Frenchman replied in that tone of exaggerated politeness which is a sign of suppressed irritation, that though he himself had never had an opportunity to derive voluptuous joy from watching the punishment of Jews and Africans, he had frequently contemplated with extreme delight the vivisection of dogs for scientific purposes.

“Do you consider, then, Monsieur,” I asked him, while with my free hand — for I had been compelled to release Morwyn — I stroked Black Peter, “that according to the law of the Universe it is as wrong to torture for the sake of scientific knowledge as for the sake of political power?”

I shifted my position a little as I stammered out this question, so as to see the Frenchman’s face; but no sooner had I seen it than I wished heartily I had been content with the sound of his voice, for I detected that beneath his courtly speech he was gloating with horrible intensity over the pain that this argument was causing Morwyn.

“Not a doubt of it!” he replied eagerly. “The System-of-Things, having once thrown its weight into the evolution of pity and sympathy, regards all cruelty as wrong. Our Spanish friend up there excuses it for religion's sake. Our respected Mr. — justifies it — this young lady will bear me out! — for the sake of Science. For my own part" — and he said this with the utmost moral unction— "I never used these grand excuses. I pursued cruelty purely because of the sensual pleasure it gave me. Of course most human beings love cruelty in some form. It's the Old Adam in us, which the System-of-Things, since it started Evolution, has resolved — as my Communist friends would say — to 'liquidate.' In every laboratory, under the excuse of the pursuit of knowledge, a great deal of sadism is practised. I know what I'm talking about, because by the law of the System-of-Things my whole life down here is spent in the pursuit of my vice; and by a system of television we have access to every vivisection-place in the civilized world. But I can assure you, Monsieur" — here I restrained myself with the utmost difficulty, for I could see by his face he was in a state of voluptuous excitement, and I knew well it was because his words were so distressing to Morwyn— "yes, on my honour as a gentleman, I can assure you I have got far more pleasure from the cruelties practised by scientists to-day than from anything I did during my own life."

"How can that be, Monsieur?" I inquired.

"The reason is simple," said the Marquis of Sade. "With us there is a certain residuum of conscience left, that even in the whirlwind of our tempestuous joy holds us back. But your pure scientific investigator stops at nothing. He has no more conscience about the feelings of his animals than have the straps and appliances that he uses to hold them. As I say, I know what I'm talking about, because by far the largest part of my life down here is spent at our television-screens, where all modern laboratory experiments are reproduced. I confess there are a few of my companions — and there are millions and millions of us in this place — who require more lively victims than dogs, who of course are usually muzzled so that their anguish shall not go beyond the walls. These do have a tendency to desert our scientific picture-shows in order to enjoy the spectacle of Jews and Africans being suppressed; but my own experience is that they very soon come back to Science. Africans have such extraordinary powers of silent endurance, and Jews are so pointed in their retorts, that I'm sure the wiser course is to choose the laboratories.

"I may tell you in confidence that our Spanish friend up there never leaves the laboratory-screens; and the ones he especially frequents are the ones where there are no students of my kidney at all, but many of the type who think, as our French Bluebeard himself thought at the beginning of his career, that for the prolongation of human life it is well worth it to become a professional torturer.

"Personally I always found life so evenly balanced between the agreeable and the disagreeable that it is hard for me to understand the desperate importance of prolonging it, especially at the risk of meddling with this new evolutionary mania in favour of pity and sympathy which the System-of-Things has developed. So hard do I find it to understand this desire for longevity that I am tempted to think — though I am afraid such an opinion will be painful to our young lady here — that most vivisectors only use it as a pious sentiment wherewith to soothe or to scare an over-awed public, while their real motive, all the while, is just pure scientific virtuosity."

I remained silent at this point, hoping that he would leave us in peace, but when I realized that if I didn't intercept him he would be talking to Morwyn, who I knew was shuddering with repulsion, I hoisted myself up a little in our voyaging bed, so as to get between him and her, and went on with my blundering questions in this damned wordless language of theirs.

“Has this implacable System-of-Things of which you speak, Monsieur,” I said, “condemned military torturers in the same wholesale fashion as those, who, like poor Mr. —, torture animals out of scientific curiosity or with the idea of prolonging human life?”

My abrupt question seemed to disturb the Marquis of Sade; for the nerves of his exposed face underwent a series of revolting spasms. In the deep irritation I felt at having to separate myself from Morwyn I spent the moments while he was pondering how to reply in clutching handfuls of the black stuff that composed our couch and allowing it to slide through my fingers. It was not a bit chillier than ordinary sea-sand would have been, but its texture was certainly exactly like that of snow.

Black Peter’s devotion to me was now strikingly displayed, for instead of remaining where I had left him by Morwyn’s side, in the place which our recumbent bodies as we clasped each other, had hollowed out and made so warm and snug, he scrambled up to my side, and as I played with the black snow I felt his cold nose pressed against the palm of my hand.

“No, Monsieur le Capitaine,” began the agitated nobleman, for her father must have told him I’d retired from the army, “no, I’m afraid I can’t say that military tormentors are as numerous here as people with my peculiarity or people with Mr.’s or with Torquemada’s.”

“But surely,” I cried, “to cause abominable pain for the sake of power is worse than doing it as the vivisectors do for curiosity or to prolong the lives of their dear ones?”

The Frenchman gave me a look so penetrating and so quizzical that I felt myself blushing.

“He knows,” I thought, “that I introduced that old tag about ‘our dear ones’ to please Morwyn.”

"The best scientists of my time," he said with a smile, "used to tell me that the physical constitution of men and animals are so different that it's pure waste of time to torment either of them for the benefit of the other. No, no, mon cher Capitaine, since I'm already damned there is no reason why I should not amuse myself by speaking the exact truth. Political and military cruelties, devilish as they are, can never be as bad as religious or scientific ones. In political cruelties you have an open materialistic struggle for gross power — a brutal, barbarous, and ill-bred business — but not nearly so mental or subtle, and therefore not half so damnable, as what we become when we torture human bodies to save human souls or to prolong, as our crafty apologists say, 'the lives of our dear ones.'"

"But you said just now," I cried eagerly, knowing how hurt Morwyn would be to see her civilized parent put on a lower level than Ghengis Khan or Attila, "that there were many television-screens down here recording cruelties to Jews and Negroes of unspeakable horror."

The Marquis of Sade shrugged his shoulders. "My brave Captain," he said, "one of the most marked characteristics of Hell is the omniscient knowledge of Matter we all possess. Down here we already know all there is to be known. I mean all that can be known by scientific methods. We know every aspect and phase of electronic energy and force and motion. We know every possible chemical combination. In biology I confess we are not quite so enlightened. Of the mind we know little; and of what is called the spirit nothing at all. You protested in surprise, my gallant Captain, because the System-of-Things decrees that the vivisection of animals for scientific curiosity or for human longevity is as abominable a crime as those committed by our French Bluebeard in the days of Joan of Arc, or as those of the Holy Office, and it struck you as amazing that to this same System-of-Things, bent so obstinately upon pity and sympathy, the huge slaughters and stupendous desolations caused by the lust for political power should be regarded as less wicked.

"Now I can't take on myself to explain what the System-of-Things is up to in its new evolutionary trend, or how, out of the bosom of Nature, so unnatural a tendency ever came to appear. I will content myself with reminding you" — here the phantom's countenance was convulsed with a hideous leer— "that we extreme individualists, not to use any less polite word, are constantly being so pricked in our consciences by this accursed tendency to pity and sympathy that except when we are intoxicated by our vice our life is made a hell! I say this deliberately, Monsieur, for to tell you the honest truth, though our real hell down here isn't very nice, I believe I suffer less in it than I did in the world! You see I'm not tormented any longer by the possibility of not doing what I like. Here I do forever exactly what I like. It's amusing, isn't it, Captain?

"When I was alive I was always being tormented by the power of choice. It was my free-will that was the devil! No wonder I joined a school of sturdy thinkers who denied the existence of free-will. But between ourselves, mon vieux, I never really believed in the logical arguments we were accustomed to use. Secretly I knew that though I couldn't help being a sadist I could very well help putting my sadism into practice; and easier still help writing about it! Here, as far as I know, I am condemned to do exactly what I like for ever and ever; and let me tell you, Captain! it's a fate that doesn't bear thinking on."

"What do you do?" I asked rather unsympathetically; but it was becoming more and more clear to me that unless we reached our destination soon Morwyn would have hysterics. I felt as if I could already hear her wild screams ascending to that adamantine sky.

The Marquis of Sade gave me one of the ghastliest smiles I have ever seen on any human face. It would have been distressing enough if his wraith's countenance hadn't been so horribly transparent. But as it was —!

"I suffer, as you see, Captain," he said, "in trying to answer your question; for my choice does seem an unaristocratic choice. But the truth is, though I hate to confess it, I always come back to vivisection. Those Negroes die so quickly! I often think they die of pure terror when one of those Southern mobs is only beginning to get to work. And, as I always say, the Jews are so used to it, that they've learnt how to suffer so as to get the least pain! It must be some protective organism they've evolved. No! I always come back to vivisection; especially the vivisection of dogs. But I don't confine myself, as our Spanish friend does, to the laboratories of those who gull the public by their sentimental talk about the longevity of 'our dear ones.' The laboratories I prefer are the ordinary ones, the common ones, those that exist everywhere in our civilized world, where the pure unadulterated love of science has a free fling! You see, Captain, people aren't torturing Jews and Negroes all the time; but there's never a second when in some laboratory somewhere—"

A desperate movement of Morwyn's arms — she must have suddenly tossed them above her head like a drowning creature — broke off short the Frenchman's words.

"I think," he murmured, "Monsieur had better look after the young lady. Women are all so nevreuse; but our young friend down there seems une grande nevreuse."

It proved anything but easy to soothe my darling, and no wonder! It had probably never happened before to a young girl "to go down alive into the pit," and I suppose the chance is small that another falling star, like the one that carried us down here, will strike the earth again till the final catastrophe.

The annoying thing was that she wouldn't let me take her in my arms any more because of this accursed Frenchman; for instead of retreating to what might be called the "upper deck" of our electric ship what must the voluble wretch do but continue to hover over us, displaying an interest that was extremely disconcerting in my blundering attempts to comfort her.

In the end — worn out with all she had undergone — she sank down inert and motionless in her bed of black snow and fell asleep.

I can't tell you how relieved I was when this happened, for I had been fearful, ever since I returned to consciousness after our first descent, lest she should have a complete hysterical collapse, or even lose her wits, under all these shocks.

As soon as I recognized that she was really asleep I thought to myself: "I'll take her in my arms again now." But I had only to make the faintest move in her direction to recognize that the Frenchman's interest instantaneously doubled.

I am sure she knew in her sleep that this sinister Being had not left us; for every now and then her arms would give a spasmodic jerk and her fingers would open and close.

It was my awareness of this and my intense desire to distract the Frenchman, that led me once more to force him to talk. I began pestering him with questions; and the more I grew aware of the effort he was making to keep his eyes upon the sleeping girl, even while he was replying, the more drastic and importunate my questions became.

"Do you really mean to tell me, Monsieur," I said, "that what you are pleased to call the System-of-Things concerns itself enough with our human affairs to bother about punishing us when we're dead?"

He still kept his horrible transparent visage turned towards Morwyn and as he watched her I could see the facial nerves under his glass-like skin vibrating like crowds of small electrified worms dancing on their tails; but this did not prevent him from replying to my question with the utmost calm.

"Pardon me for saying so, Captain," he remarked quietly, "but you use very naïve and somewhat barbaric expressions. Is the System-of-Things human that it should behave like a man? No, no, mon cher, its ways are completely non-human. When I told you just now that its evolutionary trend towards pity and sympathy made the peculiarities of our friends up there into something more evil than the slaughters of Attila, I didn't imply that it invented this Hades where we are or that it invented our appalling fate in it. Shall I tell you, mon Capitaine, who invented this place and all that occurs therein?"

"I wish you would, Monsieur le Marquis," I said, "for I confess I've hitherto held it against the Emperor of the Universe that he should have designed a torture-chamber for the criminals he himself created when he gave people like us free-will."

"We invented it!" cried the Marquis of Sade in a terrifying voice — and this time he turned his head clear round towards me. "We invented it. This place and what goes on here is the patient creation, little by little, of all the sadists who've ever lived! It has taken us a long time to make this place as we wanted it. There was an Elysium here in Homer's time. Huge fields of bog-asphodel used to grow here then. Even in Dante's time it still had patches of emerald-green grass where philosophers and poets could walk up and down without disturbance.

"It wasn't till Vivisection reached its present point that we could get rid of these archaisms! We have even invented — did you know that, Captain? — a new inscription for the entrance to this place. Instead of Dante's ‘Abandon hope,’ the writing on the entrance to our world is, ‘Do as you like.’ Yes, all this is our doing. The System-of-Things goes blindly on with its unscientific evolution of pity and sympathy, and it doesn’t bother us. We don’t go blindly on! We are scientists and rationalists. Our poison-gases and our explosive shells are nothing to the instruments we’ve invented for causing anguish. What would war be to-day without science? What would our knowledge of the limits of endurance be without science? Oh, my dear Captain, you’ve no idea how our most secret thoughts are carried out in these vivisection-places! ‘To prolong human life.’

‘To discover truth’ — these are the phrases with which the public is gulled. But the sweetest morsel of the devil’s irony of the whole thing is, Captain, that what they do is so horrible to think of, that sensitive people swallow these holy texts in sheer dread, dread of having to bring their mind to bear at all on what goes on.”

“But surely, Monsieur,” I said, nervously keeping my eye on the twilit form of the sleeping girl as we were whirled along in that singular equipage, “surely, Monsieur le Marquis, the majority of vivisectors are fanatics of knowledge rather than followers of your cult?”

The phantom gave his mouth a twist that caused it to resemble the convolutions of a decapitated worm. Then he bowed politely. “I admit it, Captain,” he said. “But the point is that this fanatical passion for knowledge — and, mark you, many of the greatest authorities hold that the difference between ourselves and the lower animals is so vast that experiments upon the one have absolutely no value in the healing of the other — this mania for knowledge, as I might say, is more hardening to the heart, more implacable to pity and sympathy, than what you are pleased to call my ‘cult’—”

“I find it hard to follow you there, Monsieur,” I protested, giving Black Peter a reassuring caress, for I could feel his hind-quarters beginning to shiver as I’ve noticed they always do when the conversation becomes scientific. “Aren’t you dealing a little in that delicate paradoxical wit, for which so many of your brilliant fellow-country-men are renowned, such as Rochefoucauld, Vauvenargue, Fontenelle, and others?”

“Not at all, not at all, Captain,” returned the phantom. “When our cruel lust is momentarily satisfied we become as tender as angels to the victims of it. Whereas the cult of your scientific fanatics allows for no more breathing-spaces, no more lapses, no more interregnums in the crescendo of its ferocity than did our Spanish friend up there. That is why” — and he fixed a look upon Morwyn that caused me a pang of alarm— “he gets on so well with our young lady’s revered—”

He interrupted himself to call my attention with quite a violent gesture to a remarkable change in the subterrestrial scenery through which we were passing. It seemed to me, too, that our speed had changed its character. It was still rapid but was in a curious way different. We seemed to be moving in a series of jerks. But the change in the scenery was striking and for a minute or two as I gazed at the incredible panorama I felt as I fancy you, my son, would have felt in a similar situation. All my emotions were swallowed up in pure wonder and overpowering astonishment.

The stone sky above us had entirely disappeared which made me realize that the floor of our subterranean world had sunk by several miles. It must have been sinking all the time we had been travelling at this terrific speed, and sinking more and more steeply, so that our black-prow’d hollow ship, as Homer would have called it, must have arrived, when our conversation was interrupted, at a point thousands and thousands of feet below the level where our fall had landed us.

And with the disappearance of the stone sky the whole aspect of the place had changed. We were now moving along a narrow gully, between black shining rocks. These rocks that towered above us on both sides, were jagged and broken, and, as far as I could make out, were of a substance considerably darker — though that, the devil knows, was dark enough — than the adamantine floor at the bottom of this monstrous world.

It was then that the Frenchman uttered as astonishing expression in that mute language of theirs. “The Magnet!” he screamed, “the Magnet, the Magnet!”

To the end of my days I shall remember the ghastly contortion of this wretched Being’s face while all the nerves behind its transparent surface, shivering up from where they transferred their frantic desire from senses to brain, twisted, twined, gyrated, and, as you might say, spasm-ed outwards, in horrid erectness, like the quivering serpents of the Gorgon’s head, till in a silence more terrible than the most frightful sound — the silence of lust drawn out taut and tense to its breaking-point — they became the multiform worm-heads, all spiralling and straining together, of the phantom’s response to what was attracting its deathless corruption.

The intensity of this accursed shadow’s emotion and the wordless moan of its frightful yearning woke Morwyn from her uneasy sleep. It produced, too, a wild fit of barking from Black Peter; and even in the agitation of that moment I could not help being again struck — just as any of you young people might have been — by the interesting objective fact, full of biological chemical, and electronic significance, that that was the only real sound, in this whole underground world! There was no sound of wind, or rain, or thunder here. There was no sound produced even by the speed we were travelling through the air. There was no sound from the coal-black rocks on either side of us. There was no sound of water; no sound of fire. It was as if this monstrous continent inside our hollow earth were hermetically sealed to every audible phenomenon save what issued from the throat of a dog. The world through which we were now travelling, between these pitch-black rocks, in a twilight generated by electricity, was a world where the roar of an earthquake and the trickle of a rivulet would have been equal, for both would have been nothing.

But now into the hushed air of this continent of silence it was destined that Black Peter's vigorous voice should uplift itself, asserting its homely protest in the midst of these desolate secrets of the abyss.

While I was quieting Black Peter as well as I could, Morwyn got up from where she lay, and with one hand on the side of our swan-like conveyance and the other — I say it with pride and joy, for it was an instinctive gesture — on my own shoulder, began a rapid exchange of question and answer with the Frenchman as he bent down towards her. I was at first astonished at her boldness; but pondering over it, for I soon gave up all attempt to follow what they were saying, I came to the conclusion that from the moment the man cried out: "The Magnet! The Magnet!" he had come so completely under the control of his main obsession that the voluptuousness with which he had till now enjoyed Morwyn's tragic unhappiness about her father had entirely disappeared; and with that insight into feelings — though not into thoughts; for they belong to a level of the soul's life independent of all such meddlings — that we had both got from the meteorite that hurled us down, the girl had recognized this change and now felt no more dread of the fellow than if he had been a wicked aristocrat in the French Revolution on the way to execution.

It was, I am compelled to say, pure jealousy, quite in the style of Black Peter, rather than any nobler emotion that led me, after a while, to interrupt their talk.

I must have interrupted it at the very moment when she was asking him something that had to do with the fate of her father, for in her irritation at my rudeness, she removed her hand from my shoulder. It was about that surprising word he had used when I first saw his agitation that I asked him; but it was Morwyn herself and in a tone of cross impatience who answered my question.

She told me briefly and bluntly that any frantic lust to practise cruelty or to contemplate cruelty, is after death increased to an insatiable mania which is forever being tantalized and maddened by sensual provocations of a kind beyond the most extravagant fancy. This tantalization — and it is really a form of semi-satisfaction — affects them, she explained to me, with the blind pull of an irresistible magnet as soon as they come within a few hundred miles of it; so that, in the conventional slang of the place, the word “magnet” has come to mean the circumference of the invisible pull which Hell’s greatest attraction exerted.

She turned away from me, as soon as she had peevishly explained all this, and resuming her impassioned questioning of the agitated shade above her, apparently forgot my existence.

As for me, all I could do was to take Black Peter on my knee, not without the bitter thought that only in him could I find undeviating devotion. Hugging him closely, though to tell you the truth he detests being in anybody’s lap, I tried to fix my mind on the rocky gorge through which we were travelling. This had considerably narrowed by the time I really began to examine it, and I now became aware that its walls were engraved with colossal carvings, cut in deep relief in the pitch-black stone.

The nature of these carvings would have been a greater shock to me had it not been for Morwyn’s explanation of the Frenchman’s cry. As it was, they were shocking enough. But such is the grossness and brutality of human curiosity that I could not resist staring avidly at each of them as we whirled past. They were monstrous representations of abominable cruelties inflicted by pre-historic animals upon one another; and as we passed one particular surface of jet-black rock in that strange twilight I noticed that the ghostly figure of a man in modern dress was actually working at it, armed with some kind of an electric tool that emitted livid sparks!

We passed this frantic artist and the work on which he was engaged, so quickly that I had no time to take in any details, but I saw enough of what he was doing to get a pretty clear notion as to what it all meant.

And though you, my son, from your "objective" point of view, will probably not agree with me I must confess that my own secret sense of justice was singularly gratified by what — through Morwyn's words — came over me now like a revelation.

A certain number of our modern artists, especially in literature, gratify their sadistic lust through what they invent and describe in their books. The ironical thing is that our moral censors, while condemning fiercely any realistic description of the most natural, harmless, legitimate, and perfectly justifiable sensuality, are too ignorant of psychology even to recognize the dangerous sex-nerve in these sadistic writings! I wish, my dear son, that you and your modern friends who take all these erotic peculiarities so lightly — let's hope because none of you know what they are! — would answer me this simple question. Is the writing and reading of sadistic books a good thing, or is it a bad thing? I mean, does it lessen, or does it increase, the temptation to put sadism into practice?

Well! You may answer my question or not as you like; but to me who find human psychology, whether normal or abnormal, the most enthralling study there is, it was not a little illuminating to see those monstrous images carved in that black rock!

And the sight of a modern wraith actually chipping out new ones, with the frantic speed of his diabolical obsession, completed the revelation. Whatever you young people, with your airy touch and your surrealistic fancies may feel about it, the sight of this wretched modern shade, alone in that hell’s gorge, feverishly adding to the number of those monstrous reproductions of sex-ferocity among mammoths and ichthyosauruses sank deep into my mind. The implacable method of the System-of-Things, in its evolution towards pity and sympathy, was revealed to me at that moment with a convincingness that made me tremble; and I could see how it was that the extravagant satyrishness of a rogue like Casanova, just because it is in line with the sex-urge of the cosmos, could never isolate him from all human relations to the degree this wretched ghost had isolated himself with his picture of the death of a young male saurian at the hands of a score of females! I saw too, in a flash of insight that made me squeeze Black Peter till he yelped, that the thoughtless butchery of millions of human beings by tyrants and statesmen and conquerors did not necessarily isolate a person’s spirit and set it upon creating for itself an eternity of sadistic satisfaction.

Some of these conquerors were undoubtedly sadists but it was their ambition, their egoism, their greed and pride — not their sadism — that shed all that human blood! It was borne in upon me as a most startling secret of life — as our weird equipage whirled on and that tortured creature in the power of those she-monsters blotted out for some twenty miles of cyclopean art everything else — that this matter of the fate of the soul after death is purely individual, not depending so much on the scale of its atrocities as on the degree to which this particular sex-nerve has vampirized the whole life of the soul.

My reflections were now tossed to the winds by the simultaneous occurrence of so many agitating events that I felt reduced to the level of a lump of quick-silver, broken up into a thousand globes of alertness, each rushing wildly in a separate direction.

In the first place, our singular vehicle began very perceptibly to decrease its speed. And instead of those huge, dark-sweltering, twisted shapes of antediluvian lust, what covered the rocks new were enormous mirrors of a slimy whitish-yellow colour, a colour resembling that of the swollen eyes of certain kinds of fish when they have been long dead.

Vast crowds of agitated shadows were pressing against each other, jostling, squirming, struggling, to get near these repulsive-looking mirrors, the appearance of which — it must have been that sickly yellowish-whiteness — made me think of the fermented gastric juices that Black Peter would sometimes vomit up from an empty stomach.

Though our equipage was moving quite slowly now, and it must have looked — from where those wretched spirits were struggling — rather like a shapeless mass of black foam carried down a stream — I could see enough of the living pictures on those pallid expanses to realize that they were all reproducing, by some new process of television, things that were going on at that very moment on the surface of the earth.

I have spoken of these extraordinary picture-screens as mirrors; and indeed that and nothing less was the effect they produced on me as I caught glimpses of what was being revealed in them. This was nothing less than a direct reproduction of all the worst Vivisection Laboratories in Europe and America.

I learnt later that certain laboratory work is reproduced down here that has been most carefully concealed from the public. I saw experiments on these screens, undertaken from the purest scientific curiosity, but of a sort that would make anyone, save a frantic scientist or an obsessed sadist unable to eat or sleep till he had got them suppressed.

Long before our conveyance stopped I had been permitted an exceptionally good view of what was going on; a much better view in fact than any I could have had among that swarming multitude of tantalized spirits which heaved and twisted like a seething mass of tadpoles, newly emerged from their natal spawn, or like millions of shining maggots making of themselves a living fountain of corruption.

I was amazed at the immensity of that crowd; and the mingling in it of all the costumes of all the races and epochs since the beginning of history was in itself an overpowering sight.

I would never have supposed that so many sadists could have lived and died on our earth as I saw teeming and tossing in never-ceasing waves about those vivisection pictures! It was curious to me to notice how certain races and certain epochs were so much more addicted to this vice than were others. I didn't, for instance see a single ancient Greek among them, and very few Negroes. Of Chinamen I detected a good many, but of course their outward appearance was more noticeable than that of other races. I was shocked by the number of well-dressed English and Americans I saw there. Of Scandinavians — and I had read so many wild tales of the old Viking depredations that this astonished me — I could not see one.

For myself, I have become so conscious of the extreme susceptibility of pain and terror among animals since I've known Black Peter that I couldn't bring myself to give more than a hasty glance at what all this multitude were watching. The fact that what we saw was actually going on at the moment when we saw it was no doubt a great comfort to the sadistic craving, but it was almost intolerable to me, and as for Black Peter I soon realized that though he was making a ghastly moan under his breath he was far too panic-stricken to do it aloud. I could see he had been seized with a desperate fear lest someone should drag him out of Hell, back to earth, and experiment on him there for the prolongation of human life.

There was one particular mirror or screen that we passed when our voyaging had almost come to a standstill, in which I could see a spectacle of such monstrous cruelty that I shall remember it to the end of my days.

It was a peep-hole into an experimental laboratory that has been kept very carefully from public knowledge, though of course, according to the law, it has had to undergo certain periodic inspections. I will not describe to you, my dear son, what the pictures in question revealed, but what I can assure you is that the unhappy wraiths who jostled one another to see it were almost beside themselves with sadistic frenzy and were betraying their emotions shamelessly. As I watched the back of their heads, for our conveyance was scarcely moving at all now, and I could look down upon these swarming shadows just as if I had been sitting in a balcony at the play, the thought crossed my mind that I've never read, in any of these authors who derive such pleasure from describing cruelty, any description of how the face of the sadist himself looks — how their own face looks — when they are writing these passages!

I couldn't see these people's face but I could see quite clearly the faces of certain students in the horrible scene at which they were gazing; and it would have been a revelation to any great pathologist to note the manner in which the frenzy of scientific curiosity was so delicately mingled — like the colours in "shot" silk or in "lustre" ware — with the subtle undertones of the other mania.

It was the extreme agitation of Black Peter that first brought home to me the fact that our wind-ship had stopped. Morwyn and the Frenchman were still whispering together; while a little further off the shade of

Mr. — and his fanatical Spaniard were engrossed in what seemed to me a passionate recognition of mental affinity.

But our equipage had stopped, and unless we living creatures were prepared to remain in this precious conveyance while it went ferrying backwards and forwards through Hell until we perished, the moment had come to disembark. The moment had also come to get something to eat and drink! Poor Black Peter, whose wits for all I know may have been quickened as much as Morwyn's and mine by the magnetism of that falling star, was evidently aware of the world-old aura of sickening cruelty that like a miasmic vapour exuded from this vast surging multitude, "thick as autumnal leaves that strew the brooks in Vallombrosa," for I've never seen him so cowed.

As a rule his hindquarters and feathery hind-legs would alone shiver, but when I lifted him up and stepped out of that air-ship I discovered that he was shaking like an aspen-leaf from head to foot.

Nor was it much wonder he was, considering that all the lost souls of cruelty, whether sadistic or religious or political, from the beginning of the world, were gathered here in these valleys, like the sands of the sea for multitude, to enjoy the spectacle of vivisection! Anxiously stroking Black Peter, for I was afraid to put him down lest in his insane terror he should bolt God knows where, I stood where we disembarked, dazed and confounded, staring helplessly around me.

Then it was my lot to witness an abominably distressing scene, a scene that even to-day, as with the fountain-pen you gave me I write this word, returns upon me with the most fearful clarity.

I had noticed before we left the air-ship that the Spaniard's face was convulsed with his longing to rush back to those Vivisection Screens. I expect he was afraid lest his favourite one, where the worst cruelties went on because the scientific interest there was purest, might be crowded by English and Americans and by obsessed ghosts from Ancient Cathay and Ancient Rome and Ancient China.

But it was now clearly intolerable to him to stay a moment longer and it was equally clear that Mr. —, whose appearance as a spirit exactly reproduced his appearance as a living creature, was just as desperate to depart with him. Together they approached Morwyn and I heard Mr. — say, in that particular tone I know so well, "Oh, of course! If they weren't under an anæsthetic how do you suppose they'd keep—" And I heard the Spaniard interrupt him. "Nonsense, man, you have to use straps — and your manufacturers are wonderful in the straps they make! In my time we had only great clumsy chains. It's remarkable how strong heretics grow when they first feel the pinch. No doubt dogs are the same."

They both became silent, for even their obsession couldn't prevent them from noticing the look of horror on Morwyn's face. But she was too upset to remember the silent language and they drowned her stammered outcry—"We must be cruel for the sake of human souls, lady!" cried the Inquisitioner.

"We must be cruel for the sake of human bodies, girl!" echoed the Vivisector.

"We get knowledge of God when we burn his Image!" cried the Theologian.

"We get knowledge of Nature when we crucify her children!" echoed the Scientist.

With this the two obsessed spirits rushed off together; and it was piteous to see how the girl clutched at the solid-looking clothes of her father only to find them as porous as air. In her final desperate attempt to hold fast what in the nature of things could not be held, the brave creature fell down prostrate upon the ground. Here she remained weeping like a broken-hearted child and I couldn't even get hold of her hand to lift her up.

"You see what they are!" whispered the Marquis of Sade in my ear. "Their fanaticism has fixed its roots so deeply in cruelty, that you can't separate the two things. I understand the phenomenon perfectly! The abstract thought 'The Pursuit of Truth,' and the abstract thought 'The Protection of Truth' no sooner enter their brain than the nerve which I know so well begins quivering like an aspen, and Monseigneur sees heretics in the flames while Monsieur sees dogs strapped down at his mercy.

"And the interesting thing is" — here I could see, though I felt nothing, that our shameless wretch had laid the tip of an aristocratic finger upon my wrist as I stared distracted at the girl on the ground— "that though persons of my peculiar cult have — it's no use denying it — caused a moiety, a quota, a percentage of human anguish, they have been innocent babes compared with these protectors and pursuers of Truth."

I shall never forget the complicated misery of that moment. I longed to kneel down by my darling's side. I longed to stop her tears by assuring her of the purity of Mr.— 's motives. I longed to be able to quote the newspaper accounts of his disappearance; where I am sure there would be no hint of the possibility that according to the inexorable law of the System-of-Things he might be already in Hell. But how could I dare to make the use of these consolations under the sardonic eyes of this particular son of perdition? Why the devil didn't he go away? Was he going to attach himself to us forever?

I shook off his touch as I might have shaken off a mosquito; and being anxious to distract his mind so that my darling might recover herself in peace, I plunged him yet deeper into the metaphysics of retribution.

"I gather from your remarks," I said to him, "that the System-of-Things doesn't concern itself with the amount of suffering a person brings upon others but only with his own private will to cruelty?"

The Marquis smiled. "Naturally," he replied, "for if the System-of-Things once began weighing the actual quantity of suffering caused by anyone in the world with a view to distributing punishment, the majority of all who have ever lived would be in hell!

"We shouldn't be able to move down here for the crowd of generals and statesmen. Besides, when it comes to suffering, what about the System-of-Things Itself? I take it that as the ultimate Cause of the universe it can hardly plead not guilty." Here to my dismay I saw that visible-impalpable finger resting once more upon my wrist; and the Marquis spoke in an intense gravity. "No, Monsieur, I tell you it daren't begin making the amount of pain the Test. Besides it would have to consider the negative side of things. Haven't you thought of that? Not only the rich, but all of us who are comfortably off and who know perfectly well that we could relieve so many of the poor if we set our minds to it, would become involved in guilt.

"War and economic inequality, my good sir, are matters in which the System-of-Things is as cautious as the Chinese about meddling! There are some famous generals and some famous statesmen down here, I don't deny it, but they are here as the remorseless Defenders or the remorseless Pursuers of 'Truth', not for their public misdeameanours.

"What you don't see and what so many of these vivisectors don't see when they first arrive, and you have no notion what airs they give themselves as they rush off to their television-screens with the idea that they are serving humanity, is that the System-of-Things allows us to do to the limit here what we most enjoyed doing in the world above. That really is the only difference between the two worlds. Up there our desires are restricted by the infirmities of our bodies. Here with our insubstantial bodies we have no restriction at all."

"But, sir," I said, for I noticed that Morwyn as so often happens with young people, had cried herself to sleep, and I was afraid lest, if our voices ceased, the blessed oblivion she was enjoying on Hell's pavement would cease too, "but sir, in all the moral codes I've ever heard of, anger and selfishness and greed and falsehood are sins that deserve punishment quite as much as cruelty."

The unhappy nobleman gave me one ghastly look and I shall never forget the gulfs of misery that that look revealed. Then he heaved a deep sigh. "I'm afraid," he remarked, "we Frenchmen are more sceptical than you. I'm afraid we keep too sharp an eye on the people who benefit by these moral codes to attribute their origin purely to the creator. It may surprise you to learn it, as an honest Englishman, but I haven't met one single liar, one single thief, one single murderer all the time I've been in Hell. Cruelty seems the only vice that absolutely requires Hell in order to indulge itself to the limit! Thieves and liars can evidently ply their trade elsewhere, and of course the energy of murderers is pointless where there's nothing to resist a blow or respond to—"

"But, Monsieur!" I interrupted, forgetting in the pleasure of our philosophical argument where I was and giving Black Peter's leash an unkind jerk. "What about shrewish tongues? What about those adder-bites that make so many honest men's lives a burden to them?" The Marquis de Sade positively tittered. "Pardon me, Monsieur, but really, vous anglais — Don't you see, my good sir, that women's tongues can't have the least effect down here? It's the simplicity of our pride they hurt. Here we should hardly listen to what they said, so engaging would be the spectacle of the futile anger bubbling up in their transparent breasts."

“Aren’t you afraid, sir,” I craftily suggested, “that some of these scientific experiments that our friends have rushed off so hurriedly to enjoy may be over before you join them?”

The man shrugged his shoulders. “I trust,” he said, “you do not fail to note the difference between me and those earnest-minded gentlemen. In fact the psychological profundity of the way the System-of-Things works couldn’t be better illustrated than in the difference between us. I shall, I daresay, be strolling down presently to the laboratory-screens — and you know there isn’t a laboratory, not the most secret and hidden in the whole world, that we haven’t access to down here — but at present I’m taking a little holiday.” Here he smiled an extraordinary smile. “My desire,” he went on in a low voice; and I was so relieved to see that both Morwyn and Black Peter were now lying peacefully asleep that I wouldn’t have disputed the most monstrous proposition, “my desire suffers lapses and intermissions wherein, as you observe, I become a quite normal person; but this fanatical scientific curiosity, especially when the human conscience is dulled by the ambition of helping humanity, knows no pause nor respite nor interval! These people cling to their strapped animals like limpets, as long as there’s a breath of life in them. Of course they die on their hands sometimes through the very extremity of what is done to them — but it’s wonderful how long they can keep them alive! They give them restoratives; and then go at it again. Oh no! those of us with my little peculiarity, who only do it for its own sake, have a much easier time down here! We have our intermissions, when we forget it all and live like ordinary people — well! like ordinary people in Hell — but there are no intermissions for scientific curiosity. It goes on and on and on, sans cesse. That’s where it’s so like religious fanaticism. I’ll take you presently to the screen where those two are. I know exactly which one our Spaniard will make for, for he told me there's a monkey they're working on there who has a face just like a heretic. It's interesting to see the way that man's mind works. He pretends the animals have souls to save! No doubt our good friend Mr. — disbelieves altogether in the soul or in any other life. When his energies flag, his 'rationalizing,' as you people call it, takes the form of benefiting—" He was interrupted by a deep sigh from the girl on the ground, a sigh that was answered by a pathetic little moan from Black Peter; and both the girl and the dog sat up.

The well-bred Marquis at once pretended to be watching with absorbing interest the departure of the black equipage that had brought us here.

But the girl called him to her side. "Is there any way," she asked him, "of getting my father separated from that man?"

De Sade bent his head in deep cogitation. I looked at Morwyn expecting to get at least the flicker of a smile from her; but propping herself on the ground she kept her eyes fixed with passionate hope upon the Frenchman's face.

At length he raised his head. "I can't do anything for you myself," he said, "but I can take you to a person down here who might be able to help you. I don't say he will, ma chère, so I beg you not to excite yourself; but there's no reason why you shouldn't go to him and boldly ask him what you —" He paused and a far-away look came into his face. "He won't do anything for me; but I know him and at intervals go to see him. The rules of the System-of-Things aren't often broken but they have been broken and will be so again. He might be able to help you if I took you to him. I know where he's usually to be found, and it's not so very — The only danger is — For then he goes enormous distances! They say he goes to the Elysian Fields; and though many of us doubt if there's such a place as the Elysian Fields, he's certainly the one to have gone there if anybody has gone there!

They tell me he's only a visitor down here like yourselves. But what do I know? At any rate he's a great traveller."

I could see Morwyn's eager face growing more and more illuminated with hope as the man went on; and I confess that the thought sprang up in my own mind: "What if this adventurous Unknown who knows the way to the Elysian Fields also knows the way to get out?"

"Does he go these long distances," I asked, "for his own pleasure or to find a way—"

The Marquis interpreted this question in a correct manner. "A way to get out of Hell? Oh, no! He must already know endless ways to do that. What interests him are the ways to get in."

"Why, isn't he one of — one of the — Inmates?" I inquired.

"Oh, no, no!" replied the Frenchman. "He represents one of the rare cases when the System-of-Things by some secret necessity of its own nature has to yield to Chance."

"To what did you say, Monsieur?"

"To Chance, Captain, to le Hasard."

I was silent. I was even aware of a moral shock. I may not be a good Englishman, but after all I am an Englishman and I didn't like to think of there being anything in the System-of-Things that lent itself to such a bagatelle of French coinage as le Hasard.

The Marquis did not miss my disapproval. "But, my dear Captain," he threw in, "your own curious descent down here — that surprising meteoric accident—"

But Morwyn, with unusual colour in her cheeks and her eyes shining, implored him to go on and passionately forbade me to interrupt him.

"Our whole country," he continued, not without throwing at me a glance of inscrutable significance, "has been seething with rumours about this Person, who apparently first came down here in the fifth century of the Christian era. Some say he has found some magical device for evading the Cosmic Machinery."

"What — do — you — mean — by 'evading?'" cried Morwyn, while I thought to myself how strange it was that a silent language could convey the effect of a girl's voice raised to the highest pitch.

"And what do you mean by Cosmic Machinery?" I added to keep him going, for in spite of my dislike of such a Frenchified notion as le Hasard brought into Cosmic matters I was grateful to the fellow as I looked at Morwyn — grateful and jealous at the same time!

The man looked at us both, smiling a little. Then with what apparently was just natural politeness he answered Morwyn first.

"The Person I'm thinking about who might help us," he said, "and he's the only one I've ever heard of who spends his time in this place apart from the necessity of his nature, is an old Welsh Bard called Taliesin. As far as I can gather from the rumours current about him he chooses to live down here from pure imaginative interest. He finds there's more intensity of feeling in our world than in the others; and I understand he's a touchy and self-centred person and too much loving-kindness gets on his nerves. Here, of course, except for a few people of my kidney, everybody is too occupied to take any notice of anyone else. We're a lonely set; and that seems to suit this cantankerous old Bard better than paradisaic sociability."

I noticed that Morwyn's face had grown more and more illuminated with excitement as she listened; and now she couldn't contain herself any longer.

"If he goes out when he likes," she cried, "and we made friends with him, he might take father with him!"

Our gentleman bowed gravely. "I'm afraid," he said, "even so great a poet as Taliesin would find it hard to separate an Inquisitor and a Vivisector when once they have met in Hell."

"But what about using force?" I allowed myself to intervene.

Morwyn frowned at this word of mine; but our polite interlocutor did not lift an eyebrow. "Unfortunately," he said, "this erratic Welshman is occupied just now with a wild-goose chase of his own."

"But couldn't he get hold of some — of some strong gangster, some powerful apache, who'd carry Mr. — to that spot — and then — perhaps — we might all get out?"

The Marquis's expressive features displayed profound disgust; and he made an instinctive movement that suggested the taking of a pinch of snuff.

"This isn't a Reformatory, Captain," he said. "There are no ruffians of that kind here. We're here because here alone in the Cosmos we can be ourselves without shame. I thought I'd made it plain to you," and his voice became grieved and pained, "that this is an extremely exclusive community. What we come here for is to enjoy in peace a very special peculiarity. Brutality, ruffianism, vulgar violence, don't give people the right to come here. Hell, let me tell you, Captain, is a place more — what do you call it? — more raffiné than you seem to realize. Nom de Dieu! People don't come here for such crude reasons as war or robbery or murder. Those activities are in line with the ordinary struggle for existence. You won't find a single politician or patriot down here. What do you take us for, Captain? This is a place of real, subtle spiritual evil, evil that is evil, not just the commonplace scramble to live. Our motives down here are all unusual, extraordinary, exquisitely remorseless. My own are erotic, of course, erotic with a peculiar twist, I admit, but still erotic, as I could prove to you beautifully if only — while our Spaniard's are religious, and your little lady's respected father's, are of course scientific. In fact let me put it like this and then I'm sure, you, Captain, with your eye of a Chasseur, will see the point. A place where we could make the Hell we needed had to be given us by the System-of-Things. It soon found it necessary to allot a geographical location to us, for our influence didn't stop with death. We used to hang about after we died. I've heard that our eccentric visitor Taliesin prophesies a time when in all the countries of the world Scientific and Religious and Erotic cruelty will be confined to one class alone, and that the ruling class. This class, he predicts, will carry things so far that there will be a terrific upheaval, led by those who still believe in the System-of-Things' pet scheme. And out of this will emerge a completely new world, that world of mercy and justice, to which it has been aiming from the beginning." He paused, and as I looked at him an expression of despair, that made me feel physically sick, flickered over his face. "That's Its peculiarity," he added in a hoarse and horrible tone. "It won't, It won't, It won't meddle with our wills!"

"You mean," I said rather heartlessly, "that by leaving such wills as ours free it's just as responsible for our damnation as if It damned us from the start, as the Calvinists believe."

The Marquis of Sade shrugged his shoulders. "Calvin is here himself," he replied dryly, "so you'll be able to discuss these niceties with a master — and in situ. But personally, Captain, I confess I'm beginning to find your — your interest in my perdition a little tiresome."

I bit my lip, for I knew well Morwyn was frowning at me; and I was fearful lest his satanic despair, combined with his lace-ruffles, might excite the girl's pity. "I think you said," I hurriedly threw in, "that this person you speak of was engaged just now upon a wild-goose chase of his own?"

But the man uttered the kind of weary sigh that a grand gentleman utters during a tedious sermon. "Oh yes," he remarked patiently. "But that's a long story and of course all my knowledge of this singular Being is ambiguous and fleeting. But what they say is that he's been seized with that weird passion for a ‘Quest’ to which his fellow-countrymen are so prone. The ‘Quest’ in his case is to hunt high and low for the great enchanter Merlin, who, as perhaps you are aware, since you come from his country, has not been heard of from any quarter of the visible or invisible world since his affair with that remarkable girl. They say that Taliesin talked to that girl in Heaven, and her opinion was that Merlin had hidden from her in Hell. They say that before going to Heaven she hunted for five centuries through every cave and burial-mound in Bardsey and Gresholm. They say saint after saint was sent to persuade her to give up the search; and none of them ever came back. But in the end they say she went to Heaven of her own accord under the escort of Saint Derfel; though how Saint Derfel beguiled her I haven’t heard, or whether—”

But he broke off abruptly. I think he must have seen from my face that this glib talk about these mysterious characters threw me into a sarcastic and sceptical mood.

“You’re laughing at me,” he protested; “but pray ask yourself, my dear sir, what conceivable motive I could have for telling you fabulous—”

But Morwyn was on her feet now and trembling with excitement. “Let’s go, let’s go!” she interrupted. “Which way is it? Oh my father, my father! But you’ll take us to this man yourself, Monsieur, won’t you? We should be helpless without you!”

You can believe, my son, if you have ever had anything to do with young women, how agitated I was when I actually saw this lovely girl lay both hands in cajoling supplication upon the wrist of this damned French ghost.

All manner of shocking fears rushed into my head, fears that I would shrink from revealing, even to you. But, after all, we were in Hell, where the most abominable thoughts in the Cosmos must have piled up since the System-of-Things first tolerated their segregation. I could have endured my girl’s gesture better — for of course her hands passed clear through his vaporous wrists and she drew them back hastily — if it had not been that the transparency of the man’s countenance enabled me to notice the lively dance his nerves were playing; and he must have detected my emotion; for he turned to me with an exaggerated air of deference.

“But I’m sure Monsieur is thinking,” he said, “that the lady needs some refreshment before setting out on so arduous an adventure? I have guessed correctly, eh? Well, I am glad I thought of it! So let’s go at once to the Tavern of Tiberius. You’ve read Milton, of course, Captain*? — Paradise Lost* has always been one of my favourite poems — and you won’t be surprised to learn that persons in our condition take quite a good deal of refreshment now and then, at least those among us who are not glued like insane moths to those Vivisection Screens.”

“Oh, I don’t feel hungry!” cried Morwyn eagerly; and then with that passionate gratitude for every sort of consideration that is natural to young girls — and you must remember that the Marquis’s manners were infinitely superior to any she had ever met before — she took upon herself to add in a voice vibrant with sympathy: “I’m so glad, Monsieur, you can enjoy a few of the pleasures of life still!”

“Oh,” he said, with a smile that was anything but reassuring to me, “you mustn’t pity me, lady. We’re like Milton’s angels.” And, if you please, what must this devil do, but with an air that would have lent itself to the Comédie Française, begin quoting the archangel’s speech to Adam.

“Let it suffice thee that thou knows’t
Us happy, and without Love no happiness!
Whatever pure thou in the body enjoy’st
(And pure thou wert created) we enjoy

In eminence; and obstacle find none
Of membrane, joint, or limb—"

Now I don't think even you, my son, can fail to understand how disturbed this quotation made me. That Morwyn loved me I had no doubt. Our time in that ship of black snow had proved it conclusively. But a girl — and was I to come to Hell to learn that? — can love one man, and yet —

But we were already being hurried towards the Tiberius Tavern. Our guide seemed to make no effort to take us by a quiet back-way to this resort. I was shocked by the manner in which he led Morwyn, walking a little in advance of me, straight past one of the worst, though it could not have been the very worst or we should have seen her father there, of these Vivisection Screens.

Did the girl realize the things that were going on in this particular laboratory — it was in America where there is even less interference than in England and it made even my hardened blood run cold — or was she so excited by the Frenchman's words as to see everything as if she saw nothing?

I noticed that the man himself went through a mental struggle not to pause at this Screen, whose audience as far as I could make out was almost entirely made up of medieval torturers and modern vivisectors, though there were a few there whose more casual absorption in the performance and whose obvious interest in ourselves, showed them to be more ordinary sadists.

But we had not gone very far before we encountered a sight so horrible that I could see Morwyn clap her hands to her eyes to keep it out. It was the spirit of a man I knew perfectly well as one of the most famous of all vivisectors, and he was evidently hurrying to this screen from some remote spot. You'll think I'm exaggerating, my boy, but I assure you that the man who approached us then was actually eaten up by invisible flames! I could see him writhing as he moved, and all his gestures were correspondent with this; but, as I say, the flames were invisible and were obviously nothing but the material projection of the working of his mind.

From what I now knew there was no mistaking the nature of the mental burning that made this figure a moving image of torment. They were the flames of that special electric current whose one pole is scientific curiosity and the other pole delight in exercising power over what shrinks.

That I was correct in my conjecture was confirmed by the fact that the figure of a woman who came hurrying after him, also with an air of exhausted yet maniacal resolution to reach that Experimental Laboratory, was devoured by self-created flames of a different kind. Well did I know the face of this woman, for I had often pondered as a boy upon her gloomy historic countenance, as I read of her unwearied zeal in the burning of heretics.

It was a strange thing to see these two inflictors of pain, the one the bigot of science and the other the bigot of religion, as their nearness to that notorious Laboratory fanned their self-created fires.

And the curious thing was that this chemical difference between their flames was emphasized by the cries they both uttered, cries that even my rudimentary knowledge of that mute tongue made me able to follow. “Harder, harder!” cried the man, “so that we may live long in the land!”

“Hotter, hotter!” cried the woman, “so that their souls may be eternally saved!”

Part Two

I WILL NOT weary you, my dear son, with a description of our experiences as guests of the Marquis of Sade at the Tavern of Tiberius. Suffice it to say that we all three, Morwyn, Black Peter and myself, came out thence with our hunger and thirst completely gone, and our various natural egoisms flattered, soothed and appeased.

Though our diet there had been composed of what I presume was some diabolical inversion of nectar and ambrosia, even Black Peter seemed half-drunk and it was in a strangely exalted mood that we set out on our grand adventure.

The Frenchman had been explaining to us at some length why it was necessary to proceed on foot in our search for the great Bard. Morwyn seemed to follow his explanation easily enough, but it was far too involved for me. Our fiery meal — for it seems that in the scientific handling of volcanic nourishment these people were far in advance of ourselves — had the effect of throwing us all into a state of drugged beatitude. I really cannot tell you how it had been brought about; but as far as I was concerned as we started off on our difficult journey I found I had almost ceased to be jealous or suspicious of our ghostly companion. I suppose any of us moderns, when it comes to diplomatic subtlety, are like simple children compared with an eighteenth-century man of the world.

I had never felt more enamoured of Morwyn than I did as we said good-bye to this city of insatiable television, and the odd thing was that the presence of our companion had no deterrent effect upon my feelings.

There she was, walking a little ahead of Black Peter and me, by the side of that sad and courtly figure, and never — not even on our walk up that Welsh hill before our accident — had I desired this little Being as intensely as I desired her now. How on earth did this damned Frenchman manage to outwit us so completely?

It wasn't as if I couldn't see the neurotic fever that was burning in his brain. And it wasn't as if I couldn't perceive too — for the clairvoyance created by that fallen star still quickened my mind — that Morwyn's childish and simple heart had lost all fear of the man. Could it have been that by some devilish ingenuity during our pause at the Sign of Tiberius he had engendered in me a tinge of that curious masculine confraternity of attraction towards young women, which can, under certain special conditions, take with men the place of the more natural and more respectable feeling of rivalry? It isn't a very nice thought that I should have had any feeling in common with a soul that the System-of-Things found so hostile to its evolutionary purpose, but to share even a tinge of the classical masculine freemasonry with such a person, and the girl in question my own true love —

But enough of this! I daresay the truth of the matter was simple enough, and purely material! No doubt that scoriae diet was burningly aphrodisiac, and both of us had been physically drugged into our dangerous and stupid beatitude. I even believe that while she kept the release of her father as her underlying motive she came pretty near forgetting what his ghost had looked like as it went off with the Inquisitor!

For myself I had never been so stirred by any feminine being as I was by Morwyn as we moved along that narrow desert-path, all three of us side by side, and Black Peter — for I had taken off his leash in my foolish mood of satisfaction — gambolling in front of us.

My girl had lost her hat by this time. I think she must have dropped it on the black snow of our wind-ship; but she had managed somehow, as women do under all conditions, to tidy herself up a little at that Sign of Tiberius. It shows how hopelessly indurated our human faults are, that not all I had seen of the risk of indulging in cruelty — especially in self-righteous cruelty — had purged me of human malice; for here I was, planning and plotting now with all my craftiness to prejudice this unlucky daughter against her father!

I began trying to lure on the Marquis of Sade to expatiate upon the comparative leisure enjoyed in Hell by pure and simple sadists, compared with the far more horrible fate of the inquisitors and vivisectors.

My wicked diplomacy was entirely successful; for so great is the urge to self-justification that this courtly son of perdition soon plunged into an impassioned eulogy of the serenity of life in Hell for his type of sinner compared with those whose cruelty was fortified by the search for knowledge, or the passion for orthodox truth. I had not noticed many women so far, and it was of particular interest to me when two of these unfortunate creatures came flickering across the desert towards us, hurrying to get to the Vivisection Screens.

I inquired of our guide whence these miserable ones came, and what he supposed they had been doing all this while, to be so long unaware of the exquisite delight offered by our modern Research Laboratories. My impression was that they were both of European extraction as they came hurrying by; but they did not display the least surprise at the sight of our two living figures or at the figure of Black Peter under the escort of so distinguished a ghost.

As I have already hinted to you, the clothes worn by all these self-damned shadows were as opaque as our ordinary human clothes; whereas their flesh was entirely transparent, betraying to every onlooker the complete working of all our poor mortal machinery. I have never been attracted to feminine nakedness. I suspect that few sophisticated sensualists are. But I have certainly derived many a thrilling moment from the occasional glimpse of a delicate neck, a maidenly bosom, a polished thigh, a well-turned ankle. I peered curiously at these phantoms as they passed but I can assure you I resolved quickly enough that I would avoid a glance at any other women among these self-damned! I had fancied they were of European extraction; and my guide seemed delighted to be able to inform me that one was a settler in Modern Africa, and the other a lady in old New Orleans.

I have seen many cruel faces in my time; I have never seen such an appalling mania for inflicting pain as I saw in these four phantom eyes, nor such repulsive nervous activity as I saw beneath these two pairs of soft breasts. They were both uttering panting sounds in their inaudible language; nor were the invisible flames that consumed them a whit less apparent to my horrified gaze than were their pantings and gaspings to my astounded ears.

"Tighter! Tighter!" cried the Louisiana lady— "Harder! Harder!" screamed the East-African settler; and so intense was their realization of their visions of blood, that, as they went past me, I got an actual impression as if from images limned on the air, of the dark bodies upon which they imagined themselves working their will. I noticed that though they didn't so much as glance at us, they did pause for a second to exchange looks with our guide.

"There! You see?" remarked that gentleman when they had passed. "Had they been scientists they wouldn't have found time even to greet a friend!" Morwyn turned inquiring eyes towards him but I hastily forestalled her question with one of my own; for I was extremely loath to let any chance of disparaging Mr. — to his daughter pass me by unexploited.

“Certainly, certainly,” replied our distinguished friend. “And if you will allow me to say so, I am no mean authority in these matters. Dogs are quite as sensitive to pain as we are, and their imaginative sensibility — their response, I mean, to the fear of the repetition and so forth — is even more lively than ours. It’s this expectancy of the repetition — I mean of what’s been done to them over and over again — that these ladies will find so interesting. And of course, though plenty of victims come safe and sound out of ordinary sadists’ hands, no victim ever comes out alive from the Research Laboratory! But it’s wonderful how long animals can live. Oh, I assure you, those women will get all the pleasure they expect! They’ll soon forget their Blacks; and the great thing is they’ll be in no danger now from the mob or the police! As with the Holy Inquisition, nobody dares lift a finger against Scientific Investigation. It’s sacrosanct! Those sublime words, wrong and right, and good and evil, words that have even made me shake in my shoes, mean absolutely nothing in a scientific laboratory! We ordinary sadists, when our perverse paroxysms are over, feel uneasy and ashamed; but no vivisector ever feels ashamed. His two grand sops, ‘Prolong Precious Lives’ and ‘Pursue Holy Truth,’ are the best anaesthetics for Conscience our race has ever had. I assure you, Captain, all we experts down here see a marvellous future for Scientific Sadism. The religious people will be left far behind. To torture for knowledge — why, the Devil himself must have invented that beautiful idea! It cuts at the very root of right and wrong. To burn alive to save souls was a happy inspiration; but this baking and freezing alive for pure knowledge — why it undermines the moral evolution of twenty thousand years! Good is no longer Good. Evil is no longer Evil. I am lost in wonder, my dear Captain, when I think what Science has done to side-track the purpose of the System-of-Things! Of course it can't win in the end — the System-of-Things is too crafty even for it; and I can't look about me down here at the results of the abolition of good and evil without confessing that there is some justification for this mania for Pity and Sympathy by which the System-of-Things is governed.

"Probably one day, when Science in her triumphant assurance has provided glass walls for her laboratories, there'll be a terrific Revolution and the moral sense will return with a vengeance. I wouldn't like to be the vivisectors in those days; but of course by that time their gases and bombs and engines of war—"

He was interrupted by a sound from Morwyn different from any sound I have ever heard. It was a horrible and harrowing sound; and faintly resembled the sound that a fish sometimes makes when a hook is pulled from its gills.

Black Peter showed signs of understanding this sound better than I, for he flew at my Lord of Sade with the most vicious barking, elongating his neck like a snake and quivering from nose to tail. I think the sound my girl made — for it was too inhuman to be called a cry — was due to her outraged feeling for her father, a feeling which our elegant companion had so unmercifully disregarded. I think her emotion made her forget her dumbness, made her in fact utter one of those inarticulate sounds which are so disturbing in dumb people.

But the unexpected attack from Black Peter brought us all to our senses and I fancy de Sade himself must have felt some sort of qualm. At any rate I noticed that when Morwyn refused the pretty pretence of taking his insubstantial arm as we went on, he paid no heed to this affront, but removing his great feathered hat, began pointing at different quarters of the horizon and expatiating to her on particular features of desolate picturesqueness which the landscape displayed. The girl’s anger melted more quickly than I liked under his courtly airs and indeed I soon came to the conclusion that I had gained little by my malicious attempt to get Mr.—‘s damned cruelties shown up in their proper colour.

Two of us living entities listened after that in a most gloomy silence to the intercourse between the girl and this lively phantom. It was indeed for many a long hell’s mile — a measurement I have reckoned since to be about three times as long as miles are with us — that I stretched my lean infantry-officer’s legs — plod, plod, plod — behind their mutually engrossed figures.

And all the while on his four feathery paws Black Peter trotted solemnly at my heels, perfectly miserable now, for it had only been for a little while after our visit to the Tiberius that he had ceased holding his tail clamped tight to his rump. My own tail, figuratively speaking, was certainly clamped to my rump as we went along; for all sorts of devilish suspicions kept entering my head. With what motive had this accurst Frenchman with his bowings and scrapings devoted himself to us? The voluptuousness of cruelty — he had confessed as much — was his sole joy and only occupation. Why then had he left those precious Screens to guide us upon this wild-goose chase? Where were we really going? Was it not possible that I was about to be doomed to witness — until the sight of it drove me mad — unspeakable atrocities, both physical and spiritual, inflicted upon this gentle creature?

Unfortunately for him, but very fortunately for me, the man’s vicious excitement — as it arose, as it increased, as it died down — was so transparently obvious, to the most innocent and superficial scrutiny, that I could keep an eye upon him. His thoughts, it is true, I couldn't read; but his feelings — such was the transparency of his person wherever it was exposed — I saw displayed before me in all their maniacal perversity; and I can assure you it was no engaging sight. But not only were they displayed before me. I still seemed to possess a great deal of that curious clairvoyance which my contact, such as it was, with the magnetism of that falling meteorite had bestowed on me; so that I was able to interpret what I saw with more penetration than you would perhaps credit me with possessing.

Another characteristic of mine, which is still less likely to have arrested your notice, is a certain desperate and reckless humour, upon which, at a pinch, I have the power of retreating. While the faces of other men — not only established persons of society either — take on a look of grave reproach when chance and circumstance shake them up and ruffle them, I derive a certain sardonic satisfaction from the very enormity, the very monstrousness, of the predicaments into which I fall. “Why should you escape, Captain?” I say to myself, “when so many men, much worthier than you, are drowned and burnt and starved and buried alive, in the natural order of events?” And then it is that I fasten a leash round my neck and jerk myself into position, and force myself to leer back at Life, as though I said to her, “I quite understand the itch you feel to make this solemn idiot skip a little; but I can skip and yet snap my fingers!”

Well, I can assure you that this sardonic bed-rock vein of mine had a full opportunity just at that moment as I plodded sulkily behind Morwyn while she talked to the Marquis of Sade. Trusting to my direct reading of his nerves I soon ceased to listen to their talk. I suppose quiet, soft-hearted, normal girls automatically fall into a yielding mood when a certain type of man — even the ghost of a certain type of man — talks to them in a particular tone; and I confess even for myself there were moments when I grew oblivious to this damned rascal's nerves, and even felt — for you must remember you couldn't see 'through his clothes — something of the spell of his French manners!

But I was guilty, as Black Peter and I walked behind them, of so much irritation at the impression the fellow was making upon her that I caught the unpardonable wish flitting for a second like a malicious cormorant across my brain that this tantalizing innocent might not get off quite scot-free from being so susceptible.

I really don't know how long we walked like this. It seemed to me as if a whole day went by, but it may have been only five or six hours. My annoyance with Morwyn did not lessen; indeed it seemed to intensify as the hours of that infernal pilgrimage lengthened out and the day waned. I say "as the day waned" but Hell seemed to share with the Biblical New Jerusalem a preference for an unchanging mystical twilight over our familiar alternation of light and darkness.

But whether it was day or whether it was night, we three in our helpless livingness, and the crafty Frenchman in his active deadness seemed prepared to stagger on forever on the strength of that fiery meal at the Sign of Tiberius.

And the more my sweet girl drooped with the length of the way, and the more Black Peter dragged at the end of his leash, the more seductive grew the Marquis's tone, and the more greedy to monopolize her beauty and keep it entirely to myself did my agitated senses become. Don't be angry with me, if I keep brooding, as my tale proceeds, upon this life-creating, this god-like, this evilly-abused, this guilty-innocent mystery of desire.

I can so well recall every detail of my feelings during that weary plodding behind those two; and I assure you that what I felt for Morwyn was well worth brooding upon! It must have borne a resemblance to that yearning to be diffused through the whole body of the cosmos, about which Goethe is always dropping mysterious hints, and which certainly must have stored up, in its long secret history, many an occult magical rite, that, if revealed, would astonish the profane!

My own feeling is that something of this kind was behind the ritual of the Druids; and had to do with the bloodless cult of the Great Mother which reached these shores in prehistoric times from Crete; and I have sometimes thought that in certain intense and imaginative moods of desire, in lands where this bloodless worship continued longest, our most unsatisfied lusts might find a paradisaic fulfilment.

Well, well! With your airy modern humour, my dear son, you are no doubt growing impatient for me to get on with my tale and to leave this mystic babble. But after all you must remember that in a long day's march behind the desirable form of one's girl on the adamantine floor of Hell, one naturally tends to fall back upon primeval considerations.

As a matter of fact what came over me more and more strongly as we advanced across this twilight landscape was the crucial difference between those who hold that all sex-desire is evil and those who hold that sex-desire is only evil when it is linked with cruelty. I confess that I have had moments in my life when I have doubted if any sex-desire is really free from cruelty and when I have been vexed in my conscience by certain sayings of Jesus and Paul that seem to imply that sex in itself is an evil thing. But if you will allow me to say so, it was a significant experience to me that I had not seen in Hell any vicious ghosts at all save those whose vice took the shape of cruelty.

Vicious I know I am, if it is vicious to indulge to the limit an intense excitement in the presence of youthful femininity, but what, pondering deeply upon the matter as I trod the “marl” of Hell’s floor, I did finally decide, though the orthodox would say that it was a decision reached under the influence of the devil, was that, though cruelty might be the ferule of the immortal staff of Eros, its handle was legitimate lust, and the fact that both these impulses — the lawful one and the unlawful one — belonged to the same magic wand no more made them identical than good and evil are made identical by their equal birth from the same heart. In thus devouring Morwyn’s figure with such mystic-sensual eyes, I came by degrees to forget the Marquis of Sade entirely. It was the blending of slenderness with softness that I found so irresistible in the sweet creature, and when I reflected that, except for this damned ghost, Black Peter and I had her entirely to ourselves it seemed well worth it to be in Hell.

As for Mr. —, I really wasn’t sorry that his burning faith in annihilation had proved such a pathetic fallacy, for as long as his spirit remained where it was it seemed unlikely that Morwyn would want to return to earth, where no doubt I should have plenty of rivals a good deal more substantial than this shadowy Frenchman. According to the clairvoyance of our fall I still recognized that she loved me; but I began to recognize now a quite definite emotional disturbance in her girlish feelings, which was undoubtedly her reaction to this fine gentleman; and I thought to myself: “If a dead reprobate excites her so much, what about the living reprobates she is bound to meet up there?” And so — scandalous though it is to confess it — I decided that even if this evasive Welshman did show us how to get out I would find some trick to double-cross him. “Better,” I thought, “have your girl to yourself in Hell than share her anywhere else!”

Justifying myself in this shameless manner I allowed my whole soul, through the medium of sight, to play round the lovely form before me; but no sooner was my spirit beginning really to feel I possessed her than what must my wretched conscience do but start accusing me of unpardonable selfishness. And how unreasonable my conscience was! Anyone who knows human nature and its basic egoism must know that it was impossible for me just then to enter into an objective consideration as to what kind of life, now that she had lost her father, would really make her happiest. A life with me, supposing we got back to earth — and no lover can be blamed for regarding the fulfilment of his love as an advantage rather than the reverse to the object of it — would, I did admit, scarcely have been life with a young and handsome man. But on the other hand it would not have been a life of hard domestic work or of extreme penury. Well! well! What I think I secretly all the while anticipated was that we should spend the rest of our days where we were! I began now — for our weakness imposes limits even to the most ecstatic contemplation — to glance away from Morwyn, and to take in our surroundings. The light in this world was, as I have hinted, of a muted kind. It resembled the beginning of the evening twilight and the end of the morning twilight. And the floor of this world upon which the uniform light fell was on the whole a monotonous level, its few roughnesses and corrugations never, as far as I could see, amounting to more than scoriac dust-dunes and a few low hillocks where some ancient seismic disturbance had scattered a thin, brownish, volcanic ash.

Between these excrescences, some of which were composed of ribs of hard volcanic rock, but most of them of mere powdery cinders, there were wide expanses of rocky slate, not always quite smooth, for there were curious gradations here and there, like irregular steps for the convenience of infant-goblins, but presenting on the whole the appearance of a vast cathedral-floor. Quite unlike a cathedral-roof, however, was what the eye saw above us as we advanced. The ceiling of Hell was itself indeed seldom visible; for hideous-shaped processions of moving mist — and yet it was not mist as we know mist on earth — kept sweeping across it.

But I now suddenly became aware, as I gazed across the vast plain we were traversing, that we were not, as I had previously supposed, the only wanderers in this scoriae wilderness.

Far away on our left — I am compelled to confine myself to speaking of "left" and "right," for I had no inkling of the points of the compass — I seemed to make out a sort of lurid "ascension" going on, as of a number of gesticulating human figures.

These figures were apparently being whirled up from the surface of the plain towards these grotesque cloud-shapes; and as I gazed at this singular spectacle I was reminded of the way we ourselves had been whirled into our ship of black snow. The ascent into the air of these phantoms, for such I assumed them to be, troubled me with an access of shocked and horrified pity, for their limbs seemed tossing about in a manner that made me think of a shoal of water-newts suffering some extreme distress This spasmodic waving of so many arms and legs, as these lost souls were whirled upwards, troubled me not a little, and even brought to my mind, for some of them seemed clinging together, the desolate fate of Paolo and Francesca in the Inferno!

So concerned did I become by what I took for a cruel punishment that I hurried after the Frenchman and made bold to interrupt his gallantry by pointing out what was going on.

With perfect politeness he turned and paused, though the girl frowned at my intrusion. "You've absolutely no need, my dear Captain," he said, "to get excited over that little matter. Those people are perfectly all right. I admit their arms and legs, as they're caught into the air, do jerk about in rather a startling way; but I must beg you to remember that Hell is not, and never was, a place of punishment. On the contrary it's the only place in the whole cosmos where people can do just exactly what they like. Please believe me, and you, my dear lady, too, that those spirits over there aren't waving their arms and legs in pain but on the contrary from a lively expectation of approaching voluptuous delight. I admit they do, as you say, look like agitated newts; but if we were nearer you would I am sure" — and he gave me a wicked leer— "derive no small pleasure from the exposure of those pretty limbs; many of which belong to quite charming—" Here he caught himself up and added hurriedly: "But not as charming as you, Madame," and with that he swept the air with his feathered hat. "But I swear to you," he went on, "that it's the hope of pleasure, not the endurance of pain, that makes them expose themselves in that manner. They are rushing off to some new Screen, a rumour of which must have reached them; and they're 'taking a wind,' just as in my days we used to 'take a calash' to go and see an execution. You're only doing now what our Parisian military men used to do in my days, watching the naughty women mount their coaches!"

My girl looked away, in proud disgust; and of course I was far too absorbed in her own dear figure to have the least desire to see these sadistic bitches, however beautiful they may have been, reveal their charms in this frantic and shameless scramble.

But a new and very disconcerting thought had come into my head at that moment — why, if it had been all this while perfectly possible to travel so expeditiously, had this tricky Frenchman led us this exhausting tramp on foot? I thought to myself: "Ho! Ho! my clever friend, I'll have a few straight questions to ask you before very long!"

But Morwyn's crossness when I interrupted her talk with the fellow had been profoundly irritating to me; and with that human desire to punish, which is one of the greatest evils of our mortality, I deliberately turned the conversation upon vivisection.

"Have you given any time yourself, Monsieur," I asked him, "to this tragic problem? Don't you think there must be some good and honourable vivisectors in England, if nowhere else?"

The Marquis of Sade smiled. "What a profoundly characteristic question!" he cried. "Aren't you, my worthy Captain, enough of a realist to see that you can no more talk of a 'good vivisector' than you can talk of a 'good inquisitor'?

"From the point of view of our mysterious System-of-Things to be a vivisector at all is to put yourself on the side of evil against good. It's simply to substitute the cruel superstition of unscrupulous science for the cruel superstition of unscrupulous religion. The people who torture animals for the benefit of humanity are no better than the people who invent diabolical engines of destruction for the benefit of their tribe. I have given considerable attention to these people's hypocritical reasoning, for it makes my own position so frank and satisfactory in comparison! I have even examined their claims to have effected cures; and I assure you that in almost every case what they claim as their achievement has in reality been done by better hygiene and sanitation, and by the removal of physical overcrowding and extreme destitution. Moreover, if you read your gazette with any intelligence, Captain, you will notice that over and over again after their proclamation of some startling cure derived from torture a complete silence will follow; indicating that in practice the thing has proved a failure! And what do they do then? Do they give up their frightfulness? Do they relinquish their practice of trying to cure diseases by creating more diseases? Not at all! They simply get hold of more thousands of cats and dogs and monkeys, and go at it again; by pain trying to cure pain, by torture trying to circumvent the laws of nature! For, consider, Captain. Everyone has to die at last, haven't they? Isn't there something monstrous and indecent in trying to get round death by inflicting torture? Death is certain. Do they think to make man immortal by torturing beasts? You turn your face away, little lady, and I will say no more; but being what I am I can assure you, across my heart, that even in my imagination I have never gone to the lengths in diabolical cruelty to which these scientists are prepared to go in their insane mania.

"The true sadists among them must have, if I know anything of my own psychology, hundreds of violent reactions; but I have never known a strictly 'scientific' vivisector to have one single flicker of pity or mercy or remorse."

This struck me as a good moment for giving the fellow a shock. "Monsieur," I began, for I am not one to beat about the bush, "why is it, Monsieur, that we haven't taken one of these precious 'winds' of yours, in place of wearing Madame out in this exhausting tramp?"

My lord gave a fine jump at this unexpected remark. He looked a fool; and you should have seen the agitation in the nervous ganglia of his transparent countenance as he bowed and stammered! I was immensely pleased. I had caught the wily rogue fairly "on the hop" as we say, and indeed I have often noticed in my long life that the cunning of a good man is much more formidable than that of a bad man. I have seen it again and again; and yet bad men never take warning. They think they can outwit what this wretched ghost calls the "System-of-Things" all the time!

"Oh, my dear Captain," gasped the fellow, and I'm sure the smile which illuminated my features as I stared at him must have caused him acute distress. "Of course I've thought of that, but I thought too that this lady wouldn't care to use so dizzy, so rapid, so adventurous a mode of travelling.

I thought it might discompose her and even give her mal-de-cœur to fly so high and so fast — but of course if—"

"Do you mean, Monsieur," cried I, throwing into my tone as much indignation as I could assume — though as a matter of fact the pleasure of having proved a match for this son of perdition had thrown me into a very good temper— "do you mean that you actually could have called down one of those comfortable air-ships at any moment during the last dozen hours? And instead of that, Monsieur, you have allowed—" And I cast at him that look of scandalized reproach with which my particular generation — as I expect you know only too well — takes its revenge for the normal strain of its virtue.

"I must apologize to Madame," said the Marquis with a bow, "but she herself is my best excuse." As he spoke, I am sure that something passed between my girl and this lost wretch. My meteoric clairvoyance had already faded a good deal; but I had enough of it left to catch a perceptible stir of emotion, though it was a very difficult one to analyse, in Morwyn's bosom, and I could see that the Frenchman's wicked nerves were jumping up and down like sand-fleas.

"I don't think any excuse is necessary," said Morwyn, "and I don't wonder that our friend thought I should be shy of a conveyance" — and she cast a glance upward— "when I see those things rushing about under the roof!"

I bit my lip, and gave poor Black Peter's leash a vicious jerk. The unlucky little beast was sniffing about round the edge of a rough lava-ridge, and in my discomfiture it irritated me profoundly to see him behave so foolishly; for it was clear that there could be no scent of any living creature in this ghastly desolation. What must our Frenchman do, however, but approach the ridge as I pulled the dog away from it, and begin poking about. It is extraordinary how a human being gets used to things as long as they go on a certain length of time! As I looked at this cavalier figure of a man in his Louis Seize costume bending down so mincingly over that scoriac heap not the remotest flicker of supernatural awe modified my jealous irritation.

It would have given me incredible comfort to have fallen upon the chap, then and there, with my bare fists, and given him as we used to say at school, a thorough good licking. But in addition to the accident that he was too insubstantial to be affected by such treatment, my fear of Morwyn's anger deterred me from attempting it.

But he rose up now and came briskly towards us, holding his hand stretched out with a coin between his finger and thumb, that looked about the size of a penny. I at once extended my own hand to receive this coin and make my pronouncement upon it, thinking, as an Englishman naturally would, that it was the man's prerogative to examine any interesting treasure-trove, especially if it had a classic character. But this frivolous Frenchman disregarded my gesture and presented the coin to Morwyn as if it were a nosegay.

"It's one of the Emperor's," he remarked with noticeable respect. "It must have fallen from a cloud. The Emperor never walks."

My first impression was that he must be talking about Napoleon; but when Morwyn handed me the coin I saw at a glance that it was one of the ordinary denarii of Claudius Domitius Cæsar, usually known as Nero. I might have thought, if I'd had any wit, that the number of Emperors in Hell, though less than the number of Bishops, must be considerable; but I never suspected that in the difficult art of carrying their money with them they could often have succeeded.

"He has a special conveyance of his own," went on our informant gravely. "He shares it with Calvin and with a great continental vivisector whose name I forget. I heard the Emperor maintain once that Calvin got more pleasure from burning Servetus than he himself got from burning a thousand Christians in his garden. 'It's all in the mind,' he remarked on that occasion, 'which is a thing we artists are apt to forget.' There is recent gossip in Hell, however, to the effect that Calvin and the vivisector have decided that if the Emperor doesn't give up his hankering after artistic cruelty and devote himself more rigorously to scientific and religious cruelty, they'll have to leave him. I understand it's the money he gives them that makes this decision a hard one. People tell me that between them they've got a million sestercii out of him, which they employ to get the front places at the Screens. Some of us ordinary people, whose nerves are not yet hardened by Science, are ready enough to give up our places for a few Neronian coins. I myself have often—"

"Have you any use for money down here?" I interrupted, with a quick glance at Morwyn, for I hoped by leading him on in this way, to show him up as the kind of miser that women always loathe.

"Oh no," he replied smiling, while my girl looked at us both. "It's only a hobby with us. Many of us down here are expert numismatologists. We find we need relaxation after our nervous excitement at the Screens. That is" — and he hesitated a moment under Morwyn's gaze— "those of us need it who are not adamant in our devotion to humanity."

Morwyn frowned; and turning away from us both scanned those queer vapour-shapes that were passing and re-passing below the metallic sky.

"Is it much further," she asked our guide, "to where you're taking us? I hate" — and she looked at the Frenchman with what struck my mind as almost a coaxing look— “to leave my father with that person a minute longer than’s absolutely necessary.”

For reply the man put his ghostly fingers to his mouth, threw back his head, and uttered in the mute language of that country, a prolonged reverberating whistle.

I shall never forget the weird effect it had upon me, this soundless sound producing a soundless echo — I suppose from metallic roof itself — an echo which filled the silence long after his whistling had died away. Nor had we very long to wait for a response. With our heads thrown back we all three waited, gazing upwards, while Black Peter strained frantically at his leash, trying to return to the lava-hillock where he had smelt out that Roman coin. In the absence of any smell save the unspeakably foul one that sometimes emanated from these bodiless apparitions, I suppose the million-times faded aroma of sweaty front seats at Roman circuses, that I daresay hung still about that little bronze disc, gave the dog’s senses a particular flip.

I believe it was Morwyn herself who was the first to notice the special manoeuvring of one of these vaporous air-ships; but she soon pointed it out to our Frenchman who clapped his hands in infantile excitement.

“It’s the Emperor! It’s the Emperor!” he cried. It was really quite shocking to see the way this lost spirit’s hands passed silently through each other, as he beat them together in his excitement. I tried my best to idealize this gesture by recalling a similar phenomenon I had noticed in a certain clear Welsh stream when the shadow of one fish kept passing through the shadow of another fish till both of them vanished in the reflection of the opposite bank.

It was to me a pathetic example of the weakness of the feminine mind, and it distressed me that this Frenchman — who certainly didn’t miss it — should have seen such frailty in Morwyn, that my girl's hands at mention of the Emperor's ship should at once have flown to her head. It is true she had lost her hat; and since she had tidied herself up at the Tavern of Tiberius her hair had become ruffled — but still —

For myself I made a point of stooping down and nonchalantly stroking Black Peter's feathery ears. I trust in that way I showed my complete indifference to the descent upon us of this notorious despot. The conveyance he arrived in was, I admit, a very compact and serviceable one. And although its exterior substance was composed of a yet more fleecy vapour, its interior seats were evidently formed of the same compressed dark snow which I shall forever link in my mind with my first intimacy with Morwyn.

Something about my studied indifference must have piqued the vanity of this imperial wretch, for his first words on alighting were addressed to me.

But the Frenchman pushed himself forward between us and became so voluble that I soon ceased to listen to his jabber or to watch his theatrical gestures; nor do I think the heavy-jowled brute he was addressing lent an ear to him longer than I did. I was, however, thoroughly disturbed to notice the looks which — from under his heavy brows — this unholiest of the Cæsars kept casting in Morwyn's direction. He really seemed at first to forget where he was and that my girl was blessedly alive while he was a damned ghost, for he looked from her to us as if he were bidding us clear off and leave them alone together; but a brief word from me, and you can imagine how stiff I kept my back, was enough "to put him wise," as they say, as to the proprieties of the situation.

But if I disliked the way he stared at Morwyn — and I can't deny that for all his sulky, cloudy, scowling features, the brute was, in his own unpleasant sensual way, uncommonly good-looking — I disliked still more the way he drew our guide, who had been pirouetting round him like a besotted Abbé round an abstracted Cardinal, close up to his purple-swathed belly, and began whispering to him. The process of whispering in this country I had only seen once before, and that was between our Frenchman and Mr.— ‘s precious Spaniard and I had been too happy then to take much notice of it.

But now between Claudius Domitius and the Marquis of Sade I was able to see this particular form of communication in its most perfect expression. And it was so much the opposite of a pretty sight, that first Morwyn, and then I, though I have to confess I got a malicious pleasure from seeing these devils humiliate themselves before her, were forced to turn our heads away.

As for Black Peter, he seemed to be almost as afraid of this sulky potentate as he was of Morwyn’s father, and with his feathery legs straddled wide apart — to gain purchase for his pull — he began tugging furiously at his leash, as if he would willingly flee to the furthest boundaries of Hell to escape this plump purple-swathed intruder.

It had taken me some time during that first journey to learn what these children of perdition were doing when they whispered to each other. What they did — and what this obese matricide and his obsequious devotee were doing now — was to rub their stomachs together, while each of them drummed with his fists on the other’s rump. This double motion of rubbing and drumming took place of course in dead silence; and it was plain that the pitiful lack of solidity in these self-tormenting Shades rendered this whispering business a feat that required a good deal of delicate balancing and adjustment.

What brought it about, of course, was the fact that since their language was already a voiceless one any considerable muting of it would mean its vanishing away. Thus there became necessary some system of physical signs; for since the greater part of the population spend the whole of the day and most of the night jostling at the Screens and are frequently jammed so tightly together that their transparent bodies are forced to interpenetrate, this whispering by belly-friction and buttock-pounding must have arisen, as all language arose in the beginning, out of the special and peculiar necessities of the case.

Morwyn and I remained politely in profile while this business went on, but we didn't hesitate to exchange, in the ordinary mute language of the place, a few words together.

"Do you want to take every risk in getting to this Welsh Seer?" I asked her. "I am ready, you know, for anything you insist on; but I can't say I like the look of things! Do you see those two leaning over the side?"

The girl nodded. Yes, she had seen them; and I can tell you, my dear son, that if it was unpleasant to watch those two Latins exchanging their unholy thoughts, it was still more unpleasant to see Calvin and his vivisector friend peeping over the side of their cloud-boat! Each of them craned forward a revoltingly withered neck pulsing with wicked veins. Each of them clutched the edge of the boat with fingers that looked as if they had been already clutching at the living nerves of heretics and dogs for a whole eternity.

One of these shocking bigots betrayed in the gloating look he cast upon Morwyn the hope that her heresies would take a million years to eradicate — always for the good of her soul — while the other seemed calculating just what process of piquant investigation — always for the sake of humanity — would make Black Peter strain most at the straps that held him down.

"Yes," the girl cried, "I'm ready for any risk for dad's sake! If I die it doesn't matter; and if we die together you won't mind that — now — will you?"

As she spoke she gave me the sweetest smile I had ever received from a woman. The only smile nearly approaching it was one I got once from a harlot in Berlin when we saw, out of our window, a circus-elephant take off a general's hat.

"Well, Captain, will you come with us? I've explained to Cæsar which way we're going, and he's delighted to give us a lift."

Morwyn and I swung round together. Claudius Domitius Cæsar allowed the extreme tip of his tongue to emerge from between his teeth as he licked his upper lip. He gave me a patronizing nod. I suppose he thought a Retired Captain from Britain was of no more importance than a Retired Centurion from Judæa. But he took no notice at all of Morwyn; a detail that I had the wit to regard as extremely ominous.

We looked at each other and we looked at this plump purple-swathed phantom and we looked at the burner of Servetus and we looked at the torturer of ten thousand dogs.

"Well, Captain?" repeated the Marquis of Sade. "Well, young lady? Are we to accept Cæsar's offer or are we to continue our tramp?"

Morwyn and I gave each other a long clinging glance, a glance that had a good deal more of tragic significance than we ourselves realized at the time. Then we made a slight movement towards each other; but that was all.

For a moment she stood very still, and I shall never forget how she looked with her bare head held back so straight and her face grown so white as it showed against the side of that air-ship, over the edge of which those two horrible phantoms gloated down upon her, and then she murmured quietly in the mute language of the country: "We are ready. Let us go."

Without farther delay I caught up Black Peter under my arm and together we ascended into the vessel. We were followed immediately after by the imperial phantom and his obsequious friend; and very soon a lavasmelling wind, not unlike the wind offered by the witch in Macbeth, was lifting us off the ground and carrying us at an easy rate of speed, but at a surprisingly tilted angle, towards the dusky roof of Hell.

Part Three

OUR FLIGHT IN this Neronian equipage was our second flight over the infernal landscape; but alas! it was a very different one from the first. Then I seemed to be entirely alone with Morwyn; for the Frenchman never obtruded himself, and the others — her father and the Spanish Inquisitor — were almost out of sight. But on this occasion things grew sinister from the very start. In the first place the Emperor and his French admirer, who seemed to have much to communicate, made no attempt to retire from our presence for their repulsive whispering; but rubbed stomachs and thumped rumps in immediate proximity to us and in disregard of all propriety. There was something revolting in this spectacle; and it was made almost unbearably grotesque by the pretentiousness of the folded toga worn by the one and of the laces and ribbons worn by the other.

Morwyn kept her eyes nervously lowered, like a young nun caught in a tavern brawl, and it came over me that I had always disliked — even on earth — the particular hissing sound, as of Miltonic Pandemonium-Devils, that people seem forced to make when they whisper; and I said to myself, as I watched these two sons of perdition plotting their filthy plots, that it was clearly a characteristic of Hell to bring out into the open and enlarge upon, as if under a magnifying glass, all the lesser, as well as the greater, abominations of our earthly life.

As a matter of fact there was nothing really indecent about this whispering; but it gave me, and I think Morwyn too, a sense of gross brazen obscenity — the sort of shrinking nausea that extremely old-fashioned

English ladies get in Paris and that I suspect most squeamish travellers receive in the Priapian quarters of ancient Pompeii.

But if Morwyn and I were uncomfortable I have never seen Black Peter so upset as he was upon this imperial air-yacht. He made water constantly, evidently overpowered by something sulphurous on the air around him, and I saw him struggle in vain to ease his bowels. Several times he lifted up his head and barked at these whisperers; but when he did this I struck him without scruple. I didn't at all want to excite any outburst of fury in that purple-wrapped brute, and in any case the shrill sound of canine barking in this vast Colosseum of deadly silence got on my nerves.

But worse was to follow. Our Roman and Frenchman were still at it, and Peter was still curving his back and making that too familiar arch of his stumpy tail, when our other fellow-travellers forced themselves upon our notice. The ship was moving very rapidly just now and rather jerkily, or their proceedings would have been more apparent than they were; but it was impossible not to feel disconcerted when the notorious Theologian and the famous Vivisector — both of them anything but young men — perched themselves on a kind of yard-arm above our heads and like a pair of screaming vultures stretched out their long hairless necks and began jabbering in the soundless, language of the country through what obviously was some infernal substitute for a wireless microphone. Poor little Morwyn was by this time at the breaking point; and sinking down under the bulkhead she thrust her hands hysterically against her ears and bowed her head over her knees.

I shall never forget the desolate look of her thin elbows as she did this, nor the way in which the big tears falling from her eyes made little round holes, like those of sand-worms, in the chemical substance of our vessel. If I weren't such a wretched linguist I could have understood by now every word these long-necked scare-crows were screaming from their bird-like perch. They would each in turn have a go at the instrument, and then reluctantly yield its mouthpiece to the other, and I grew more and more horrified as I made out first one and then another terrifying menace from broken fragments of this devilish broadcasting. They were both up to serious mischief, these insane rogues — that much was clear — and that it was mischief aimed especially at my feminine companion I began to be more and more certain. They were sermonizing all Hell — that too I could detect — on their curst bigoted theories; but they were also indicating that it would be encouraging to religion, beneficial to science, and extremely satisfactory to the Imperial artist, if the heretical young lady who had come down into their midst should be saved from her heresies and the black dog used for humanitarian research.

As to the silly old military man who accompanied them — so I seemed to gather to be the drift of this genial broadcasting — it would be best to deport him back as quickly as possible to the country from which he came, on condition that before he died he should bring down more young ladies and if possible a monkey or two to be offered up to God and the Truth.

I could clearly hear the ferocious advocate of Predestination arguing that the burning of Servetus had kept millions of souls in the Faith and that the death of this woman — thus providentially sent to Hell before her time — would have a similar effect. I think I could also gather that the Vivisector felt that several years might be added to the lives of old gentlemen on earth when you had a real dog to work upon down here. There was a lot more from both these aged broadcasters, but it was of a scientific nature, and I believe it referred to the material difficulty of their pious undertaking, owing to the fact that they were Shadows; and though a shadow can feed forever upon the pleasure of seeing cruelty, it is hard for it to inflict cruelty.

If I understood what I heard correctly, but the vivisector involved it with a great deal of obscure phraseology, the suggestion was thrown out that from all the confines of Hell a great host of spirits should gather, who should meet our vessel before we reached our destination and by the sheer oppression of their numbers separate me from Morwyn and Black Peter.

As soon as these ravens of disaster had finished their accursed croaking I hurried Morwyn aside into the stern of the ship where we were comparatively isolated. Here I revealed to her what I had heard during her collapse and how extremely sinister I regarded it.

The girl's face betrayed a whole drama of emotion as I spoke. At one moment I really believe the idea crossed her mind of flinging herself out of the boat; but as I went on she suddenly laid her hand on Black Peter's head and lifted her face with a noble gesture of defiance and desperation. Luckily there was no need to fear being overheard; though I was firmly resolved that nothing would make me go through, with Morwyn's dear form, this humiliating process of whispering. But the rush of the wind was so strong through the body of our ship, for we were travelling now at a very great speed, that it drowned the magnetic vibration of even the most intense of our silent words.

We sat close together after this disclosure of what awaited us, with our hands clasped tight and our knees touching; while Black Peter, who seemed to understand that some new menace was in the offing, refrained from his usual agitated whining in the presence of human fondness, and showed his concern by a series of low-pitched rumbling sounds, directed vaguely towards all our fellow voyagers. Black Peter's rumblings were the only audible sound as we rushed through the air, though we could feel quite clearly the impact of the wind on our faces. The two wicked old men remained aloof from us after sending off their wireless message; but they were so constantly occupied in that repulsive stomachrubbing and buttock-thumping game I began to wonder — though I said nothing to Morwyn about my misgivings — whether they were deciding that there was no need to wait until that multitude of spirits arrived before playing some devil's trick upon us.

It was one of those moments when man in his helplessness instinctively turns to God; and I knew by Morwyn's expression that she had already begun saying her prayers. But — there it is! — I am not naturally of a religious turn of mind, and certainly nothing that I had seen down here impelled me in the direction of pious thoughts, though I have always uttered long pharisaic prayers to the elements of nature. But what we needed to come to our rescue at this juncture was one of those terrifying angels of Dante, who rush so proudly down the gullet of Hell in obedience to some pitiless vendetta of Omnipotence. In place of any such Being whose primo amore and savage "justice" had created Hell, I felt myself confronted down here by nothing more active than this calm, evolutionary System-of-Things, upon whose "mysterious ways" our Frenchman was always animadverting with such a mixture of self-congratulation and dismay, — a System-of-Things whose purpose was pity and sympathy, but whose method was the appalling one, worse than any personal "vendetta," of leaving evil minds to their own horrible devices!

As I watched Morwyn's white face and closed eyes, and saw her lips moving in desperate prayer, and as I felt Black Peter's nose, which in the poor beast's agitation had grown hot and feverish, touching the back of one of my hands, my thoughts beat, as they never had done before, upon the adamantine mystery of cosmic existence, whether on earth or in Hell.

"The best of all possible worlds" — that was the tag that kept running through my head; but running with a new stress on the word "possible."

Perhaps it was the best of all possible worlds? Perhaps without the freewill of the created no tolerable world was possible; and the only alternative would be some appalling predestined machine such as this cruel old man who wanted to please God by burning Morwyn alive believed in, and such as this other horrible old man believed in too, who hoped to prove its existence by playing a tune on Black Peter's nerves. If this devilish machine-world was the precious "Truth," for which girls must be burnt and animals vivisected, and the only possible alternative was a world of such free-will as I now saw around me, perhaps this slow-moving System-of-Things, whose purpose caused such dismay in the heart of the Marquis of Sade, was, after all, doing the best it could!

But, meanwhile, what the devil were we to do? What hope was there for us? Here we were, in a Hell that the System-of-Things had provided for men of evil will after their death, in a Hell where, as on our own earth, everything that happened was due to a mixture of Chance and Free Will; and what comfort was it to know that in the long run pity and sympathy were bound to prevail?

What we needed was pity and sympathy — even as much as a "wren's egg" — here and now!

It was with a sick hopelessness that I turned from these thoughts and looked over the side of the vessel. What a sight it was! Not so very high above us stretched the roof of our world. It was of a dusky brown colour, and appeared to be composed of the same metallic rock as the ground we had left, ground that now frequently disappeared altogether as wisps of sulphurous smoke crossed and re-crossed it. We were off on a wild-goose chase in any event; a chase in which I confess I took very little interest. What was it to me, any more than to the easy-going System-of-Things, that a truth-loving vivisector should become the bosom-crony of a truth-loving Inquisitor? I felt sure in my own heart that no Welsh Bard, even if he were a re-incarnation of the audacious little man who stirred the Cauldron of Caridwen, could prevent these birds of a feather flocking together; and I felt equally sure that no Welsh Bard, even if he conjured up his friend the enchanter Merlin, could persuade Morwyn to return to the earth while her father remained down here. Oh, what an impasse it all was! But you can imagine in what direction I turned my eyes most often, after watching my sweet girl sink down from her prayers into a heaven-sent sleep of sheer exhaustion. To the stern of our rushing cloud-chariot, I turned them, for I feared, after that murderous summons over the wireless, that any moment I might see the dusky air behind us grow thick with pursuers!

And I began endeavouring to disentangle from all the senseless scientific verbiage with which it was mixed up what that rascally old vivisector had actually hinted that they could do to us if they were so minded. I tried to imagine what would be the issue now, if, like a resolute mutineer, I started to fling our four ghostly companions overboard?

I hadn't seen any air-sailors on board; not even so much as a pilot, but of course I hadn't explored the whole of the ship. There may have been a deck hidden away full of such patient mariners. But if so I never saw them. The Emperor and the Marquis seemed to do with ease whatever navigation was required on this singular boat.

I think there was a kind of helm; but it was evidently not one at which it was necessary to stand all the while. I suppose it could be fixed in a certain position and then just left.

Black Peter was now lying at our feet with his legs stretched out and his back paws upwards; a position which normally gave me a feeling of peculiar security. Just now, however, I felt so jumpy and uneasy that this irresponsible doggish calm seemed a mockery.

"That's right, fool!" I muttered to him in my vexation. "That's right! Trust to the good, kind System-of-Things. Why, they'll bake your guts by inches inside your living body before that ancient Snail moves the millionth part of an inch towards helping anybody! This cosmos of ours — and Hell's no exception — is run by two goblins — the goblin Free Will and the goblin Chance. They used to worship goblins in the old time; and they were right! Goblins are brisk and lively. A minute is an hour to them, while to the System-of-Things a thousand million years is as one day."

To this reproach Black Peter replied with a faint tremulous shiver of his tail, and once more, while my eyes automatically turned to the quarter of the compass where I expected to see our pursuers, I tried to visualize how a hand-to-hand encounter with these demons would turn out.

As I contemplated the Emperor and our Frenchman at one end of the ship, and Old Predestination and Reflex-Action at the other, I thought to myself, in reality they can do nothing to us and we can do nothing to them! That's the rub. That's the heart of the situation. They're air; or only a trifle more than air. If I took hold of that great purple-swathed brute to throw him overboard, my hands would go through him. When they plunged through his clothes they'd be concealed from me but they wouldn't meet with any resistance; and where he wasn't covered by clothes I should see my hands through him as if through a shadow in water!

No, they can't do anything to us and we can't do anything to them. They can't burn Morwyn or take our Black Peter's brain. But they can be there, and be there too in such overpowering numbers that everything we looked at would have to be looked at through the body of a Shade! What a fate that would be! As a matter of fact it would drive a person mad. And I must remember that it would be with the intention of driving us mad that these sadistic scientists and theologians would crowd round us.

It would be a religious festival to some and a biological experiment to others; but a sadistic ecstasy to all. They would take notes of our contortions at every stage of the process. I don't suppose it would draw the most cruel of all from their beloved Screens, but it would draw a great many. Besides, Hell would then, for the first time in its history, possess an experimental laboratory entirely of its own; and we should be the squirming exhibits in it.

Such were my thoughts as I kept craning my neck round — for we were seated you must remember, amidships, with the old men at the stern and the other two at the bow, and we ourselves facing ahead — full of dreadful anxiety as to what I might see behind us. How beautiful Morwyn looked as she slept! And though every now and then, Black Peter would utter a low whine in his sleep, he too slept soundly, and looked so natural and peaceful in the way he was lying that when I kept my eyes on him it was hard to believe the appalling nature of our predicament.

I know I am not naturally brave, but you must admit that there was something so shocking in the present state of affairs, something at once so horrible and so uncanny, that you'd have had to have been a pretty tough customer to endure it with equanimity. I have often thought all the same that if we could practise assiduously enough the art of taking everything that happens to us from the artistic point of view, we could grow much more hard and callous than we are at present. It was with this in mind that I struggled frantically to thrust the idea of ghostly pursuers out of my head and to enjoy the unique experience of this voyage. You must bear in mind that the whole scope of Hell, as we flew along under its adamantine roof, was silent with what on earth we would call "the silence of the grave." It was this silence that made my consciousness of Black Peter's distress so vivid. It was a weird thing to be whirling through this vast hollow continent where the only sound was the whining in its sleep of a little dog!

If I could have got out of my mind the hideous possibility of what might prove our end as it will be recorded in the horror-diary of the System-of-Things, I might have derived much artistic pleasure from what I saw as I stared forward. That screwing my neck round to glance astern was a very different thing; but forward the spectacle really was impressive. I could of course see clear through the bare heads of both Roman and Frenchman, and indeed clear through the bare legs of the former, who seemed anxious to display his plump figure as much as possible to his admiring friend; and I can assure you there was something curiously and weirdly beautiful in thus watching the subtle changes in the infinite gulfs of luminous twilight as they were perceived through the shadowy heads of these two lost souls! The Emperor — either to enjoy the feel of the air upon his insubstantial flesh, or to excite to still further raptures the admiration of the Frenchman, presently unfolded his purple toga from his effeminate torso, exposing its obese curves without the least shame to the hollow vault through which we were voyaging. The purple folds thus thrust aside from the imperial breast, though of course insubstantial as all the rest in the matter of touch, were opaque in the matter of transparency. You could see through the flesh of Claudius Domitius but you couldn't see through his clothes!

But lying on his knees, after the wretch had removed them from his great transparent chest, whose capaciousness as I saw it before me in the eternal greenish-grey twilight, made me think of the Hebraic metaphor, "the bosom of Abraham," they looked, these sumptuous purple folds, like fallen curtains above which — clear through the now quite visible heart of this evil spirit — I could see the wondrous gulfs of air into which we were sailing! I was gazing with a certain grim and sombre interest, in spite of my anxiety, at

Hell's landscape, as it presented itself through the bosom of Nero, when I noticed a sudden and startling change begin to take place both in the appearance of the roof above us and of the ground beneath us. In fact both of these objects, upon which I had been keeping a pretty steady eye since we mounted into the air, simultaneously disappeared. The ground beneath us opened into an unfathomable gulf downwards, and the roof above us opened into an unfathomable gulf upwards. We were now travelling — save for the rare appearance of vessels like ours, and these I was thankful to note passed our bows diagonally, and thus obviously were not pursuers — through a complete void, a void that was literally, so it seemed, the "illimitable inane." The mental effect of this was anything but reassuring. After all, we had been dropped through the roof into this appalling country; and as long as the roof was there we might dally with the idea of getting back through it. And we had proved that it was possible to walk for twelve hours along the floor of this land. But to be whirled through a Hell-Gulf that had neither roof nor floor was a condition of affairs that wrought upon me like desperation. I am easily made dizzy by heights; and the thought of having a bottomless hole below me, as well as a bottomless hole — if one can speak in that manner — above me, gave me a sensation of psychic vertigo that was hardly bearable. I tried to remember words in the Psalms about flying to the "uttermost parts of the earth," and the Lord being "there also," but I couldn't get them straight!

In fact I couldn't feel sure whether the Lord "was there also" with a friendly intention or with the reverse.

I clasped my hands fiercely together, and watching the quiet breathing of Morwyn I made a super-human attempt to be a real philosopher, capable of facing the crisis when it came. I said to myself, "Death must, in any case, come for us all three sooner or later; and few people die without going through something. Well! vie may have to go through something; but in the end we shall be dead and out of it all! Stone dead shall we be; dead as all the millions upon millions born since the world began."

In making this philosophical attempt to gather myself together and be ready for the worst, I tried to realize my situation in the cold, merciless, white light of stark acceptance. I said to myself, "Here am I, an unknown human entity, but with a miraculous living body and with a mind that can travel through unbelievable gulfs of space and time. I've got with me two of the only three beings in the world that are part of myself" — you see I didn't forget you, my airy offspring, at this supreme moment— "and though we are lost in Hell and though we are in danger of being hunted to death by the Damned, I know this for certain, that the whole material cosmos is but a small part of the Reality of Life and that we all three — Morwyn, Black Peter and I — have something in us that's indestructible, something that belongs to a reality outside the astronomical universe, something that can still defy and resist, even though multitudes upon multitudes of these terrible spirits, whose consciousness has become a flaming, devouring Worm of undying cruelty, rise up upon us and do us to death with disgust and loathing!"

And I said to myself, "I can shoot forth my mind, without its leaving my body, until in pure empty nothingness it sees the astronomical world like a speck of dust, and in that speck a smaller speck which is the earth, and in the centre of that speck an infinitesimal pin-prick of hollowness, which is the Hell where we now are!"

At that moment almost simultaneously, Morwyn stretched out one of her thin girlish arms with a convulsive gesture of mental agitation, and Black Peter uttered a pitiful moan: and it came over me that as long as I was committed to these two, as I so deeply was, every mental attitude I assumed had to include them and take account of them.

But now a new distraction tore me from these desperate thoughts and brought fresh bewilderment and fresh alarm. I suddenly became aware that Black Peter's head was up and his nostrils twitching violently. That was the first sign I had. But very soon I could see Morwyn shifting uneasily as if something were bothering her, something that, though it didn't actually wake her, drew her mind up to the last delicatest ledge below the level of waking consciousness. And then I became aware of the most horrible smell I have known in my life proceeding from the gulfs beneath us.

I became aware, too, of a lively movement among our fellow-voyagers. The two old men at the stern came hurrying past us, hastening to join the others at the prow, all gabbling and bickering in the voiceless language of the Abyss. Their excitement soon awakened Morwyn and I feel sure she started up with one of those bewildered screams that children give when disturbed from deep sleep. And how pitiful it was to mark that this childish cry — the cry of living humanity in a madhouse of phantoms — was audible only as the faintest squeak of a mouse!

Quite different was the long-drawn howl set up by Black Peter. This sounded really shocking in the dead silence; and it was not made less so by the fact that the smell that was the cause of our agitation grew in intensity as our ship proceeded.

All four men were now talking together in the bows; and I was amused to notice how shamelessly terrified the plump Emperor showed himself. He kept twisting his purple toga round his portentous waist, and as he stared anxiously into the faces of his advisers with an expression that struggled to be frivolous but was really terror-sick, I was reminded absurdly enough of a Purple Emperor Butterfly I caught once, gorged with carrion.

Meanwhile Morwyn and I, with Black Peter at our heels, moved to the edge of the ship and gazed down into that misty void.

“There’s a Pit above us too,” I whispered to her. “We’re between the two Nether Gulfs of the Universe! We’re at the bottom of the one, and at the top of the other.”

The Theologian and the Vivisector were evidently less taken aback by the unspeakable smell which was now rising from the bottom of the world than were the Roman and the Frenchman. De Sade came over to us and explained with a great deal of self-depreciating mock levity that he had a curious dislike, inherited I think he said, from his father, of bad smells. “They don’t so much make me physically sick,” he elaborately indicated, while through every inch of his person that was not concealed by clothes I could see his nasty-looking nerves whirling up and down like medieval tumblers, “not so much physically sick, my good sir, as spiritually upset, and they make me furiously angry. Some of the worst things I’ve ever done were done on occasions when my sensitive nostrils were offended by a villainous stench. I was just telling the Emperor that if this smell has any origin that we people down here can deal with without using force, no punishment would be too—”

He was interrupted by a rush to his side of the three other spirits; and an instinctive huddling together of the four of them took place. I have never seen, except in one of those disgusting tins of live bait that boys sometimes carry when they go fishing, anything quite so repulsive as the way the forms and shapes of these four insubstantial Beings overlapped and interpenetrated one another as they huddled together there.

Evidently what the damned fear most in Hell is a spiritual visitor from a higher Dimension. This much of their accurst psychology I certainly learnt as, with Black Peter under my left arm and Morwyn’s dear fingers clutched tight in my right hand, I watched these cruel sons of perdition experiencing down here what their victims must so often have felt in life.

But the girl suddenly snatched her hand away and pointed hysterically over the ship's edge. And there, coming up towards us from out of the Abyss, was — and neither of us had the least doubt of it from the first moment we saw him — the very Personage whom we had come so far to seek!

Never have I seen so formidable a figure. Never have I seen so noble, so majestic a face! He was steering a little air-skiff of his own, and it seemed to me as if that small boat of his — and a life-boat indeed it was to us I — were actually riding on the crest of that filthy stench as it mounted through the air.

Out of that odious smell came this calm heroic figure, all that was most loathsome in the world seeming to give birth to all that was most god-like!

The two impressions came simultaneously. The smell was such as might have proceeded from millions of tons of decomposing fish down there at the bottom of that gulf; while the features of the mysterious Person that were now uplifted to greet us seemed illuminated by a mystic, phosphorescent glory.

The stench that bore him up in his little air-boat seemed to me in that tremendous moment to take a reflected gleam from his illuminated face. It seemed to grow palpable, as if with the leprous whiteness of millions upon millions of fish-scales, scales that might have been shed like a glittering scurf from the body of the great world-snake of the old Norse legends.

Yes, it was undoubtedly the man we sought, that mysterious spirit of the enigmatic Taliesin, who alone of all the myriad hosts of the dead moved for his own inexplicable reasons from one realm to another of the afterlife. Had he really been seeking his fellow-countryman, the lost magician, "at the bottom of the monstrous world"? It seemed to me judging from the indescribable nature of that smell, that it would have been more easy to lay hands upon some antediluvian survivor of the Jurassic Age marooned down there, than upon any enchanter, dead or alive.

But I had no time for speculation. Like our insubstantial companions, Morwyn and I stood spell-bound by this startling apparition, who now proceeded quite coolly to attach his little cloud-skiff to the stern of our big one, and to step quietly on board. He was a tall, personable figure, dressed more in the manner of some old Homeric Soothsayer than of a medieval minstrel; but to tell you the truth I hardly looked at his dress when he came towards us, for he had one of the most extraordinary faces I have ever seen. It was a face whose lineaments seemed to fluctuate and waver as he spoke. Like the other phantoms his flesh was transparent, and, as with them, you could see what the poet calls "the very pulse of the machine," but where he differed completely from the other Shades was in regard to the nature of the nervous system thus exposed wherever his skin was uncovered. His nerves were absolutely calm and still! O my dear child, I cannot describe to you the relief it was to all three of us living creatures to encounter such a person. I could see Black Peter felt just the same; for I had to pull him back from jumping up in the most happy manner against this stranger. He did once, before I could stop him, lay his paws upon the man; and the fact that they went through his airy substance as if it had been water did not deter him from trying to repeat this demonstration. He wagged his tail too, which I can assure you I hadn't often seen him do down here!

And even when the old Bard actually stooped down, and began whispering to him in the way they did down here, the spectacle was a pleasant rather than an unpleasant sight, and the thrill it gave to Black Peter was overwhelming.

Our visitor was enchanted with Morwyn at first sight. I could clearly see that! But to watch a Shadow addressing her with his nerves under complete control was such a wondrous comfort that I would have been ashamed to let myself feel jealous.

Morwyn and he fell at once into a quite intimate conversation; while all Black Peter and I could do — for such volubility in this country's silent language was totally beyond us — was to gaze upon them both with sympathetic awe. But you can believe that while Morwyn conversed with our new friend, and it was a wonderful reassurance just to contemplate his old white garments, faded and threadbare, after the sinister purple on the Emperor's plump body and all that Louis Seize finery of the Frenchman, I didn't fail to cast several sly glances in the direction of our ghostly companions.

Aye! but how frightened they were of Taliesin! They remained huddled up, all four of them, in that interlapping and interlocking confusion that was so unpleasant to see, and I noted that they were too panic-stricken even to look in our direction. They resembled a number of eels, some of them with black skins and some of them with brilliant-coloured skins, twisting and twining together in a terrified effort not to be observed by some great white-feathered fish-eating heron.

I didn't dare to interrupt the stranger's colloquy with Morwyn; and even if I had, I would have shrunk from trying to whisper to so dignified a Shade in the humiliating fashion of the place.

So I just waited till they should pause, and contented myself with restraining Black Peter from any further protestations. But while I was waiting I became aware that our cloud-vessel, incommoded no doubt by the weight of the visitor's skiff at her stern, and entirely neglected by her imperial owner, was acting in a manner that I felt was unusual and for all I knew, might be extremely dangerous.

She was in fact beginning to descend, and not only to descend, but to list to one side in a way that was decidedly alarming. In the course of these erratic movements she swung so far round that without turning my head I found myself facing the direction from which we had come. I knew this to be the case by the position of certain stationary smoke-clouds, whose shape I had noted, for indeed they resembled both the "whale" and the "weasel" referred to so caustically by Hamlet.

But — Heaven save us — what a sight I now beheld. That vicious "wireless" issued by that pair of bigoted old men, had indeed met with a terrifying response! I suppose the thought of sacrificing a living woman to the questionable "Truth" of the past, combined with the thought of torturing a living dog for the equally questionable "Truth" of the future, was irresistible! It must have excited to a fever-pitch just that particular mixture of evil emotion in them, that, under the indulgence of the System-of-Things, with its prejudice in favour of Free Will, had been the primal cause of the creation of Hell. And now they were coming here by the millions. Yes, and as the Bible says, "all Hell was moved at their coming."

A live woman to be tortured as a heretic — for no doubt both Torquemada and Calvin would view Morwyn's simple idealism as fatal to Salvation — and a living dog out of whose sufferings might be squeezed exquisite drops of dubious knowledge, these were attractions enough to despoil all the television-screens of Hell. "He-souls, she-souls, and shoals of souls," as the Dublin writer says, they were all pouring after us, in every cloud-vessel and air-wherry, and wind-skiff, that the fumes of the Abyss could carry. There wasn't a second to be lost. It was madness to be any longer scrupulous about interrupting those two. We were lucky in the fact that the four devils on our ship were too busy hiding their heads from the Welshman to notice how successful their appeal had been. The immediate danger, in my ignorance of such things, seemed that our whole ship might capsize. And then, what a fate! To fall down into that bottomless pit which was even now yawning below us and out of which came this infernal stench; and to know that these millions upon millions of maniacs of cruelty would be gloating over our unspeakable end — oh, I can tell you I had need at that moment of every scrap of philosophy I've raked together in my fifty odd years.

But I expect you'll be surprised — as indeed I was myself — that with this absurd ship of ours steadily sinking, and the fumes from that pit, like the reek of a thousand dead leviathans, steadily growing thicker, and that accurst armada of pursuers "warping," as Milton says, "upon the wind," I still hesitated to interrupt those two!

I suppose it was the extraordinary dignity of that old man in his threadbare bardic dress. No wonder those cruel devils had to hide their heads! There was something about that old man, phantom though he was, that made a person lose his assurance. But I hazarded the plunge, and speaking — in their silent language — louder than I need have done, for this telepathic speech has many degrees of psychic intensity, I burst in upon them with my alarming news — that the whole of Hell was after us, and that our vessel was rapidly sinking!

The force of my interruption was so great that it broke up that group of panic-stricken wretches, and the two friends, the religious bigot of Predestination and the scientific bigot of Determinism, hurried past us to where their wireless was, and began chattering into the air in alternate volubility like a pair of savage chimpanzees.

The old Welshman bowed politely to Morwyn, and lent a grave ear to my somewhat incoherent speech. I was still clumsy in the use of their language; but I had come clearly to see the absolute necessity for something of the kind. In fact from beginning to end of my visit to Hell I was struck with the amazing "strides" — as people put it — that Science has made in this underworld. The moral atmosphere of Hell, its power of concentration, its lack of distraction, its indifference to right and wrong, its ghastly fatalism are all conditions that lend themselves to scientific progress.

The mingling too of spiritualistic experiment with biological experiment is so easy and natural down here. Immoral spiritualism falls in most happily with immoral science; both of them feeling at home in Hell and both of them being ardent idolaters of non-moral truth in a world where the System-of-Things is so obstinately bent upon making mere human goodness the test of everything.

And what a triumph of the reconciliation of science and seance was the discovery, helped on no doubt by many learned vivisectors and black magicians, of this silent telepathic speech! Of course the grand difficulty of social intercourse down here from the very start must have been the difference of tongues; and though it takes a certain time for a lost soul to learn this mute language, what it really amounts to is the substitution of one minor difficulty for a great number of insuperable difficulties.

I had already discovered that people come to Hell because it's the only place left where you can enjoy the simple pleasure of pure cruelty uninterrupted by the System-of-Things penchants. No one, but this man I was now addressing, and possibly his enchanter-friend can ever have come to Hell for any other purpose. But as all practisers of cruelty know, whether their sadism is personal or theological or scientific, there is a curious heightening of the pleasure when it is enjoyed in common; and the beauty of this common language is that a Negro-torturer from the United States when once happily down here, can exchange his feelings with a courtier of Nero; while, to the deep comfort and satisfaction of them both, an old Inquisitor can strengthen the nerves of a young vivisector.

The Welshman listened patiently to my disconnected and agitated words which as you may believe were supplemented by frantic gestures in the direction of our pursuers and in the direction of those vicious old rogues who were so busy communicating with them; and when I'd finished I was hardly surprised to observe a brooding frown flicker across his calm features. Could he help us? As I watched him pondering there, this one single spirit of good-will among all these millions, I confess I gravely doubted what he could do. My chief relief lay in the manner in which the purple-swathed owner of our sinking craft was blending his phantom substance in sick terror with that of the Frenchman, who was in vain endeavouring to release himself.

If the ruler of the whole ancient world shivered like that before this solitary old man, wouldn't all that motley riff-raff draw back in even greater terror when they realized who was with us?

While our visitor stood pondering, with sombre eyes fixed on the artistic substance, like congealed cat-ice of a rich blood-colour, whereof our deck was composed, for the Emperor's yacht was of a less natural and simple texture than our previous vessel, I managed to exchange a word or two with Morwyn. "He's our only hope, our only chance," I said distractedly, "but whatever happens to either of us, remember this — Nothing will make me wish that this hadn't been!"

She gave me a long steady look which I have never forgotten. Its precise meaning was obscure to me then, and is so still, for I couldn't read her thoughts; but with one last flash of my old meteoric illumination I saw that she had not ceased to love me, and that was enough. I was ready, as we say, for the event; not heroically ready, but still ready; and I prayed that if these demons did frighten us to death, the girl and dog and I might perish simultaneously.

But a wild trouble came suddenly into Morwyn's face and I knew well what it was. She was thinking of her father! Oh that accurst Mr. —, how I did hate him.

I hated him alive and I hated him dead; though of course I was glad he was dead. But in his dead state he certainly revealed his full disgustingness. It's extraordinary how deceptive the mere fact of being alive makes us! Everything living, everything healthy and sound and natural, blooms like a flower with illusion and pretence! The illusions of life, as Goethe says somewhere, are encouraged by Nature herself, and woe to those who meddle with them! Mercy and Justice are no doubt the most deceptive of all Nature's illusions; but since the System-of-Things has thrown its weight behind them they will prevail. Illusion against the World! That accounted, I said to myself, for the noble calm of this old Welsh Bard, and the panic he created among all these Torturers for the Truth!

To the great Spirit who renews the world a creative Illusion is far more precious than a dead dissected Truth. That is why so many sadistic people become vivisectors. Sadism in its essence is the perversion and sterilization of the life-force. It tortures to death; and then, in its diabolical frenzy, it becomes necrophagous It eats the dead! All the nobler inventions of humanity are the work of the living imagination. Vivisection is the morbid cruelty of those who medicine life with death.

But I am, of course, elaborating too far your father's thoughts, my child, as Morwyn and I turned away from what might have been our last look at each other, to gaze like two terrified children into the insubstantial lineaments of this extraordinary person, the only person in the whole history of the world who has gone in and out of Hell for purely intellectual reasons, but the substance of what I have just set down did flash through my mind.

“Well, Captain; well, little lady,” our friend said at last. “We’ll do what we can. Things do look pretty unpleasant. But there’s always a limit to the cunning of madmen, and that’s what these people all are. Are you prepared to take a great risk, Captain? Your lady says she is if you are.”

I uttered the word “yes” as vigorously as I could; but unfortunately in this atmosphere of the everlasting “No,” and I daresay under the influence of so many great masters of paradox the word “yes” has come to sound like its opposite.

The old Welshman lifted one of his eyebrows and gave me a sharp look. “He means ‘yes,’” threw in Morwyn hastily. “He speaks Leprosid with difficulty.” This was the first time I’d heard the name of their curst language; but I caught at the straw she held out.

“With difficulty, Leprosid,” I echoed feebly. “Yes-no, no-yes. Me with she. She with me.”

The Welshman smiled, and his smile was such a comfort to me at this juncture that I looked away from them both and faced our pursuers.

Oh, but they were getting so near! The whole air, for half the circle of its horizon, was alive with cloud-ships. “Come here — you!” This command, uttered in a voice that sent a cold shiver down my spine, came from the wireless apparatus. I could see the Predestinarian and the Determinist grinning from above the gunwale with goblinish triumph. They were transferring to me a message they had just received; and they were using a loud-speaker.

It was the voice of Mr. —! Morwyn’s face as she listened to it was “a study;” but I believe I actually detected, among other emotions, pleasure to hear the brute's voice! "I'm her father," it went on. "She's my daughter. I've made arrangements to have her with me. I wish to see her here."

"Pick up your dog, Captain," said our Welshman, "and take your girl's hand. Gobaith gwr o ryfel, man's hope's in battle!"

Morwyn, however, wasn't persuaded at the first word, or at the second word either, to do what our protector bade. She had an obstinate and most untimely longing to try to talk to her father over the wireless! I doubt if we could have got her away at all, if, with the gathering about us of this host of demons, Claudius Domitius hadn't grown suddenly bold.

Egged on by the Marquis of Sade he actually dared to approach us; and it was a sight to see the great purple-swathed bully-boy hanging back and lurching forward in alternate gusts of fear and desire. His very hands, I could clearly see, would have been burning hot to the touch, for all their transparency, so intense was the erotic emotion that impelled his advance.

Our protector's attention was occupied just then with unfastening his boat; and taking advantage of this these two cowardly wretches came near frightening my girl in a manner upon which I dare not even now allow my mind to dwell. What made it so particularly unpleasant for us was that the torturer of Servetus had his little glowing persecutor's eyes fixed on Morwyn, from whose mortal frame he must have felt a ravishing desire to expel heresy.

As for his friend, the famous vivisector, his eyes, I need hardly tell you, fastened themselves so covetously on Black Peter that I could feel the poor beast, as I pressed him against my side, shivering from head to foot.

"Father, forgive me!" cried Morwyn; and I knew from that that she was at last prepared to go.

But it was now too late. Our rudderless vessel gave such a lurch at that moment that the Welshman's little skiff, in which he was standing beckoning to us to descend, broke away; and to our horror as we leant over the side, we saw it sink down; while, relieved of its weight, the vessel that carried us rose into the air with a violent jerk. The foremost of our pursuers were now so close that we could see their decks crowded thick with maniacal spirits; and there was no doubt from what I could see of those obsessed faces that our fate was upon us. A lingering death — by terror in place of instruments — was what they had come to enjoy; and it was evident they anticipated some delicate additions to scientific knowledge and some exquisite confirmations of religious "truth" before they had done with us.

Our accurst vessel kept lurching from side to side as it slowly rose. Many of our pursuers were now alongside of us, and we could see their eager forms clinging to the taffrails of their ships, like huddled flocks of evil birds.

Desperately we leaned over the side and peered down into the gulf, hoping against hope that our protector would manage to right his small wherry and ascend again. We could just discern him, through the everlasting twilight, working at the tackle of his boat; but he was still sinking, not rising, and he was evidently too busy even to glance up at us.

By this time one of the pursuing vessels was side by side with our own, and presently a horde of excited phantoms boarded her and began crowding round us. All was lost. We were completely hemmed in. On one side of us were old Predestination and old Determinism; on the other the Roman and the Frenchman.

It was the Frenchman who inaugurated the proceedings that were to be the beginning of our end; but of course, since our tormentors were what they were, the longer our inquisition lasted the more knowledge would be added to the archives of Hell.

"Put the Catechism to them, Professor!" cried the crafty Marquis; and without a moment's delay the croaking voice of the famous Vivisector began as follows.

"Is there any who can protect the helpless?" And at once, in that silent Leprosid that made the effect more horrible, for it rose like an eager miasma from a thousand perverted hearts, came the reply:

"There is none who can protect the helpless!"

Then again the Vivisector chanted:

"What are above Pity and Mercy?"

And the answer came in a ghastly universal howl from that gibbering crowd:

"God and the Truth are above Pity and Mercy!"

And, while the infernal catechism rose and fell, the crowd about us grew so thick that it blotted out the whole air. All we could see were multitudes of excited faces, of every race, nation, and age, their maddened nerves jigging under their transparent skins with frantic emotion.

"What must we give heretics for the sake of God?"

"Torture!"

"What must we give animals for the sake of Truth?"

"Torture!"

All this while I was searching the faces of the lost souls who were nearest to us in a despairing hope that I might detect in one or two among them some sign of softening. I was still holding Black Peter under my arm and I was still clutching Morwyn's hand, and we were all three huddling together against the vessel's side. I could clearly see the nature of the vivisection to which they proposed to subject us and it was one that would certainly, in its terror and shame, have killed Morwyn sooner than they hoped. They proposed to pass, in a long interminable procession, through our living bodies, as of course it was easy enough for them to do, and by reason of the verisimilitude of substantiality which they possessed, the shock of it, particularly to Morwyn and Black Peter would have been unendurable. I might myself have clenched my teeth and endured the horror of it, but to Morwyn —

As I watched those nearest to us, and among them were the four in whose company we had been voyaging, I thought I did, quite distinctly, see some faint signs of compunction in the faces of the Roman and the Frenchman. They, of course, as I had now come to understand, were just personal sadists who tortured from pure pleasure. But in the countenances of the Theologian and the Vivisector I saw a pitiless hardness, against which it was clearly useless to struggle. These two felt so absolutely certain that their wickedness had behind it "God" and "the Truth" that they would have willingly spent months in doing Morwyn and Black Peter to death in the manner at which I have hinted. They had no drop of human pity left in them!

I could feel Morwyn's fingers begin to grow cold, as these Lemurs pressed in upon us, and as for Black Peter, his whole body was shivering. I was at my wits' end. Morwyn, I know, was praying desperately to the God of her fathers; and, after his fashion — as no doubt millions of animals were doing at that moment in Research Laboratories — Black Peter was praying to some Power in Earth or Heaven more pitiful than man.

And then it came over me that sooner than endure the devilry of these phantoms the best thing we could do would be to throw ourselves overboard. The last time I had looked over the side, there were no cloud-ships beneath us. There was nothing beneath us, but the fathomless gulf of the Abyss, out of which rose this unspeakable smell that filled the air.

But we should be dead — all three of us — dead and safe from all these horrors, long before we knew where our bodies would lie! And our souls? Well! None of u*s* were heretic-burners or vivisectors. Morwyn and Black Peter were innocent of all vice; and my own vice — and you can believe I had noted that with some interest — was apparently un-represented in Hell.

I daren't reveal my decision to the girl in their curst Leprosid — How could I make her know? How could we say a word to each other before we plunged to our death? So far — and I put it down to the lingering irradiation of our wits by the magnetism of that falling meteor — we had been wonderfully preserved from any supernatural fear of these phantoms. But my instinct told me that this preservation was rapidly drawing to an end. If we didn't plunge to a natural death in a second or two, our death would be an appalling one; at least Morwyn's and Black Peter's would; and though I managed, because of my tougher nature, to survive, what should I feel, lost in this place, along with the bodies of the only creatures in the world except yourself for whom I have —

But I must tell you what actually happened. We were — as I say — facing our persecutors; not conveniently bound to the stake, or to the torture-table, as they would doubtless have preferred, and not without a vague hope that the Marquis or the Emperor, since they had no ideal interest in our contortions and squirmings, might relapse into common human pity, when I became aware that Black Peter had suddenly twisted round under my arm and was violently sniffing and panting.

My heart almost stopped with a spasm of wild hope. I knew Black Peter so well that I felt sure that this sudden exhilaration of his, for he always panted in this way when he was welcoming someone or something he liked, could mean only one thing; that our old Welshman had got his boat under control and was near at hand! If I hesitated to go through the grotesque and ignominious process of whispering when all I had to communicate was my decision to plunge to our death, I didn't hesitate now. To the girl's complete astonishment, and I think she feared for a second that I had gone mad and wanted to embrace her in the presence of all Hell, I flagrantly pressed myself against her, squeezing Black Peter recklessly in the process, and with my free arm about her body, tapped out upon her back, using my fist exactly as a one-handed typist might use a typewriter, the incredible news that our preserver was at hand!

Then I drew back, and we both swung round towards the side of the ship. Our retreat was a sign for a general advance of the whole crew. "Thick as autumnal leaves," they swept down upon us — only to see us scrambling over the side of their damned vessel and tumbling, safe and sound, into the little cloud-skiff of our Bardic friend! There was no further attempt to interfere with us when once we were snugly ensconced at the bottom of that celestial life-boat.

The old Welshman of a thousand incarnations apparently must have excited in them exactly the same shiver of supernatural terror that they themselves had now begun to excite in us. There weren't many vessels below the keel of the imperial yacht, and those that were there when we boarded the little boat scattered in all directions like a flock of sparrows before a hawk!

It was from a different quarter that danger was menacing us now; and it considerably spoilt both the sweetness of our relief and the expression of our gratitude to find that our astonishing old gentleman was having a most crucial struggle to get his craft under control.

Now that I saw his difficulties with it, I realized the stupendous effort it must have cost him to mount up to our rescue after his wherry had once sunk down. Down it was going again now — a fool could see that — and at a most disconcerting speed.

The old man, beyond a grim smile when we first appeared, had no time to concern himself with us; and as I watched his desperate struggles to cope with the problems of aerial navigation I couldn't help thinking how queer it was that the transparent bodies of the souls who survived death should not be able to disregard completely the laws of gravitation and just float about where they pleased. Such, I know, is a great many people's naïve and unthinking view of the state of things after death; but now that I saw how matters really were I realized how ridiculous it was to expect any creature, however ethereal, living within the categories of Space and Time, to be able to disregard these familiar limitations. I mentally resolved to inquire of the old man later — if we three luckless ones were to have any "later" — what would happen if one of these spirits fell from a great physical height? According to ancient mythology Satan himself and his followers fell from the greatest of all conceivable physical heights and yet after a period of bewildered unconsciousness picked themselves up intact. But those were angels — rebellious angels it is true, but still angels — and had the advantage of bird-like wings; whereas we have no authority in Homer, or Virgil, or Dante, or Milton, or even John Bunyan, for endowing the souls of the damned with wings, and my personal experience coincides completely with the inspired clairvoyance of these sages.

As we lay huddled at the bottom of the Welshman's boat my thoughts took a far flight. I said to myself: "It's clear that Hell possesses, as the medieval cosmographers taught, a definite geographical location, and it's clear too that the souls of our dead who have made a cult of the pleasures of Hell, being automatically drawn, as the scripture so well puts it, 'to their own place,' find here their natural home. But though Hell," so I concluded in my pensive audacity, "is circumscribed by time and space and by the laws of this stellar universe, there are plenty of other invisible regions, many of them completely outside the whole astronomical world, that remain available for such as have sought to adapt their human nature to the System-of-Things's slow-moving prejudices, and there, very likely, the laws of space no longer hold good."

I had such confidence in our aged pilot, and so I think had Morwyn, and I know Black Peter had, that it was a considerable shock to me when he suddenly approached us and, wetting the tip of his longest finger at his lips and making a mystic sign in the air, told us in Leprosid that there was nothing for it but to let the boat sink.

"Where shall we land?" I inquired while Morwyn stared at him with troubled eyes.

He shook his head and made a motion that I should follow him to the stern of his air-schooner.

"The fact is," he whispered to me, and I can tell you it was a queer experience to feel, and yet not feel, his ghostly fists beating a tattoo on my back, "I don't know if we shall ever land at all! Some authorities from Africa — whence I have reason to believe the deepest human wisdom proceeds — hold the view that the great river Oceanus flows at the bottom of the gulf we are approaching. If this is the case — for the Oceanus is a circular river without source or outlet — it is possible that my little boat will be carried round and round within the interior of the earth, without pause or relief, until the end of the world."

Black Peter, who invariably followed me every step I took, now rose on his hind legs and laid his paws upon the old man, gazing up into his face with so much gravity that the Welshman could not help smiling.

“He knows what I’m saying,” he remarked to me in Leprosid. “Well! You’d better prepare your lady for the worst; though I wouldn’t mention the Cimmerian river! Tell her we’re sinking into regions beyond my experience; but tell her I’ll do the best I can.”

As I returned to my place I heard him muttering to himself what I fancy was a Leprosid rendering of the praise of “Branwen ferch Llyr” in the second “branch” of the Mabinogi, “tecaf morwyn yn y byd oedd hi — the most beautiful maid in the world was she.”

I was glad enough for practical reasons to catch this unconscious revelation of our bard’s admiration for my girl. If he felt like that in his old phantom heart, it was clear that nothing would induce him to desert us! At the same time I didn’t attempt to conceal from myself as I hugged her close in the bows of that sinking boat, that I did wish it were possible for a young woman to receive a famous poet’s admiration without so much as a butterfly-wing’s flutter of emotional reciprocity!

But our rescuer had evidently all he could do at present to keep his overloaded craft on an even keel, as it sank down to God knows what abysmal landing.

And Morwyn and I had all we could do to keep from being overpowered by a ghastly dizziness that was now overtaking us. Faster and faster the boat sank, and so much time passed that I began to wonder what would happen if we reached the magnetic centre of the earth? Would there arrive some staggering revolution, some palpable reversal of “up” and “down,” after which, according to the laws of gravitation, we should find ourselves ascending in place of descending? How clearly I can remember every detail of that plummet-like fall into the bottomless pit!

The very struggle against that ghastly dizziness soon began to narrow down my perceptions to the essential and the ultimate. The stench from below grew worse and worse all the while. It was as if we were descending into the Morgue of the Universe! We were falling too fast and the gulf was too wide for anything to be visible save the usual cold grey artificial twilight — the accursed everlasting twilight, "eterna, maledetta, fredda, e grave," — that was Hell's substitute for our familiar alternation of day and night; but I knew that we must long since have left the level of the plain, and I drew back with a shudder from the thought of the sickening vertigo we would necessarily have felt had we approached in our recent march over the volcanics and the edge of this indescribable pit!

Had that Frenchman intended all the time to lure us to the verge of this Bottom of the World, to describe which, let me assure you, my good child, isn't for a tongue "che chiami mamma e babbo?" It is well within the bounds of probability that this is precisely what the rogue had in his mind, ever since he drugged us into that stupid beatitude with his vile Tiberian brew!

But now I must reveal to you a queer thing. One would have supposed that beyond my desperate clinging to Morwyn the dizzy tension of our descent would have totally killed all more earthly feelings — but not at all! Whether it was due to some demogorgonic aphrodisiac, diffused through the abysmal fumes I was inhaling, or whether I was thrown into some primordial mood of erotic recklessness as happens sometimes among people condemned to death, I cannot tell, but the fact remains that it was certainly, as the Prayer-Book says, "with my body" that I "worshipped" this sweet girl, as the fetid wind from the gulf beneath us blew back her hair and whistled through her dress!

I shall never, after this adventure, feel the least doubt about the truth of the story that it was the Welsh prince Madoc who discovered America long before the Norseman or the Genovese. I would never have believed that a

Bard, or a Prophet, or a mystical Teacher, could possess such a firm hand in sailing an air-ship as this extraordinary old man revealed as we went down.

He actually managed at last to lessen very materially the speed of our descent, which was an enormous comfort to both of us, and indeed removed once and for all the danger of either of us being physically sick. But in doing this he steered the boat almost within arm’s reach of the side of the pit, a move that was considerably agitating to his passengers, for it necessitated the bringing upon the scene of a gigantic pole, with which as our descent became slower, the old man kept prodding the wall of the gulf, and each time he did so Morwyn would utter an inaudible feminine cry, for there did seem an emphatic danger of his being jerked overboard.

But I could see what a proud delight he took in being once more captain of his ship and master of our destiny. He even began to murmur some fantastical Welsh ditty, using the mute Leprosid language but throwing into it all the elfin wantonness of his own ancient tongue. With his voice in my ears I found myself gazing with an almost luxurious passivity at the smooth slabs of volcanic stone that composed the side of the shaft. They showed themselves in that livid Hell-light, which resembled a diffused electric radiation seen through water, to be of many various tints; but their predominant colour was a metallic steel-blue, whose cold gleam, sometimes almost phosphorescent, was accentuated by the artificial quality of the twilight.

Both Black Peter and Morwyn were now happily and peacefully asleep, and I am inclined to believe that I should have been soon in the same condition, for I had begun to feel as if we might sink down like this forever, when my wits returned to me in a startled awareness that our pilot was staring upwards with an expression of intense and troubled consternation.

I had come to know his facial expressions pretty well by this time; and even when he spoke of the possibility that our descent might end in that fatal Homeric river, I didn't catch upon his countenance such an expression of concern as I detected there now. Some new menace of an unlooked — for and most alarming character was clearly imminent. I took the liberty of hurrying to his side and following his gaze. I could, of course, discern but dimly and ignorantly what he had seen with devastating clearness; but I could see enough to realize that the pursuit had begun again. Some fast-sailing craft — I could make out its general outlines though the thing was still many miles above our head — was boldly following us into the bottomless pit!

Our protector hurriedly returned to his steering-gear and our speed began rapidly to increase; but although I had already found out how much he hated to be questioned when busy with the problems of navigation, this was not a moment for scruple or hesitation, and I followed him to the stern of the boat and asked him point-blank what vessel it was that was following us. I found him very crusty and laconic; and though I plied him with questions his replies were like those of Panurge's semi-quaver friar.

"We are being pursued then?"

"You saw."

"Is there any danger?"

"A great deal."

"What kind of danger?"

"You'll see."

"Whose ship is it?"

"Nobody's."

"Has it ever been anybody's?"

"Yes."

“Please tell me whose?”

“Fu-Hsi’s.”

“Was he a Chinese king?”

“The first.”

“Where is King Fu-Hsi now?”

“What’s the name of his ship?”

“The Yin-Yang.”

“And some of these devils have stolen the Yin-Yang in Fu-Hsi’s absence?”

“Yes.”

“Do you know who they are?”

“Yes.”

“Who are they?”

But the Welshman was silent.

“O greatest of all the Bards of Ynys-y-Kedeirn,” I implored, throwing into my imperfect Leprosid the most moving propitiation I could conjure up. “If not for my sake, at least for Morwyn’s sake, tell me who these ship-stealers are?”

The old man jerked me towards him and rubbing his lean belly against mine and thumping on my buttocks with his clenched fist admitted he had caught a glimpse of the rascals. And the thieves who had stolen the Yin-Yang in Fu-Hsi’s absence were none other than Mr. — and his Inquisition crony!

“May I tell Morwyn?” I inquired as soon as he released me; and I shall never forget the look of unfathomable contempt with which he replied.

I returned to my girl’s side; and though I awakened her as gently as I could, I confess it was impossible for me not to reveal to her that we were being pursued by the most formidable air-ship in Hell under the pilotage of the Grand Inquisitor and her deceased parent. It was all very well for an ancient Welsh Bard to bear so much responsibility and to steer our common fate in resolute silence. I simply wasn’t made for such heroism. Besides, who knows what unexpected resources a crisis like this might reveal in a feminine mind? In plain words it presented itself to me as simply ridiculous to keep Morwyn in the dark just at the very moment when we were in most need of her presence of mind! I must admit, however, that our old Bard had reason enough for warning me. I am, and I know it well, far too quick at blurting out things to women. I tend to forget, not only that our strongest weapon against them is silence; but that our wisest moves in their own protection are made in silence. Lie to them and they’re almost sure to squeeze the truth out of you. Once let them read your silence in your face and they’ll get your secret, be it buried never so deep! But conceal the fact that you’re concealing anything; and in that way, and in that alone, you — and very often themselves too — will be safe from danger.

Little do we know the hearts of women! When we’re involved with them in moments of the most tragic import they will absolutely astonish us by their reactions.

No sooner had I revealed to Morwyn what our Pilot had discovered — and I remember his curious boast in one of his oracular poems that it was from Africa, not Asia, that he drew his mystical science — than she leapt up from her place, causing Black Peter to bark vehemently, and rushing to the old man began imploring him to wait for her father.

I shall never forget how the sound of Black Peter’s barking echoed and reverberated in that gleaming twilit shaft.

Our pursuers on the deck of the Yin-Yang must have heard it clearly and no doubt attributed it to its true cause; namely the agitation excited among us by their appearance.

"Certainly, certainly!" I heard the old man reply in Leprosid, and I can now see the besotted smile, for he was evidently infatuated with her, with which he said it.

As for me I turned cold at such incredible folly! Didn't the old idiot realize — didn't "all the sciences of Africa and Europe" reveal to him — that Mr. — and his atrocious ally came as enemies, not as friends?

"Certainly, certainly," he kept repeating from his position in the stern, where he was frantically busy with his sailing-gear.

I sat down by the girl with an indignant sigh, prepared at any moment for the boat to cease her descent; and it was hard for me, and clearly impossible for Black Peter, who by the aid of an instinct older that "all the sciences of Europe and Africa" knew perfectly well what danger we were in, to help giving way to a fit of real anger with this silly girl whose infatuation for the ghost of that cruel wretch was risking all our lives.

The crazy child kept glancing upwards to where we could see the Yin-Yang rapidly descending upon us like a great buzzard upon a wounded lapwing, and before long what must she do but begin frantically waving to two little black specks that now showed themselves at the side of the vessel; specks in which even I with my elderly vision imagined I could discern the detestable triumph of Mr. — and his Spaniard.

But what did this mean? What was happening now? As Morwyn and I kept straining our heads upwards, it began to become evident to me that those two phantom specks at the side of the Yin-Yang were beginning to grow smaller instead of larger! This was followed, in a short while, by the Yin-Yang herself growing obviously smaller; and it began to dawn upon me that instead of constantly diminishing, as it had previously been doing, the distance between us had begun rapidly to increase. I breathed a sigh of intense relief but what could be the cause of this extraordinary phenomenon? It was then, as I gazed anxiously at the expressive features of our old pilot, that the truth of the situation dawned on me. The crafty Welshman had quieted Morwyn's desperation but he had done the direct opposite of what she had begged him to do!

Instead of waiting till the Yin-Yang drew near he had removed every impediment to our descent; and save for the very slightest mechanical control, he was allowing us to sink, by our own gravitational weight, plumb down to whatever lay at the bottom of the shaft.

Having arranged the boat's gear so as to leave only the barest minimum of resistance to her descent, the sagacious Bard, with a portentous cloud on his formidable physiognomy, came hurrying up to us.

"I found it impossible to do what you wished, lady," he said; and I couldn't help noticing that though compelled by the chemical atmosphere as well as by the psychic aura of the place to speak in Leprosid he was struggling to find a synonym for the Welsh word for "lady" and I could see his attempts were in vain. No parallel expression for that strange, beautiful, non-Aryan word, "Arglwyddes," a word that he must often in former incarnations have applied to the great goddess Caridwen, existed in Leprosid.

But Morwyn leapt to her feet and gazed upwards in desperation. No, we were falling like a plummet now, and there was no sign of the Yin-Yang. She was too overcome with disappointment to burst out angrily against our friend, as I greatly feared she might do. She just staggered down into her seat and lay deathly still, hiding her face in her hands. Thus we remained. And I told myself grimly that it might easily be in this precise position that we should be caught by that mysterious reversal, that saltimbanque-trick of gravitation, which must play the devil with all travellers who pass through the "thick rotundity of the world."

Every now and then Black Peter would utter a low frightened moan in his sleep; a moan which was echoed, faint as it was, from both sides of this unfathomable shaft, and echoed too both upwards and downwards. It began to seem to me now, however, that the upward-sounding echo was the one that receded into the greatest distance.

It was becoming to me more and more of a race-outrage, or perhaps I should say of a "genus"-outrage, that while our human speech was rendered mute by the atmosphere of this place, the least sound Black Peter made seemed doubled or trebled in its acoustic power. "But what is that?" I thought. "Is this still only the echo of Black Peter's moaning — grown twenty, thirty, a hundred times louder as it recedes?" For what I heard now, where had been audible only the prolonged reverberation of a little spaniel's moan, was the roar of some antediluvian Zoological Garden, a Zoological Garden of Dinosaurs and Dinotheres.

It was at this point that our pilot suddenly leapt to his feet; and I don't think I have ever seen a human countenance express the kind of impersonal excitement his expressed then; an excitement of pure childish interest in what was going to happen next! "We're near it, we're near it, we're near the bottom!" he cried and rushed to his electric machinery; but I could see that his absorbed ecstasy in this great moment of cosmogonic discovery had made him totally oblivious of us — yes, even of Morwyn. "All's well!" he shouted; and then, "you'd better—" But even as he spoke I was aware of a mass of water beneath us and a deafening, stunning, blinding crash that obliterated everything.

I hadn't time to snatch up Black Peter or to hug Morwyn to my heart; and now, as I consider it all in cold blood, I think it was providential that I didn't have time for these things; for since we fell into deep water and I was myself the only one of us rendered unconscious I might have dragged down and drowned both of my loved ones.

How it happened that neither the girl nor the dog were stunned in the way I was, I cannot to this day understand. It must have been largely due to the miraculous precipitancy with which this surprising old man mitigated our descent at the last and to the manner in which he kept his head and guided the boat till we struck the water.

My first impression when I returned to consciousness was that of extreme heat upon my face and hands. As far as my companions were concerned they seemed, in my dazed state, to be in exactly the same position as when we had been together in the boat, only Morwyn and Black Peter were now leaning over me. As my wits came back I realized that the heat I felt came from a fire of dead wood, round which we were all gathered, and upon which the tall shade of the old Bard was still piling fuel. My clothes were steaming in the warmth of the fire, and I noticed that Morwyn had taken off her jacket and her shoes and stockings and had laid them on the ground to dry.

Confused as I was, I was not too stunned to derive a delicious sense of pleasure from the sight of her bare ankles in the glow of the flames.

Another thing gave me a thrill of delight even greater than her ankles, and that was the unbounded joy that her face expressed on seeing my recovery! "Thank the Lord," I said to myself, "so you can forget your father under certain conditions!"

And if I was touched to the heart by my girl's absorbed concern in my safety, I was hardly less affected by the fuss, as soon as I began to take notice of him, that Black Peter made over me.

Even the old Bard cast a benevolent glance in my direction and this — after our experience with the other Shadows — was a most comforting relief.

I could really have sat up long before I did; but it was so sweet to me to enjoy the girl's entire concentration, and the change from what we had gone through brought with it such a delicious relaxation of mind and body, that I deliberately remained as I was, in spite of the heat of the fire, and gave myself up to that lovely mood of diffused tenderness towards the whole cosmos which often accompanies physical weakness in an atmosphere of sympathy.

But I did sit up at last and even stand up, and as soon as I had done this I completely passed out of my melting mood and contemplated our situation with absorbed amazement. We were on the shore of a vast subterranean sea that stretched away, without limit or interruption, to the furthest horizon. The waters of this extraordinary inland ocean were breaking gently, in long, oily, rolling waves, within a few yards of where I stood.

The shore upon which our fire was burning was composed, as far as I could make out, of one vast mass of dark-green granite; and the colour of the water, although it darkened to sheer black as it receded towards the horizon, was of that metallic blue-black which, if I am not mistaken, is called Indigo, though why this Acherontic ocean should resemble the juice of the plant Indigofera was a mystery to me.

But the more I gazed at what was before me the more absorbed, petrified and completely rapt out of myself I was by what I beheld! I begged Morwyn to hold Black Peter for a minute or two while I retreated a few hundred yards inland to a spot where there appeared to be several granite ledges of a considerable height. Seeing that I was obviously quite myself again she expressed no objection to this, though Black Peter pulled desperately at his leash.

But I didn't want him with me at this particular moment. For one thing I desired to retire out of sight for a natural reason and for another thing I was afraid he would start barking and thus reveal to the crew of the Yin-Yang the fact that we were alive after our fall.

My hope was that this accursed ship had given up the chase as too dangerous; but as I walked away from our fire, I paused to glance up above my head and I fancied I could make out, by a certain patch of lighter greyness in the stone roof, the actual orifice, or tellurian pit-shaft, down which she would have to sink, if Mr. — and his ally were to come at us.

But what a sight met my gaze when I finally turned to take my bearings on the top of a granite-ridge! In my usual manner I kept a close analytical eye on my own feelings at this crisis, and it was really amazing how calmly I took the astounding spectacle presented to me, a spectacle which, you must understand, my good lad, struck with its bewildering shock upon my senses of hearing and smelling, quite as vividly as upon my sense of sight.

For one thing I noticed how nothing in the lurid monstrosity at which I looked affected my intimate feelings as much as the sight of Morwyn's bare legs as she dried her stockings!

"What a mystery it is," I thought, "this maddening, this irresistible attraction of girls' legs!" The truth is, I have always resented the idea that this attraction comes purely from what you, my dear boy, in your modern jargon would call "sex-appeal." I resent equally the notion that the paradisaic fascination to me of youthful feminine limbs comes from their intrinsic loveliness. They're prettily turned enough; but I think, from the point-of-view of pure a*esthetic beauty*, they aren't to be compared with the limbs of boys and young men!

No, my own secret feeling here — though you will doubtless laugh at me — is that the particular kind of charm in the legs of young women is in some mysterious way connected with the deepest mystery of creation and with some especial magic — like the reflection of those wonderful dark moons in a flowing stream due to the flickering motions of water-flies — that runs through nature, and is a symbol, or archetype, hinting at a secret in the universe at present unrevealed! I think this is suggested by the curious attitude, full of an intense furtive, reverential narcissism, with which girls themselves regard their limbs.

However this may be, I have certainly never seen anything more captivating or engaging than the sight of Morwyn drying her stockings by that fire and the red flames throwing into relief the whiteness of her skin.

The black form of Black Peter, as he still struggled against his leash which the girl had twisted round a broken portion of Taliesin’s boat, looked so touchingly little from that distance that I caught myself in a tragic realization of the physical littleness of all living entities among the huge terraqueous forces that toss us forth and draw us back. Rationally I knew then as I do now, that the mind is greater than all these, and that considered relatively and philosophically size is nothing, but when I saw that little black form, among all the enormities I have now to describe to you, straining at his leash with his feathery paws straddling so pathetically on this ultimate floor, it was not easy for me to hold before my consciousness the insignificance of Matter compared with the significance of Mind. If ever Matter cried out in triumph: “I alone am the Conqueror!” it was here, in this navel-pit of the world.

If it hadn’t been for the red flames of that fire and the white gleam of Morwyn’s ankles and the familiar shape of Black Peter struggling against the pull of his leash, I should have been overwhelmed by the terrible sublimity of all that now pressed upon my consciousness. The lean figure of the old Welsh Bard, too, as he fed the flames, I found reassuring; but otherwise what I saw before me was so terrific that it made me lose all thought of that accursed Yin-Yang, the re-appearance of which I dreaded more than anything else.

A little to the left of our fire rose a group of seven gigantic trees. Now, as this was the only vegetation I had seen since that sidereal meteorite swept us down, you can imagine how I stared at these titanic growths. They were larger, far larger, both in height and in girth than any I had ever seen. I fancy the colossal Redwoods of the Pacific coast would have been dwarfs compared with them! And their enormous size made it easy for me to detect their species.

I recognized them at once by their peculiar shape; though they were leafless at this winter season. They were gigantic alders; and it was with the dead branches of these trees — fallen I suppose for thousands upon thousands of years on the banks of this Avernian sea — that our Welshman was replenishing his fire.

I couldn't remove my eyes from these trees. I tried to imagine what they looked like when they were in leaf; and the thought came to me how invincible was the power of Nature, that even upon this floor of the bottomless pit there should be felt, year after year, season after season, the miracle of resurrection!

But, heavenly Christ! What were those two monstrous Shapes bending over the blue-black water? They were alike and yet not alike. They looked solid and palpable, and yet in some indescribable way I knew that they were not made of any material produced by the earth. In fact, even as I surveyed them from where I stood I perceived a queer sort of perpetual motion, like the faint-flowing pressure of some unseen creative power altering their shape before my very eyes! Though they faced the water and bent over the water, they were looking downwards with what seemed to me, from where I stood, almost human lineaments. These lineaments were only in half-profile, for the larger portion of their cyclopean physiognomies were turned seaward, but no words of mine, my good son, can describe the horror of their expression! I thought to myself, as I stared in stupefied awe, that no one could have looked upon their full faces and survived such a Gorgonian experience.

And, moreover, as I continued to gaze upon them, it seemed to me that there was something else round and about them that touched a limit of frightfulness beyond what they were in themselves. It seemed to me that there floated round them moving images of unspeakable and unbearable cruelty, such as might have curdled the phantom-blood even of our pursuers!

The Shapes themselves were so tremendous that they seemed only a little less tall than the topmost branches of the gigantic alders; but they were hunched and humped and indrawn, as it were, as if they shrank in undying loathing from the very images of intolerable cruelty about them, over which, at the same time, they were gloating with an everlasting obsession.

The waves of that blue-black ocean, as they gathered and crested, were swept oilily forward, and subsided without breaking into foam at the feet of those two crouching Shapes, but this was by no means all; for I now became aware, and aware for the first time, that the surface of that dark, oily water was broken by the occasional appearance and disappearance of vast, wallowing, saurian creatures, creatures such as I have seen reproduced in imaginary pictures of the Jurassic Age, and such as I myself have often clothed with imaginary flesh, as I have gazed at their bones in our various museums of prehistoric relics. I find it hard to describe to you what I felt as

I stood on this granite-ledge and beheld these things, but this much I will say, that side by side with the petrifying shock of all this I retained my normal self-consciousness sufficiently to make a mental note of the miraculous adaptability of the human mind.

As I think of it now, and still more as I think of what followed, it does seem to be astounding what our nature can endure of the shocking, of the appalling, of the overpowering, and yet retain its sanity. Can it be that there is something below all the nervous refinements of our precarious civilization, something that we have inherited from the prehistoric jungles and swamps and salt-marshes, that at a crisis leaps up from the depths of our being and endows us with a veritable ferocity of courage? And not only of courage. What I felt then can only be described as a sort of mad ecstasy of contemplation, the kind of insane glee such as one can imagine Satan feeling, when, as Milton describes it, he forced his way like a dragon through the wild elements of chaos. Had nothing more been presented to my senses at that moment than these two humped shapes, made of a substance that was half-mental and half-material, and surrounded by shadowy images of blood-curdling cruelty, while at their feet wallowed and sported in the water these primordial monsters of the deep, I really believe I could have kept my head, kept it at least at that infernal level of crazed contemplation. But what I was destined now to witness, went beyond all endurance; and I am not ashamed to confess that when I saw what I saw now, it was in sheer brain-sick panic that I fled down from my granite eminence to the protection of our familiar fire and our friendly Welshman.

If it had been only the sight of that spectacle, far away as it was — in fact I believe it must have been half-way to the horizon — I might have remained where I stood. It was the renewal of that long-drawn bellowing sound that we had heard as we descended that broke me down, and even more than that, the unbelievable smell that accompanied it. For what I saw, before I ran down in desperate panic to my girl's side, was nothing less than two mountainous Leviathans — I don't know how else to describe the Things that rose up out of that blue-black sea — both of them trumpeting like sea-elephants, and as far as I could make out locked together in a loathsome embrace, and in that condition rending and tearing each other's flesh. It struck me at once that it was from this frightful struggle and from the rending of their Saurian bodies that this filthy smell proceeded. Their trumpeting was like an accumulated scream of appalling physical pain, and as they heaved up and down upon the surface of the water, burying themselves in each other's flesh, I received the impression that this hideous contact and this mutual immolation had been going on in this subterranean sea for thousands of years.

There was a moment before I fled down to the fire and before the wild tension of my frantic contemplation collapsed in a fit of hysterical panic, a point of time, if the truth must be told, that was probably less than a minute, when the whole enormity of what I saw was realized in its monstrous fullness. It's extraordinary how at such moments something takes hold of Time itself and draws it out to its breaking-point, to the point where if it did break it would dangle and bleed in an eternal void. Yes, I took it all in before I bolted, and if I were to shut my eyes now, even as I write this word, I should see it all again.

The roof of this ocean in the bowels of the earth was not as high as the roof which had covered the great plain from which our shaft descended, nor was it too high for the opening of that shaft to be visible from where I stood.

But the spaciousness of this watery world with its sky of stone was rendered monumental by the naked simplicity of every element in that terraqueous abyss. The granite shore was of one prevailing tinge of grey-green, the oily sea of one prevailing tinge of blue-black, while the very light that illuminated the whole spectacle seemed to have been strained and purged and wrung-out, so that nothing but its harder, colder, and more metallic quality remained.

That towering grove of bare alders seemed to have gathered into itself everything that was least warm and tender in vegetable growths, while it emphasized everything that pertained to the weird, the ominous, the deathabsorbing. The deeply indented bark of these alders had apparently thickened itself out with some species of dark moss, and even with minute specimens of ferns and funguses; and I have certainly never seen any vegetation more deeply rooted.

All around them the soft leaf-mould was piled. I think they were rooted in great fissures of the granite; but a thousand years of falling leaves had surrounded them with a porous mould that was black as pitch. Those two humped and crouching figures, that were forever quivering and shivering under the creative breath that was moulding them, displayed, in the half living, half-inanimate spasms that kept shaking them, an absolute absorption in the wavering images that hovered round them; while the surface of the ocean nearest to the fire whereon the Welshman kept throwing pieces of dead alder-wood was not only swept by wisps of smoke, but kept heaving up under the shapeless backs, slippery as eels, yet scaly as dragons, of those prehistoric creatures.

But all this, if you are following me, my dear son, fell into a mere negligible frame-work for those screaming monsters against the horizon. The moment they rose above the water, these frightful screams that must have been muffled under the water — for I doubt if they had ceased for centuries — rose with them; and with the screams came floating in over the water that pestilential smell.

There before me, in that terrible moment of time that was being stretched to the breaking-point, I seemed to feel in the eternal embracing and eternal devouring of these first-born of the abyss the very secret of the dark, obscene, life-and-death entanglement, that old evil "knot of contrariety," out of which, as the lips of the damned had confessed, the System-of-Things was evolving its purpose. I wonder how you, my dear son, would have borne up under what my fate presented to me at that unique point of time? You and your new generation, with your disillusioned lightness of touch and your deft avoidance of mysteries, would I daresay have settled like butterflies upon this abysmal revelation and dodged its significance with a flutter of wit. You would certainly have smoothed out the complicated meaning of what I did next by your airy formulae.

Rushing like a frightened infant to Morwyn's feet I flung myself down in front of her and hiding my head between her knees, I clung to her bare legs and burst into an uncontrollable fit of sobbing. Her soft skin, now completely dried by the fire, smelt of fragrant wood-smoke and though she was youthful enough to be my daughter, what I felt, as I clung to her body and buried my life in her life, was an absolute abandonment of my hard, clear-cut identity in the deep sweetness of her young strength; and as my paroxysm of sobbing died down a strange sensation of infinite safety and security took its place together with a feeling as if I were back once more, for all my grey hairs, and conscious too of its fathomless beatitude, safe from life's horrors, in the blessed womb of the woman who bore me. The intolerable screaming of those Enormities as they rent each other's flesh reached me in that warm darkness, but they reached me through the tender beatings of the pulses of my girl's life, and became no more than some inevitable cosmic note, some necessary Discord of the Spheres, without which the whole planetary motion, from equinox to solstice and from solstice to equinox, would be inconceivable.

My hysterical weeping — and let me confess I suspect this was the first time Morwyn had ever seen a grownup man cry, for Mr. — was a perfectly self-controlled person except when he was confronted with the provocative nerves of tortured animals — ended at last, as was natural enough, in a deep and prolonged sleep. The wondrous thing, as I knew from her tone and her whole attitude when my sleep was over, was that this absolute collapse of mine and this infantile clinging to her woman's limbs and all my flood of tears against her fragrant fire-warmed knees, broke down some barrier of virginal reserve of which she had herself hardly realized the existence. There is such a thing as a spiritual ravishment of maidenhood — occurring like its physical loss on a particular and recognizable occasion — which gives to a girl's love something peculiarly intimate and impassioned. And such a moment of spiritual seduction is often far more important and far more emotionally serious than the corresponding physical one; an aspect of things which entirely demolishes the undue stress laid by puritans upon mere physical purity.

There was something most exquisitely touching to me about Morwyn's attitude when I awakened at last from this desperate and abandoned sleep. There was a timid ardour about her, combined with an enchanting shyness, that to the subtle sensuality of my mood, as I awoke, resembled the temper of a youthful bride. I felt as if my clinging collapse, my absurd tears, my reversion to the eternal child that lies concealed under the mask of all the sons of women, had in some queer psychic sense broken the final barrier between us.

Would that this blessed moment could have lasted forever! But, alas, I had only to struggle to my feet to be arrested once again by the sickening terror of the impressions that crowded in upon us. One relief, indeed, I did have, when I recovered enough spirit to look about me, and that was indescribable. Those two monsters of the deep had carried down their obscene embrace, their revolting struggle, their loathsome stench, their appalling screams, into the abysmal sea-gulf out of which they had emerged.

And with them all the lesser spawn of that prehistoric subterranean ocean had sunk down out of sight.

We were left with that endless expanse of blue-black water, and with those crouching figures of half-materialized substance, and with that sinister grove of leafless alder-trees. Even the floating shapes of superhuman cruelty that I had seen gathered like the ghosts from some Cosmic Inquisition about those bowed figures had vanished away.

I moved closer to the fire. I even began replenishing it, as I had seen, or fancied I had seen, our shadowy Welshman do, with bits of ancient wood that must have fallen, in the course of centuries upon centuries, from that grove of colossal vegetation. I occupied my mind with this, partly to regain my disturbed and distracted wits, but also from a feeling that I ought to give Morwyn, too, a chance to recover herself and to re-assume her now completely dried garments.

“Where’s our friend, the Bard?” I inquired of her when at last I turned round. I spoke in Leprosid; for I’d resolved that no risk of being overheard should ever make me practise again upon her dear form that repulsive whispering-trick.

She shook her head, placed her finger on her lip, and pointed across our stranded air-ship in the direction opposite from the alder-grove. I saw then that the tender mood had left her too and that she was tense with alert concentration.

Following her gaze I detected the pallid wraith of the old soothsayer, standing about a hundred yards away, staring up anxiously at the black gulf in the roof above us.

"My father!" she cried. "He thinks he hears his ship!"

Under my breath I damned both the ship and the man, and then I chuckled at my irrelevance; for wasn't the cruel wretch sufficiently damned already?

"Does he hear—" I began.

She nodded. "He did just now," she said.

But at that point our protector came striding back.

"Is it my father, is it my dear father?" she cried.

"It was," answered the old man laconically.

"Oh, don't hide things from me, don't hide things from me!" she begged, lifting her arm in her emotion as if to touch him.

But he drew back sternly. "It was," he repeated. "But the ship's gone up again."

He paused for a moment, frowning. "Gone to bring more of them," he added, looking significantly at me.

For several seconds the old man and I stared at each other. "Is there nothing we can do?" I murmured, glancing at our stranded conveyance and casting longing eyes across that great mass of blue-black water.

His expressive face grew as hard as a stone. "Nothing," he said. But a minute later a faint light came back into his face. "Wait," he murmured hoarsely, and fell into a fit of deep inner concentration. "I seem," he began after a pause, "to remember — something. It came — to me once—" His voice died away again; but even as I watched him he seemed to fall into a kind of self-imposed trance. “Came to me once,” he repeated, “when I remembered those drops from the cauldron. I was on the shore of Tegid Llyn with Llywarch Hen and he asked me — and!”

Once more he paused and then added in a strange, far-away tone: “And I wrote it down — afterwards — long afterwards.”

“What did you write down?” I asked him; mixing up their damned Leprosid words in a most shameless manner in my eager snatching at this straw.

His stony face relaxed into the flicker of a smile. “It’s hard enough,” he said, “in our own tongue.” And then he brought out the following obscure syllables, which the mute Leprosid accent reduced to gibberish.

trwy ebostol pwyll
a phryderi.”

For some extraordinary reason the queer rhythm of this abracadabra came to me with a thrill of vague relief. “Complete,” he continued in Leprosid words, still smiling his strange, far-away smile. “Complete was the captivity of Gwair in Caer Sidi through the apostle of Pwyll and Pryderi,” and with that he fell silent.

“What does it mean?” was my natural question; but my bluntness didn’t seem to bother him.

“It was,” he replied, “under the inspiration of that Cauldron I used the word ‘Cyweir’ or ‘complete.’ Now ‘Cyweir’ also means ‘harmonious’ or ‘beautifully arranged’; and now — after pondering on the question for nearly a thousand years, for no bard understands at once the full meaning of his words — I am inclined to think I was referring to the deepest secret of all in our old—”

“What are you doing?” I interrupted him, calling anxiously to Morwyn, who having slipped off in the direction whence the old man had just returned, was staring pitifully into the shaft’s mouth above her head.

But I had come by this time to know so well the nature of the look she threw at me across the granite floor that I tried to absorb myself in Taliesin’s tantalizing riddles and forget the imminent appearance of that wretched Yin-Yang.

“I beg your pardon, sir. You were speaking—”

But I needn’t have thrown that in. He was going on just the same, as if Morwyn were out of hearing and I were in a mood of calm receptivity: “ — the deepest secret of all in our ancient religion; a secret that bears upon the mystery of good and evil and upon the mystical light that sometimes shines out from the most noisome regions of evil.” He paused and pointed with his hand towards the massive rocky base where those two thought-created Images looked down at the blue-black water. “Of course,” he said. “You realize what those are?” I shook my head; but I confess I had formed a pretty shrewd guess.

“They’re the twin-gods of Religion and Science,” he went on. “I don’t myself know which is which; and I think in the end under the washing of this sea they will become one figure with two faces. They’re both, as you observe, still in the process of creation. They’re the creation of their worshippers and have only a dim half-life. When we first came down here their worshippers were at work on them. The air was full of scientific and religious thoughts.” He paused, for me to make some comment; but I was still pathetically clinging to that straw of hope he had tossed out.

“Do you mean that your ‘captivity of Gweir’ may be under those horrible Molochs?”

The old Bard nodded. “I am not able,” he said, “even yet to unravel to you all my meaning. But I think I meant that Hell, in some special sense — perhaps in a musical sense, for my word ‘Cyweir’ implies a musical mystery — when ‘harrowed’ as the Bible says, and as I say in my ‘Harrying of Annwn,’ may be made a hiding-place for the highest. But a vo penn bit pont as Bendigeidvran cried. It’s only the greatest who makes of himself a bridge into the future.”

With these words upon his lips he turned and glanced at Morwyn. Exhausted with straining her neck to stare at that ghastly shaft in the roof, the girl had sunk down with her back against a ridge of granite, so as to be able to keep her eyes on that grim orifice with at least less physical tension.

“Nothing short of violence will move her from that vigil,” our look decided.

Then he resolutely pulled his grey garment tightly about him. “I’m going,” he said, “to see if there is any passage there. Will you come with me? We won’t leave her for long.”

I glanced down at Black Peter and he returned my look with a long, puzzled, uneasy, searching stare. “Be cautious, O great master!” his eyes seemed to say. “A little unwise recklessness may be the death of all of Us!”

“I’ll come a step anyway,” I said. “I can always go back if I feel nervous about her.”

So we advanced along the windrow of that blue-black sea, hoping to find some kind of expanse of sand or pebbles between the Images and the water. Black Peter came with obvious reluctance. He kept pulling at his leash and twisting his plump body into a galvanic crescent in his desire to keep Morwyn in sight.

It became clear to me that in his faithful dog-mind he half-suspected us of some deadly human treachery. As for me, I only prayed to heaven that he wouldn't bark. I didn't dare to disturb Morwyn's vigil at that moment; but I felt, for all our sakes, that I must try every door of escape while there was still a chance.

"Better not look at those faces as we come up to them," said my guide. "I've fought against Arawn, King of Hades, in my time, but there was nothing there like those Horrors."

I obeyed him; but though I didn't "look", I could feel my deepest flesh shiver itself into ice-cold wrinkles as we approached; but I was glad to find there was a strip of sand between those Images and the water so that if there existed any passage beneath them a person would be able to enter it dry-shod. No, I didn't look at their faces as we turned our backs to the sea's edge and moved up closely to them; but there are expressions on the faces of Life, or perhaps I should say on the faces of Death-in-Life so appalling, that it is not only with the eyes that you perceive their presence.

But the old man was perfectly right about these twin Molochs being in the process of becoming one. Without lifting my eyes beyond their knees I could see that under some parallel movement of the tides of human cruelty and the tides of this pre-historic ocean these two gigantic bodies were growing together.

But a very curious thing began happening to me then, of so bewildering a nature that I almost forgot what I had come here to seek. It was a queer spot, this little strip of sea-sand. There were several very oddly shaped shells lying about, but they were composed of such lovely mother-of-pearl that their shapes didn't worry me, though they did make me think of those sea-krakens I'd seen, whose smell was still in my nostrils and their screams in my ears.

But what I made an effort to concentrate upon, so as to avoid any danger of a chance glance at those unspeakable faces, was a vast piece of sea-weed that lay stretched out on that sand.

I was absolutely sure I detected that same loathsome smell — the smell of the erotic sweat of Jurassic-Age monsters — coming from that piece of sea-weed. But its size was so terrific! Its size troubled me. I had an odd feeling that that piece of sea-weed of so monstrous a magnitude was breaking some fundamental law of nature; had something obscene about it, something startling and sickening.

But what I referred to just now was not the sight of any of these details. Indeed, I tried to absorb myself in these details so as to shut my mind to this other thing.

It was the effect produced upon my own nature by the aura that surrounded these gods of religion and science!

I suddenly began myself to think of such things, that, as they conveyed themselves to Black Peter, for in his crucial nervous state the dog had become positively telepathic, made him lift up his head and howl. I didn't yield my will to these thoughts. I held them at bay. But there was something devilishly insidious about their particular kind of frightfulness, automatically transforming itself into what, under other conditions, might have disturbed me. But there they were, crowded into that single spot, all the thoughts of all the minds that all the way down the ages have killed their pity, for the sake of these twin Monstrosities!

So absorbed was I in this mental struggle that it was with a shock of awakening, as if roused from a trance, that I heard the Welshman cry out in shrill Leprosid: "By the Cauldron of Caridwen, there is a way down!"

I rushed forward to his side. Yes, we were standing now — and we were below the stone base of those half-created Idols — on the very brink of an enormous tunnel. The floor of it sloped clear down before us, not very steeply either; but in the dim artificial light of this place we could see it descending, descending indefinitely, descending immeasurably, into the bowels of the earth! Above the entrance to the tunnel was a cyclopean monolith of granite, in appearance suggesting the work of superhuman hands, for it was perceptibly curved in the centre, like the curve of a Norman arch. It was all of one integral single stone. There was no doubt of that; and in that respect it looked, but so indeed everything else did down here, as if it had been in existence before the Flood.

The old soothsayer stood spell-bound, gazing without speech at this entrance and this path-way to what he had visioned as he walked with Llywarch Hen by the edge of Bala lake.

Suddenly he lifted his hand and pointed. “There’s something engraved up there,” he murmured. “There are words up there.” The “words” were easy to read, for they had been deeply chipped out of that huge slab; but I could make nothing of them. I had never in fact seen anything in the least resembling these extraordinary hieroglyphs. They seemed to me to be entirely composed of straight lines, but arranged in such a way as to suggest the separate letters of separate syllables.

I regarded them with wonder and not a little awe. What hands, among the ancestors of our race, had carved those everlasting symbols over the entrance to this terrific descent?

But the awe I felt before this dusky lettering in the heart of Hell was not unmixed with a faint comfort. In this kingdom of insane shadows it was a relief to see the handwriting of men who at least had been alive and in their right minds when they moved about down here.

My companion, however, who had been contemplating these strange symbols with intense concentration, turned round to me now with a look on his expressive face that I shall never forget. There was a dim radiance in it, as though someone had suddenly lit a lamp under fathoms of water.

“Do you know what those words mean?” he asked me eagerly.

I shook my head.

“What does it mean?” I asked.

He pondered for a moment, evidently finding the task of translating by no means easy. I suppose he had to turn it first into his old Welsh and then into this damned Leprosid.

“Sleep is the bond forged for Cronos,” he cried at last, and there was not a little of the pedantic pride of the scholar in the complacency of his tone.

“What does that mean?” I asked him. My question must have betrayed a barbarous ignorance, for he became at once as testy as a schoolmaster.

“Mean?” he cried. “It means what it says! You and I, by a grace we don’t deserve, have stumbled upon the most sacred spot in the stellar universe. Somewhere down here is the actual place where Saturn sleeps, until the overthrow of the world! And with him sleeps — I have no doubt — the great magician and prophet of my people!”

“You mean—” I began; and if I hesitated to utter Merlin’s name it was more because of the mystical excitement I saw on my instructor’s face than because of any superstition of my own.

He solemnly bent his head; and I saw that my guess was correct. His lips now began moving, as if in prayer, and I felt constrained to look away; I had never seen a person praying to any God except the one worshipped in England and I regarded him with embarrassment. I couldn’t catch his words. Indeed, to confess the truth, I drew away a pace or two, afraid lest, in his mood of awed respect, he might feel compelled to address me in a Leprosid whisper.

But in place of whispering he uttered what I suppose was a Leprosid version of something in Greek; and I fancied I caught the word “Crete” or “Cretan.”

More humbly than ever I implored him to make his meaning clear to my limited intelligence. He gazed at me in astonishment.

“I thought—” he began, but hurriedly checked himself, out of what was evidently a polite desire not to hurt my feelings. “I know of course,” he went on more quietly, “that a generation that thinks it can gain knowledge by torturing animals must have lost the clue to the secret of life.” He spoke sadly, but very gently; and proceeded, in the tone one uses to a badly brought-up child, to explain to me that Cronos, or Saturn, was a Cretan ruler in the Golden Age, when the only worship known was the bloodless worship of the Great Mother. It was in connection he told me with the baskets in which offerings were made to the Great Mother that the cult of the Holy Grail originated, coming to these islands long before Goidel or Brython, and of course æons before the Christian era. “Whatever Creative Spirit,” he said, “is responsible for the existence of our Cosmos, it’s clear that Nothing can come of Nothing. In other words Nature, through her human children, refines herself and spiritualizes herself, just in proportion as she returns, though enriched of course by the experience of the struggle, to the Saturnian Age from whose wisdom and simplicity we have so lamentably fallen. Those words up there must have been engraved by Druidic hands under the influence of voyagers from the Grecian isles.

“I suspect that the planetary resting-place to which this descent leads can be reached from the interior of many a Gorsedd Mound in my country. Our enemies, the Norsemen, made Hell conquer Heaven. Our poets, much closer to the secret of the universe, reveal the existence of a Paradisaic Underworld that is beyond both.

“And I can tell,” he went on, still with the charming complacency of the vindicated scholar, “I can tell from the significance of these difficult letters, that this very entrance, where we stand now, actually leads, not only to the captivity of Gweir in Caer Sidi, but to the sleep of Saturn himself.” He was silent, while several shuddering spasms of what I suppose was pure joy in some inner beatific vision passed and re-passed across his fluctuating lineaments.

Seeing that he was so absorbed in his great discovery, thus stumbled upon by pure chance as he assisted Morwyn and me, I made a sign to him that I would soon return, and hurried off with Black Peter to bring Morwyn to the spot.

The smoke from our smouldering fire concealed her from me when I first emerged from beneath that loathsome pair of Demogorgons; but I knew at once that something was wrong from the way Black Peter dragged against his leash and hung back. As a rule he became almost as excited as I did myself when we were hunting for Morwyn; but on this occasion he kept huddling himself together, and looking sideways, and licking the edges of his mouth with his pink tongue, and several times he even squatted down on his rump. No! there was no sign of those appalling sea-beasts; nor had the floating images of horror returned, wherewith the religious and the scientific have, from the beginning of time, appeased their self-made idols.

When, however, I was half-way through the smoke, the dog began uttering quick low growls in rapid succession. This alarmed me and made me so nervous that I clapped my hand over his mouth and held him down by his collar. Then — for necessity knows no nicety — I practised on his black form that villainous whispering-trick, and told him, after the repulsive fashion of the place, that he mustn't make a sound as we were all in great danger. My attempt at whispering must have struck him as a deed of desperation, for he followed me quietly after that and with no further struggle.

There are moments in our life when the devastating shock of what we see makes us death-cold as the inanimate, makes us like an ice-floe carried down a swift tide. Such was my sensation, in spite of the friendly warmth of our fire, when I beheld what I now beheld.

The whole expanse of the granite shore below that terrible shaft was crowded with air-ships, some broken, some intact. Air-ships were floating far and wide in the water; and all about them and between them, crowded together and jostling one another, were the desperate Beings they had contained. In some places, as it seemed to me, these evil voyagers were so merged and fused in one another that I got a revolting sense of a multiform Shadow, wherein the separate shapes of these lost souls were fused together, in an inchoate mass.

And even as I looked, other air-ships kept descending, kept disgorging their burden of living-death, till the whole stretch of those forlorn sea-banks was thick with a tumult of excited phantoms. But dear God! what was happening to Morwyn? As far as I could make out, from where I stood choking in the smoke of the fire as I struggled to keep Black Peter quiet, the girl was crouching against a granite-ridge, while between her and the seething crowd of our adversaries were the figures of her father and the Spaniard, engaged as it appeared from where the smoke whirled round me, in a tense and dramatic argument.

I shall never forget the frozen misery of the way my mind cracked and groaned at that second! Should I rush to her support? Or should I fly back whence I'd come and call the Welshman to our assistance?

If only Black Peter had been a different dog, had been like some dogs, I might have sent him back to fetch him, and rushed alone to my girl's side!

And then it occurred to me that if he barked — the one thing I'd been keeping him from doing, for I was muzzling him with both hands — our protector might hear the sound, in this great hollow shell of atrocious silence, and know that there was something wrong.

No sooner had this flashed through my brain than I did release the dog; and sure enough — and the sound echoed like homely thunder under this vault of Hell — he burst into furious and wild barking.

Dragging him on his leash by main force I then emerged from the smoke and made straight for Morwyn. If the tumult had been bad before I intervened, it was trebled now. The crowd of spirits made that sort of desperate rush forward that mobs of men and packs of wolves make when they smell blood. Terrified, frantic, completely at the end of my tether, pulling Black Peter, who was now too paralysed to make a sound, recklessly after me, I was just in time to reach Morwyn's side when the crowd swept round us.

I say "round us" — and so it felt to me — but as a matter of fact though they formed more than a semicircle about us they never came quite behind us. There was still that one avenue left, for rescue or escape!

But the moment was such a tense one that I could do no more than throw one arm round my girl, while with the other I lifted Black Peter from the ground.

At crises of that kind abysmal weaknesses in our nature — such as we have never supposed existed — are revealed to our shame; and I now have a disgraceful thing to confess. In my dazed agitation it never occurred to me that I was showing equal concern over the girl and Black Peter; and one of the most grievous regrets that trouble me now is that I didn't hug Morwyn to my heart, or at least — for I could have done that and still clung to my dog — given her what might have been our last embrace.

But if you — even you, my dear son, with all your modern devil-may-care tone — had been where we were at that moment you might have lost your self-esteem just as I did. You can have no notion of the expressions in the faces that thronged about us, and if the roar of a mob is blood-curdling, I assure you that the dead silence in which all this took place was something more appalling still. Black Peter's pantings as he pressed himself against my side seemed like the sound of all the elements; for it was the only sound there.

The waves of that water were inaudible as they broke; and beneath all that vast hollow vault not a breath of air stirred. But, oh the sickening expression on these multifarious faces! There must have been a sprinkling of pure sadists among them, but these evidently formed a very small minority. The bulk of this multitude were scientific and religious fanatics; though I believe a good many of them worshipped the State in place of any personal God.

But whether they wanted to torture Morwyn to death for the sake of her soul, or whether they wanted to torture Black Peter to death for the sake of humanity, the expression on their faces was simply unforgettable.

Every trace of natural human feeling, every trace of that mercy and pity and righteousness and justice to which, although so slowly, the System-of-Things is moving, had vanished away. All that this expression said — all that it said to the water, to the fire, to the air, to the towering alder-trees was: "Let me torture to know more! Let me torture to save souls!" And as if their expression wasn't enough, there were other things. The excitement of their nerves was an appalling spectacle, showing clearly how it had come about that they had flocked into Hell. The perversion of the pivot of divine sexuality, upon which the whole cosmos turns, into this piston of cruelty needed nothing less than all the bowels of the planet for its satisfaction.

And there was something else too. As in the case of those entwined sea-serpents, only that was natural compared with the effluvia of this shoal of perdition-fish, a reeking fume exuded from their jostling forms. I think it was this fume, more than anything else, that gave Morwyn the desperate courage actually to whisper to me something before them all. Tragic and heartbreaking it was to feel her young breasts pressed against my chest and her small clenched fists beating wildly on my back. What she whispered to me I shall not reveal. No doubt to the new generation it would have seemed the most old-fashioned nonsense.

Suffice it to say it had to do with her determination rather to die than to yield her living body to the bodiless rape of that mob of unspeakable shadows.

But the protracted altercation that was going on between her father and the Spanish Inquisitor held back our adversaries for a while. The whole crowd paused so intently to listen to what those two were saying, that it began to dawn on my dazed wits that upon this colloquy our fate depended. The strange thing was — as I look back upon it all now — that I never felt that their savage and cruel obsession was directed to myself as well as to my girl and my dog. Nor even yet do I believe it was! The great advocate of Predestination — who burnt Servetus to establish his “truth” — and how, after my time in Hell, did I loathe the very look of that word! — was apparently not among this crowd. I learnt later that the artistic Emperor and his obsequious admirer had refused to risk their valuable air-craft on the mere chance of torturing a girl and a dog. The hearts of both Nero and the Marquis of Sade lacked the sacred fire to keep their cruelty at white heat. It tended to flicker down when the conditions were difficult.

On this occasion they must have simply steered their precious yacht in the opposite direction, completely disregarding in their sublime egoism, the indignant howls of Calvin and his aged friend. Well, you can imagine, my boy, how if our multitude of tormentors stopped to listen to their momentous argument, Morwyn and I awaited its conclusion with beating hearts!

What she heard from her father, in that terrible mute tongue, must have pierced her bosom like a sword; for Mr. — was actually trafficking, as far as I could make out, his paternal feeling, for the privilege of being the only torturer in all Hell, of a living animal. The Spaniard was to have the undisturbed right to "save," after his fashion, Morwyn's soul, as long as Morwyn's father was permitted the uninterrupted ecstasy of squeezing his truth out of the nerves of Black Peter.

It is a wonder that at a fearful crisis like this the human mind doesn't lose its balance. What incredible tenacity our normal reason must have, to be able to retain its power of observation and even of philosophical commentary, when the very ground is opening under its feet!

At that moment I seemed endowed with a calm clairvoyant insight into the exact emotions of every character in this mad drama. The emotions of that great phantom-multitude, as it closed in upon us, were indeed not difficult to follow. But I could read the much more complicated feelings of Mr. — at that moment just as I could read those of his daughter. And I am anxious — mark you — not to load the judicial dice against this detestable person. I do believe the fellow, in his own manner was attached to Morwyn; and I believe that even at that moment he was exerting more will-power than either of us realized to keep the mob from rushing upon her.

I wasn't near enough to catch in any detail the terrible struggle that must have been visible in his transparent countenance; but even at that distance I could see that the stress of the moment was contorting his whole face.

I think myself that something in him trusted all the while that the Inquisitor would refuse the proffered bargain; and, after all, the Spaniard's cruelty, as with most experimentalists in the sufferings of others, had probably outgrown its original purpose. He may have been dallying with the hope that Black Peter too had a soul to be saved.

Yes, I do really think that Mr. — was procrastinating, and deliberately doing so on our behalf. Possibly he knew better than I did, being a spirit himself, that Black Peter's burst of furious barking would be sure to bring our friend to our rescue. And he may have supposed that the Spaniard was so sure of getting both the dog and the girl that he would refuse the bargain with contempt!

But I know you are asking me why it was that none of these "sworn tormentors" ever turned their ferocity on me. I'm not made of wood or of stone. I can feel a prick or a burn as well as another. But I suppose the truth was that I'm such an ugly devil, and such an elderly devil, and such a thick-skinned devil, that it didn't strike them that there was much sport to be got out of me. I must have appeared to them as one of those tiresome fish who just sink to the bottom and refuse to be "played."

But now, having done my duty by Mr. — and his compunctions, I must tell you what actually happened. I soon perceived that the wily Spaniard, so far from rejecting this bargain, was all itching to close with it; but knowing human nature a good deal better than Mr. — he was anxious, before he made any move, to get him completely absorbed in the dog, to get him, in fact, off with the dog, if possible on board the Yin-Yang, so that while his rival and the dog were sailing away, he, the most religious of Inquisitors, would be in a position to take control of the situation. Whether it was that the mental illumination which had been brought to me by our meteoric descent had not yet been dissipated, or whether it was that the emotions of these lost wraiths were so transparent that any fool could read them, I now perceived that the sight of Black Peter in my arms was a greater temptation than Mr. — was able to endure.

I have never in my life seen such a look as the look he fixed upon this unfortunate dog. Still held back by their desire to await the end of this trafficking between the Vivisector and the Inquisitor — for with the cunning of the insane they saw that for their purpose we must be separated before they fell upon us — the multitudes that thronged round us were now straining most dangerously at the rope.

In their horrible Leprosid a muted howl went up from their throats, and the loathsome stench of their excitement made the air feverish and fetid. Their torture-lust communicated itself to Morwyn's father, as he gloated over the dog in my arms, and finally so intensified became his feeling that, as if to make it an accompaniment to the Spaniard's agreement to their bargain, he burst into a sort of litany of scientific Research. "What will you do to it that we should let you have it?" was what the Leprosid silence around him cried; and the answer came in a spume of exultation from the man's lips.

I was foolishly relieved by the fact that no sooner had he begun his infernal chant than Morwyn's hands went to her ears. And she didn't confine herself to that, for shrinking, as well she might, from the look on his face, I could see, as I glanced sideways down at her profile, that she had shut her eyes as well.

Soundlessly the long blue-black waves broke on those granite rocks; soundlessly the towering alder branches stretched out their gaunt protest to the metallic roof that was their sky. But what was that? As one by one the revolting threats to Black Peter rose from the man's perverted soul, I fancied I saw, through the smoke of our fire, the figure of the old Bard dragging from beneath those alders great bundles of dead wood and piling them on the smouldering flames. My first impression — and the desperation of my nerves was revealed in this — was that our Welshman had gone over to the enemy and was preparing the fire in which Morwyn's soul was to be saved; but this horrid illusion only lasted a second. As soon as I saw the effect produced upon the whole horde of our adversaries by the red flames that now began to leap up I drew a sigh of relief.

But the multitude didn't move back far; and after their first recoil at the sight of these huge flames which threw a vibrating fiery path over the water, they came on again. Their gregarious ferocity resembled the persistence of summer flies returning to their blood-sucking the moment the beast's tail ceases to swing!

And still Morwyn's father went on with his vivisector's Hymn of expectant joy. And what a fool I'd been to suppose that by stopping up her ears Morwyn could escape their curst Leprosid! Alas! I knew by the way her whole body was shuddering that she heard every word this scientific sadist uttered. It was only when I saw the man's ghastly expression as he gloated over the dog and prepared to sacrifice his own flesh-and-blood for the sake of what he desired that I realized the full effect upon these people's minds of the practise of vivisection.

"What will you do to it that we should let you have it?" chanted those lost souls; and while the whole multitude strained forward at each exciting promise, Morwyn's father chanted in reply: "I'll cut out his organs and keep him alive! I'll drive nails into his paws! I'll squirt virus into his brain! I'll drown him by inches! I'll plunge his head into plaster of paris! I'll bake him! I'll scald him! I'll burn him with molten lead! I'll pour boiling water into him! I'll tie his legs over his back! I'll stitch his kidneys into his neck!

I cannot describe to you the horror of this infernal chant. I have put it down as I best recall it, but it was interspersed with inarticulate howls of exaltation that I couldn't attempt to reproduce and then at the end, quite gravely and pompously, evidently repeating what he must have often said in his life, he remarked quietly: "You laymen know nothing about it. I am a privileged person. I hold a licence from the Home Office. No society can touch me — No pity can affect me. My Research Laboratory is beyond good and evil. I am Science — holy and sacrosanct!"

And at that point, to add the last touch to this crucial scene, I caught from the lips of the Spaniard, who all this while had kept his burning eyes fixed on Morwyn, the final culmination of it. "It would be better," this demon cried, "for all living things to perish in a paroxysm of pain, than for one single human soul to be lost!"

The crowd began now to press closer upon us, and Black Peter had already set up a low despairing whine, when I felt Morwyn's fainting body fall with its full weight upon my arm. That revelation of her father's degradation had been the last straw. It was not till then, but, Christ be praised! it was then, that I saw the Welsh Bard, with a great blazing torch of wood in each hand come rushing straight towards us! It was clear — though I hadn't realized it before — that these damned spirits had an extreme dislike of fire.

At the sight of those flaring torches in the old man's hands they fell back — I should think about twenty yards — but at that point they stopped again. Fire certainly frightened them; but it appeared that even fire couldn't hold them back for more than a few seconds.

But our protector was now at our side. “Lift her up and carry her!” he cried hoarsely. “And drag your hound by his leash!” Even at that moment — such is the complexity of the human mind — I noted, with something approaching amusement, that he should call this poor little object, who now came trailing after me in the manner of a scurrying black louse, by so grand a title as a “hound.”

But I obeyed him literally. I took Morwyn up in my arms, and stumbling and shuffling, with the dog’s leash round my wrist, I made my way as best I could into the cloud of smoke.

The Welshman followed behind us, every now and then turning round to brandish his torches; but as soon as we were in the heart of the smoke he threw them into the fire and moved up to our side. It was a good thing he did this, for without the encouragement of his presence, I doubt if I could have found my way, so thick was the smoke, to the spot where at the feet of those two monstrous creations lay the entrance to the nadir of our earth. Once within this entrance, once under the great inscribed trilithon beneath which the passage descended, and I felt such a relaxation of escape that I became, as I laid the girl down on a slab of stone and leant over her, a little hysterical. Black Peter certainly became more than hysterical. I have never seen such a transformation in any living creature. He proceeded to rub himself against the very stones of that sacred porch to the sleeping-place of the world as if they had been posts in a cottage garden. But the Welshman rebuked us both; admonishing me to gather my wits together, and with similar severity commanding my “hound” to postpone his demonstrations.

“You’re not safe yet,” he said. “You don’t know those people. Listen! Can’t you hear them?” He must have referred to their silent Leprosid uproar; but I was too overcome by our escape to do anything but try to catch some ordinary human sound; and of course I heard nothing except the panting of Black Peter.

Again I knelt by Morwyn's side. I had no fear that she wouldn't regain consciousness; and indeed I was clumsily fumbling with the fastenings of her dress, under the old-fashioned notion that such was the way to bring a woman out of a swoon, when the colour came back to her lips and she opened her eyes. She opened them with a wild frightened look, and made a motion to lift her hands to her ears, but when she saw nothing but Black Peter and me and the figure of our protector she closed them again, and relapsed once more into a happier but yet deeper trance.

All this while the old man had been standing under the entrance-arch listening intently, but he now came up to us, evidently greatly troubled.

"They're near — they'll be on us soon — the whole multitude—" he brought out. "I wish I knew where — I wish I knew what—" His aspect and tone made me think of the distress of Virgil when in the Inferno the demons refused him entrance into Dis. But an angel had come to aid those two; whereas, in our real Hell, the cruelty of the dead had nothing to resist it except the obscure intentions of the System-of-Things!

"Take her up," the Bard directed; "and the hound's leash too. We must try to find him."

I took it for granted that this "him" referred to the great Magician whom he had so long believed to be hiding down here, and when I uttered that tremendous name, I found my assumption was correct. But our friend's agitation was imperative; and slipping the leash hurriedly over my wrist, as I had done before, I lifted up the girl, in my arms and we moved together down that dim descent.

The incline was a steep one and what we had gone through had thoroughly shaken my courage. I kept stumbling as I went and my precious burden, slim as the girl was, weighed heavily on me.

I clenched my teeth, to confess the truth I uttered in my heart a prayer that I had not used since my boyhood. Every step I took seemed to me the last I’d have the strength to take; but on I went, reeling, staggering, gasping, while the sweat, trickling into my mouth, tasted to me rather of blood than of tears. But my will took hold of my shaky body as a strong man’s hand might take hold of a river-reed and I found myself counting in foolish mental iteration every step I made, and as I counted I seemed to see each figure I named as if it were a living creature!

Like goblins, with variously coloured heads, they were, and these heads seemed to me, as I named them, to grow smaller and smaller; till when I passed the hundredth step they were no bigger than the heads of ninepins.

But suddenly we found ourselves on level ground, and as we did so I became conscious of a sensation that came terribly near to proving our ruin. It was as if the power of gravitation had doubled itself! It had become, humanly speaking, impossible for me to go on. Each foot, as I moved it forward, seemed to be lifting a great lump of lead. My will seemed to grasp these leaden-bound feet of mine and lift them up for each step with merciless invisible hands.

And then like a lightning-flash it came over me what the cause was of this singular experience. We were actually approaching the pivotal centre, the astronomical navel-point, of the whole round earth. The light about us was now much dimmer; but after labouring forward, I think it must have been about twenty paces from the spot where the gravitational pull had increased, we reached a vast cyclopean wall of solid rock, split in the centre by a narrow chasm. There was a faint light coming through this cleft in the rock; a light of a different quality from the pale diffused artificial glimmer by which we had descended.

I don’t mean it was brighter, though perhaps it was a little brighter. I mean it was, so to speak, of a different texture. The light we had come by was like a pallid, spectral, gaseous emanation, evenly diffused throughout the air; whereas the gleam that now shot into our twilight through this narrow aperture resembled the sort of ray that certain submarine fish have the power of projecting as they move through their world of ink-black water; only this ray had a warmer glow than any phosphorus could give.

Our guide signed to me to pass on through the cleft; but this was no easy task. Indeed it would have been an impossible undertaking had I been a shade stouter than I am. As it was I had the greatest difficulty in supporting my burden through this world-old planetary crack; for the opening was a crevice in a solid mass of rock that might well have been some ten or fifteen yards thick and the crack itself was so narrow that it was necessary for me to push myself along sideways, holding my limp burden with the utmost care lest her head should strike against the stone.

As I shuffled forward I couldn’t help being seized with what perhaps was the absurd fear lest on emerging from this passage into whatever lay beyond I should be forced into a blind somersault, due to our arrival at the geographical centre-point of the planetary globe.

All the way through this abysmal cleft the magnetic pull upon my feet seemed to increase; and indeed at one point I turned in cold terror and cried aloud to the old man behind me that my feet had turned to stone and were clamped to the ground.

But the power of our mortal will can at a pinch compel the most exhausted of corporeal frames to achieve the impossible; and I did get through at last; and did not when I emerged undergo any startling reversion, or any transference of "up" and "down."

The first thing I did was to stretch the girl out as comfortably as I could on something that looked like a low altar-stone save that it rose a little at one end and was covered with soft grey lichen. She was now, from her look and her breathing, sleeping a deep and quiet sleep; and this was an indescribable comfort to me, for I thought: "The longer she sleeps like this the more chance there is that she'll recover from her father's ghastly words." At the same time I couldn't resist a secret hope that that glimpse into the soul of a Vivisector was the end of her filial devotion.

Rising to my feet from where I had laid her, though in every nerve of my body I felt an infinite longing to sink down and sleep by her side, I began to take in the extraordinary sight before us and the awful solemnity of what the old French chronicler calls the "Esplumeoir" or secret alcove of Merlin's hiding-place. Extended upon a slightly raised bed of stone not unsimilar to the one whereon I had just laid the girl lay the Magician's recumbent figure; and it seemed to me then, though I cannot vouch for the accuracy of my bewildered impressions, that even in size the form I saw was super human. It was the form of a man well advanced in years, though perhaps not as old as our bardic protector, and even if he was not of the gigantic size I thought at first, he certainly was of a superhuman dignity. His long beard, darkly grizzled rather than grey, flowed down beyond his waist and gave a wondrous emphasis to the calm outlines of his majestic physiognomy.

Like our guide he was wrapt in a faded white mantle caught in at the waist with a broad massive girdle; but unlike our guide, whose mantle only reached to his knees, the motionless occupant of this antechamber of the world’s sleeping-place wore his garment of dim white wool almost down to his sandals.

But I now became aware that the warm magical glow that illumined this rock-hewn vault came from a second cleft in the stone, a cleft at the further end of the vault almost identical with the one through which we had just forced our way. I strained my eyes to follow to its final source this shaft of misty illumination; and as I gazed through that rocky cleft, beyond the head of the sleeping figure, it seemed to me that I was aware of two vast Presences in there, far more shadowy and mysterious than the one before me, but lying just as this one did, at full length upon their stone beds. I keep using the words “rock” and “stone” for the cosmogonic substance out of which, at some planetary epoch “in the dark backward and abysm of time,” this great vault at our globe’s centre had been formed; but as a matter of fact as I gazed at the walls around me and the roof above me I received a strange impression — and I think it came from the colour of these things — that they were made of a material more like metal than stone.

I moved a few paces beyond where Morwyn slept; and, as I moved, I couldn’t help remarking that Black Peter had stretched himself out, in that queer way he always did, with his hind-legs straight out and the pads of his hind-paws exposed, at the foot of Morwyn’s temporary sarcophagus.

This was the first time in all my memory of this devoted little beast that he had deserted me for any living person; and I wondered whether, in this weird temple of the sleep of time, an irresistible hypnotic trance had come over him, as indeed it had nearly done in my own case; or on the other hand whether, without experiencing any panic, for he hadn’t barked since we escaped through that smoke, he was aware — with some sort of dim and doggish kind of psychic awe — of the presence of supernatural Beings.

But if I stood spell-bound at what we beheld, my aged companion gave way to his feelings in a much more impulsive manner. I suppose it's my English temperament, but I must confess to receiving a certain shock when he fell down on his hands and knees and began tapping his forehead upon the ground! Whether he did this before the majestic sleeper stretched out in front of us like an Image of Eternal Rest, or whether he did it before those two Divine Presences in the farther sanctuary, I have no idea. During his many incarnations he may have seen other sleepers than this one, and other Presences than those two immortals. In his time he may have seen the old Welsh gods Pwyll and Pryderi, and Arawn, king of Annwn, and Rhiannon, and the great Caridwen herself!

But you mustn't think, my dear boy, that because I lack your modern generation's artful-artless levity I can't see the monstrous grotesquerie of life. I am not at all sure that in un-sexing yourselves, as you have all done, and in cooling the burning seeds of erotic imagination by your methods of frivolous analysing, you haven't dissipated your sense of the real grotesqueness of life, and turned it into a sort of Alice-through-the-Looking-Glass joke. It was a grim kind of burlesque-sense I admit that I was destined now to indulge, while my love's sweet bosom rose and fell in her untroubled sleep, and the breath between her parted lips kept being caught in pathetic little whistlings and sighings, like a newt's breath coming up to the top of a lily-pond. It was a humour as profane as you could wish; but it was monstrously, not airily profane.

Indeed, it was as if I had the power of entering with a weird exultation into the feelings of some ribald Cosmic Showman whose whole pleasure lay in the outrageousness of the events of his planetary entertainment.

You must remember how my nerves had been strung up to the breaking-point during that exposure of the heart of a Vivisector; and there really was a pantomimic ghastliness in the dead silence in which our dignified old guide jerked himself along that floor like a reverential caterpillar, prostrating himself and then shoving himself forward, in fantastic alternation, and doing this round and round in a circle, just as if he were playing some childish game of "forfeits."

But if I gave way to my feelings in a mute chuckle of gross ribaldry, when I saw this dignified old Bard gyrating like a mechanical toy about the magician's bed, I confess I yielded to an outburst of hysterical Leprosid laughter when I suddenly perceived, side by side in the cleft through which we had come, the triumphant, leering countenances of Morwyn's father and the Spaniard. These gentlemen evidently made sure they'd caught their victims at last, beyond any possibility of escape; and their gusto was an indecent spectacle. I suppose to the mind of the pious Inquisitor all the old heathen tales about the Sleep of Cronos were inventions of the Devil, while no doubt to Mr. — they were the hallucinations of some erotic reflex action. I expect they both thought they had stumbled upon the real secret of Taliesin's visits to Hell, his discovery, down here, of some valuable collection of paleolithic antiquities! They probably took the sleeping Magician for an interesting specimen of Egyptian mummification and even as definite scientific proof that in the Bronze Age Britain was colonized by Egyptians.

What they felt with regard to the chamber beyond I cannot guess. My suspicion is that both these respectable practitioners of ideal cruelty were extremely insensitive to sense-impressions. They could smell heresy afar off, and they could watch the saliva pour out from a slitinthe neck of a dog, but in respect of ordinary human impressions their physical senses were as atrophied as their moral ones.

But it is curious that at this crisis of my life I should have been seized with this outburst of silent laughter. I have called it “hysterical”; but I’m sure I don’t know. There was that in the whole situation, in the whole pressure of our predicament, that really had something monstrously comic in it. That fantastical old Bard doing ecstatic homage to his unconscious Sorcerer by encircling his bed with Tibetan prostrations; Black Peter stretched out at full length with his paws upward, in sublime confidence that all was well; Morwyn’s dear lips uttering in her sleep those childish whistling sounds, like fairy-bubbles through heather-bells; and now those two obsessed faces peering out of the cleft of the rock, with multitudes upon multitudes of their damned confederates behind them; all these things, touched with a kind of trance-like unreality by the silent aloofness of that figure on the stone bed and the indescribable Presences in the chamber beyond, affected my mind, down here at the bottom of the world, as if they were some fearful Burlesque, performed in the “lonesome latter years” of our poor planet’s history, for the edification of some jaded Demiurge.

Where was the mercy and pity, where was the tenderness and justice, towards which, according to our unholy Frenchman, the System-of-Things was directing its irrevocable course? Can there lie hidden in the most harmless of men, even in the bowels of an amiable Captain Shandy like myself, a vein of sympathy with what one might call the humour of Satan? Why the devil else should the sight of this intolerable Vivisector and his accursed friend watching the gyrations of our protector round that blind bed, while Morwyn and their other proposed victim slept their poppied sleep, have roused me to so gross an outburst?

Those two foul shadows filling that narrow entrance were evidently being pushed from behind by a dense and excited crowd, for every now and then they were impelled forward with a violent jerk.

What made the two hang back, I think, in spite of this pressure, was their fear that the influx of the mob would cause the immediate death — a horrible enough death, but still a quick one — of both the maiden and the dog. For how would Religious and Scientific Truth be served by so bungled an event as that? The two rogues were glad of the pressure of the multitude to strengthen their hand, but they had no intention of delivering up these two precious organisms, dedicated to their private use, to a speedy and unprofitable oblivion.

All this while, you must understand, there was no sound audible on this subterranean stage except the whistling catch in the unconscious girl's breath and the steady breathing of the dog at her feet.

But our Welshman rose to his feet at last and in a flash realized the peril that confronted us. I could see him cast a look upon the recumbent Magician, and another quick glance upon the entrance to the inner chamber; but he came boldly forward and confronted the forms in that narrow cleft. "Get back, get back where ye belong!" he cried in shrill Leprosid. "This is sacred ground. We're in sanctuary here! This is outside your Hell. Can't you read what's written? Can't you see where we are?"

But his words were evidently drowned in the inaudible howlings of that multitude of the damned, and those two fearful faces in one foreground were thrust still nearer by the mob behind them.

But I could see the Inquisitor turn his head and make some kind of angry appeal to the maniacs who were pushing him forward; and apparently his authority still held its weight, for after his words there was an obvious lessening of the pressure. There was a pause in fact at this point, while the two leaders went through the disgusting process of whispering together; and because of the narrowness of the entrance and the awkwardness of their position, I was nearly driven to a second fit of gross laughter by the spectacle of their performance.

When they separated, however, Mr. — at once began addressing the indignant old Bard in the pompous tone of professional authority.

"I'm a medical man," he said coldly and sternly, "and I hold a licence from the Home Office. No society, no body of persons in the world can interfere with me. I am a Scientist. What would get ordinary people a long sentence in gaol if they did it to an animal, I do every day — with my licence and behind my thick walls. I don't want to disturb you in your study of mummies. Give me that dog, and I'll leave you at once. I'm a scientist and you're a layman, so it's no use explaining—"

But the Bard interrupted him. "Yes," he retorted bitterly. "You hold your licence! And the moaning of your victims goes up to the Creator night and day. You're the plague-spot at the heart of this accurst civilization! And let me tell you this. Your science may torture all it likes with your precious licence, but the vengeance of Heaven will fall on your race! More will perish because of Science than will live because of it. You can't mock God forever. The lives you save — if you do save them — by this unspeakable wrong, will survive to curse you and your diabolical science. The law of the universe is righteousness and justice and mercy and pity; and not all the Science in your laboratories can make wrong right! The moan that rises from your places of torment will return upon you and upon your children — yea! it is doing so already! — with a vengeance that will shake the world. It is the pity of God that lies bound upon your tables; it is the justice of God that lies helpless under your racks. But it will be the vengeance of God that will descend on your children's children; for unto them that use the pain of the helpless to extract knowledge, their knowledge shall turn to madness and destruction; and, to them that use the torture of the helpless to prolong life, life shall be a burden and a plague and a despair! Back, I say, all of ye, back where ye belong! This place, though it's in your Abyss, is not yours! Don't you understand the great hidden secret of my People, that there's a Below-Hell, just as there's an Above-Heaven?"

He paused, as well he might, for I had never heard since I first came down here this curst dumb tongue used to such effect. And the quaint thing was that though he spoke Leprosid with what I recognized as a Welsh accent, it wasn't the accent of to-day. It had the inflexion of the Welsh of to-day but there was something else in it that suggested to my unscholarly mind the "timbre" of certain intonations that I recall as a subaltern when I was stationed in one of those semi-Greek islands of the Near East where they're always finding prehistoric remains.

I suppose it was the fact that they weren't accustomed to so much energy being thrown into words — their own being completely absorbed in other activities — that made them listen to the old man as they did. I don't think his words had the faintest effect on their feelings. They had predestined themselves to perdition too absolutely for that; but I do believe they were fascinated by the music of his speech; and who knows if to some of them that prehistoric Mediterranean accent didn't revive memories of wonderful civilizations long buried in the grave of the Past?

"You want that hound," he went on — and once more I came near smiling at the difference between my notion of a "hound" and the funny little black object stretched out at Morwyn's feet— "to practise your filthy experiments on. Let me tell you once for all — yes, you may laugh, but not one of my prophecies has ever failed — the great spirit of the Cosmos isn't found in physical knowledge; isn't found in long lives purchased with the pain of the helpless. The great Spirit of the Cosmos is found in righteousness against unrighteousness, in good against evil, in mercy and pity against cruelty and injustice. If ever a generation of men in Ynys Prydein obeys the great Spirit of the Cosmos it will refuse your loathsome drugs, every drop of which is a drop of bloody sweat, every drop of which is wrung from some wincing and quivering nerve, and it'll expose the lying tricks wherewith you've gulled the crowd; it'll take away your damned Licences, and, if you persist in torturing, it'll clap you into a madhouse, as the perverted criminal you are!"

He paused again and then with surprising agility for so old a Shade he leapt upon a ledge of stone adjoining the narrow cleft where Mr. — and the Spaniard were restraining their followers, and began pointing with shrill cries of recognition at a phantom in armour just behind these two, from the edge of whose gorget sprang the bristles of the most repulsive beard I've ever beheld, a beard that in the curious light of that spot had a most unbelievable tint.

"Ho, Marshal of France!" cried the old man in a terrible voice. "So you're here too? So you've thought a girl's blood would serve, have you, as well as a boy's, to prolong your precious life? But you'd better go back to your Laboratories! You'll find them in full agreement with you. They haven't come to children yet; but they will, they will! They already agree with you that there's a peculiar satisfaction in the prolongation of life through the pain of the small and weak. But there's only one young person here, Monsieur le Maréchal, and she's the property of Holy Church. But listen, child-killer: On this very day in a well-known English laboratory there's an experiment being performed on a young monkey, who's so sensitive and so human in his reactions that I'm sure it'll prolong your Hellish vitality for centuries to see it! It'll be on the Screens now. Later it may be too late!" He dropped down from his post as he spoke, and I caught a villainous susurration of Leprosid laughter as Monsieur le Maréchal, aided by the look of his fifteenth-century armour, forced his way out of the crowd.

Evidently somewhat dismayed by the effect of the Welshman’s words, the Inquisitor now moved forward a step and uttered his ultimatum.

“I’ll give you three minutes,” he said, “to get back where you belong,” and he peered with a dim, incurious eye at the entrance into the next chamber, “and then we’ll do what we’ve come to do, in spite of you and through you!”

I think that was the moment in this whole frightful experience when my heart sank the lowest. I could see nothing for it but that these demons would rush in upon us in their multitude; and knowing Morwyn as I did I knew well enough what that would mean.

Whatever happened to Black Peter or to me, unless I did what she’d asked me and killed her with my own hand, the first of these evil ones who reached her — and she’d be awake enough then! — and passed through her woman’s body would be — But I turned sick at the thought. Shadows they were. Transparent they might be. But I knew now that their substance was not pure air. Had I not smelt their loathsome essence?

But the voice of the Bard rose to meet the challenge in a torrent of impassioned words.

“Mad ye are!” he cried, “mad and besotted in your damnation! Have ye no vestige of humanity? Have ye forgotten that ye were ever born of women, that ye ever looked upon the light of the sun? Come! Ye shall hear it. Come! Ye shall know it. Learn now, ye larvae of Satan, learn and turn back howling into the slime that spawned ye. Here I have found what I have searched for in vain in a thousand incarnations! This is the Sleeping Place of Cronos, this is the navel of the Universe, this is the lap of the Great Mother, this is the Centre of the Circle; this is the King’s chamber! Here is the bed of the Indestructible; here is the Cauldron of the Indissoluble; here is the resting-place of the System-of-Things. Here and nowhere else is the sleep of the deathless; here and nowhere else are the seeds of what was and is and is to come, the all-powerful, the all-merciful!"

He stopped exhausted and I perceived a kind of tremor, like the tremor that passes over hushed waters before the awakening of a great wind, go shivering over that horde of reprobates. Then he turned to me with a groan and murmured, in the lowest tones possible to that odious language, short of whispering: "It's no good, my friend. We must wake the lady. Our hour is come. There's no hope for us unless — but that's impossible. And mark you what he'll say now. Mark you how he'll do it. Mark you, my good Captain, mark you, my worthy friend. It'll be the voice of the old eternal objective lie, the lie that's hindered creation since it first stirred in the void! It'll be the voice of the false Law, the false Causation, the false Predestination, the false Reality — It'll be the voice of that ancient Serpent that forever devours its own poisonous tail!"

But he was not altogether right in his prophecy at this grim juncture. For though Mr. — began to speak in a low, cold, smooth, official voice, exactly as he had predicted, the man's fanaticism soon carried him away. "The late Grand Inquisitor," he began, and I could see that the moment he ceased speaking nothing would be able to stop the multitudinous rush of the whole mob, "has told you why we are here and what we have come for. Some of us in this country — I could name an Emperor of Rome and a Marshal of France and I am afraid I must include my personal friend the Marquis of Sade — are inclined to take their duties too casually and lightly; preferring to indulge in airy journeys through our God's dominions, to serving him with the holocausts and hecatombs his soul loves. But we are agreed that nothing, not conscience, nor mercy, nor pity, nor justice, nor any other feeling, no! nor any creature in heaven or earth, can stop us from serving our God and getting knowledge of his laws by the torment of the helpless! Therefore, whatever things can prod, whatever things can burn and freeze and scald and boil and convulse and cause twinges and squirmings, if there be any torment, if there be any despair, if the walls are so thick and high that no help can ever come, think on these things!

"Yes, our Inquisitor has spoken; and it now left for me" — he spoke very slowly at this point and I've wondered since if his heart failed him just a little as he looked at his daughter— "left for me to sacrifice all feeling, all remorse, all compunction, all conscience, all difference between right and wrong, for the sake of our most holy Science. Give me that dog!"

During his final sentence, where his voice assumed that "dying fall" which betokens the last word of an ultimatum, I was hastily arousing Morwyn from her sleep.

Black Peter must needs at this crisis go through that pathetic and provocative trick which is natural to spaniels and turn over helplessly and resignedly on his back! Here he lay, with all four feathery paws bent at the knees, and his liquid eyes fixed upon me; and when I tugged at his leash all he did was to wag his stump of a tail, as if he were saying: "Give me to the wolves, master, and escape with the lady!"

I do not think, however that he was saying that, or anything like it; for when the rush came, and we all four of us fled recklessly and impiously past the living tomb of the Magician, Black Peter was by no means lingering in our rear. In fact he was leading our blind flight.

Have you ever, my good son, been tossed up by some untoward and startling shock till you found yourself clinging to a tight-rope in eternity? Some such feeling I had when, as we approached the cleft in the wall before us, we were met by such a supernatural awe, for I can call by no other name the magnetic effluence that poured out upon us from what was beyond that barrier, that we were fain to crouch down, the Bard lowest of all, as do Catholics at the sacring of the Mass.

Huddled thus together, Black Peter on one side of me, and Morwyn on the other, and the Welshman a little in front, we instinctively turned our heads to face our enemies. The crowd burst in, headed by Mr. — and the Inquisitor as if shot out of a catapult. By reason of the propulsion of those behind them the violence of their descent into the vault was so overwhelming that any resistance offered them, whether physical or psychic, must of necessity have swept them in a confused welter to the ground.

And what did meet them and did fling them pell-mell into a surging and catastrophic heap was a sight aweinspiring enough, even to us for whose sake it occurred.

As for our protector, he dropped his grey head so violently to the earth that I actually felt the shock of his skull in contact with the stone floor! For that motionless Figure upon the stone bed heaved itself up, and erecting itself in a sitting posture before the inrush of intrusive phantoms, lifted a long threatening arm against them. I could see his hand, with the palm outwards and the fingers distended in the manner of the avenging Christ in Michelangelo's "Last Judgment," menacing them with what, for all I know, the Book of Revelations calls "the Second Death."

I expect it was simply my wooden-headed stupidity — for I've always had a tendency to "rush in where angels fear to tread" — but I didn't imitate our old Bard even then by hiding my face.

To confess the truth, I stared like an idiot with my mouth wide open. And now, after it's all over, I can't be too thankful that I did see what transpired before us. For one thing, I realized clearly enough that this mysterious

Being, from a Past so remote that the mind staggers at it, was not a phantom like the rest, but a thing of flesh and blood, even as Morwyn and myself.

I suppose he had gone further than any earthly creature into the mystery of life and by his power and his magic had put on, even while he lived, that “new body” of which St. Paul speaks. No doubt it was partly this, his not being dead and his not being a phantom, that overwhelmed these mad Shades in such a seething rout; but I soon became aware that he was doing much more than hurling them back. He was working some terrible spell upon them! He actually began uttering words, and I shall never to the end of my days forget the voice in which he spoke— “husky” as Dante says, from so long a sojourn among the dead.

And he didn’t speak in Leprosid either. Aye! but what a relief it was to my poor mortal ears to hear, for the first time in Hell, the accents of a living man! What his words were, God knows! I assumed then that they were in the ancient tongue of his countrymen. But they were abracadabra to my intelligence, and perhaps they weren’t Welsh at all, but some secret esoteric language common to the magicians of all ages. He only uttered a few of these husky words and then — just as if he’d done the whole thing in his sleep — his arm sank down to his side; and with a strange, long-drawn sigh, like the sound of a far-off sea on a great beach, he re-settled himself to his repose, and assumed again the position from which he had been aroused.

My interest had been so absorbed in the man himself that it wasn’t till he had retaken his recumbent position that I realized what he’d inflicted on our enemies.

He had turned them into the victims of their own cruelty! Black Peter must have been, after his fashion, aware of this, for he began sniffing the air as if he smelt a host of other animals.

Thinking it over afterwards there occurred to me many ways of diminishing the miraculousness of this act of magic. Take Mr. — himself. It's clear that day and night he must have had before him the image of the squirming creature from whom he was extracting his wretched drop of Satanic knowledge. This image — the image of the tortured beast — must have been emphasized in him to a point of mental intensity, stopping only just this side of a visual manifestation. All that the Magician's art had to do then, was to give bodily reality to this almost objectified thought; and where could he find the protoplasm for this save in the substance of the thinker himself, who, you must remember — now that he was a shadow — was made of very tenuous stuff?

I will not say it was a sight more shocking than the half-created eidola of victimization that I had caught floating round those two imponderable Idols; for these lacerated and macerated creatures now before me, their limbs and their flesh twisted, distorted, scraped, raked, combed, harrowed, shredded, gouged, singed, plague-spotted, till they had become mere ghastly puppets of petrified pain, were after all finished and done with, whereas those others were projections of what was, what is, and what was to come.

I fancy, too, that their transformation only lasted as long as they remained in the presence of their punisher. I think the moment they managed to scramble out — which they did in so wholesale a manner that their flight resembled an escape from a burning zoo — they must have resumed their natural shapes.

At any rate I could catch from among them the psychic shishing and soughing, the chittering and chattering, of their vile Leprosid the moment they were out of sight. So I take it they were not deprived permanently of their vicious "images of God." I hadn't the heart — nor indeed, to confess the truth, the stomach — to look closely at this seething and scrabbling mass of tortured flesh and blood; but I could see that though there were some human forms among them the majority were clearly victims of vivisection.

How far the perpetrators of these crimes, who had been compelled to assume the ghostly ligaments and phantom fibres of the flesh they had desecrated, felt the pain they had inflicted, I cannot tell. Certainly I saw one dog tottering out of sight that looked as if it were in abominable suffering; and on my soul, this particular animal had something about its appearance that made me think of Bitch Bessie. Had there perhaps been some predecessor of Bitch Bessie who —

But I was interrupted in my thoughts by our triumphant guide, who with his noble lineaments distorted by overpowering awe informed us in a tremulous voice, keeping with some difficulty — such was his excitement — his Bardic-British syntax out of his Leprosid words, that the moment had come, if we were brave enough for such a quest, to enter the Sleeping-Place of Saturn.

You will easily understand me, my son, when I tell you that this audacious enterprise meant much less to me than it did to our good friend. For though I didn't take the sordid view of the late Mr. — that the mysterious Presences upon whose "eternal rest" we were to intrude were merely a treasure-trove of well-preserved mummies, I was so unacquainted with ancient mythology that the name "Saturn" brought little to my mind but the notion of a savage divinity who was accused of devouring his own children.

Instinctively I looked to Morwyn for a lead; but, not altogether to my discomfort, I found that she was still so drugged by sleepiness that though she was passive in my hands she was hardly aware of the danger we had just escaped, or alive to the importance of what we were going to do next.

Supporting therefore her wavering, sleep-drugged steps with one hand, while with the other I held Black Peter's leash, I followed our guide, with outward boldness but inward trepidation, through the cleft in the rock, into what lay beyond.

The first thing I realized, when we had pushed our way through the narrow passage, was that the place we entered was of unexpected and startling dimensions. Indeed I could see no boundary to it, whether of horizon or roof. It struck me as an adamantine pavement without end, without walls, without sky, without any dimension that Science could measure! The very pavement itself was of an unknown metallic substance, much more like bronze than like any stone I have ever seen, and the rays of light, which I soon perceived came from two separate centres in the place, were reflected from this brazen floor in a dull, deep, misty radiance, like the reflection of a late October sun upon the dead leaves of a thousand years.

Thickly-drifting, heavily-charged smoke-clouds of ancient sour-sweet incense, with a smell totally different from any I have ever known, wavered up and down in fluctuating eddies over the recumbent Presences of this strange spot.

I said there were two distinct centres from which the dim yellowish rays diffused themselves through the place; and as we stood with our backs to Merlin's hiding-place, Morwyn in her half-drugged state leaning in relaxed abandonment upon me, and Black Peter with quivering nostrils and vibrant tail straining forward, I could see that one of these reservoirs of light was on the left of us and the other on the right of us, and that in each case the light emanated from the top of an exalted oblong mound, like the longer-shaped mounds among our oldest prehistoric earth-works.

I became aware also that the clouds of drifting incense, although they mingled together over our heads, came, just as the light did, from these two divergent directions, and I thought I could even detect a difference in their fragrance.

I noticed for instance that the one that pleased me the more, and seemed even to exercise a mysterious pull upon me, drawing me towards its source, proceeded from the left-hand Mound; while the other, the one proceeding from the right, seemed, from the way she made unconscious little movements of pleasure whenever it touched her forehead, to be Morwyn's preference. It was the opposite flickering of these separate streams of light and the opposite drifting of these separate currents of precious odours that made it difficult at first to see what was immediately in front of us, midway between these Mounds of misty sweetness and dim radiance; but as I looked more closely I could clearly make out the brazen rim of a gigantic Cauldron, and beyond this what looked like a seated image of the extremest limit of human old age.

It had been towards this seated figure behind the cauldron that our guide all this while had been directing his impassioned gaze: and I was surprised, when the drifting incense lifted a little and we both could see what was there, to hear him utter a deep and disappointed groan.

And then to my astonishment he began rolling off rhythmical vowel-deep symphonies of indignant eloquence, no longer in Leprosid, but in his own bardic language.

Though I couldn't make out one single word he uttered, it was, I can assure you, an indescribable relief to find that we were free in this place to speak once again in our native tongues; and without, I am afraid, showing much interest in the cause of the old man's disappointment I began whispering rapidly and volubly in our blessed English; and oh! how lovely it sounded and how sweet it tasted! I whispered to Morwyn, I whispered to Black Peter, I even whispered to the mysterious Presences. I would have whispered to that vast cauldron in a minute, for the thing had a look — I can't explain why — that made me think of the Blessed Sacrament; but I soon found that my old gentleman was seriously disturbed, for he began casting wild and agitated looks about him, looks that were extremely at variance with the lotus-breathing languor of this place.

So I instinctively began speaking to him in the language of Hell; and I am thankful to say he replied to me at once in the same tongue. As long as I didn't have to whisper in that infernal shorthand of theirs, I was quite ready to use Leprosid to the end of my days, just as Englishmen will use French, purely as a convenient common coinage.

Hurriedly the old Bard explained to me that it was from the Cauldron of the great Welsh goddess, Caridwen, that he had derived, in the first of all his incarnations, his occult wisdom from Europe and Africa, and that it was a bitter disappointment to him to see that the figure he had expected to be of a woman was of a man, and a man with a snow-white beard descending to his knees!

The old gentleman was so outraged to see this bearded antiquity, where he had expected to behold the mysterious goddess of his most intimate worship, that I was at the end of my wits to console him. But it sometimes happens that a fool and an ignoramus manages to hit the mark where wiser ones fail, and so it proved in this case; for ignorant as I am of ancient mythology, I am unusually quick — I suppose because of my sensual nature — to detect the faintest signs of feminine attraction, and I had been gradually coming to the conclusion that the mysterious Presence on our left, from whose Mound of Sleep came the fragrant incense that especially stirred me, was of the feminine sex.

"If it's a beautiful goddess you expected to find down here," I said to him in Leprosid, "I shall be much surprised if your divinity is not over there.” And I made a shrewd inclination of my head towards the Mound on our left.

He gazed searchingly at me. “But — but—” he stammered, and I noticed that his awe was so great that he dared not look directly at the spot from which this delicate fragrance was wafted— “but that” — he did not even dare to say “she”— “must be” — and I had a momentary panic lest in his infinite reverence he would revert to their horrid whispering— “must be — can only be — the Great Mother herself.”

“The Great Mother?”

He positively gasped at my stupidity.

“Rhea, Bona Dea, Cybelè, Dindymene, Magna Mater, Titæa, Ops—” he began.

I raised my hand, and suppressing an inclination to smile — for after all a half-pay officer of His Majesty’s Forces could hardly be expected to take such a rigmarole in solemn earnestness — I modestly suggested that since the Personage on our left had already so many names there seemed no reason that the name he made so much of shouldn’t be added to the list.

“You mean,” he murmured, while a gleam of hope lit up his anxious lineaments, “that — she — may be Caridwen?”

I overcame my inclination to smile, and replied gravely that I saw no reason why she shouldn’t be.

“She is evidently a Being of many aspects,” I repeated. “Why shouldn’t she have been worshipped in our part of the world under a Welsh name?”

“Why not?” I concluded. It certainly was an ironic turn of the wheel that I — a plain half-pay soldier in these troublous days — should have been the one to reassure this master of mysteries upon so nice a point; but as I said before, there are moments when the veriest simpleton can instruct the wisest.

I was all this while leaning against the wall through which we had come, holding Morwyn's warm relaxed body against my own while Black Peter lay peacefully on the ground beneath us, his head upon one of my feet.

Our old friend, who struck me at the moment as resembling the ghost of Don Quixote, had fallen upon his knees and with his head bowed on his chest was muttering some rhythmical invocation, directed to that obscure Mound on our left towards which I myself was aware of a growing attraction.

We were all in a curious condition, both mentally and physically; our nerves, now that the old man had found his Caridwen in the bride of Cronos, profoundly quieted, and our minds filled with a peace beyond peace.

But the strange thing was that in the midst of this Reverential cessation of all mental or physical activity a deep unutterable voluptuousness took possession of us.

I have experienced in my time, as all amorists must have done, delicious sensations of diffused sensuality, sweeter and more entrancing than any actual erotic satisfaction, but what I felt now was ten times more intense.

I felt as if beneath that mystic Mound, sleeping its sleep until the return of its bloodless rule, when cruelty and torture would be ended and all these scientific horrors would seem monstrous insanities, lay in etherealized essence the eternal Well-spring of all the creative magic of femininity!

But the interesting thing was that Morwyn's girlish senses — and as I have already told you, my son, till no doubt you're sick of hearing it, never was a maiden more chaste — were evidently roused to exceptional voluptuousness by the incense that floated over to us from the right, from where in fact, as our friend had explained, “Sleep was the bond forged for Cronos.”

If the sensuality evoked in me by the presence of the Magna Dea of the Cretan Age was a delicately diffused emotion, you may imagine that what was felt by the slender form leaning against me was of a yet more tenuous quality. Such as it was, however, you will believe me, my son, when I tell you that I took full advantage of it. The heavenly yieldingness that melted her young frame under the influence of that Saturnian incense, oh, what enchanting pleasure it was to me, as I pressed her soft body against my own!

We were disturbed in our happiness, which was of a far more mutual character, let me tell you, than any that our propinquity had aroused before, by the old man rising from his knees in a new state of excitement, The profane thought crossed my mind, as I turned to listen to him, that his invocations must have been somewhat perfunctory for the last five minutes, if his thoughts had had the time to travel so far in a different direction!

What he was now talking to us about — and Morwyn was evidently prepared to listen to everything in a most fond manner, looking up at him with a bewitching responsiveness — was the huge Cauldron, beyond which we could still see that bearded sleeper nodding in his upright chair.

I certainly had never realized what a mystical and sacred object a cauldron was to the ancient inhabitants of these islands till I heard the old man roll out his sonorous and enigmatical list of these miraculous vessels, just as Don Quixote might have done with his interminable romances. His enumeration commenced, where perhaps it should have ended, with mention of the Christian Grail, but I confess I was relieved when he began to do justice to vessels of a remoter antiquity; for with all this Cretan incense in my veins I felt in anything but an ascetic mood.

“Which of all these sacred objects do you suppose this one to be?” I asked him. But I regretted I had done so immediately afterwards, for careless of my total ignorance of ancient Welsh he began, in a low impassioned voice, to chant what I suppose was a bardic composition of his own. I could of course make nothing of this; and even Morwyn, though she knew modern Welsh pretty well, seemed at a loss, though in her relaxed mood she smiled so sweetly at the old man that he appeared quite satisfied. She must have caught something of his meaning, however, for she repeated the mysterious word “Annwn” several times and also the words “Caer Sidi”; and after listening to them for a while I got a vague impression that this Cauldron of Annwn in the Sleeping-Place of Cronos was of some Apocalyptic significance.

“Does he mean that we are in Caer Sidi now?” I asked the girl, but she was in one of her Welsh moods when any point-blank question caused her evident pain, and I hurriedly let the matter drop.

Deep in my heart I cared very little where we were or by what learned names these Presences might be described. All I cared for was that the place had drugged her into forgetting her father. If it could also provide us with the means of getting back to earth I would be willing I thought, to insert the words “Caer Sidi” into every devotion I uttered to the end of my life.

“I have it!” cried the Bard suddenly. “That old man over there with the great beard is Rhadamanthus, the Judge of the Golden Age. He must have come from Crete to Carbonek with those Two. Shall we — dare we — go nearer to the Cauldron?”

I glanced at Morwyn who smilingly nodded assent. It was clear to me, not altogether without a spasm of jealousy, that the girl was in a mood to humour our guide to the uttermost. Walking gingerly therefore, as if we were pilgrims in some secret shrine in Tibet, surrounded by the living and the dead, we moved round the Cauldron, whose edge was garnished with what looked to me like extravagant pearls, each one as big as a heron's egg, and approached the seat of that judicial Ancient of Days.

"Why, he's a living man," cried Morwyn, "though he's as old as time!"

And certainly the figure we approached was made of the same stuff as ourselves, though his flesh was wrinkled and wasted to a degree that made him repulsive to look upon.

"He is no god. He's a man like Merlin," murmured our guide, "only Merlin survives by his own power, and this one by the gift of heaven."

"The gift was a cruel one," I thought; and even as we came to the Judge's feet I noticed that he was mumbling and gibbering to himself while the spittle ran down his monstrous beard.

He was indeed a lamentable specimen of an undying Judge. His flesh was mummified into parchment upon his bones, not by human art but by the more merciless art of nature; and it covered his gaunt skeleton like an ill-fitting garment of dead leaves. It hung in wrinkles and folds on his thin neck, and in leathery flakes on his hollow cheeks; while his hands, which still clutched tenaciously after all these centuries at his precious wand of office, resembled the withered hands of the father of all forest apes. Into such a pitiful scarecrow of righteous judgment had the "iniquity of time" reduced the lawgiver of the Golden Age! I suppose it was the withered wretchedness of this undying sacrifice to the cause of justice — and far kinder would it have been to have buried these lamentable bones out of sight and allowed this weary soul to refresh itself in the fields of asphodel — that produced the extraordinary event that now occurred.

Ever since Merlin had transformed those devils into the victims of their own bigotry I had been occasionally conscious of a tickling and scratching sensation in the middle of my back. Several times I had tried to reach the place with my hands; but had given it up, partly, I confess, because to my old-fashioned mind, though I suppose you modern lads think nothing of scratching in the presence of your girls, there was something humiliating in being caught by Morwyn in such a low activity.

But now the discomfort was fully explained; for, taking, as he must have done, this forlorn Rhadamanthus, with his black wand, to be the royal ancestor of all monkeys, an indescribably mutilated and disfigured little ape, who instead of escaping from the magician's anger as the rest of them had done by hurrying back to Hell, had sought refuge under my coat, now leapt forth and scrambling up upon the pearl-bordered brim of the Cauldron of Annwn — or was it of Caridwen? — sat there jabbering and screaming.

Our guide, who had made an instinctive effort to prevent the little creature from reaching his venerated Mystery, now fell back into one of his hushed and awed expectancies, evidently anticipating some catastrophic upshot.

Nor did his anticipation go unfulfilled; for no sooner had the beast's hands and feet clutched that sacred rim than we were made witnesses to a most shocking phenomenon.

Two completely separate voices suddenly proceeded from the monkey's throat, voices that at once began angrily conflicting with each other. One of these voices was the voice of the monkey itself and the other was the voice of its vivisector. I wasn't altogether satisfied with our guide's mythological explanation of the place where we were. "Caer Sidi" sounded as remote as the zodiac to me; and in fact at the back of my mind was a dim idea that some living species of homo sapiens may in prehistoric times have established itself underground and that this was the headquarters, so to speak, of the tricks by which it was ruled.

But I confess I was horrified by the startling clamour that now rose up from that gesticulating little beast as it clung to the magic cauldron. Though this place may not have been the eternal refuge of the First-Born of Earth and Heaven, it was undoubtedly a holy place; and I felt outraged that it should be desecrated in this manner. Nor, as far as I was concerned, could I catch a single intelligible word, though both these voices out of the monkey's belly were apparently speaking my own tongue.

Our guide was even more aghast than I was to hear so violent an altercation issue from the throat of a scarcely recognizable ape. I caught him muttering in his ancient language some gnomic sentence that sounded like "Gwern gwngwch uiwch," that I took to be a reference to those alder trees we had seen in Hell for I knew "Gwern" had something to do with alders.

As for Morwyn I could see that the sight of this vivisected creature recalled to her mind the one thing I had prayed she had forgotten — that appalling litany of exultant torture chanted by her father. This I knew at once by the way her hands went up to her ears.

And then, to the complete amazement of all of us, the undying Cretan Judge, moving aside the white hairs that covered his mouth and the heavy eyebrows that covered his eyes, with the ferule of his rod, gave us as well as the poor little double-voiced beast a shrewd and piercing glance; and it soon became clear to me that in his infirmity he took Morwyn and me for monkey-friends of the poor creature.

"This — is — not," his words began slowly; but as they went on they soon gathered weight and speed. "This is not as strange to Rhadamanthus, as it seems to be to the relatives in court," and he gave me a very grim look. "Centaurs and chimæras have ere now come before our judgment-seat and have gone away satisfied. Speak one by one, accused and accuser, so that we can hear more clearly and the better judge. Let the accuser begin."

Awed into silence I suspect rather by the patriarch's tone than by the meaning of his words which were in Homeric Greek, the vivisector in the belly of the victim held his peace, allowing that poor husk of an ape's body to speak for itself.

"He used me for human diseases till I could bear it no longer," screamed the disfigured ape, "and then he practised on me with a slow instrument to learn the effect of extreme fear upon certain of my organs. He did the same thing with a cat and a dog; and I can see the dog's eyes now, and the way the cat bit in a spasm at its own flesh. One of us got loose and drew a drop of blood from him, and you should have heard the fuss they made about that! They said he was an heroic martyr. What I want to ask you, great Judge, is this: Is it right to cause us all this intolerable and prolonged pain just for the sake of knowledge? If they were like serpents and swallowed us it would be different. What I call wicked is the way they do it in cold blood, simply for knowledge. That is my plea, great Judge — that it is wicked to extract so little knowledge out of so much pain. Is it right, or is it wrong? And if it's wrong, why do they give them a licence to do it?"

Morwyn dropped her hands from her ears. Black Peter sat up and stared, panting wildly as he always does when he's very excited.

The Ancient of Days gave us a prolonged and puzzled look. To his dim old Minoan mind it must have seemed queer that a she-monkey could be as lovely as Morwyn. But he turned to Taliesin. "It is against the custom of our court," he remarked gravely, "to use the plaintiff's relatives as interpreters; but perhaps you," he evidently regarded our guide as some kind of semi-immortal— "know enough Greek to tell me what that poor creature has just said. I can see he has suffered some great wrong."

Our guide came forward gladly in obedience to this; but his response was unintelligible to me. It may have been Greek; but if so, it was Druidical Greek, and spoken with an extremely Celtic accent.

But Rhadamanthus seemed to get the drift of it; for he soon made an abrupt sign to the Welshman to stop, and turning to the monkey on the Cauldron's edge, remarked categorically: "Stand down, so that the accused may address the court."

The monkey's disfigured body quivered and shook, and a human voice began to mingle with its pitiful wail; but this gouged-out and scraped-out phantom of a shredded husk, that once in its natural body had swung free among golden boughs, must have felt that it was on the verge of being swallowed up in that vast gulf of black Nothingness, in which the shrillest screams are silenced, and must have resolved to break its cracked heart in one culminating appeal. If such a ghost of a ghost had any intelligence left at all it must have observed how this withered judge of monkeys and of men spoke with a grave sympathy for its doom.

"Judge, Judge!" it shrieked, while its small hands clung desperately to the edge of the Cauldron, just as its perishing consciousness clung to the edge of extinction, "there's a cry going up from these places of torment, a wail of nether-most despair, such as no martyrs at the stake have ever uttered! These, oh just and righteous Judge, had paradise and glory to look for, but we have nothing — nothing, nothing, nothing, nothing! Think not because we're dumb that we lack the feelings of your branch of our race. Closed in our cages, behind those great stone walls, none can hear our screams but those who cause them. No Heaven, no Jesus, have we to look for when the torment is over! Even Inquisition-prisoners, even political prisoners, have a faint hope that one day they may escape. We have no hope — None is ever seen alive again that once crosses a vivisection threshold.

Their devilish Science does its best to enable them to kill one another — thousands of them it kills with its gases and engines to one it saves with its vivisection! — but when they're wounded they're allowed to go free and to live long. Never can we go free. The sight of what they reduce us to would turn all but scientific stomachs sick with nausea and shame. At first we can hardly believe that human beings can be such fiends. Hunters and wild beasts we have known and the brutality of trappers; but this is another thing. Did you know that when once they've got us they keep us alive in our pain as long as possible? They bring us back to life a hundred times by their science; and then — begin it all over again. Think what we feel when we see them preparing to begin it again!

"'Yes, I'll have that monkey out now!' they order their attendants. 'Get it well strapped down!' We ourselves have killed and eaten in the struggle for life. But this is different. This is not a matter of life and death. This is not a matter of ancient custom. This is not a primary impulse of Nature. This is pure mental evil! This is the cold-blooded substitution of the law of evil for the law of good! O Judge, O stern and righteous Judge, hear me this once, this once, before I die forever! Even if out of our torment their race does prolong its life, is not that life under a curse? Their scientists think they can mock at God, mock at right and wrong, mock at good and evil. They say there's only nothingness behind the Motion that makes Matter. They say their ways of horrible cruelty are the law of the universe. Oh rise up, great and righteous Judge, and condemn these demons, so that the poor creatures of earth may be avenged!"

All the while the monkey was jerking out these words, in a sort of high-pitched pidgin English, its body was being contorted and convulsed. Evidently the particular vivisector whom Merlin had transformed into this small beast was excessively anxious to get a hearing.

And he certainly got it now; for the moment the monkey paused to take breath he gave him such a wrench that the miserable little thing let go its hold upon the edge, reeled for a second trying in vain to recover itself, and fell backwards into the Cauldron. There was a startled movement among us all at this point, mortal or immortal, living or dead. Rhadamanthus dropped his staff of office. Morwyn rushed to the brink of the Cauldron and peeped into its obscure depths. The old Bard made a hesitating and wavering movement towards the girl as she leant over that nearby rim. He evidently felt that her audacity was unpardonable, but at the same time he couldn't resist a passionate curiosity to see what the result of her boldness would be.

No doubt he expected her daring hands, like those of

Rhiannon the mother of Pryderi, to be glued to that perilous rim.

But the issue was stranger than any of us expected; and to tell you the truth it was Black Peter who first got wind of its nature, for he now set up a savage fit of barking. In the appalling silence of Hell it had been a relief to hear the homely voice of a dog; but somehow in this sleeping-place of Saturn

Far sunken from the healthy breath of morn,
Far from the fiery noon and eve's one star

But profane or not, I fully understood the cause of the dog's agitation when I perceived Morwyn actually helping a brisk and malapert young phantom, obviously bursting with indignant amour propre, to extricate himself from the depths of the magic receptacle. Skipping down to the ground, and making a mock-reverence to Black Peter while both Morwyn and Taliesin drew hastily away from him, this lively young springald saluted the Judge with the air of a youthful atheist entering a consistory of cardinals.

"So you don't think much of modern science down here," he began briskly. "I kept telling them that, all the way. I kept warning them they'd get into trouble. I'm a Behaviourist myself and I find I can always predict future reflexes from past reflexes. 'But aren't we,' they said to me, 'survivors of the death of the body?' Think of their saying a thing like that in these days! But they didn't talk to me for long. I soon showed them they were only bodies still, only matter and motion, only chemical automatons, only organisms reacting to stimuli! I don't know what kind of a museum this may be, or who you are," and the young phantom stared defiantly at Rhadamanthus— "but I can tell you this. It won't be long before the whole world will be where it ought to be, under the heel of Science; and then all these backwaters of yours will be mopped up. It's beginning now! The new governments are scientific governments, and it won't be long before Science will have the whole race at its disposal. It's begun, I tell you, and nothing can stop it. Pity and mercy do you say? Why Science laughs at these old superstitions! Science will soon have the whole race to experiment on. The public's afraid of us already. I've only to say, "I'm a scientific man. I hold a licence from the Home Office,' and everyone bows and scrapes. They know it's coming. They know it's idle to resist. Why, we scientists rule the world already! See what we make of justice and mercy and all the old catch-words! Everything is chemical. Everything is subject to the law of cause and effect. I make no apology for my shadowy condition; but I make no claim either. I am no more a self, a soul, a spirit, than that monkey whose decease you're lamenting! Mankind has thought too highly of itself. Men are nothing as individuals. The whole human race amounts to nothing except as the subject of sociological experiment. And the public begins to recognize these truths. Look at our art; look at our writers; look at our rulers. What do they really admire? Machines! Are machines merciful? Are machines pitiful? Do machines follow the dictates of conscience? Does a machine lie awake in the night thinking about Good and Evil? I don’t know to whom I’m speaking in this Colosseum of Antiquities. But if this is any kind of a law court, I can only say I’m a privileged person. You’re all laymen here and know nothing of—”

But the Welshman could contain himself no longer. Rushing forward, his whole frame quivering with rage, he thrust his face so close to the young phantom that the latter contemptuously drew back and began grinning like a gamin.

“And what do you suppose that is?” the Bard shouted, pointing to the Cauldron. “That’s the Cauldron of Annwn! And if it wasn’t for that, where would you be now? You’d be screeching in the belly of a dead monkey — that’s where you’d be!”

There was a pause then, a pause of miserable discomfort to everyone present except the youthful vivisector. This arrogant young son of perdition took the opportunity of gazing with itching desire at Morwyn. Now the attraction of Morwyn’s girlish charm had been — I am not the one to deny it — enhanced tenfold by the warm waves of aphrodisiac incense that floated backwards and forwards over those two mystic Mounds.

As she shrank back to the feet of Rhadamanthus, whose old fingers kept feebly clutching the air, for he was too stiff to pick up his staff, her nervous confusion increased this appeal; and she certainly did look — at least to my eyes — absolutely irresistible.

For my own part I could think of nothing but of how she looked; and yet this insolent lad totally devoid of all the nobler values created of twenty thousand years of human evolution, found it as easy to look away from her as to look at her! His impertinent stare now wandered from Rhadamanthus to the Cauldron, and from the Cauldron to those two Mounds of Sleep.

"I would like," he murmured, talking apparently to himself, but surveying us all as if we were in cages in his Research Laboratory where his white-frocked assistants only waited the word to strap us down. "I would like — to do — a little — excavation — in this queer old place."

Then, giving Morwyn, who was still crouching at the Judge's feet, a casual glance, as much as to say: "I may, and again I may not, bother with you," he deliberately fumbled in his pocket for his note-book. But though these disembodied shadows seemed able to exercise a kind of de-tactilized pressure upon material objects, as when they steered their air-boats and as when our guide bore those burning alder boughs in his arms, it took them some time, as if in the manipulation of evasive magnetic currents, to adjust their will-power to their desired purpose.

So this cool young upstart's production of note-book and pencil to make a mathematical calculation of the exact number of furlongs between the Sleeping-Bed of the Son of Heaven and the Sleeping-Bed of the Daughter of Heaven was an affair of time.

And during this time, except for an occasional glance at Morwyn — as if to make sure she was still waiting his leisure — he hummed with patronizing carelessness a parody of the Mass that had recently become popular in his circle.

I looked at our guide and he looked at me, while Rhadamanthus, with his two-thousand-year-old fingers, made several touching attempts to reach the girl's dishevelled hair. Backwards and forwards above us swept the mystic clouds of immemorial incense, and not a sound was audible in this navel of the cosmos save the nervous breathing of Black Peter and the lewd humming of this impious popinjay. It was one of those moments that are so full of a strange poignancy that they remain in the mind like a wedge of ice, never to melt till death.

Waiting there, at the heart of the universe, I was struck by the fact that so far from diminishing the portentous awe which lay, cloud upon cloud, upon the solemn unconsciousness of those silent Presences the lewd ribaldry of this intrusive young phantom only intensified their mystery. And I was aware of an inkling, too, that the whole material universe, with all the dramatic issues that we see unrolling themselves, is forever being created and destroyed by the magic of the mind.

Intermittently amid these thoughts I caught myself glancing rather reproachfully at our ancient Bard. I confess it began to present itself to me as a queer thing, that, after all he had done for us in Hell, he should be powerless to deal with this insolent intruder into the resting-place of the Age of Gold. Though the whole scene, under the pressure of my whirling thoughts, seemed to rock and heave and sway, like an island upon a ghostly tide, yet the figures of Rhadamanthus and the Scientist, of the old Substance and the young Shadow, confronting each other under the Judgement-seat of the centuries, gathered to themselves such a significance at that eternal moment, that even Morwyn in her sweet confusion and Black Peter with his nervous pantings, drew back, as it were, to the misty horizon of my consciousness.

But the young vivisector had now completed his measurements; and the insubstantial pocket-book, with its careful data for a future excavation of Caer Sidi, was back again in that shadowy pocket.

As I am always reminding you, my indulgent son, I am only a doddering half-pay captain of His Majesty’s Forces, and it is not often that I can act boldly or wisely. But, as I have hinted, the aphrodisiac fumes that rose and fell with the glimmering light from those mystic Mounds seemed to exercise a quickening influence on my simple wits. I remembered the trick played upon the Marshal of France by our subtle Welshman, and I decided to try it upon this bold wraith.

"It must be about now," I remarked calmly, addressing the young man, "that that famous experiment on the brains of a thousand puppies is to take place, from which hope is entertained that the crisis of two most rare and interesting diseases may be postponed for half-an-hour. But I expect even the perfect Television of your best Screens down here will hardly be able —"

My words were like a burning fuse to a charge of gunpowder and the young man found difficulty in buttoning up his coat, his fingers trembled so. But he had only recently died. He was still young. He had rushed to damn himself the second his breath left his body, but he had some human instincts still clinging to him. He wasn't as de-humanized as Mr. —; and these subtle Minoan odours, in spite of his pocket-book, had had their effect on him.

In a flash, before it was possible to stop him, he leapt upon Morwyn and pressed his burning and yet ice-cold lips upon her panic-stricken mouth!

A burst of crimson fire dazzled my eyes; but snatching up the nearest weapon that offered itself, which turned out to be the fallen staff of Rhadamanthus, I struck wildly at him. I had never realized before, though I daresay if I'd been a more literary person Dante or Milton would long ago have enlightened me, that, though their bodies were only a little more corporeal than air, these souls of the dead were still subject to the mystery of pain.

Whether, during its long sojourn down here at the bottom of the world this staff of the great Judge had turned to stone, or whether the vegetation in that far-off Golden Age was tougher and more perdurable than ours, the youth set up a yell that pierced my bones, though being in Leprosid it made no audible sound.

Turning fiercely upon me he tried to tear the weapon from my hands. Again and again his ghostly fingers passed clear through its petrified substance, while the jerks he caused it to give almost threw me to the ground.

So violent was the strain of our struggle — his diabolical magnetic pull pitted against my normal human clutch — that in a second or two the rod broke in half, leaving the shorter but more jagged end in his possession. With this dangerous instrument, before I had time to defend myself, he proceeded to make repeated and vicious jabs at my groin, using the thing like a broken spear-head.

It was my turn now to cry out; and I am afraid I uttered a howl — and it wasn't in Leprosid either — that made that holy place resound. I could see that our guide was wrestling with him; for the white garments of the one and the black garments of the other seemed to mingle before my eyes; but the wretch kept on jabbing me in the same place till, dizzy and sick from the pain, I sank helplessly to the ground.

Triumphant from his victory he flung his weapon to the earth, and then, to my helpless indignation, proceeded deliberately to give Morwyn a second kiss.

"I'll take your love to your father!" he mocked, as he dashed away.

Following his flight with impotent rage I could see him beating the air with his hands, as if warding off — as Mephistopheles did the angels' rose-leaves — the formidable influences of the Sacred Mounds; but instead of directing his flight towards Hell, it seemed to me, perhaps owing to his excitement, that he was moving in the opposite direction.

But at any rate he was gone; and my comfort was that the torture of the puppies had taken place long before we descended down here; so that if he did get back to the Screens he wouldn't have the satisfaction of carrying the impress of Morwyn's lips to that particular entertainment. I think I may have become unconscious for a brief space of time after his departure for I have no recollection of being moved to the stone base of Caridwen's cauldron. But that is certainly where I found myself, when with a confusion of tumultuous emotions that I can still feel I saw Morwyn and our guide bending over me.

It was with a spasm of terror at my heart that I asked after Black Peter; for the thought crossed my mind: "He has carried him off!" and the vision of that shrinking little black form being dragged away to the slowest death it was possible to inflict caused a cloud of blackness to descend between me and Morwyn's sympathetic face.

But it was with an irresistible smile that Morwyn pointed out to me the familiar feathery paws with the black nose resting on them, as they crouched safely ensconced under the footstool of Rhadamanthus.

What I couldn't quite understand, and never have altogether, was the attitude taken by our guide to my wounded condition. He seemed intensely bothered, or perhaps I should say profoundly disturbed by the whole incident — I could see that. But his agitation did not seem to be caused by human sympathy with me, or by concern over my hurt, or by anxiety as to what was going to happen to us all? Oh, it's very difficult to explain to you, my son, precisely how his curious preoccupation struck me. It's a subtle point of course, but then our Welshman was one of the subtlest human beings I have ever met, but I am really, on the whole, temped to put it like this, strange as it may sound. He seemed to treat me as if I were one of the figures — not the principal figure, but one of the figures — in some mysterious Cosmic Rite, or Ritual, or Passion Play.

That’s as near as I can get, anyway, to the impression I had of his behaviour — and his behaviour was very odd. He was in fact never the same to me after this incident. It was as if in the place of any natural feeling he had for me as an individual — I don’t say he had much of that sort of thing but I do think he had a little — he now had the sort of attitude that anyone would feel to an anonymous priest, a totally unimportant priest, to whom chance had given a minor part in some awe-inspiring mystical ceremony.

The individual feelings of such a priest would be totally unimportant and less than negligible. It would be nothing to us if he had lumbago as he held up the cope of the High Priest, or if his spine should tickle extremely, when it was impossible for him to move a finger.

In my obsession over Morwyn it was at once with her that I linked this queer behaviour of our venerated friend. What strange beings we lovers are! I believe — though it is a shameful thing to have to confess — that deep in my heart I was conscious of a sense of injury because the girl didn’t seem more upset by the insult she had received. She certainly had been looking incredibly lovely as she crouched down at the feet of the old judge. All the enchantment of that Cretan incense had gathered about her. With or without her will her whole being diffused an irresistible attraction. Nor was this charm lessened by her complete unconsciousness, or by that virginal innocence of her senses the discovery of which had made such an impression on my libertine’s mind.

By degrees as she tended my hurt, which really caused me a great deal of pain, and as the old Bard watched her and struggled to adjust his mind to his occult vision of my condition, I seemed to gather from their attitude — not by anything they actually said, but indirectly by what they didn't say — that they felt I had brought this trouble upon myself and upon them by my own lack of self-restraint. Their idea seemed to be — mind you, they never spoke of it, but I felt sure I read it in their tone — that if I hadn't flown at him like that, the young wretch would have hurried off after his first kiss and left us all in peace.

There was some phrase in his ancient tongue that I caught our guide muttering when I first regained consciousness; and now, when he began repeating it to himself, I listened closely to the queer syllables. It sounded like the words, "Tryded anvat palvawt yn yr ynis honn," and because it struck me from the way Morwyn looked at him that she understood its significance, I asked her pointblank what the thing meant.

And then it was — and I so often think of it now as I lie here, still suffering from this curst hurt in my groin — that she smilingly asked me if I'd ever read The Four Branches of the Mabinogi?

I must have looked somewhat blank at this; and I daresay, in my weakness and pain, I replied rather peevishly that I'd never even heard of the work in question. "They don't teach us Old Welsh at Sandhurst," I said, "but what does it mean?"

"The Third Dolorous Blow in this island," she answered.

"But I admit," she added with a smile, "I don't see how it applies to you."

Part Four

I HAD LOST by this time all consciousness of the passing of days, and since we hadn't seen the blessed light of the sun since our first descent, it is useless to try to tell you how long we remained in this lotus-drugged Hall of Sleep. Much of our time was spent in listening to our guide's somewhat obscure discourses. He pretended once or twice, though I took it for poetic licence, that he'd been here before; but the main drift of his argument, as far as I could make out, was that in the spiral evolution of terrestrial happenings the Powers of the Golden Age who were sleeping here would eventually rise up again and bring a happier life to the world.

I got Morwyn to ask him once in a whisper, not a Leprosid whisper but a Welsh one, whether this forlorn Rhadamanthus who made me think of that frightening description in Dean Swift of the undying old men—"Struldbrugs" I think he calls them — would play a part in this happy consummation; and I still remember his answer, for I think it was a good one.

"God," he said, "leaves to chance and free will the details of His purpose; but we may be sure that the Justice of the Age of Gold will return, whatever happens to its Judge."

Considering things later, when I had the normal seasons to go by, I fancy we must have remained encamped — if I may use such expression — between that Cauldron and that Judgment-seat for at least three months.

I must have been a miserable care to both Morwyn and our charitable Welshman, for they had to be frequently carrying me considerable distances from our bivouac, and as frequently coming to fetch me, so that I might, as we say, “obey Nature” in all propriety and decency.

At first I used to be extremely fussy about this; and made them carry me quite long distances; in fact till I could hardly see those sacred Mounds, or the gorsedd of Rhadamanthus; but by degrees I became less punctilious. But, you may be sure, however far I was carried, Black Peter came caracoling behind us, and as I think of it now we must have appeared a queer cortège to the vision of the immortal Judge, as he watched us disappear in the mist!

As to food and drink, including Black Peter, we needed not to take thought, for the Cauldron supplied us freely. “It is the ‘peculiarity,’” our guide would remind us — and he always made use of the old word Kynnedyf— “of all magic Cauldrons, whether the Cauldron of Caridwen, or the Cauldron of Pywll Penn Annwn, as I believe this one to be, or the Cauldron of Diwruach the Goidel, or the Cauldron of Gwydno Garanhir, that they should supply the brave and the beautiful” — and he would cast a faintly ironic look at me and a lingering look of almost maudlin adoration at my girl— “with the best refreshment any human heart could desire.” And then he would launch into that particular poem of his own about a former visit of his down here, which I always regarded, but I daresay unjustly, as pure boasting. I heard the words so often that I got quite weary of their wind-in-a-stone-circle sound. They ran something like this:

And Morwyn told me Rhys has translated them as follows:

“Perfect is my chair in Caer Sidi:
Plague and age hurt him not who’s in it—”

I am afraid I criticized this last passage to our friend, indicating, during one of our daily excursions, that in the particular example before us of extreme old age in Caer Sidi it could hardly be said to be so desirable.

The Bard’s retort to this was that God gives to all souls what they want most and will continue doing so, till all the cruel ones in the world have deliberately damned themselves to Hell. “It’s a terribly slow method,” added the old gentleman sadly, “and our respected Rhadamanthus, being dissatisfied with the slowness of it, has got what he wanted most, the position of an immortal righteous judge.”

“There may be yet, my child,” murmured the Bard.

“But if the vengeance of God is so slow,” protested the girl, “how are the weak to be protected from the strong?”

The poet only replied with a sigh; but after a pause he said, in a low far-away voice: “The weak are sometimes stronger than the strong.”

In spite of my crippled state, for I couldn’t move more than a few steps without support, and in spite of the pain in my groin, the days — if we can speak of them as days, for we slept when we wanted to sleep and waked when we wanted to wake — passed peacefully enough. Whether it was due to some magnetic effluence from the two Divine Sleepers, or whether she was hiding her thoughts too deep in her heart for my clairvoyance to reach, my sweet love seemed no longer fretting about her father. I sometimes wondered if the man’s appalling eulogy upon vivisection had killed her feeling for him; but, knowing her as I did, I didn’t play with this thought very long.

At any rate the time passed easily in Caer Sidi. Black Peter’s tendency to begin barking at any sudden move of the old Judge was practically the only thing that really disturbed us. We found a beautiful pool of water to wash in, not too far away, and my companions would sometimes leave me there for a change, while they walked together and discussed their interminable Welsh topics.

It was on one of these occasions, and they had left me stretched out on the brink of this pool, my mind pondering languidly upon the everlasting question as to whether we should ever get back to the surface of the earth, when I realized, to my startled surprise, that a strange figure was approaching me. He approached from the direction directly opposite the cleft in the rock that led to Merlin’s hiding-place but yet he did not move like one who had come from very far.

I was clearly not visible to him till he came quite close; and he gave a lively exclamation of astonishment when he stumbled upon me lying there.

But if his astonishment was great, mine was a good deal greater, especially so as I was certain I had seen him before, though where or when I couldn’t think! He was dressed a little like our old guide, but in a much less incommodious attire, and on his naked feet were a stout pair of leather sandals.

But oh! I was sure I had seen that physiognomy somewhere. It was an unforgettable face and to tell you the truth it was the most unprepossessing human countenance I have ever seen in my life. He was an elderly man, though not, I fancy, as old as our Welshman; but his features were positively monstrous in their ugliness. He had a thick negroid nose, loose sensual lips, staring, animal-like eyes, and with his short, bristly beard and his bull neck he resembled nothing so much as those gross eighteenth-century vignettes of the demi-god Silenus that one sees in the frontispieces of old bawdy publications.

And the moment he opened his lips and addressed me I knew who he was! Have you guessed, my son? No! I suppose not, with your modern education. But he was Socrates of course; and since by good luck I had "taken" the Apology at my prep-school and have always been an adorer of his adorer, Rabelais, I soon found, after I'd begged him to speak with slow articulation, that I could get the hang of his words.

He seated himself, with an easy and considerate courtesy, quite out of keeping with his boorish physiognomy, very carefully at my side, arranging himself so that I could see him and hear him with the least possible effort, and have at the same time my view of that lovely pool of water entirely unimpeded.

Before seating himself, however, I noticed that he made, casually and almost automatically, like an old, benevolent, credulous-ironic priest, a gesture of worship to the Genius Loci or indwelling Numen of this charming pool, dipping reverently the palm of one of his great hands into it and sprinkling the drops upon the air.

What struck me at once about him was that he was so much more of a solid ghost than the others. It was as if his genius for falling into philosophical trances at any moment and in any place, while it was unable to spiritualize his muscular frame, had the opposite effect of thickening out his surviving wraith with a corporal opacity altogether beyond the normal. You should have heard — only I fear my British officer's directness must have seemed somewhat blunt to this metaphysical foot-soldier of Athens — how I struggled with my wretched prep-Greek to compliment him on the surprising solidity of his posthumous flesh and blood.

He seemed greatly amused at my favourable opinion of his pretensions — shadowy enough as they were — to substance and opacity; and he proceeded at once to give me — speaking just as he must have done to his young disciples by the Ilyssus, only a little bit slower and with fewer niceties of wit — a most original explanation of his prosperity as a ghost. He said he had always been an impassioned worshipper of youthful beauty and had so long cultivated the power either to yield to his emotions or to restrain them, that his inner being had become absolutely impregnated with the vitality of the erotic.

And thus, when he came to die, there was twice as much livingness in what survives death as is the case with most men. I think he thoroughly enjoyed explaining this to me and drawing his images and illustrations from the delicate reflections in the pool at our feet and the lovely spirals of fragment vapour, that kept forming and reforming in the air above us; and he led me on to make such unheard-of use of my prep-Greek, — but I must have been extremely well-grounded in the rudiments — that I broached a subject that was very close to my heart, but that I hadn't dared to mention to our Welsh friend.

The truth is I felt much more at my ease with this grotesque-looking sage with his prize-fighter's body than I ever did with our heroic guide.

There is something — some sort of imaginative reserve — about the Welsh nature that has always prevented me from feeling quite at home with it; whereas to this un-fastidious Greek, free from all suppressions and all resentments, though, I suspect, taking most things with a pinch of Attic salt, I felt at once that there was simply nothing I couldn't say.

To be plain with you, my son, I told him how bitterly — especially since I had been crippled with this wound in my groin — I had missed the relief and comfort of smoking cigarettes.

He was extremely interested in my accounts of the virtues of tobacco and declared with an engaging smile that he would like to experiment in its power over erotic agitation. “I have been in the habit,” he said, “of inhaling the smoke of dead asphodel stalks. Something of the sort has become a necessity to me; for I have been undergoing a trying time of late. The truth is I have been — But I don’t want to bother you! Are you tired of this secluded spot? Would you like me to carry you back whence you came?”

The tender graciousness of the look he gave me as he said this is something I shall never forget. I can see now, the moment I shut my eyes, the way it illumined his satyr-like features.

“Oh no!” I exclaimed, and I anxiously cast my eyes over the now quite familiar aspects of this mysterious “field of sleep.” I wanted to catch sight of my companions.

Yes! there they were, walking as gravely and serenely side by side as if they had been in the Elysian Fields! I suppressed the faintest flicker of a jealous pang; and hoisting myself up as well as I could, I pointed them out to my new friend. I think I detected a shade of disappointment cross his face when he took them in. I suppose a young girl meant little to him, and I daresay one of his chief objects in leaving Paradise was to escape the society of elderly poets.

“Listen, my friend,” he said hurriedly. “Before your companions appear I must tell you why I’ve come. I believe I can trust you?”

To this I replied that it was not the habit of His Majesty’s officers — even on half-pay — to betray the confidences of fellow-soldiers.

“So it’s soldier to soldier, is it?” he remarked with a smile. “Well, it’s like this. I’ve always been more of a city-person myself than a countryman, but they knew my ways in Athens, and when I wanted to sink into my soul, and converse with my daimon, they let me alone, even if I stood still for hours in the market-place! But since my death I've been greatly harassed by troublesome sophists. Every new philosopher who dies must needs come bustling to Paradise to explain his ideas to Socrates; and none of them seem to understand that the humble questions I put to them, aren't quite as simple as they sound. I didn't mind it so much in what I understand you call your Middle Ages; for though very learned in the works of one of my pupil's disciples, an industrious student of Nature, they still put the Human Conscience and the difference between Good and Evil in the forefront of their doctrines. But a dreadful person — I believe he belonged to your remote island — whose patronymic was Bacon turned up, and since his time everything went wrong. The soul of a wise man, the conscience of a good man, became no longer the test of the purpose of the System-of-Things. And it gets worse and worse. Oh, my good friend, you have no idea to what things I've been compelled to listen! I've had to give up my ironic method altogether. It makes no impression on these fellows. They take my pretended ignorance literally and lecture me as if I were a child. They seem to think that the mere study of what they call Science gives them the right to defy Conscience, to mix up Good and Evil, and to practise devilish cruelty. They come jostling round me when I want to sink into my soul, and worry me to death with talk about reflexes and complexes. And I can't see any ennobling of human character, any enriching of the human mind, any real philosophical wisdom, issuing from their theories. They don't seem to understand that the centre of the cosmos lies in a man's soul, in a man's character, in the difference between Good and Evil as the System-of-Things reveals itself to our reason. They even talk as if the phenomenal accidents of cause and effect limited the working of the highest intelligence. But I see your friends are coming and I must be quick.

"As I say, I have been, for some centuries now, living alone not far from here, hoping against hope that these rulers of the Golden Age would awake from sleep. But I've been disturbed lately by a most lamentable invader of my solitude. One of those old defeated Titans — I don't know whether you've heard of him: Tityos he calls himself and he claims to be one of the first children of Heaven and Earth — has forced his way into my refuge. He's a pitiful and horrible spectacle, larger than human in his body but weaker than human in his wits, and he is tormented by two loathsome birds, or ghoulish ghosts of birds, who tear at his vitals without mercy or respite. I think they renew their base lemur-like existence from his immortal decomposition.

"Now I believe he could wring these foul creatures' necks, for, like himself, they are more tangible than ordinary phantoms, if it weren't for a mental delusion from which he suffers. He's got it lodged in his afflicted brain that only Rhadamanthus can absolve him from his guilt, and until that is done he won't raise a hand against these winged demons. But that's not all! The worst of it is that quite recently there has drifted into my retreat a second intruder, in the form of the most unpleasant young man, with the most abominable ideas, that I've ever set eyes on. My accusers at home were pillars of righteousness — and between ourselves I did of course, from their point of view, corrupt many lads — compared with this young upstart. I certainly have no wish to try to corrupt him. Nor, to do him justice, does he beat about the bush or mince matters very much.

"When I asked him what philosopher he followed, and alluded to Democritus, who was I believe the first thinker to divorce reason from conscience, he told me he was a 'Behaviourist'; and when I put to him a few humble questions — and I assure you my face remained perfectly grave — you have never heard, my dear Captain, such monstrous, inhuman, and grotesque dogmas as issued from those youthful lips I “Had he but once murmured that philosophical phrase which is the axiomatic basis of all polite discussion and which I always taught my pupils to introduce, ‘might it not seem,’ or ‘isn’t it possible for us to suppose,’ I would have listened to him patiently; but when I heard this conceited baby laying down the law for a universe that baffles the oracles of the immortal gods, when I heard him announce that beyond the use of teeth and claws and the getting of progeny man has no access to the mystery of life, in fact when I heard him imply, as I assure you he did, that to him the cosmos was no longer a mystery, I was compelled to retire to the interior of my cave, and to the inhaling of asphodel-smoke.

“But now comes the point; and you must forgive me if these long years of silence have made me long-winded. After driving me to remain in my cell, what must this popinjay of science do — and he himself assures me that these vivisectors are quite distinct from ordinary doctors and form a special class by themselves — but begin experimenting upon this poor half-witted Titan!

“I suppose, in his contempt for the past, he regards this early child of the cosmos as so entirely sub-human as to be good for nothing but the torture-chamber of physiological ‘truth.’

“On the contrary, all that this wretched giant needs is the authority of someone who represents to him absolute spiritual infallibility. It’s an unphilosophical wish, but hardly an inhuman one. You see, he’s got on his crazy brain the unhappy delusion that the more exciting and satisfying an erotic pleasure is the wickeder it is!

“In my study of human religions I have come so often upon the track of the cruel Zeus and the cruel Jahveh that I now recognize that they are the same; the same inchoate Monster, perpetually being re-created by the energy of cruel minds! This purely speculative conclusion I have of course verified down here" — and he nodded his satyr's head in the direction of that pair of Abominations between whose legs we had escaped into this Limbo— "and it interested me to remark," he went on, "that the scientific Idol, though so much younger, is already a good deal more horrible-looking than his mate. But of course both of them—"

He was interrupted at this point by the arrival of Morwyn and our guide; and I regret to say that the moments that followed were unpleasant ones to us all.

Of course I had had plenty of what you might call "lover's quarrels" with my sweet girl since we descended into Hell, but this was the first time that I gravely and profoundly disapproved of her behaviour. She took an intense dislike to Socrates; and I grieve to say hesitated not to express her feelings in manner, tone, and speech. She shrank back from him far more noticeably, she avoided looking at him far more apparently, than she had ever done with the Marquis of Sade or with the impertinent young phantom who had kissed her!

And unfortunately her feelings appeared to be entirely shared by Taliesin. Thinking it over afterwards, I came to the conclusion that in Morwyn's case it was pure feminine divination. She saw that the Athenian wasn't attracted to her and never would be! She felt that when she spoke he wouldn't listen, when she smiled he wouldn't respond, when she wept he wouldn't yield, and when she looked her most lovely and touching he would notice nothing.

With Taliesin, I believe, it was not very different. Supreme genius as he was, like all poets he craved instantaneous admiration and unbounded reverence. But the Athenian Sage, ironically indulgent to the humbler commonalty, had already crossed swords with more than one distinguished poet.

He bothered them by his ironic questions and they bothered him by their prophetic assurance. So that, just as Morwyn knew in advance that her charms would draw no blood from this ugly-looking philosopher, so the Welshman knew in advance that his peculiar kind of genius could never, under any circumstances, have justice done it in that same quarter.

This reluctance in my devoted companions to accept my new friend cast a gloom over the return to our "camp" — if I may so call it — beneath the magic Cauldron.

But when the Athenian explained to Rhadamanthus, whose pitiful appearance with that broken staff in his withered hand in no way lessened the respect with which the philosopher treated him, I was astonished at the change that took place in the old man.

"We have heard of you," this forlorn image of ancient justice cried, and the sound of his voice was like the sound of the wind among dead reeds. "You are the thinker who died, not for knowledge, but to obey his conscience, to obey that eternal law of Right and Wrong which is beyond all reasoning and all wisdom, which is, in fact, de facto and de jure, the will of the System-of-Things. Aye! We know thee who thou art; the one who obeyed the Law, for the sake of the god in his own breast!"

And as he uttered these words I was amazed to see great tears, "tears as big as ostrich-eggs," roll down his hardly human countenance.

And when the Athenian went on further, and with grave humility implored the great Judge to leave his seat in Limbo for a brief space and bestow his official pardon upon this tortured son of the Earth, I could hardly believe my eyes at what I saw.

Very slowly, and with infinite pain to his petrified limbs, that grim Arbiter of the Golden Age actually descended from his seat of Judgment! He was forced to rest for a space then, leaning upon the stalwart shoulder of the Athenian; but he gathered up his great beard and thrust it under his belt, and though for a moment his skeleton-frame seemed to sway like a leaning tower troubled at its foundations, he soon stretched forth the hand that clutched the broken staff and rested it against the rim of the Cauldron.

The Welshman gave me a quick significant look when he did this — as much as to say, “You see how they all depend on It!’ And indeed our guide’s confidence was wholly justified. Even as the old man leant his weight on this Fountain of Life I could see the natural forces return to that mummified body.

And then without delay we all set out. The Athenian insisted on carrying me in his powerful arms; and though his ghostly substance was like thick vapour to the touch, it had, as I have hinted, far more opacity than the other Shadows, and I felt nothing but pride and satisfaction when his insubstantial flesh penetrated my own as we moved along. Every now and then he had to make a fresh adjustment of my weight and change his hold. I noticed in fact that it took about thirty steps of our slow advance for his arms to pass through the portion of my body they supported; but he never let me fall. He was always careful to shift his burden, which he did as tenderly as any woman, in time to prevent such a mishap.

The great Judge, swaying and toppling like a stone image, came heavily behind us, supported on one hand by Morwyn and on the other by Taliesin, while to my considerable amusement I could catch at intervals hurried glimpses of Black Peter, leaping and bounding in high delight round the whole surprising procession.

I had remarked for many days — if I can so speak, though they may have been years in Caer Sidi — a particular spot in our landscape above which a cloud of smoke seemed always to hang.

My companions had often spoken of visiting this spot: but for some reason — probably because they were too occupied with their Welsh mythology — they had never realized this project.

But arriving at this over-clouded place we found that what the mist concealed was a cleft in a vast wall, a wall whose height it was impossible to gauge owing to the heavy vapour, that constantly swept against it. Through this cleft, which was a little wider than the one between Merlin's refuge and our Field of Sleep, the Athenian boldly carried me; and though he kept stumbling over Black Peter as he went he held me firmly, and we were followed closely by the others.

The moment we were safely through, our leader laid me down with my back against the great rock through which we had passed; and from this point of vantage I was in a position to take in to their full extent the grandeur and strangeness of what lay before us.

We were in a region totally different from the one we had left, and the scene that faced us now possessed many elements that were extraordinarily comforting to my poor human senses, homesick for the familiar aspects of the earth. For one thing we were confronted by an astonishing expanse of dead, but quite naturally and seasonably dead, vegetation. Most of this consisted of the dried-up, winter-withered stalks of asphodels, stalks of a pallid yellow colour in themselves but bearing clustered spikes of reddish-brown seeds.

The spot where we now rested — and the aged Judge and our dear maid sat side by side upon a ledge a little to my right — was on a level with this strange garden, over whose drooping feathered grasses and upright stalks a cavernous breeze was blowing.

But what a spectacle met my eyes when I looked across this reassuring wintry parterre! Lying at the foot of two cyclopean flights of steps, which separated above his head, was a dim gigantic Figure, stark naked, and even in his lacerated state possessed of the tremendous muscular development of which we get so many broken hints in our museum-fragments of Pheidian sculpture.

I don’t think he was a phantom-shape; at least through his recumbent form I couldn’t detect the outline of the enormous stairs, that in a double flight rose above his figure. His face, though across those withered flowers I could only faintly discern his lineaments, was, as the poet says of another of the same primeval brood, “large as that of Memphian sphinx, pedestalled haply in a palace-court, when sages looked to Egypt for their lore.”

But what I saw being done to that huge offspring “of the infant world” made my gorge rise and a shuddering nausea pass through me. Two unspeakable creatures — if they were vultures I can only pray their breed is extinct! — kept plunging their beaks into his belly and as they did so fluttering their evil wings and uttering low blood-curdling slobbering sounds, the peculiar horror of which I would give anything to erase from my memory.

But what was this? Mercy of God! my dear lad, you can imagine what I felt when I saw the figure of that accursed monkey-torturer who had insulted Morwyn, gloating over this disgusting scene and taking passionate notes in his pain-diary of every contortion of the wretched Titan’s face as he winced and squirmed under those fiendish beaks!

I was so outraged by this sight that I made an instinctive and desperate effort to rise to my feet; but it was useless. Coward though I am, I think I would have rushed to that poor giant's rescue if my groin had been only a little less hurt.

But every attempt to stand gave me such a spasm that I believe I should have fainted if I hadn't fallen back against the rock and given it up.

But my Athenian was already on the spot; and after a moment or two of his intervention the note-book was being returned to the youth's pocket, the beaks of the vultures were being lifted from their repast, and the head of the unfortunate Titan was feebly hoisting itself up and staring with piteous hope at the apparition of the undying Judge. I had time, during that brief lull in events to notice that the two flights of stairs, before they were completely lost to sight, diverged to the left and to the right. And not only so; but I was comforted to observe, for I regarded every sign of vegetation as a promise of escape, that the one that led to the left — I had lost all notion of the points of the compass — seemed to assume a faintly green colour, as if overgrown by some species of living moss, ere it vanished in the mist.

But what it was my destiny to see now, my good son, will be forever bandaged so tight round the nerves of my vision that I shall behold it, blurred in a fog of blood, to the end of my days. For I saw my philosopher struggling to help Tityos to his feet; and I saw our Welshman, after a second's hesitation, due either to the ironic lift of the Athenian's ugly eyebrows, or to the ghostly entrails dangling from the combed-out belly of the Titan — begin to heave him up from the other side.

And thus supported the wounded creature tottered forward towards us. As he came, stride by heavy stride, across the intervening space, treading down the stalks of the dead asphodels while a faint stir of wind made the tall feathered grasses brush with a long-drawn sigh against his legs, those two foul birds, their phantom beaks still dripping with his blood, came fluttering with him, the loathsome quills of their moulted wings beating against his side. I could only catch the half-profile of Rhadamanthus as this crazed victim of the vendetta of Zeus offered himself as a suppliant; but what I saw now did, I'm not ashamed to confess, give me that feeling of tears behind the eyeballs which one gets from the emotion of the heroic. Every particular hair on the old man's face seemed electric with ecstatic joy, and every individual wrinkle on his withered features seemed to melt away in exultant rapture.

"Let the accuser speak first!" boomed forth the hoarse voice of this derelict of the Golden Age. These words took by surprise everybody present.

Morwyn looked questioningly and somewhat nervously at her Welshman. I could see that she half expected some cruel sky-god of thunder and lightning to come down cursing and accusing from above our heads. It was then that I was struck by the amazing legal acuteness of my noble Athenian as he hurriedly intervened.

"The accuser, O great Judge, is, I humbly submit, unable to appear before this Court, and for a sufficient reason."

"For what reason?" boomed Rhadamanthus. "If he were my own father I would insist that he present himself before me!"

"The accuser is unable to appear," replied the philosopher firmly, "because he is only half-existent, only half-created. The accuser of Tityos is that possessive, implacable Automaton, sometimes called Jehovah, sometimes called Jove, who is forever being half-created by the minds of men, and forever falling back into the maggots of decomposition.

"The damnation that follows all cruelty would have annihilated him long ago if it weren't for a new God-Devil to which mankind is now giving the same horrible half-life. Knowledge-without-Pity is this fiend's name, and he is a worse one than the other. In plain words, great Judge, the accuser of

"Let them both come!" boomed the Ancient of Days. "I fear, my Lord, that is entirely impossible. The System-of-Things has found them a place in Hell, where their worshippers are most numerous. Once every twelve months, my lord, on the night that used to be dedicated to Saturn, these two proclaim the passing of a year in those regions by breaking the eternal silence."

"How do they break it? Do they call for a righteous Judge to judge them?"

"No, my Lord. From one of them comes the cry: 'My worm dieth not!' and from the other comes the cry: 'And my fire is not quenched!' and I assure you, my Lord, this annual breaking of the eternal silence by these Half-Lives has a very curious effect."

"How do you come to know so much about all this?" inquired the astute Cretan. And for once I saw my philosopher look a little non-plussed. Indeed I think I caught him murmuring something about a pupil of his who was a great traveller and had a poetical imagination.

"Come to the point, come to the point!" said the old man sternly; and then, raising his voice: "The accuser of Tityos, the Titan, is not present in court. Is there anyone here who will represent him?"

"That will I, sir!" cried the young vivisector, skipping impertinently forward and staring shamelessly at Morwyn, "I will represent him."

Black Peter hid himself under the fold of my coat. "On what grounds?" And I was touched to see how the noble old law-giver laid aside completely any personal feeling against this young man; though it was entirely because of him that he was at this moment clutching only half of his staff.

"On the grounds," declared the youth boldly, "that my god is the old god's successor."

Rhadamanthus gave a little nod. "I wish just to say," threw in my philosopher — and I confess I began to think that the old Cretan law courts must have been more orderly and more like our own than those of Athens— "that it was only for a natural erotic impulse that this first-born of Earth and Heaven was condemned."

"We'll hear all that presently," said the Judge, "when the time comes for the Defence. Go on, prosecutor?"

"You have only to look at that dumb savage, sir," cried the young man, "to see how useless to Science and Progress his existence has been. I understand he was condemned for attempted violence offered to one of the wives of my God's predecessor, a silly, senseless irrational crime, and one that could only have been attempted by a half-wit. My God's predecessor, not improperly, condemned this stupid savage to the beaks of those birds; and no experiment I have ever made on monkeys, or dogs, or cats, or any other creature, has brought me as much knowledge of the psychology of pain as I've had from watching this brute's punishment. He's on a level with the animals; and the word of my God is: 'The animals are given you to torture, that you may gain knowledge of my laws and live long in the land.'"

"All this," said the Judge sternly, is "irrelevant to the accused's guilt. What was his crime?"

"He attacked a-high-born woman."

"But isn't he himself," protested the Judge, "a son of Heaven and Earth?"

"Brutes of his kind," snapped the scientist, "must be taught their place. A time will soon come when my God will give us for our Laboratories any specimens we need from among the inferior races."

"But his crime, his crime?" repeated the Judge. "The future of the world doesn't depend on your new god any more than upon the old. It depends on the secret purpose of the System-of-Things."

At this point, with a pitiful strumming and drumming in his deep chest, the lacerated Titan before us began uttering articulate sounds. I don't know whether you, my son, have ever heard the wind howl on November nights through the monoliths and trilithons of Stonehenge; but only if you have, can I give you the faintest idea of the lamentable sounds that now issued from that lacerated bulk.

The abominable vultures kept flapping their featherless quills against his face as he tried to speak, smearing it, as they did so, with blood and filth from his own bowels and making his words still more obscure.

My philosopher for the second time that day seemed baffled; for it was clear that he couldn't understand, any better than I could, the primeval syllables, like the autumn wind through cyclopean ruins, that came, hoarse and pitiful amid the flapping of those horrible wings.

But it was then that our Welshman stepped forward. "Can I interpret, Arglwydd?" he inquired. "I can read what we bards call Ogam; and these are Pre-Aryan words known to me in Ogyrven."

The Judge lifted up his over-hanging eyebrows with the jagged end of his staff and cast a piercing look upon this new witness. "What did the accused say?" he asked.

"He said that she was more beautiful than he could bear. He said he embraced her as she went towards Pytho, through Panopeus with its lovely lawns."

The Judge turned to the vivisector. "Is an embrace a crime?" he asked.

"You can see what an animal he is," retorted the youth. "He has shed blood too. He has killed and he has raped. These violences on the part of the lower races must be rigorously stamped out. Science must have an absolute control over the sex-impulses of—"

But at that moment I heard Morwyn give a peculiarly sharp cry, pitched in a certain key that I well remember noticing once before when she caught a boy killing a squirrel. She made a rush forward after uttering this cry, and frantically waved her arms. This did for a moment drive off the vultures who were now doing all they could to prevent the Titan's uncouth words from coming forth.

"What does he say?" repeated Rhadamanthus to the Welshman.

"He says that a son of the Earth and Heaven can't help fighting and embracing. He says he was born to fight and to embrace; and if there was violence he says, it was the fault of life itself."

"Well, young man," said the Judge, turning again to the vivisector, "what do you say to that?"

"He's excusing himself," retorted the youth, "in the way all the lower natures excuse themselves. But science will soon put an end to all this. There will be no natural fighting, and all the embracing that will be done will be done under the control of our laboratories. We shall keep a percentage of the lower races alive for experimental purposes. And they will be too frightened to resist. At the sight of a man of science they will shiver all over, as this giant's doing now, and as that dog over there is doing. Qh no! These stupid fighters and embracers, these lusty children of Nature, will be made so quiet by experimentation that they'll cast down their eyes when they meet a scientist. Just as we do with dogs, now, we won't let 'em die. We'll keep them alive to experiment on; so that by their torture we and our dear ones may live forever! I'm speaking frankly; but you must remember, I'm only speaking before this archaic court under strong protest. The Press of our country trembles already before our name. And well it may. Science is ten times more powerful for punishment than for anything else. Look at the weapons of destruction we have at our control! No, no! It's only under protest, and because I want to finish my observations on the reaction of gastric nerves to ornithological stimulus that I'm speaking now. When I've finished with Tityos I hope to come upon Tantalus. It'll be wonderful to examine the saliva from a human dog's mouth who'd been in a Laboratory for fifty-thousand—"

But the Athenian, whose ugly face had been for some while positively twitching to interrupt, could suppress himself no longer. Pressing forward in that impulsive manner which startled me as much as it disturbed Rhadamanthus, he demanded whether he could crossexamine the prosecutor.

I could see that this interruption spoilt the whole consummate scheme of the great Judge as well as scandalized all his ideas of legal propriety; but while he was pondering how to refuse the philosopher without prejudice to the defendant Socrates began his speech.

I couldn't resist a wry smile when I detected — even down here at the bottom of the world — how this old pillar of justice bit his lip in vexation and combed indignantly his great beard with his staff at this breaking of court rules, even though, as I knew well, he agreed with every word the impetuous pleader was uttering.

"There's the issue," cried the satyr-faced philosopher, "and the court has seen it! This young man, whose new god-devil is only the old one in another mask, claims to be superior to the difference between good and evil. But may it not be that even while we are holding this trial the eternal System-of-Things, beyond all reason and all understanding, is working out its purpose? The issue at stake is a simple one. Is there a Right and Wrong in the world? I call upon the earth and the heaven to answer, I call upon the fire and the water to answer, and this young man may justly say there is only silence. There is only silence; the silence, the emptiness, the horror, of the place from which he comes! For he comes from the deaf Outward, he comes from the abyss of death, he comes from the atoms and the void. Where he comes from there is indeed no answer; and he may ply his pincers and his lancets, and he may record in his brain and in his note-book all the motions of those atoms and that void, and there will be no answer! For the answer comes from another place.

"The answer, O great Judge, comes from the heart of man. It is in the heart of man, in defiance of the whole universe of atoms and void, that the System-of-Things — our great unknown Pan, for He is our All — has placed the response to this cry of the world. The base god-devil this young man represents, in his inhuman and heartless science, has challenged the only Revelation from the System-of-Things that we possess, the revelation — beyond all analysis and all argument — of the difference between Right and Wrong. One of the few modern philosophers, great Judge, who for his open mind can be compared with our ancient Empedocles, is a citizen of the New Atlantis, called in our tongue Jakobos or James. And this James, whose personal name I understand was William, and who like myself was interested in the silent voice of the soul, declared that vivisectors ought never to be trusted, either in what they do or in what they brag of doing.

"And does it not appear and might it not be said, that whereas the big things, the vast expanses, the enormous forces, are all on the side of this false god, on the side of the System-of-Things there is only the murmur of conscience? Against this faint sound, this frail voice, this sigh from within, all the knowledge and wisdom of the universe is helpless. This faint sigh can subdue the strongest, can shake the foundations of the earth, can overthrow all their laboratories of torture! For this faint murmur of conscience in the human heart, this daimon of the god within us, has behind it all the power of the Unutterable, all the purpose of the System-of-Things. As the accused says, to fight and to embrace, yea! even to shed blood in the hot struggle of life, is according to Nature. We err, we repent, and we are forgiven. But this new claim that we have a right to torture for knowledge, and a right to torture so as to prolong our lives upon the earth, is a claim that sets itself against the voice of the heart within us, sets itself up against that unutterable Will to mercy and pity which is at the heart of the System-of-Things!

"This young man, great Judge, torturing animals to prolong human life, has separated Science from the most important thing life has produced — the human conscience. May I ask the Court this? What is the importance of human lives? Is it their continuing alive for so many years like animals in a menagerie? Me genoito! The value of a man cannot be judged by weighing the atoms and measuring the void, or by the number of the diseases from which he escapes. The value of a man is in his human qualities; in his character, in his conscience, in the nobility and magnanimity of his soul. I humbly submit that this young accuser of Tityos the Titan has no place in his Science for human character.

"I submit that all the way down the ages evil and dangerous attempts have been made to shift the pivot of life to something other than the character of the individual man. The character of the individual man has been held as unimportant, O righteous Judge, in comparison with the State, in comparison with Religion, in comparison with Knowledge. It is held unimportant now in comparison with Scientific Invention. But I submit to this court that everything in the universe is negligible compared with the character of an individual man! This is the teaching of all the poets of my race. What was their sole idea of a worthy and tragic subject? It was always the same — the character and conscience of a man wrestling against Fate.

“And does it not appear as if the terrible catastrophes that have followed these attempts to shift the pivot of life have been due to the fact that the System-of-Things Itself, that Power beyond all Powers, is behind the conscience and character of a man, as it is behind nothing else? I am not learned, my Lord, in the laws of the Atoms and the Void as is our young disciple of Democritus, but when he tells me that people to-day torture animals to gain knowledge and to prolong life, I do not need to go to the Atoms and the Void for direction. In my own being as a man I find a complete answer. The daimon in my own conscience speaks in no wavering terms. And what does it tell me, O righteous Judge?

“It tells me that this torture of animals is wrong, that it is against the will of the System-of-Things, and that until it is stopped, there will be disaster after disaster for the human race. When I was in the Elysian Fields, O righteous Judge, shall I tell you who was the wisest man I met? He was a little old Chinaman, and he was so frail that I’m sure in life I could have taken him in my arms and broken him to bits like a sea-shell.

“I had grown weary of the solemn superior men in that place — for as the cruel choose Hell, so do the professional philosophers gravitate to the Elysian Fields — and I found that Kwang-Tze, for such was his name, was as weary of them as I. ‘Confucius alone is enough,’ he said, ‘but when it comes to Mencius’ — and he made a gesture I shall not describe, for it would be out of keeping with the dignity of this court.

“I used to go every evening to the outskirts of that place, dodging with infinite care the tent of Parmenides and nodding a cautious good-night to Pythagoras, where I would always find my little friend Kwang-Tze hugging his knees on the back of an intelligent tortoise. He said that this tortoise was wiser than all the philosophers and that on his shell alone were engraved such humorous and illuminating paradoxes that Mencius would long ago have had him thrown out, only he had been there when they first came, and it was against the conscience even of the most tedious of Chinamen to meddle with a prehistoric status quo.

"I would beg for permission to sit down on the grass by the side of this aboriginal of the Elysian Fields and I am convinced I caught once in its curious eye, when the creature twisted its neck almost completely round to inspect me, a look that seemed to say: 'Now you take care how you behave to Kwang-Tze. He never asserts himself; but I have been known to assert myself!'

"I don't want to trespass too long on the patience of the court so I'll come to the point of my story as quickly as possible.

"One evening when the tortoise had fallen into a philosophic trance the Chinaman took advantage of its quiescence — for I believe the creature used to upbraid my little friend very severely if he ever launched upon a modern topic — to inquire of me what I thought was the strongest power in the world. He asked this question in such a quaintly wistful and whimsical manner, not at all with the massive ironic gravity which we Greeks affect, that, in spite of the fact that I have myself no mean talent for dialectic, I couldn't — onmysoul, most righteous Judge, I simply couldn't — tell where his humour ended or where his seriousness began.

"Baffled by his whimsicality, for to confess the truth my victories in argument have been largely due to my being more sophistical than the sophists, I took refuge in simple and naive directness and replied to him bluntly that Wisdom was the strongest power in the world.

“No sooner had I uttered the word ‘Wisdom’ than the Chinaman skipped up erect on his tortoise’s back and danced a jig. It was clear he was entertained: but whether his hilarity sprang from the truth or from the absurd error of my reply I hadn’t the remotest idea. The man’s whole attitude to these profound matters was so different from that of anyone I had ever met that I felt completely puzzled.

“Taking his seat again while I caught myself hoping that his absorbed friend would awake from its trance and with its cold prehistoric eye put a stop to these levities, Kwang-Tze now proceeded to make a sound on his pipe like the voice of the bird known as the Goosander.

“‘It is very sad,’ he then remarked in a plaintive resigned tone, ‘that a spirit-like man like yourself should not know any better than that.’

“I asked him what in his opinion was the strongest thing in the world and if the court will allow me, and I assure it is not irrelevant to the case before us, I will try to tell you his answer.

“He began by saying that water was stronger than rock, and that air was stronger than water. Then he went on to say that some mental quality — only to my Greek mind it was very hard to follow exactly what quality, but it certainly had to do with an absence of self-asserttion — was stronger than the greatest intellect, stronger than the most heroic courage.

“And may it not be that this invisible mystery, this formless, weak, yielding mystery, finding its level like water, is nothing less than the will of the System-of-Things?

“Why, O great Judge, is the crime of Tityos, the old animal crime of struggle and violence and rape, less wicked than the cold-blooded, deliberate, rational crime of a vivisector like this accuser?

“May we not suppose, does it not seem, that when selfish cruelty is the act, not of blind sensual impulse, but of deliberate mental fanaticism, it is far more damnable?

“Sensual people, O great Judge, even vicious people, do nothing like the harm to the world that is done by mental fanatics, full of self-righteousness. And, what’s more, this whole system of spreading disease to cure disease and inflicting pain to cure pain is a false and evil system. The bodies of animals and the bodies of men are totally different. I’ve been keeping in touch for some while with these matters, and I notice that the Press is always announcing new cures obtained by the torture of animals, but when these cures are proved futile by experience never a word appears to tell us so!

“Why, O great Judge, after all these failures do the vivisectors continue their diabolic work? Because they enjoy vivisection for its own sake! One of the chief peculiarities of this atrocity is that in regard to the contemplation of pain it totally dehumanizes those who practise it. If it were absolutely proved that no cures have been worked by it, or ever could be worked, do you suppose, great Judge, that they would chloroform the victims upon which they’ve started, destroy their instruments, give away the animals waiting their turn, and never vivisect again? God knows they would not! They would go on just the same. They are fanatics of knowledge, just as their fellows in perdition are fanatics of politics, or religion, or what they call ‘purity.’ And I humbly submit to this most ancient court that it is this cold-blooded mental fanaticism on the side of evil that was, and is, and is to come, the only unpardonable crime against the mystery of life.

“And the best proof, great Judge, that I am right, is the tone these vivisectors take! They all say the same thing. ‘We are privileged. We are holy. We are beyond the good and evil of ordinary people.’

“And need I remind the court that this attitude of theirs: ‘We are experts. We know what we are doing. There is a necessity for it beyond the law of conscience, is the attitude that from the beginning of the world has condoned crimes so hideous and horrible that the rape of a wife of Zeus appears virtue in comparison!

“But I don’t want to exhaust the patience of this indulgent court. I have said what I had to say, an immortal spirit speaking to an undying Judge.

“Whether it is better to be as I am, liberated from the afflictions of the flesh, but debarred its glorious and delicious pleasures, or to be as these three are” — and he indicated Morwyn and Black Peter and me— “the System-of-Things alone knows. These will return to their earth-life. The rest of us will return to our lives as spirits. But may I not hope that it will prove an infinite comfort to all here, except the Accuser, when the undying Rhadamanthus gives his judgment?”

With these words, spoken, I daresay, according to the best tradition of forensic poignance, the Athenian fell back and began talking quietly to Taliesin; and I confess I marked with satisfaction how much his eloquence had impressed the Welshman in his favour.

Then the undying Judge gathered himself together and stretched out his broken staff towards Tityos, who obedient to the signal came forward and humbly knelt upon the stone floor. As he knelt the vultures circled over his head; and he was so tall that, even so, the Judge had to tilt back his head to look into his face.

“We have heard,” Rhadamanthus began, and I could see from the heaving of his mummy-like chest and the gleam, as of a live coal, in his unconquerable eye, that he was with difficulty restraining his emotion, an emotion largely, no doubt, of pure joy, at being able to take up his vocation again, but also of righteous indignation. Yes, it must have been the mingling of natural delight in the job he could do so well, with his sense of the importance of his verdict that gave to the words of this Ancient of Days their accumulative weight.

“Accuser of Tityos,” he said, “or representative of his accuser, this court has given full consideration to all that you’ve brought against this man — vivisected by these birds at the command of Zeus for fifty thousand years — but now it is the duty of this court to announce to you that judgment is given absolutely and entirely for the Defendant.” At this point he paused for a minute and then concluded. “Your presence, therefore, young man, being no longer necessary for the purposes of justice, is no longer desirable for any reason, and the court emphatically recommends that you go back whence you came as fast as you conveniently can.”

I happened to glance at Morwyn while the Judge concluded his sentence and I was surprised and not a little disturbed to notice a distinct wave of pity for this arrogant young soul sent back to Hell flicker across the girl’s face.

But the youth turned upon us all, waving his note-book in the air. “You don’t suppose,” he cried, “that this ends it, do you, this ridiculous farce played out on this prehistoric stage by a set of antiquated puppets that intelligent progress has left far behind. It’s not you who judge me; but I who judge you! Science will keep you, you besotted old fool, among the Hottentot idols in our museum. And as for you, Captain,” and he unexpectedly singled me out, “we’ll give you the wholesome and honest job of cleaning out our monkey-cages! We know the kind of sensual sentimentalist you are and we’ll appoint you nurse to our youngest and most pathetic she-monkeys.”

Then he moved a step towards Morwyn. “Don’t you worry about your father, my pretty lass,” he said. “I’ll send him down here to you, if only to score off the Captain!” With this he was off, disappearing with such alacrity through the cleft rock that you would have supposed the earth had swallowed him up.

And then and only then and not till then did the vivisected Titan realize that he was released from his guilt.

Leaping up from the ground to his full height, in which he towered above us all, he clapped his great hands together over his head; and even as he did so the evil birds that had tormented him since the beginning of time fluttered down at his feet in a little pile of dust. Then in a rapture of joy he sank down again, and kissing the earth his mother, burst into a torrent of weeping. Above him, drawn by an impulse beyond our control, we all gathered, beholding that gigantic frame shaken with sobs.

Even now, as I recall that moment something of the strange rush of tenderness and release and pity and reconciliation that melted us all comes back to me. I could not explain it then and I cannot now, but I think my feeling, and I believe the others experienced, each in his own fashion, something of the same emotion, was as if, for the flicker of a moment, the vast burden of the long tragedy of our planet and its pitiful “knot of contrariety” melted and flowed away; while a hint, a glimpse, a wavering intimation took its place of a redemption for all souls, souls human, sub-human, super-human, to whom the earth in her huge fecundity had given birth!

What I think I especially felt in that moment was that the vast convulsed figure grovelling there at our feet in this ecstasy of its release, was more, much more, than itself alone.

In it, so I think I felt, were included, in mystic participation, all the millions upon millions of anonymous lives, beast-lives, half-beast lives, and undeveloped human lives, that had been tortured by the pitilessness of the competent and the intelligent since the days of the Golden Age; that is to say since conscience first began to be divorced from intellect.

Part Five

MORE TIME MUST have passed, I think, over our dazed heads than we had any notion of; but what roused us from this condition — and I noticed that Morwyn and the Welshman were the first to glance at each other and then at the rocky wall on the right of one of those Cyclopean flights of steps — was, it seemed to me when it finally reached my ears, the sound of monstrous reverberating laughter. I have heard many unpleasant sounds in my time, including the trumpeting of those monsters of the deep, but I've never heard any sound quite as disquieting as this abominable laughter. And though it reached us through that rocky wall, it was distinctly human laughter; indeed I might say it was philosophical laughter! Our eloquent Athenian had grown, I believe, a little deaf, for I noticed that even the old Judge began to move aside with his broken staff the snow-white hairs that covered the ear nearest to the rock, before that ill-favoured satyr's skull turned to the sound.

When he did catch it however, he swung round to us all in a most knowing manner. "Hush!" he whispered. "Listen to that!"

"What is it? Who is it?" I asked him hurriedly; and I was struck by the fact that even Black Peter fixed his liquid eyes upon, him, as if aware that only by that ugly-looking head could the mystery be solved.

"I may be mistaken," said the voluntary victim of the laws of his city, "but by Pan, I believe it's that rascally old scientist, the ribald of Abdera! That fellow's laughter was so malicious in Paradise that it kept even Kwang-Tze's tortoise awake. 'It's the Laughter of Matter,' Kwang used to say, as we heard it resounding through the Elysian Fields. ‘Eternally it mocks at the Tao and tries to drown the spirit-like whisper of the heart.’”

I set myself to listen carefully to this devilish sound, which certainly drowned the sobbing of the released Titan and introduced a most disturbing element into our midst.

We all looked at each other in a kind of nervous discomfort, as if we’d been caught in some act of superstitious sentiment.

The Titan alone completely ignored it. But he got up from the ground and began, like a foolish infant, scratching the new skin which had already begun to form over his lacerated stomach; a proceeding which evidently gave him an agreeable sense of being tickled.

“I wish,” said Morwyn, “that the tortoise was here.”

The Welshman nodded vehemently in response to this. But I doubt if Socrates understood what she meant; and certainly I didn’t. He and I looked at each other as if the situation had begun to get out of control.

As law-abiding soldiers of free Democracies there was something extremely disconcerting to us both about this shameless laughter of the Atoms and the Void. Tityos, however, continued to take not the slightest notice of it. I suppose his mother, the seed-bearing Earth, had taught him long ago how to disregard such profane malice of the chemistry of meaningless chance.

But the old Judge evidently shared our discomfort, for he took a couple of tottering steps towards the cleft in the rock that led to the sleeping-place of Cronos; and though he turned after that and leaned against the wall I could see him plucking nervously at his long beard.

I found it hard to believe that in Abdera, or any other human city, there can have been a Being who could so completely identify himself with the ghastly futility of chaos.

But the laughter we listened to was the laughter of a man. Indeed it made me think of certain moments in my own life, when everything seemed useless and purposeless, and "Matter alone," as some writer says, "continued onwards."

What had Morwyn meant by wishing the tortoise were here? What could a tortoise, even if he'd survived seven ice-ages, do against this Mephistophelean contempt for all creation?

Suddenly I saw the old Judge jerk himself together with automatic severity and tighten his grip upon his broken staff.

Morwyn gave a wild cry and rushed forward. "Father! Dearest Father!" she wailed. I swung round; and there, emerging from the place we had left, which they must have traversed with the most exquisite precaution, was that horrible young man again, leading this time, with mock reverence and respect, my girl's unhappy parent!

The old Judge, leaning against the wall, began to shiver, and I got the impression that he was trying to speak; but all this agitation after such huge aeons of inactivity had clearly been too much for him. Had it been in crafty malignity that the lord of thunderbolts had given him the gift of immortality?

I was pleased with the way, like a faithful supporter of the laws, the Athenian now moved to his side and did his best to support him; and by concentrating on this praise-worthy effort I tried to avoid being an onlooker at the meeting of Morwyn and her father.

But as I watched the philosopher help this poor mummified creature to lift his broken staff to his face, so as to make an orifice in his tangled and be-dribbled moustache, a pang of sick and weary hopelessness shivered through me. It seemed so bitterly cruel that after his noble judicial decision this poor old scarecrow of immortality should be reduced again to such a woeful wreck. But I am sure it was the simultaneousness of that youth's reappearance with the damned laughter of Democritus that blighted the old gentleman's exultation.

If the laughing philosopher had said to himself, like Iago: "I'll set down the pegs that make this music," he couldn't have timed his appearance with more devilish ingenuity. What I wished above everything else at that moment was that the Abderan should appear in person before us instead of jeering from behind the wall, so that my philosophic fellow-soldier might put a few pointed questions to him!

I even went so far as try to imagine, since anything that prevented me from looking at Morwyn and her father served my turn, what knock-down question I could myself have put to this invisible materialist, but oh dear! I couldn't scrape up a single one.

At this moment, as I recall these events in peace and quiet, I can think of several retorts, but, as I say, that terrible youth's return on the top of this atomic guffawing put my wits to rout as completely as it did the Judge's. Aye! but "isn't it sad" — as that friend of the tortoise would say — how a "spirit like man" such as this noble Rhadamanthus could be so humiliated and crushed by time and tide and chance and circumstance?

I'm sure if that satiric buffoon from Abdera — whom we read that the scientists of his town supported to a man when he got into trouble with simpler people — had stayed to crack his jokes with the atheistical statesmen and prelates in Elysium, and hadn't taken into his inquiring head to wander down here, the Old Man of Crete would have been able to cope all right with the new incursion from Hell.

But these reverberating peals of mocking laughter going on and on at such a crisis would have upset even a modern judge. And it was impossible to order the court to be cleared as I should have loved to hear him do; first because the court was no longer sitting, and secondly because except for Socrates and myself he had no officials at his command.

Strange thoughts, unusual to my sensual nature, began now to stir in my brain. Could it be that ever since the beginning of the world the material of creation, the “body” so to speak, of the System-of-Things as opposed to its mind, has been itching and seething and fuming and spluttering to express its furious malice at being disturbed in the amorphousness of its original chaos? Could it be that as it turns and twists in its desire to thwart its own restless soul it becomes the cause of those moods of depression, these moods of abysmal disillusion, that trouble so many of us all our lives?

And was it this, the inert malice of matter, that was being, as you might say, intellectually expressed in this echoing cachinnation? Perhaps it was from the mind of my fellow-soldier, as we looked at each other across the shaky form of the Ancient of Days, that these unusual thoughts entered my head. I certainly began to feel as if I were struggling at that moment to loosen the ultimate knot of the cosmos. Still putting off as long as I could the distressing sight of Morwyn with those two damned ghosts — though I rejoiced to observe that now he had been released from his own feeling of guilt the exultant Titan took no more notice of the young scientist and his note-book than if the fellow had been a gnat or a beetle — my eyes, when they looked away from Socrates, wandered to those two flights of steps that lost themselves in the cloudy firmament. Whither did those flights lead? While I was pondering this question I heard Socrates give a heavy sigh of relief and I could see that he had succeeded in soothing the agitated old man, for I observed a distinct tendency in those withered eyelids to close over their eyeballs. The intrusive young phantom still remained busy with his note-book, and Tityos was still absorbed in scratching his new skin, when I was suddenly impelled to take notice of the extraordinary doings of our Welshman, who was now scrabbling and grubbing, on his knees, on the spot where the poor giant's sobbing had so affected us all. Thank the Lord, the Citizen of Abdera had taken himself off at last; and I confess I indulged in the hope that the first thing he would see in returning to Paradise would be the outstretched neck of that redoubtable tortoise, and the look of its cold, inscrutable, un-amused prehistoric eye, the one aperture perhaps into the evolutionary mind of the System-of-Things that could disconcert the laughter of chaos!

"But what on earth is the crazy old Bard doing now?" I said to myself, as I watched that hunched-up form carefully and meticulously sifting between his ghostly palms every grain of gravel and dust, every minute spore of lichen, every wisp and twig and husk and flake that had drifted here from the dead asphodels.

As I have explained before, it was by no means easy for these airy spirits, with their insubstantial simulacra of physical bodies, to exert pressure upon solid matter. But their "spiritual bodies," although like air, were not quite air; and though the pressure they used, which I daresay was partly magnetic, was a very weak one, still it was a pressure, and things — especially inanimate things —— did in the long run yield to it. But what the devil was the man after? Was he hunting — as those cynics in Hell had maintained all along — for hidden treasure? Was he geologizing or botanizing at the foot of this Jacob's Ladder?

I was interrupted by the Athenian, who came to ask my advice — as one faithful soldier of another — whether it wouldn't be a good thing if he carried the old Judge back to his official seat by the Cauldron.

"Of course the best that could happen to him would be to die. But are we to suppose that in that case his soul would prove a mere replica of what he is now, or would it receive, as my own has done, a fresh influx of vitality from the fount of life?"

"Perhaps he'll just sink down into sleep," I said, "like those two divine sleepers. Couldn't you make him comfortable between his seat and the Cauldron? I'd leave him actually touching its base. It may be a superstition, but I've a feeling that no harm would happen to me if I slept till Judgement, as long as I was in contact with that thing!"

The Athenian smiled. "Yes, my friend," he said. "It's better to be both superstitious and sceptical — about all things but one."

"And what is that one?" I asked.

He looked at me sharply. "You know as well as I do," he said.

I nodded.

"Everything that exists," he went on, "as well as everything that is said to exist is a matter for both faith and doubt. But that the System-of-Things is bent upon goodness and mercy — that is beyond them both." Thus speaking, he approached the old Judge, who by this time, though he was still leaning against the wall, was sound asleep, and lifted him bodily up in his arms just as he had done with myself.

It was a curious sight to see those strong phantom arms sink slowly into the flesh of this living mummy; but after giving me a reassuring nod the philosopher bore him off so swiftly that it looked as if they would be well through the entrance into the shrine of divine sleep before any readjustment of that burden became necessary.

Still postponing as long as possible my encounter with the detestable Mr. —, I hoisted myself up as well as my wounded groin allowed, so as to discover if I could what this mysterious thing was that the Welshman was so industriously seeking.

The movement I made and the concentrated strain of my observation roused the interest of Black Peter, who now began snuffing about, this way and that, round the crouching figure of the Bard. I saw the aged Shade give him a quick glance as he heard his heavy breathing, but as he didn't seem to mind the assistance of my diminutive "hound," I made no attempt to call the dog away, asking myself what on earth this venerable spirit of so many incarnations could have got now into his eccentric head. I did become aware of one curious thing about that patch of earth over which man and dog were so excitedly hovering. The released Titan had shed so many passionate tears upon the place where he had bowed his head and kissed his mother the earth, that the dust — and some of it must have been composed of the remains of those two terrible birds — had caked itself into little pellets and gobbets of damp clay.

I was disturbed in my observations by a sudden movement on the part of the young scientist; and I saw that he had begun making laborious efforts to get his precious manuscript-book into his ghostly pocket. Unwilling to let him know I had my eye on these proceedings, and it was always a rather pitiful sight to see how these phantoms were forced to fumble with the resistance of matter, I only gave the youth an occasional sidelong glance.

But my spying grew much more alert, though not less furtive, when, the book disposed of, the rogue began making a stealthy movement towards Morwyn. How softly he moved! I see now that I was a fool to refrain from disturbing him, as I could no doubt easily have done by giving Morwyn a shout of warning; but a complicated and ambiguous motive held me back. It was no doubt a certain kind of morbid and malicious jealousy — such are the wayward intricacies of the heart — but something in me longed to give the damned wretch as much rope as possible before I made any move.

If this was an evil impulse in me I was well punished for it; for after stalking his lovely prey like a lustful panther, for several moments, the irrepressible youth suddenly made a dart forward, planted a kiss — the third he had given her — upon the back of her neck, and crying out: “I’ll think of you at the Screens!” dashed away to the entrance, and vanished out of sight.

I’m afraid even then, though the girl must have known what had been done, for she swung round at once and watched him disappear, that it was I and not she who lifted up the howl of indignant execration that now resounded through that place.

There was some little disturbance then, but not very much. Black Peter began barking, though he did not leave the Bard’s side, and Taliesin himself, rising on his knees, stared about him, dazed and puzzled and distracted, evidently with only a modicum of his usual wits free to realize the situation. All he did in fact, and I couldn’t resist a groan of irritation, was to murmur something about this being “the Third Dolorous Kiss.”

I had already been initiated by Morwyn into the penchant of the ancient Welsh — almost equal to that of Hegel — for the number three; but it was small comfort to me, after this final outrage, to know that this son of perdition’s sacrilege could be neatly fitted into a semi-prophetic Triad.

How often since that unlucky third kiss have I cursed myself for the crooked and convoluted malice into which my jealousy led me when it stopped me from crying out in time! What had my motive been in letting him steal up to her like that without lifting my voice? Did I merely want him to damn himself further, or did I want to torment myself, and test her, by seeing what she would do?

I daresay even now I am exaggerating the violence of the cry I uttered as the youth vanished; and no doubt as one usually does in such cases I over-emphasized the effect of my agitation upon my companions.

At any rate both the Bard and Black Peter were soon reabsorbed in their mysterious search; and neither Morwyn nor her parent as they advanced towards me seemed aware of all I had thrown into that cry as, out of my complete helplessness, I witnessed that third kiss. My great comfort was that he didn't touch her lips this time, as he had done before. If he had done that I can't answer for what would have happened! You do know, my dear lad, don't you, that a girl's lips are twenty times more sensitive than ours. When a girl really yields herself to a kiss it is as if she yielded herself to everything. Our battle is won. All that follows is a clumsy sequel. That's why all good women who haven't attained the chastity of nuns and whores are so chary of letting anyone but their chosen lover kiss them on the mouth.

But, heaven help me, it was impossible to retain even an after-taste of jealous malice when she came towards me now, leading Mr. — by the hand! Her lovely little face was absolutely radiant; and I confess that Mr. — did have an expression in his eyes that I had never seen there before. I can't say it was a serene expression, in fact it was a tormented and contorted one, but it did have in it something that was quite new; and it wasn't hard to detect — after I'd been with him for a couple of minutes — what this something was. It was the uprising of a tiny portion of his perverted soul that had begun seriously to protest and struggle against this licence from the System-of-Things to spend an eternity in Hell.

I am no psychologist, as you young people count psychology. My ideas are all grotesquely obsolete; and I find it impossible to take the difference between modern ideas and "obsolete" or "archaic" ideas as seriously as you young people do. All ideas, being human, and being limited by the fancies of a particular epoch, are soaked in illusion. "At a clap of thunder, at a fall of mist," as Taliesin would say, a new enchantment covers or uncovers the vision of men.

You'll probably say that Mr. — was deliberately fooling us. Certainly that young villain who insulted Morwyn brought him here with some infernal and tricky purpose. But I don't think he was fooling us. I think he was entirely sincere; though I would be puzzled to tell you on what I base this feeling, except perhaps on the unhappiness in his eye.

Morwyn brought him up to me with that intense and quite special joy that women take in the wicked men they save. For a parallel to her excitement you would have to go — I speak of course as belonging to a very definite generation — to the virtuous man who "saves" or tries to "save" a girl of the streets. In Elizabethan days of course there was less of this sensual glow when good men spoke to erring women. In those times a whore was a whore, a loving wench perhaps, like Mrs. Quickly's Doll, but not exactly a soul to be saved. In the days of my youth, however, there was a peculiar and special unction in such transactions. Mr. — was not a whore, nor was his daughter a philanthropist, but I can assure you that her touching delight in hovering over this very doubtfully-reformed gentleman had a glow in it not unlike the glow to which I refer.

But oh, how lovely she looked! If she had been desirable before under those aphrodisiac waves of Saturnian incense, she was ten times more so now! In her concern over her father she seemed to completely lose all consciousness of herself. I have never seen her face more animated, her gestures more captivating. Her slender limbs moved with a voluptuous magnetism; and her warm, girlish bosom rose and fell under the panting eagerness of her feelings, till I could scarcely refrain from hugging her to my heart.

The encounter between “the second Mr. “ and me — and so vividly realistic did the clothes of this damned ghost look that it was hard unless I kept my eyes on his transparent face to realize he was only a spirit — brought down the girl’s happiness a good deal. You must remember I hadn’t addressed a word to the wretch, since — not without satisfaction — I had helped to bury him.

However, he held out his phantom hand to me quite in his old conventional way, and by staring at his rumpled waistcoat which still carried the stains of the fall that had killed him, I was able to go through the motion of taking it without too much distaste.

I have always sympathized with the American, Ingersol, who refused to shake hands with a vivisector, but what could I do under Morwyn’s eye?

But she saw what I felt — you can’t hide these things from a woman — and as the man and I exchanged a few superficial words I caught a grave, inscrutable look on her face, the meaning of which was totally beyond me.

What distressed me, as I kept glancing at her, while I laboriously tried to be civil, was the fact that ever since this hurt in my groin I had lost that wonderful psychic clairvoyance which had come to me from the falling meteor.

Thus as I mechanically replied Mr.— ‘s conventional talk I thought bitterly how ironical it was that the man’s tragic attempts to conquer his obsession should bring back the dullness of his old self; and along with this I began to be troubled to the bottom of my heart by a terrible doubt.

Had Morwyn’s revived devotion to this man turned her against me? Was she one of those girls — and in my time I’ve met such — whose heart can be hardened permanently against a lover by the deadly force of family ties?

“Tell him what you feel now, Father dear,” she suddenly broke in, evidently anxious to put an end to this exhibition of commonplace fatuousness in such a place and at such a moment.

And then the perturbed phantom did make an attempt to describe what was going on within him. It was the cynical tone, he confessed to me, of that repulsive young man that had given him the required shock. He himself was one of those vivisectors — and I had always known it — who have a whole array of sentimental moral reasons to justify their cruelty.

I am tempted to think that there may often occur in Hell cases like that of Mr. —, where the society of frank and shameless rogues, of a less hypocritical kidney, bring them, I won't say to their senses, but to a recognition of how far they've lost their senses. I would have liked to have asked the Marquis of Sade, that curious authority upon the ways of the System-of-Things, how it was that a commonplace hypocrite like Mr. — could be brought to the point of desiring, if only feebly, to get rid of his vice; while so many cruel devils, who are frank and shameless, are allowed to go on de-humanizing themselves without hope of change. I tried to imagine, as I listened with weary distaste to Mr.— 's specious apologia, what the realistic Frenchman's reply would have been; and I told myself that he would have quoted the clever phrase of one of his contemporaries about hypocrisy being vice's tribute to virtue.

Would the fellow never stop his long-winded confession? And how could he in this place, under those stupendous flights of stairs, and among asphodels that the most honest of sages had brought from the Elysian Fields, go on with the old conventional excuse about the torture of animals having saved women and children from so much pain? How is it that the greatest rascalities in the world are always committed "for the sake of women and children?" No doubt a lyncher from Mississippi would say that tying black men to posts and pouring petrol over them was "the only way to protect our precious womanhood."

I believe all would have yet been well, and I should have got through this appalling ordeal — for I can't tell you how much like a penitent butcher-bird the fellow looked — without irrevocably offending my sweet maid, hadn't by ill luck our good Athenian come strolling back at that particular moment. You know, my lad, how difficult it is for us in our mortal malice to avoid bringing in a third person, and of all men alive or dead Socrates was the one best adapted to make this repentant devil realize what he'd been and what he was!

It was therefore as great a joy to me as it was a distress to Morwyn when Socrates joined our little group; and I'm afraid my tone when I continued interrogating our pompous culprit was not entirely free from metaphysical spite. Certainly his replies were stupid enough to give anyone an advantage. He played on all the old sentimental strings. He used statistics loosely and deceptively. He assured me that even now "he wavered in his new faith when he thought of the wonders of insulin." He certainly wavered from some cause at that moment; for I noticed that the eye he fixed on Black Peter, who was still snuffing the ground where the Titan had bowed his head, gleamed with a throbbing longing to have this nervous little beast securely fastened down with straps provided by the best manufacturers.

"Have you cured cancer?" I unkindly asked him. He shook his head.

"Is there complete agreement among medical men over any one single cure you claim?"

He shook his head.

"Are there other ways, other paths, other directions in which alleviation of human suffering can be found, independently of vivisection?"

He nodded his head; but all this while I could see that it was touch and go with him. He had come here only partly in reaction against the brutality of that young scientist, and only partly from his feeling for Morwyn. An irresistible attraction to Black Peter — of the old wicked kind — had also played its part!

But I went at him again. “Doesn’t,” I asked him, “the devotion of such huge sums of money to animal torture, the cost of all these ships-loads of monkeys for instance and all this vast secret traffic in cats and dogs, divert resources that might be used in other directions for an equal alleviation of human pain?”

But at this point Morwyn angrily intervened— “Stop!” she cried. “How dare you treat my father like that? How dare you say such things, when you can see how he feels? If that’s what you’ve become from your—”

I’m sure she was going to say, “from your friendship with him,” meaning with my philosophic Athenian; but at that moment our wretched quarrel was interrupted.

There was a stifled bark from Black Peter, a wild cry from the Welshman, and I saw the latter struggling desperately to snatch something from the dog’s mouth. He was evidently successful in preventing the dog from swallowing what it had found. He was on his feet now, holding the thing up to the stream of misty light that came through the entrance to the place we had left, and uttering incoherent cries of excitement.

We all looked at him, and at Black Peter who was jumping up at him, in complete bewilderment. It was clearly something very different from a Neronian penny that my clever “hound” had discovered this time. The man of a thousand incarnations came actually running towards us with this precious discovery.

“The Tear of Tityos!” he cried. And again he cried. “God slay me if it isn’t the Tear of Tityos!” His tone as he repeated this phrase was like the tone of some old alchemist who had discovered the elixir of life. I’m sure I don’t know, my dear lad, if you’ve ever felt for a girl as I felt for Morwyn; but I can tell you it wasn't to see the effect upon her of "the Tear of Tityos" that I kept desperately trying to catch her eye.

But she wouldn't look at me! The cruelty of these exquisite creatures is beyond belief when you're unlucky enough to make them really angry; and it was now clear to me that I had hurt her to the quick. This perilous gulf between us — her love for her father and my hatred of him — had always existed, but it now had deepened to a yawning chasm. By my Socratic questions I had, as the phrase runs, "called his bluff," and the girl had witnessed his confusion.

So now it was my destiny once more to learn that there is something in a woman's love — even in the gentlest and tenderest — that partakes of the cruelty of the elements, something blind and remorseless, something beyond good and evil, something let's hope, that they don't themselves understand.

Of course it's a thing that cuts both ways. It enables a woman to forgive, as Morwyn had forgiven in her father, the most frightful of crimes, but it also enables her to punish with a scorn that turns to stone like the gorgon's head. I do not say of course that it's given to all of them to love with this death-in-life love; but when they do love with it they can give their man one single assassinating look and leave him forever! They seem forced to leave him; though I think — but this is a terrible mystery — that when they do so they feel themselves to be in some incredible sense the living heart of the man they've left! And that's why they can do what they do — for it's as if they did it to themselves!

"What is it?" the girl now asked the excited Welshman; but I noticed there was nothing in her tone that showed her usual sympathy with his mystic agitation. She asked him the question as coldly and calmly as if all he'd done was to find a snail on one of the dead asphodels.

But she had struck me so cruelly with that Medusa look that I got no comfort from this coldness of her tone to him.

And as for the Bard himself, he was far too worked up to notice anything unusual in her manner. He spoke to her alone and he spoke in Welsh; but when he saw that she didn't at once translate his words for my benefit, he turned to me too and spoke slowly and distinctly in Leprosid.

"The Tear of Tityos," he said, "is one of the Three Mysteries of the World. Do you know what it is? It's the one and only token there's been in the whole universe from the beginning that the world's cry is not disregarded. It's the tear shed by the System-of-Things itself in pity for the pain that life would bring when the spirit first moved in the darkness of matter. It's the eternal retort to the laughter we heard just now. All the way down the ages a few men, a few bards, have known it existed. It's the only material proof we've got that the System-of-Things-is — is to be — is not to be—" He broke off; and then added in a shrill, piercing cry that made the walls echo, and went reverberating up those two great flights of stairs, a cry that was as thin as a hair and as broken-edged as a crack in ice, "is not to be hated and cursed!"

After that he became calm again, so calm that he permitted me to try to translate, in my clumsy prep-school Greek what he had just said, to my friend the Athenian. And then with awe and reverence, as he held it in his shadowy hand — and I couldn't help but notice that even the airy substance of his hollow palm retained what he held, as a leaf might hold a drop of dew — one after another we all gazed at the thing.

What struck me most about it was that it kept changing its colour. Sometimes it was like a drop of blood; then it would grow clear as crystal; then it would take a pearl-like softness; then it became as blue as a hedge-sparrow's egg, then as green as the most vivid moss; and under all these changes it shot forth an indescribable lustre, that was not of any colour I had ever seen, and yet was a colour, though it wasn't white, or yellow, or golden, or the colour of flame.

I suppose all this is simply tedious to you, my son, with your modern mind. I suppose you're thinking that once lost, as we were, in the bowels of the earth it was likely enough that we should come across unusual geological specimens. I suppose you've already decided that Tityos must have been a survivor of some early Neanderthal race, who, to escape one or other of the glacial ages, had taken refuge underground. No doubt you think that anybody's floods of tears, dropped in an emotional crisis on one spot, in a place like this, might wash away a few grains of dust and bring to light some unknown precious stone. Why attribute such a portentous mystical significance, you are thinking, to what may well have been just an unusual natural phenomenon — a nameless gem with a lustre different from other gems?

Well, my lad, I can only remind you that every day in some place or other in these islands tears are shed, so desperate, so heroic, that some regard them as divine. There are plenty of you young people who don't boggle at believing this; and why shouldn't the intense emotion of the last of the Titans, or the last of the Neanderthals if you like, wring a wren's egg of pity out of the great Macrocosm Itself? Besides, my good friend, you mustn't forget how moved we all were at the giant's release. The extraordinary power of such waves of psychic emotion has been manifested again and again. Few scientists would dare deny that groups of intensely moved human minds have had, all down the ages, the power of working what look uncommonly like miracles.

The hearts of all of us were melting at that moment towards the System-of-Things. Why should such feelings remain subjective? Why shouldn't they crystallize themselves in a material form?

But I confess I'm using special pleading adapted to your particular habits of thought. What I prefer myself to think, and what seems the most natural, is that "the Tear of Tityos" was drawn out of the Titan himself along with the poor giant's own bloody sweat at his overwhelming redemption. But whatever the explanation may be, I shall never forget how we all stood, bewildered and dazed, staring at the object in Taliesin's hand.

Recumbent as I was I had my back to the stream of warm thick light, full of dancing dust-motes, motes which seemed larger, richer, goldener than the dust in any ordinary ray, that streamed in from the sleeping-place of Cronos. Full upon Morwyn's lovely face fell this magic light; and as I gazed frantically, cringingly, pitifully at her girlish form, outlined against those Cyclopean flights of steps behind her, it seemed to me that her youthful breasts were more developed than they had been before we entered Caer Sidi.

Had the psychic effect of that fit of abandoned weakness, when I sobbed myself to sleep against her body, been to make her less of a child and more of a woman?

But it was in vain I struggled to catch her eye. More beautiful, more animated, more maddeningly desirable than I had ever known her, she wouldn't look at me!

It was as if her love for me had turned, not so much into anger or hate, for then there would have been hope of a change, but into a frozen wall of icy indifference that nothing would ever melt again.

But the stream of light that illuminated my girl passed by, owing to some projection of the great rock, the burly figure of Socrates. Standing a little back as he was now, it seemed to me that he was completely out of sympathy with this increasing fuss over "the Tear of Tityos." Morwyn had come under its influence now and she and the Welshman were pouring out upon each other a veritable stream of broad Cymric vowels and deep Cymric gutturals.

But Socrates's satyrish face had begun to assume, if I'm not wrong, the particular look it must often have taken in the streets of Athens when his ironic questions only led to an irrelevant outburst of poetical rhetoric. It was an indulgent look. It had no weary detachment in it. At the same time it was formidably attuned to a very different spiritual key from all this mystical agitation. I am not sure that he didn't answer my glance across the space that divided us by a something approaching a philosophic wink. But I know it wasn't from any lack of sympathy with the Titan, who was still blissfully scratching his huge naked torso, that he acted like this.

I fancy it came from an instinctive hostility to women and poets; an hostility that many great philosophers, and a certain number of soldiers too, have displayed ere now in the annals of history. Surprised that I still regarded him with sympathy — I suppose he thought that I must of necessity share every mood of Morwyn's — he came slowly over to where I was and began giving me all his most personal impressions of this incident of "the Tear of Tityos." He was less logical than usual. His feeling about women and poets was evidently clouding and blurring the free working of his brain. My own impression is that he was struggling to give utterance, though his Greek sense of dignity held him back, to a mood totally at variance with that of Morwyn and her Welshman, a mood that was stoical enough, but at the same time obstinately humorous, and possessed of an abysmal sense of what you might call "cosmogonic beatitude," such as I have always relished in his admirer Rabelais.

I expect you're smiling, my boy, to hear me talk in this intellectual manner; but after all, you've so often caught me over the fire with Rabelais that at least you must know it isn't affectation, though it may be pedantry.

"What do you feel yourself, my friend," Socrates was pleased to inquire, as he sat down by my side, "about this 'Tear of Tityos'?"

"I'll tell you," I said, answering him gravely, though I couldn't take my eyes off Morwyn's illuminated face. "I think it's going too far to make as much of it as those two are making. I certainly haven't myself seen anything in the method of the System-of-Things that lends itself to the possibility of its shedding tears. It seems to me to be evolving its reign of pity in a less emotional manner. In fact I'm not at all sure" — here, for Black Peter was between us, I twisted into a regular curl the wisp of hair on the top of his head, which I call his "talent lock"— "that what my dog found is a tear at all. But, if it is, I regard it as what our anthropologists" — he smiled at my use of that word— "might call the external soul of all tortured animals. Tityos was the victim of a sort of vivisection; and it seems to me that this discovery, whatever its chemical constituents may be, might be regarded as an embodiment of all the tears that these wretched creatures, if they'd been human, would have shed in their helplessness and their pain. Not one of them in all their torture could really, of course, any more than the System which produced them, shed a real tear, but don't you think that what Black Peter found, connected so closely with this first of vivisected Beings, might be taken as a sort of symbolic covenant between them and the power behind the world that the cry of their torment has been heard? I have a notion that pain does possess the power to create and destroy various organic secretions, and what I really think is that the pain of Tityos, whose parents, like those of our immortal Sleepers" — and I nodded towards the place we'd left— "were the Earth and the Heaven, caused to be secreted within him, since he refrained for twenty-five thousand years from lifting a finger against those birds, this curious and tangible sign that the 'System-of-Things,' in spite of all appearances was on his side."

"It may well be," remarked Socrates with a sigh, "that you have put this matter correctly, but I find in my heart a profane wish that the Daimon in the System-of-Things's conscience would stir it up to quicker and more direct action. However! If the Tear of Tityos is a covenant that the Golden Age will return, and the weak and the helpless will be saved, I can only hope that the great Pan and the other gods will do all they can to hasten the coming of that most blessed day."

He was silent; and perceiving very soon with his sympathetic instinct for all erotic subtleties how absorbed I was in watching Morwyn, he left my side, and wandering over to Tityos began, after his customary manner with the simpler intelligences at home, asking the Titan a few provocative and revolutionary questions.

It was then I became aware that some new matter had arisen between Morwyn and Taliesin that clearly had to do with me. They both kept turning towards me and then gazing again at each other; and then, in obvious connection with her and me, glancing at those two great flights of stairs which rose in front of us and lost themselves in the darkness. At first I regarded all this with an intense and morbid interest, but without the remotest suspicion of any danger.

Then suddenly I turned deadly cold. They were plotting to desert me! Yes, there could be no other explanation of those repeated glances at that staircase, and these furtive and deprecatory looks in my direction. This was for me, except for that crisis on the Emperor's yacht, when the hellish crowd was actually upon us and they recited the Vivisector's Catechism, the worst moment of this whole appalling experience.

I made a frantic effort to get up and go to them; but my groin made me so sick with pain when I tried to stand that I had to give it up.

Then I waved to them to come to me, but their heads were turned away, and not only so, but they were straining their necks with the utmost concentration; struggling I fancy to pierce as far as possible into the darkness where those two staircases, the one to the right and the one to the left, vanished from their eyes.

Socrates, too, had his back to me. He was standing like a stalwart, broad-shouldered dwarf at the knees of a naked giant, and I could see the face of the Titan, who was bending down above him, already stiffened into a pathetically anxious and puzzled expression.

And then what should I see but the exultant Taliesin actually handing over to Morwyn his precious "Tear of Tityos"; and when he had made sure it was safe in the palm of her hand, what did he do but hurry off towards the Athenian, evidently to try to induce him to join in this plot against me!

Yes, except for that scene on board Nero's galley when we were huddled together at the taffrail and I thought the end had come, this was my worst moment. Three times I struggled frantically to get on my feet; but it was no use. Not only was the pain of such a movement intolerable, but it seemed to me that some essential muscle, or sinew, or tendon, deep inside the socket of one of my thighs, had grown entirely atrophied and refused to obey my will.

There I was, left completely alone, while Morwyn with her back turned to me, sometimes gazing at what she held in her hand and sometimes staring up at those enormous flights of steps, made no attempt to prevent her father who was pouring into her ears his ambiguous remorse, from stealing furtive and burning glances at Black Peter where he lay at my feet.

I don’t believe she was lending more than half an ear to what the fellow was saying. Having once got him into the right path she displayed a profound feminine unconcern about his elaborate explanations of this change of heart; and she didn’t seem in the least disturbed by his obvious hankering after the old wickedness. I suppose that was feminine too. Shakespeare, I remember — though by God! I didn’t think of Shakespeare then — indicated in Macbeth the difference in this point between men and women. Emotion of some sort is to them — and heaven knows perhaps rightly! — the sole moving force in all human decisions; and they just take it for granted that the man they’re dealing with, though he’ll do what he wants to do, or what they want him to do, won’t be happy unless he’s allowed to dilate on all the plausible and logical reasons for this line of conduct and allowed to indulge to the limit in regrets, compunctions, afterthoughts, reversions, recessions, and in every sort of backward glance in the forbidden direction.

What with the pain that my struggles to get up had caused in my wounded groin, and the complete loss of that re-assuring clairvoyance that had made me certain of her love, I felt at that moment that I touched the rock-bottom of human misery. How could she treat me so? How could the rest of them treat me so? I had realized the Welshman’s infatuation for her; but I had thought, I confess, that the Athenian would stand by me to the last.

But there he was, talking as earnestly to the giant and Taliesin as if I didn’t exist! And there they were, returning to Morwyn now, gathering round her, gathering round her father, while Tityos towered above them all, dazed and bewildered, almost numb with puzzled beatitude.

I stretched out my hand to stroke Black Peter; and in my weakness and pain I muttered to him monotonously, over and over: “I’ve got one friend anyway! I’ve got one friend anyway! I’ve got—”

And then I saw the whole group of them, with Tityos in the background, advancing towards the place where I lay.

“Well, Captain,” began my friend the Athenian, “we’ve had quite a council of war over you, and though the conclusion we’ve reached will distress you in one way, in another way it will have its compensation; and in any case you will, I know, bring your philosophy — which I think I may say is also mine — to bear upon the issue.”

I barely gave him a nod. Every pulse, every nerve, every drop of blood within me, all that we call “mind,” all that we call “spirit,” was beating and quivering and straining towards Morwyn, making a fierce, wild struggle to break up this terrible barrier between us.

“Can’t — we — talk — alone?” I murmured, as I gazed up pitifully into her face.

She looked at me for a long, long minute in absolute silence. And not only were we two silent, but all our friends were silent. And it seemed to me as though from the mysterious place we had left, the Caer Sidi of our guide’s wild boasting, where “sleep was the bond forged for Cronos,” there flowed over us all a veritable eternity of silence.

In the abysses of Hell — unless those sea-monsters were still making their moan — a yet deeper silence prevailed. I felt as if I could hear nothing in the whole universe of matter except the panting of Black Peter and the beating of my own heart! Black Peter was particularly jubilant at that moment. He even began dragging himself about on his belly after that curious fashion of his, a gesture in which he never indulged unless he was obsessed by some overwhelming pleasure.

But save for the thundering sound of my own heart in my ears and for this ill-timed outburst of joy on the part of Black Peter, all the whole earth, all the whole sidereal cosmos seemed waiting upon the decision of this one slight girl, seemed hanging upon the inscrutable working of this one enigmatic breast. But harder than adamant in the self-lacerating whim of its arbitrary choice, my girl's heart showed not the slightest sign of yielding, nor even — and this was crueller still — of revealing any reason for this sudden mad resentment against me.

In vain I tried to call up the faintest flicker of that wonderful clairvoyance that the fall of the meteor had evoked. It had left me forever; and as I gazed up from the ground upon that little oval face with the eyes fixed so clingingly upon my own, it seemed as if some monstrous enchantment must have fallen upon us, that we could look at each other like that — that she could look at me like that — and no intelligible communication pass between us! But she did look at me with her whole being. I felt that at the moment when it happened, and thinking of it since I am absolutely sure of it.

For that brief while our eyes, as the phrase is, "clung to one another." Can it be that there comes into existence an actual identity between lovers who are more than ordinary lovers, an identity that is totally unaffected by the feelings of the moment, an identity that can continue undisturbed in the midst of paroxysms of anger and grievance and even in the presence of actual hatred?

But what a fate to be united in hopeless identity with a being who constantly turns upon you a look of cold and indignant contempt! If any other person hated you, or despised you to such a tune as this, oh, how willingly and with what a sigh of relief you would whistle them down the wind and take measures never to cross their path again!

But you can't do such things when once this identity has established itself. Is there anything you can do?

Nothing at all! Nothing will come of nothing. For the rest of your days you will have to endure every grade, level, and degree of contemptuous distaste — just as if you were some fabulous beast whose forked and stinging tail was forever being turned against its own flanks!

Ah, my dear son, you and your generation are so accustomed to analyse all this away that you cannot take it seriously. You name these things by one queer name after another, not realizing that the thing itself remains unchanged by being named.

Down there in the heart of the cosmos — where no one could interfere with us or make a guess as to what was going on between us, any more than if we were two pips in the centre of an infinite orange — Morwyn and I wrestled, as our eyes clung together, in that old immemorial love-hate, ancient as life itself, forever beginning, forever ending, without reason, without cause!

Her face was strained as she stared at me, but at the same time triumphant. What was she doing? What was she being driven to by the double-edged force within her? The longer our eyes clung, the stronger she became and the weaker I; till at last I could bear it no more, and I looked away in order to find refuge in Black Peter.

But Black Peter was no longer at my feet, no longer making those ecstatic movements on his belly. Black Peter was desperately jumping up towards her hand, towards the mysterious object she held in her hand. Then it rushed into my mind what a mad fuss he had made when he first found the “Tear of Tityos.” So that was it! That was the cause of his excitement; not, as I had innocently supposed, because of his joy at the three of us being together.

But the breaking up of our mutual gaze was the signal for a fine hullabaloo of excited chatter between all our companions. Even the poor foolish Titan began murmuring articulate words. Indeed they all talked so fast, and in so many different tongues, that the scene became for me, in my insufferable misery, like a monstrous burlesque of the day of Pentecost!

But silence came at last, and Morwyn began speaking to me. She spoke calmly and quietly, but with the same curious strain in her speech that was at once queerly exultant and in some odd way abnormal and unnatural. I heard her with my eyes fixed in dull hopelessness on Black Peter's futile struggles to reach what she held so tight. She explained to me, while the rest of them listened more closely than I did — for what did I care? — how one of those great flights of steps led back to Wales, and the other to a portion of this strange underworld from which it was possible to reach North America. She told me that Taliesin had been long prophesying to her — so now I knew the secret of all those passionate conversations! — that only by the return from the dead of the soul of a confirmed vivisector could this atrocious crime against the conscience of mankind be abolished.

It was on the occasion of some old dark legendary crime, occurring I understood in Ireland, when he'd heard some avenger called Mordwyd Tyllyon utter the syllables "Guern gwnywch," that this kind of penance for an unnatural deed first entered his head. But many other portents, he had told her, pointed in the same direction.

Tityos, in his dumb brutish way had, it appears, got the idea lodged in his brain that if he could only get safe to North America he'd be able to roam, free and at large, over vast mountains and illimitable ice-fields, and never meet a living soul. And if a woman and a dog, Taliesin had told her, were to make a pilgrimage throughout Northern America, they could excite, among such as had the destiny to be excited— "tynged" was the word the bard used— "a passionate response against vivisection. I told him," she concluded, "that Black Peter was so devoted to you that he would never leave you unless he was carried by force, but he said — and you see how true it has proved! — that as long as I had ‘the Tear of Tityos’ the dog would follow me to the world’s end. We’ve been talking it all over, my father and I; and we feel that in your unhappy condition it would be lunacy to attempt to take you with us. Black Peter and I will have all we can do to get on alone. I expect it’ll end with the Titan having to carry us both! But Socrates here” — and she glanced at my Athenian with a gleam of that terrible feminine humour that bites like poisoned flame— “says he’ll be delighted to escort you home to Wales! Now do you see what I mean? Now do you realize how our course is marked out, as Taliesin says, by the stars? I shall be helping my dear father to undo the harm he’s done” — here she actually touched the sleeve of the second Mr. “ — while you’ll be able to get safe home — a thing beyond our hope! Once home I’m sure you’ll be” — here for a moment our eyes clung together once more— “cured of your hurt, and” — here she hesitated and her lips did seem to me to twitch, while I wondered desperately what was coming— “and it’ll be easy, of course, after all this, for Black Peter and me to come back to you over the water.”

I think I might have been able to keep my self-control at that moment, for there’s a deadly strength in righteous indignation and she’d struck me a blow whose mark I’ll carry to the grave, if it hadn’t been that her wretched father must needs put in his hypocritical word.

“It is, my dear Captain,” he said, “one of those spiritual matters that can only be understood from the inside. This mission of ours to America will be only a beginning. I think I’ll reside in California when it’s over. There’ll no doubt be splendid missionary work to be done in California. I’ll be interested to argue, too, with the spirits of the Californian scientists out there. I believe they’re wonderful in some of the things they’ve done, especially in regard to dogs. I’m sure Morwyn won’t mind my visiting some of their Research Laboratories as long as I speak against the abuses of the practice. I'm sure she'll feel as I do when she's seen some of their more beautiful experiments, that it's well worth a little suffering of the lower animals, and — perhaps even of the lower races, if the precious lives of our dear ones can be prolonged. Indeed, I intend to suggest that in the Southern States, and I'm sure my little daughter will agree with me, that when that unspeakable and unthinkable event occurs of which I can scarcely bear to speak in her presence, of an African man embracing an American woman, it would be both a protection for pure womanhood and a wonderful advance in scientific knowledge if they substituted" — here the second Mr. — glanced, with the sly unction of a statesmanlike moralist, first at Tityos and then Black Peter— "a few of their most problematic black men for the dogs and monkeys in their laboratories."

He looked round, as he concluded, with so much self-satisfied composure and such an air of preposterous virtue that I was roused to a fit of blind fury. To have endured all we had endured, to have seen all we had seen, only to find this incorrigible man just as lacking in conscience as ever was the last straw.

I lost all control. I became beside myself. Staggering to my feet, though the pain it caused me was almost intolerable, I seized Morwyn by the shoulders, and pressing myself against her thumped out upon her back a savage Leprosid whisper.

"He's dead, dead, dead!" I gasped in insane anger. "He's dead, I tell you, and I'm alive! You're sacrificing life to death. You're letting this miserable ghost, whom God has damned, come between us forever! If you go away now, if you rob me now of my only friend in the world, you may be proud of your pious choice, but you are — you are — you're killing—" My hands dropped.

The pain was too great. I staggered away from her and sank down unconscious against the wall.

“Morwyn! Morwyn!” I murmured feebly, when I saw only the ugly satyr-visage of Socrates bending over me. His face seemed to hover so deliberately between me and the dim-ascending stairs that I thrust it impatiently aside. Oh, my love! oh my false, false love! There she was, Tityos in front of her, the Welshman behind her, and Black Peter’s little dark figure at her side, all vanishing into the mist, all deserting me, as the darkness of the ascent gathered their forms into it!

She was gone. Black Peter was gone. Not once had she looked back. Oh, unbelievable strength of woman’s will! Cruel in their love, cruel in their hate, how could it be that their limbs should be so soft and their hearts so pitiless? That little black louse-like figure, he did look back! Clearly I saw him twist round; and the touching thing was that he did what he frequently used to do when I have been taking him where he was reluctant to go. He pretended to want to lift his leg! But she dragged him on; and that was the last I saw of them. The thing she held, burned still, a beautiful, terrible burning. That shone on, when all the rest was swallowed up in darkness.

But I sank back, and waving the philosopher away — how I hated his kind ugly face at that moment! — I shut my eyes tight and fell into a blank, hopeless, despairing coma. I think I must have been delirious when this coma passed, for in some strange manner the loss of both girl and dog were for a time — such are the opiates of mental aberration! — held in abeyance by thoughts of what she carried. It was the last thing I had seen and my stunned intelligence seemed to cling blindly to it. But it was all confused and changed in my delirium.

Had I really heard someone say, when they were discussing this thing, that though it had fallen from that poor giant’s eyes it was really a tear of blood shed by the Power behind the universe?

All these immortal spirits, from the Marquis of Sade to our old Welshman had spoken of the System-of-Things as if it were some kind of living Being, and now in my delirium I seemed to visualize this Being. But, as so often happens in the extravagance of such raving, my vision of it was grotesque and ridiculous. For I saw it, this Tremendum Mysterium, in the form of a fish, and not of an uncommon fish either. To say the truth I saw it in the form of a mackerel of the sea. And the curious thing about my vision was that it seemed perfectly natural to me that a mackerel of the sea should be the Beginning and the End of all things. It never struck me at that moment, such was the power of my delirium, that it was as impossible for a fish to weep as for the First Cause to weep.

I was indeed completely obsessed by this Tear of Tityos! I seemed to see it as it slid burning and beautifully down the furrowed cheeks of Cronos, down the weary ages of evolution, down the unending spirals of terraqueous change. In generation after generation I saw it — a light shining in darkness — and it was always mocked and derided. Over it and about it rose and fell forever the laughter of Democritus, the jeering of the atoms and the void. It was weakness; it was folly; it was madness; it was the eternal protest of the Impossible against reason, against the determination of matter, against the doing of evil "that good may come."

How grotesque this vision of my delirium was can be seen in the substitution in my trance of a fish — a common sea fish — for the unknown Power behind the universe! What under heaven had put into my head this grotesque substitution? Certainly nothing I had seen in that ghastly Cimmerian abyss where those monsters clung and tore. I have never set eyes on a mackerel of the sea except dead and bleeding and sold to me for food. But what insanity! Had I seen the System-of-Things sold in the market? Had I caught its eye fixed upon me glazed and white from the slab of a fish-shop? Had I eaten the System-of-Things with bread-crumbs and vinegar?

Certainly that whole vision, after seeing her drag Black Peter away, was a mad affair; and through it all ran, not only the thing she held in her hand, but the image of that familiar little black shape twisting its head round and uplifting its leg. In fact I seemed to see the whole secret of creation in that black reversed head and that pathetic excuse as she jerked him forward. Yes, I saw the 'Tear of Tityos shine forth pitiful and terrible from every prodded nerve in every beast in their laboratories. I saw it in the scorched flesh of every negro at the stake. I saw it in the wild eye-balls of pain none ever see, save the demons in Hell who feed upon such sights.

The chemistry of its mystery seemed to be drawn, in my madness, from — But I will not go on! Only it seemed to me that in what I saw there was something else than pity — something that I couldn't understand. Yes, that was the rub. That was the question of questions.

I found myself saying to myself as I awoke, "The vengeance of God! The vengeance of God!" just like that, over and over again.

Thinking of it now in cold blood, however, I confess it does not seem as if my experience of the ways of the System of Things jumps, as you might say, with the idea of vengeance. It rather suggests the idea, a good deal less satisfactory to one's human mind, of the doling out of rope to the wicked, so that they can damn themselves at large, at their full leisure and discretion!

It was at this point, before the cold, clear, deadly recognition of what had happened turned to a block of ice in my heart, that the infinite tenderness and delicate tact of Socrates served me such a wondrous good turn. He gave me no time to brood upon my situation in a spot where every rock and stone, every dead asphodel-stalk, every phosphorescent light-mote from the sleeping-place of Cronos, was full of reminders of her words, her movements, her frail form. Careful and gentle as a woman — and of course his lack of bodily substance helped him to make full use of this delicacy of touch — he lifted me from the ground and holding me firmly and lightly in his arms strode over the asphodel-stalks towards the steps.

You can imagine, my son, what I felt when we reached the point where the steps divided! Far into the mist I saw that right-hand flight ascend, up which she had dragged Black Peter. He had turned but she had not turned. Had my distrust, my worse than distrust, of that damned ghost alienated her heart from me forever? Noticing how I kept twisting my head as he bore me up the fatal steps, my Athenian paused for a minute and took breath. Made bold by his tenderness and feeling a deep urge to confide in someone, I asked him point-blank if he thought my girl's heart had turned completely against me.

His reply, as I think of it now, showed no small wisdom. Gravely — and yet with a flicker of a smile, for I could see he regarded all this fuss about a woman, so alien to his own weakness, as pure Nordic moonshine — he assured me, swearing devoutly by his beloved Pan, that I need have no anxiety.

"She would never have taken your dog," he said, and unlike the Welshman he didn't refer to my small pet as a "hound,"

"hadn't she resolved to return to you. My own good woman used frequently to present to me a countenance convulsed with hatred, but that didn't prevent her from preparing my supper with the utmost care! She once broke a valuable pitcher on my head, and followed the blow with a torrent of the bitterest invective, and yet she remembered that very day, when the man came to our door, to choose the particular Piraeus cake for which, just then, I had a special fancy. No, no, Captain! I assure you, across my old love-bruised heart, you need have no fear. She will come back to you, if she lives! And unless those hyperboreans she is visiting are godless barbarians I'm sure that with that Homeric minstrel to guide her, and that simple son of the morning to protect her, she will be perfectly safe. Well! if you have gazed long enough at the place where she vanished, we'll proceed on our way."

It was indeed a strange journey upon which we set out. The light grew dimmer and dimmer as we advanced, and ere long vanished altogether, leaving us in thick darkness.

But the darkness, instead of retarding, seemed only to quicken the sturdy steps of my athletic bearer. It seemed as if nothing was impossible to him as long as he could plant one firm foot after the other upon the atoms and the void that lay beneath him. Something about this immense confidence of the man made me thoroughly ashamed of my pusillanimity. Besides, who knows? If she did reach America, after all we had gone through, a voyage home by sea would be nothing to her.

"Do you suppose," I asked him after he had been put to it to shift me from arm to arm several times, and I can tell you I sank into his bodiless substance as if into a bed of down, "that when she does return she'll bring back that horrible spirit with her?"

He pondered for a while, in the dense darkness that surrounded our ascent, without replying. Then he said, speaking very slowly and in something like my own Preparatory-School Greek: "You have asked me, Captain, a difficult question, and I must ask you something in return. Do they, among those Atlanteans to whom she is going, defy the immortal concepts of Mercy and Pity for the sake of knowledge and to prolong life, as I find they do to-day in wide-stretching Europe?"

“I believe,” I answered, “that there are even fewer restraints over there with regard to the torture of the lower animals. There are certainly larger bequests of money among them to encourage such cruelties.”

“In that case,” he said, “I think you may be pretty sure that the man’s repentance will be short-lived. He’ll probably give her the slip and spend his time hovering about the worst of their torture-chambers until he gets a hankering to return to Hell, where he can indulge his ‘service of humanity’ with less trouble. No, my friend, my prediction is, though I am no prophet, that your woman will bring your dog back alone.”

His words were such a comfort that I must have fallen then into so deep a sleep that even the shiftings I had periodically to undergo, when I sank too far into his insubstantial form, lacked the power to awaken me.

When I did at last come to myself it was to find that we had reached a kind of platform or landing in our ascent, upon which there was falling a soft and pearly luminosity through a narrow arch. Fronting the arch through which this most welcome light fell, a man in the garb of a priest-scholar of about the time of Holbein was squatting upon a plump wine-skin of some sort, from a little slit in whose side rich purpureal drops were oozing, drops that trickled unnoticed to the ground from beneath his faded cassock.

He was a middle-aged man with the most intellectual head and the most piercing eyes I have ever seen in my life. He wore a closely-trimmed beard, cut after the French manner, and as far as I could make out, as he jumped to his feet to greet us, he laid down beside his wine-skin-stool an earthen pot full of tiny seedlings growing in dark leaf-mould which he had been examining under some primitive kind of microscope.

He came hurriedly forward with a cry of joyous recognition and helped my Athenian to lay me down on the ground; where with my head resting on the wine-skin whose oozing drops actually wetted my skull, I was in a position to gaze through the arch into what — even to my wounded heart — seemed like a veritable heaven. I saw an expanse of softly-lit, emerald-coloured pastures, among which upon lovely undulating slopes and by crystal-flowing streams men and women in gay butterfly-clothes were dallying and conversing with eager joy.

"This old rascal, Captain," said Socrates with some embarrassment, "will never let me introduce him properly to anybody. He insists on being called 'Frank,' and nothing but 'Frank.' When I introduced him to my Chinese friend Kwang-Tze the situation I can assure you became extremely disconcerting. This incorrigible Frank — yes! my fine rogue, I will give you away — who's the friend of god knows how many princes and prelates, wanted my polite Chinaman to dispense with all his submissions and prostrations and call him his sweet cod, his honey-cousin, his pilgarlic crony, his blessed pig's eye, his jolly cheese-mite, his honest drinker, his royal tickler, his darling cock-weevil of the quintessence. And now, on my life," so Socrates went on, in his elaborate city-manner, poking satiric fun no doubt at both of us, "I don't see, Captain, how you'll know who this honest Frank may be, compared with all the other honest Franks and Toms and Jacques Bon-Cœurs who have drunk neat and spat white over the barley-bearing earth. But I can assure you that not his own Doctor Rondibilis or any of our old classic medicine-men has understood more deeply the secrets of the cosmos than Master François here; and this, my dear Rabelais" — so he was pleased to continue with a tender glance in my direction— "is a gallant Captain from the Britannic Islands who has been on his travels but is now on his way home. The Captain tells me he knows your book, my good Frank, from cover to cover; and indeed he spoke of it only lately, in the sleeping-place of Saturn, as the wisest and greatest book ever written by human pen."

The man in the faded soutane chuckled cordially as he made his bow, while I summoned up the best French I had learnt at Sandhurst to express unbounded veneration for the immortal creator of my admired Pantagruel, that indulgent, heroic, tender-hearted model of all noble virtues.

Socrates had spoken in the slow and simple Greek I had come to follow pretty well, and it was in that same language, but uttered far too quickly for me to catch its drift, that the great Doctor now murmured something in reply. I believe his words referred to the hurt in my groin, which since that burst of angry whispering in the ears of my girl, had been causing me the most devilish pains.

That such was their import I felt to be confirmed by what now followed; for kneeling at my side this great and good physician actually squeezed some of the heavenly contents of the wine-skin beneath my head into the palm of his hand; and before the precious fluid had time to sink through that shadowy cup he tilted it into my parched gullet; and I can assure you, my child, I have never tasted such a drink!

Sinking back after this divine refreshment I found my spirits so wonderfully recovered that I began fo babble out my most intimate secrets to this worthy man; and though my French must have been a disgrace to my education I confess I found the language peculiarly adapted to the topic most near my heart.

“I want to assure you first, Doctor,” I began, interspersing my boorish struggles with this amorous tongue by a few debouchings into a still more clumsy Greek, “that I have been asking myself since I have been in Hell whether what has happened to me is a punishment for the sensual pleasure I have derived from making love to a girl so much younger than myself. It is true I have refrained from actually seducing her; but I’m afraid—”

I was interrupted by a tempestuous burst of laughter from the Curé of Meudon. “O most honest,” gasped the great Doctor, “but most deluded of Captains; let me tell you once and for all — so that you will never again make this wretched, this god-forsaken, this blasphemous, this hell-spawned error — that there is no sensual pleasure, as long as it contains no scurvy and one-sided cruelty, whose joy and rapture and ecstasy in our brief and troubled pilgrimage through this mortal life is not allowed, encouraged, indulged, confirmed, and more than blest, by the most bountiful and all-wise God, who is the great shepherd of us all! He it is who has put into our poor, frail, weak, shaky, and metagrabolized bodies, that celestial power of being transported to the Seventh Heaven by the rapture of voluptuous dallyings. No, it is not this great and good god, whom the deep philosophers of all the centuries have known as the System-of-Things, and whose pity and mercy are revealed in our human conscience, who would forbid the exquisite delights of our amorous senses. It’s the false god of Science who’d forbid these free joys in the name of ‘Eugenics.’ It’s the false god of Religion who’d forbid these heavenly delights in the name of Chastity. All sensual joy, oh most honest but most gullible Captain, is permitted by this great and good god, as long as it isn’t cruel, and I can assure you that the horrible cruelty in the world doesn’t come from the pleasures of Eros but from the puritanism and fanaticism of misguided bigots.

“My precious crony here tells me that your dainty, sweet-natured, most loving wench has one of these stony-hearted dog-tormentors for a father. A pox on the cruel devils! I knew them well, in my time on earth. I always hated them. They’re not true doctors. True doctors cure diseases with the wholesome antidotes given us by Nature and with a firm hand on a beneficent knife. They destroy disease; they heal disease; they don’t expel disease by the means of disease, or with the help of Satan cast out Satan.

This honest drinker here has been investigating this very question as it exists in your world to-day. He has had plenty of opportunity; for many excellent doctors come to this place who don't give a fig for such abominations. They tell him that of recent years the death-rate from every disease has gone down, owing to sanitary improvements except in the cases of the very diseases they claim to cure! And yet this honest cod here swears by his god Pan, and I believe him too, that these cruel devils would go on doing what they do for the pure interest of what they call Research, even if it were proved up to the hilt that they've never cured a single human ailment. That's where the rogues are such cunning catch-poles! They gull the people, just as the begging-friars and the pardoners and the psalm-singers gulled the people in my day. They spoil the sweet breath of life with their secret torments and their poisonous practises! May a million cart-loads of hornified devils carry them away! The stomach of an honest man is turned by their practices; and yet no one dare lift a finger against them. By the belly of Bacchus, if I were a living man again I'd write such a sequel to my Book as would clear the earth of such smug bigots.

"The merciful and great God who made the world will call upon them to answer one day for this foul crime against his creatures. And as for your pleasures with your wench, may the same omnipotent Being increase them ten-fold! Therefore take heart, dear cod, and keep the divine spirit within you unperturbed."

He was silent; and once more I took up my tale; rambling on about all my anxieties and troubles, and I doubt if any unhappy lover — certainly none of my mature years — has ever found such a courteous and sympathetic audience.

The Athenian's satyrish features did, it is true, not unfrequently break into a sly smile, and now and again a gargantuan chuckle issued from the great humorist's bearded lips, but they both heard me with infinite patience and understanding; and the comfort of expressing my heart's burden — even in abominable French — was indescribably sweet.

As I went on — and the sight seemed to tune my periods to a rhythm far beyond my natural gifts — I couldn't help gazing across their expressive lineaments into the luminous expanse of verdurous felicity that was revealed through that narrow archway.

It is not everyone, my dear boy, who while yet alive has been privileged to fix his eyes upon the Fields of Elysium — but our nature is such that when a miracle actually confronts us we take it very easily!

"If I could only be sure," I murmured passionately, "that neither my girl nor my dog had turned against me; if I could only be sure that I should eventually see them both again, I think I could endure the misery of this separation. But it's terrible to me to feel that my distrust of that accursed ghost should have thrust an everlasting wedge between her and me.

"Has all the self-restraint which I've displayed in my relations with her, been totally thrown away and wasted? You know how it is" — thus did I address these two great spirits without fear of being misunderstood— "with the dearest of women? They fall into perfectly insane fits of erotic hatred; and yet you know very well that if once they've loved you, you have a hold upon them that outlasts life itself. Of course men are different in these things; and though I shall forgive her the pain she's caused me, I shall never forget the sickening despair that came over me as she dragged Black Peter after her up those steps!"

There was a pause when I had finished and a look passed between the two friends that was beyond my interpretation. I think they must have seen that I had caught this look, for Socrates spoke at once.

“You won’t be offended, Captain,” said he, “if I reveal to you the thought that the Doctor and I exchanged just then? We decided together that it was God you wanted!”

I moved my legs to make them more comfortable and gazed dumbfounded at the two of them.

“God?” I exclaimed. “Aren’t half the cruelties of the world done in the name of God?”

Socrates quoted a passage from Homer; but it was the immortal Doctor himself who now addressed me.

“There have always,” he said, “been a multitude of gods in this mortal world, and not one of them but spends the whole of his time, or of her time, meddling and tinkering with the lives of honest men. I rejoice to learn, Captain, that this brisk, neat, gay, kind, most happily-toying, most sweetly-dallying wench has gone to lure, beguile, seduce and cajole these bastard scientists from the cruel torments they inflict on the creatures of earth. If only, as Aristophanes says — for our friend here will allow me to quote once from that jibing and jesting enemy of novelties — if only all such comely, waggish, fair, good-conditioned, daffidowndilly lasses would turn sour, peevish, gloomy, unkind, biting, sarcastic, puritanical, until these inventors of bombs and poisons and gases, these torturers of monkeys, these cutters-up of dogs, ceased their devilish games, the great universal God who has revealed Himself in our human conscience, would then, and then only, and not till then, see his divine will realized upon earth! Then would the Golden Age return. Then would Saturn awake from sleep. Then would the wise and the un-wise lie down together in confidence and peace. Then would the restitution of all things be at hand.”

The good Doctor bent forward at that point to hold to my lips another deep draught of his immortal liquor. Then he recommenced. “If you, my worthy but heartbroken cod from the Britannic Islands, would turn, as our friend says, to the only great and true God whose name is mercy and pity, you would find him in the fire, in the water, in the air, in the earth; you would find him in the divine spark of heroic magnanimity at the bottom of your own immortal soul, you would find him in the link indestructible, in the bond unbreakable that exists between all honest lovers from the foundation of the world. It is the worship of false gods that does the harm.

"Not long ago, along with my friend the poet Villon, I made a journey to the edge of the Cimmerian ocean. Here I discovered two monstrous and cabalistical idols, idols in the very act of being worshipped by a horde of famished, hunger-starved devils, of filthy, swingeing devils, of rustling, thumping and scuffling devils."

I could not resist interrupting him at this point to say that I also had seen these Images and that it seemed to me they were still in the process of being created by the souls that cringed before them.

The noble Doctor contemplated me with astonishment. "Then you have been," he said, "where few, even of us, have presumed to wander. You have been to the bottom of the ultimate abyss, and how you escaped with your skin from that Colosseum of Tophet the System-of-Things alone knows."

With this he turned to Socrates and began rallying him roundly; for it appeared that my Athenian had refused to believe that his friend had actually seen these horrible gods of black Religion and black Science. "You see," he cried, "hyperbolical and sophistical cod, how this honest drinker of a Britannic Captain bears out what I've always said? I tell you Master Villon and I heard these thumping devils howl out their litany to their twin Beelzebubs. 'O great Demiurge!' they cried to one of them, 'that out of thy canonical whimsies and for thy own private and arbitrary will and pleasure hath created all the cruelty on earth, save us and help us who cringe and cower and lick the dust before thee! Make us thy pets, make us thy favoured ones, make us thy darling elect, chosen by thee for our dung-licking, even from the foundation of the world! Out of nothing, O great Demiurge, didst thou for thy merry sport create this world, predestinating it according to thy wilful fancy and moulding its nature after the model of thine own sacrosanct will; so that power and cruelty and strength and knowledge and cleverness should have the weak and the simple and the foolish and the helpless at their absolute mercy for ever! Favour us therefore who copy thee and cringe to thee and forever cry upon thy name, favour us who acknowledge thee as our only god; and as for the heretics who refuse to lick the dust before thee — burn ’em, tear ’em, nip ’em with hot pincers, drown ’em, hang ’em, spit ’em at the bung-hole, pelt ’em, bruise ’em, dismember ’em, gut ’em, bowel ’em, paunch ’em, thrash ’em, slash ’em, gasp ’em, pare ’em, hew ’em, flea ’em, boil ’em, broil ’em, carbonade ’em, crucify ’em, these wicked heretics!”

“Master Villon was so panic-stricken at what we heard that I was hard put to it to keep him from bolting back to Heaven the prehistoric way; but I held him — as the poor rogue can bear witness — till we’d listened to what the other devils were howling who were worshipping the other Image.

“‘O great God of Science,’ these cogging prattlers chittered, ‘grant us to know more and more and more and more and more of thy divine chemistry and most sacrosanct secrets! Grant us to pinch and boil and freeze and burn and press and prod the lower animals of the earth, till in every devilish way thou canst devise we have wrung-out and squeezed-out the last shrieking drop of thy most holy knowledge from the nerves and the veins and the sinews and the fibres of the helpless creatures thou hast given into our hands! Thus with their diseases shall we cure our diseases; thus by their torture will our lives be prolonged. Thus shall we prosper by poison; thus shall we flourish by torment; thus by evil piled up upon evil will knowledge and progress and civilization prevail!”

But I could stand no more — this frightful confirmation of all my fears, issuing from the lips of my favourite writer, broke me down completely. I saw the whole round earth given up to the fanatical, the powerful, and the cruel. I saw Morwyn raped and murdered; I saw Black Peter flung into a Research Laboratory. My groin gave me an intolerable spasm; my heart seemed to break; and while my head slid down from the dripping wineskin, I rolled unconscious upon the ground.

When I returned to life again I found that both the two magnanimous spirits were bending over me.

But the other great Shadow lifted my head upon his own lap, as he squatted there; and I shall never to my dying day forget the words he uttered as he bowed down above me.

“You are going back into your own world, dear cod,” he said gently, “and may that Intellectual Sphere, whose Centre is everywhere and Circumference nowhere keep you in His Almighty Protection. He is the System-of-Things, my honest friend, and not these false gods. He works slowly, but He works surely, for His ways are not the ways of power and force, but the ways of mercy and pity. Beware of those who look only to the future; for all true advance is also a return. The sleeping-place of the Age of Gold is in the depths of every human heart; and to this must all revert. Bloody religion and bloody science are not forever. At the bottom of the world is pain; but below the pain is hope. Be of good cheer, dear cod, He is overcoming the world. There is knowledge; but He is not in the knowledge. There is religion; but He is not in the religion. Wherever a man refuses to do evil that good may come, wherever a man is merciful and pitiful even unto his hurt, there and there only is the great and true God, who is below all, and above all and in us all!"

It's a queer thing to have to confess, my son, but so deeply did these words move me in my weak state that even before he ceased speaking the tears were pouring down my cheeks.

"Take him up now, my friend," I heard him say through my sobs, "and carry him whence he came. He has seen Hell; he has entered the sleeping-place of Saturn; he has looked into the Elysian Fields; but when he goes back whence he came, it will only be to discover that in his own heart, and in his own heart alone, is the divine weakness and the divine madness wherewith the System-of-Things overcomes the world!"

I find it hard to recall, in any coherent or logical sequence, all the details of my long journey home under the care of my courteous Athenian. We spoke much together as we went; and I fear I wearied his patience sadly with my perpetual talk about Morwyn and Black Peter. I confessed to him again and again that I myself was far too great a coward ever to give my life for these tortured beasts; but I told him how greatly I feared that my girl, especially if her father gave her the slip, might be driven to do that very thing. But at this he always shook his great satyrish head.

"No," he assured me, "whatever dangers those two may encounter in America, they will return home safe, even as she said they would, in some mighty ship. But remember," he said, "if by any chance they did give their lives for these tormented animals, or if you yourself by any chance died of this hurt, which I am afraid is more serious than you think, before they came back, no one knows and no one will ever know, until the System-of-Things restores the Golden Age, whether it is better to be alive or dead! But alive or dead, as the Doctor reminded us, the real mystery of our hearts, and of the hearts we carry with us, lies outside all we know, lies outside Earth and Hell and Limbo and Paradise, lies in that Circle that has no Circumference.”

THE END

Owen Glendower (1941)

The second of Powys' 'Welsh Novels', Owen Glendower was first published by Simon & Schuster in 1940 in America and by The Bodley Head in Britain the following year. He decided to write the novel about the great Welsh soldier, leader and military commander, Owain Glyndŵr, after encouragement from his partner, Phyllis Playter. He began working on the book in the spring of 1937 and spent the following months visiting sites of historical importance relating to Glendower's life. He devoted the next two years to researching and writing the novel, reading extensively about his subject. In his diary, he noted that during the process he frequently received helpful and informed advice from Phyllis that improved the narrative and characterisations.

Owen Glendower is based on the eponymous hero's uprising and war against King Henry IV at the beginning of the fifteenth century. Owain Glyndŵr led a fifteen-year Welsh revolt against English rule, gaining popular support from many of his countrymen and capturing much of Wales during the early years of the conflict. He received military aid and assistance from Scotland and France and in 1404, he was proclaimed King of Wales. However, the English forces eventually managed to reassert their authority and from 1408, he was forced to retreat to the Welsh mountains and engage in guerilla warfare. Owain Glyndŵr is believed to have died in 1415, although the circumstances surrounding his death and burial remain unknown.

I. THE CASTLE

Don Quixote might well have recognized in the gaunt piebald horse that carried young Rhisiart down that winding track towards the river Dee a true cousin of Rosinante's. Like Rosinante he was as much of a personality as his master; and like Rosinante he was burdened with a strange assemblage of unusual objects.

One of these objects was a heavy crusader's sword, at that time completely out of date; while another, contrasting oddly with this old-fashioned weapon, was a trim leather case such as Disputants at the University of Oxford were wont to carry, packed so full with parchment-covered manuscripts that any inquisitive stranger under the excuse of caressing Master Rhisiart's steed might, had he been able to read, have deciphered between the gilded straps, fragments of a Latin that clearly was not the Latin of the Church.

Master Rhisiart had also burdened his powerful but odd-looking steed with a huge bundle of a young man's changes of raiment, wrapped up in what might have been taken for — and in actual truth was — a thick bed-cover of well-worn sheepskin, better adapted to a scholar's wintry nights at Oxford than to the hot June sun that just then beat down upon it.

But this was not all; for firmly attached to the sheepskin bundle was an object that flung back the blazing sun in a thousand fiery points as the horse moved, an object that needed no very close inspection to reveal itself as a light mail jacket of polished metal formed of a number of loosely-riveted links.

Rhisiart was certainly not a good-looking or a particularly sociable-looking youth, and yet neither at Oxford nor on his slow journey northwest had his extreme self-consciousness, though a far touchier medium for impressions than superficially appeared, suffered many rebuffs from strangers. This may have been due to something dangerous about the gleam of his dark eyes, but it was no doubt also the effect of a large aquiline nose, a feature which the rank and file of that epoch had come by bitter experience to regard as a sign of noble, if not predatory blood.

Save for the antique sword and the coat of chain-armour fastened to his sheepskin bundle, the youth's appearance would have passed for that of a well-born scholar, a novice perhaps of some religious house, though this latter possibility was made unlikely by the fact that in his leathern belt, next to what was clearly a well-filled wallet, was stuck a rather vicious-looking dagger.

"How soon, how soon shall I see it?" had been the refrain of Rhisiart's thoughts ever since he left behind him the towering battlements of Chirk. This desire of the young scholar's heart had nothing to do, as might have been expected, with his first sight of the sacred river. It was a more personal and more inflammable craving than could be satisfied by any merely historic encounter.

Ever since his earliest childhood he had longed for the moment that was now approaching — the moment when with his own eyes he would see that ruined castle on the sharp-pointed hill where his traitor-ancestor had died, the besiegers baffled, but the man's own heart broken by his fearful remorse. His own particular ancestor had been this princely traitor's bastard; but for several generations his immediate family, oblivious to this double "bar sinister," had been devoted servants of the Sheriff of Hereford in a semi-legal, semi-official role.

This old piebald horse, of which he had been permitted by his mother to take possession, was the last of a sequence of such beasts on which it had been the fancy of the pageant-loving sheriffs of Hereford to mount their clerkly assistants; and it had needed all that Rhisiart's hooked nose and flashing eyes could do to quell in mid-speech many broad-mouthed jests at the expense of this pride of Hereford town.

Indeed, so peculiar did the horse look that the prentices of Welshpool, encouraged by the presence of a group of idle bowmen from Lord Charlton's Castle, had raised the cry of "Mummers" as he stopped to buy a capful of strawberries in that pleasant market.

It was clear that Master Rhisiart's mind was agitated by more than one emotion as he followed his sinuous path through the scattered patches of hazels and the verdurous park-glades with their clumps of freshly-green beeches, and through all the ferny hollows full of rabbits and grass-snakes, that the ruling Fitz-Alan in his grandiose way was wont to speak of as "our Forest of Chirk."

The young man kept swinging round in his saddle, causing the more warlike portion of his baggage to jingle so sharply that any horse but Griffin would have been seriously disturbed. Then he would bring him to a complete standstill, and with his own neck so twisted round that he resembled those unfortunates in the Inferno, upon whom the humorous ferocity of the Emperor of the Universe had worked its will, he would stare backwards.

Having listened intently in this manner for some minutes he would swing himself round again and spur Griffin on, his whole soul straining and stretching forward in single-hearted intensity to meet whatever it was that lay behind the next curve.

"I must see it alone," he said to himself, "at least I must see it for the first time alone."

And then when the next curve of that pastoral road had revealed nothing but another clump of beeches hiding the horizon he would pull up Griffin again and once more twist himself about with jingling and discomfort.

“If that heretical fellow overtakes me at this minute,” he thought, “just when Dinas Bran may be round the next corner, I’ll completely forget myself. I’ll do him a damage!”

Rhisiart had neither spurs nor whip. He and the old horse needed no such intermediaries. At the slightest touch Griffin would quicken his jog-trot. But these motions of haste in the young man were always the unconscious expression of his feelings in response to some irresistible mental vision of Dinas Bran; and the moment his mind returned he reined back the obedient creature, whose weariness was apparent.

A moment soon came, however, when something had to be done; for during one of his nervous pauses he became aware, beyond all mistake, of the sound of voices behind him.

“The Lollard has found another victim,” he thought. “What the devil am I to do?”

It was only too clear that unless he went on at a cruel pace he would soon be overtaken. All manner of wild ideas rushed through his head. Should he turn round and ride back, pretending he’d lost something on the road? But that unconscionable heretic would no doubt think he was doing God service by riding back with him.

And who was the fellow’s companion? Very likely some henchman of the Earl of Arundel, the last kind of person before whom he’d care to betray his feelings when he first saw Dinas Bran. He flung down his reins on Griffin’s neck and groaned aloud.

Up went the old horse’s ears, and its nostrils expanded, wide and quivering. Then very slowly and to its rider’s complete astonishment it began leaving the road and ascending a grassy slope that led to a small patch of woodland.

Tightening his knees about the piebald sides he knew so well, Master Rhisiart, getting his cue from the horse, began eagerly urging him forward; and to his delight, when they did finally reach the wood, there presented itself to them an overgrown narrow path totally invisible from the road below, but obviously leading clear through the little copse to whatever it might be that lay behind.

Into this leafy path, while the young man on his back bent low down to avoid the swishing hazels and the brittle sharp-smelling elders, Griffin forced his way.

Wisps of trailing parasitic tendrils, bewildered caterpillars and grubs, feeble brown moths and flimsy white butterflies clung, as he moved, to his hot panting bulk. The vegetable waifs among these disturbed natives entangled themselves in the woolly sheepskin and between the links of jingling armour; while the living insects, including little armadas of drifting midges, seemed ready to drug themselves to death in the sticky equine sweat, or to risk a more violent end between impatient human fingers, so long as they could taste, for one paradisic instant, the inebriating nectar of mortal blood.

Once safely escaped from all danger of evangelical interruption young Rhisiart drew rein and fell to listening. How curiously satisfying to hear those manly tongues in lively discussion and their owners so completely unaware of this ambush above their heads!

The wood was too thick, and he had already plunged too far into it, to have any chance to see what kind of a fellow-pilgrim the Lollard had picked up, but the tone of the unknown’s voice, when at last he got the ring of it clear of the other’s eloquence, made him rise very straight on his saddle and, with a gesture he was quite unconscious of till after he had made it, jerk towards himself by the middle of its worn-out sheath his crusader's blade.

But he soon let the sword sink back to its place beside the sheepskin, and with a sigh he plucked a twig from a sycamore branch at his side and began stripping it of its leaves and counting them as they fluttered down.

"One... two... three... four," he counted. "In four years I'll have shown them what Rhisiart ab Owen can do!" But the voice that had so disturbed him still went on, and our friend couldn't prevent a stir of malicious pleasure at the thought of his eloquent acquaintance being fairly out-harangued.

"Out-chanted I ought to put it," he said to himself. "This is clearly Welsh poetry, and my gentleman has found his match!"

It certainly was an extraordinary sound that reached them in that wood; and Griffin seemed as fascinated by it as his master.

"That's Welsh poetry, Griff!" murmured the boy, stroking the gaunt shoulder beneath him. "We'll hear plenty of that from now on. So you'd better get used to it, old friend!"

But the horse, feeling the reins slack on his neck, bent down and began tasting some wood-sorrel that attracted him amid the moss and rubble. Though both the heretic and the poetry-declaimer, who were apparently riding at a swinging trot, were soon out of hearing, our traveller sat on there on his horse's back absorbed in a bottomless sea of thought.

The sound of that Welsh poetry had brought back all those particular memories of his early life from which he had built up the main outlines of the narrow imaginative cult by which he had come to live.

Upon Modry his nurse, a handsome young Welshwoman who had married before he was capable of grasping all she had taught him, lay the responsibility for this unbalanced idealism. He had learnt Welsh from Modry much more quickly than he ever picked up French or Latin from the monastic schools in the city; and along with her native tongue she had inspired him with a frenzy of patriotic feeling for his ancestral country, especially for that portion of it that surrounded Dinas Bran. A person would only have had to give a cursory glance at Rhisiart's appearance to gather the fact that he would be just the very one to get lodged in his brain some obstinate and passionate obsession.

As he let Griffin search about for something more to his taste than wood-sorrel and allowed his own fingers to follow idly the pattern made by sun-flicker and leaf-shadow upon that stooping neck, he recalled how Modry's teaching had thrown him at Oxford into the society of an ardent group of Welsh scholars. He felt ashamed now as he thought how crudely he had patronized these evasive eccentrics on the strength of his mother's proud Norman blood, and how mockingly he had cajoled them and led them on, till one by one they had secretly confessed to him that at any clear call from their native hills they would sell their books, get themselves arms and horses and gallop westward.

His closest friend among them, Master Morris Stove of his own Exeter College, had already begun practising with the long-bow for this unlikely event. The learned man's convulsions of pride when by some chance he killed a wild-duck on the banks of the Isis came back to him now and he found himself comparing his own more fanciful and complicated motives with this heroic simplicity.

Master Stove had no long-cherished shame to purge, no dark old treachery to obliterate, no Dinas Bran lifting its mystic battlements against indescribable spiritual horizons.

All he possessed was the plain downright imperative, one that had already got him into many a street-brawl in Oxford town, to hold the call of Cambria above everything in the world.

From his earliest childhood under Modry's influence Rhisiart had hugged to himself a vague fairy-story hope that he might be the one destined by fate to restore the lost glories of the old chiefs of Powys or at least make Dinas Bran what it had been in the days of Griffith ap Madoc.

Modry had got it lodged in his earliest consciousness that his name Owen carried with it some mystery of prophetic significance; and she had talked to him sans cesse of the great Owen Red-hand, in the Black Prince's time, who had fought for the king of France. Many a night by his dying fire, with this very sheepskin over both their legs, he had heard Master Stove express the view that the elderly Baron of Glendourdy, or Glendower, who was a cautious and law-abiding subject of the late unhappy king and a great patron of poetry and scholarship, might have been the Owen of all these prophecies had he been a younger man, or a man prepared to live a dangerous and desperate life.

"But he's old," Master Stove would add with a groan. "He must be nearly fifty. Besides he's related to half the Border, and his daughters have all married English barons."

Rhisiart could remember one particular interruption when Stove was speaking like this and they were both drawn to the window by a sudden uproar and saw some terrified town-official extricating himself from an angry mob and heard great shouts going up: "We want King Richard! Give us back King Richard!" He could hear now, as he stared at a clump of late bluebells, that looked in the shadow of the underbrush as if they were purple rather than blue, the bitter curse with which Stove came back to their wretched students’ fire and began accusing this peace-loving Glendourdy of having betrayed the unfortunate King.

“It was old Fitz-Alan who came between them. He always hated Richard; and Owen was his squire.” Up and down that small green clearing among the hazels Rhisiart let his horse carry him, while one after another of the sights and sounds of this little wood — certainly a very modest portion of the “Forest of Chirk” — mingled with his thoughts.

He saw what he supposed to be a black-cap singing passionately on the branch of an oak-tree. He could see the outline of its throat as it heaved up and down under the long-drawn notes of its whistling. He could see its feathers ruffled at the same time by a faintly stirring wind.

“I’ll let my friends down there get well to the river. If I give them a little longer they’ll be across the ford and lodged at the Tassel, unless they’re going on to the Abbey to-night.”

Thus he talked to himself; seeking in reality any excuse to postpone the great moment to which he had looked forward almost as long as he could remember.

Was he afraid that the sight of the real Dinas Bran would make the ideal one — that mystic terminus of every vista of his imagination — dissolve into air?

Always vague but always dominant, the secret channel which his under-life had worked for itself had adopted Griffith ap Madoc’s hill-fortress as the ultimate symbol of its direction. In some confused and tortuous way he had come to take it for granted that he, plain Master Rhisiart, descendant of a traitor’s bastard, would be accepted by the invisible spirits of all his ancestors as the destined restorer of their lost glory. Years ago the patriotic Modry had told him of this Baron Glendourdy or, as the Welsh called him, Glyn Dŵr; but she, like Morris Stove, had always spoken of him as too absorbed in scholarship, too rich, too peaceable, too closely connected with the English Court, to be in any sense the man of destiny who would people with free warriors — like fiery shapes from a vasty deep — the towering battlements of the old castle of their race.

As he listened to the black-cap's self-absorbed singing, and watched Griffin's leisurely movements among the cool-rooted woodland growths, he began to realize two things; first that he had deliberately thrust the idea of this "Glendourdy" into the background of his mind from an obscure prejudice against a person so lucky as to be the recognized heir, not only of his own chieftains of Dinas Bran but also of the ancient rulers of South Wales, and with all this to have played his cards so well as to have won renown in Richard's wars without being implicated in the ill-starred monarch's ruin; and secondly that hidden out of sight, down deep behind his own boyish ambitions, had lain all the while a shrewd and practical resolve to introduce himself, with his piebald horse, his crusader's sword, and his coat of chain-armour, to the notice of this powerful kinsman of his — and see what happened!

His horse was bending so low now over a large patch of wood-spurge, amid whose foliage he had apparently discovered some especially succulent leaves, that Rhisiart was forced to lay his hand on a hazel-branch beside him to keep himself and his heavy load from a tendency to slide forward.

Normally he would have dismounted during this pause; but his mind was in such a state of abstraction that it was like the mind of a person under a drug. He had grown unconscious of the ordinary significance of material bodies. He had ceased to be a lean youthful figure, in a dark scholar's dress with a leather belt and a velvet cap, mounted on a piebald horse. He had become a bubble of complicated thought, a bubble that floated beside the sheepskin bundle, a bubble devoid of weight or substance.

"Will it spoil it all?" he thought. "Will it break to bits the only ideal I've got in life, when I see Dinas Bran?" So wayward and so self-lacerating was this Hereford boy's nature that as he looked at the sun-and-leaf flickerings on Griffin's back and listened to the queer sounds the animal was making as he tasted those leafy juices, he felt already the ice-cold waters of disappointment. Dinas Bran couldn't be what he had, all his days, imagined it!

And with this feeling that he was approaching the worst catastrophe that could befall him — the loss of his life-illusion — there came over him in an accumulated weight of released emotion his jealousy and envy of this lord of Glyndyfrdwy, this legitimate heir to Dinas Bran, who was such a friend of Thomas Fitz-Alan and such a traitor to the murdered King.

Rhisiart stared and stared at a flimsy currant-moth that was now fluttering feebly through the twigs of a thick-growing elder. He felt as though, with the panicky distaste of those slender antennae, he himself was cursing the raw pungency of that rough foliage.

It was King Richard's wistful face, as he had seen it once at Hereford, that hovered about those sharp-smelling boughs, and when he thought of his murder he confused those delicate features with those of a man he had seen put to death in his childhood, an unforgettable, abominable sight, taking the heart out of all the June woods of England!

And it was an imaginary Cousin Glendourdy, crafty, grey-headed, portly, full of punctilious fussiness about nice heraldic points, only anxious to be left in peace to his bards and his women, who was the bitter-smelling elder-branch against which that moth fluttered!

"He's not the Owen of the prophecies," thought the obsessed youth, "any more than was Owen Red-hand! There's been no "Owen of Wales" since they buried Owen ap Griffith ap Cynan in Bangor Church."

The lad’s nostrils dilated and his whole face changed its appearance as he sucked in his lower lip. In a sudden spasm of angry vision he saw the diplomatic Glendourdy drowning their disgrace in drink and song while the Fitz-Alan ensign floated from the fortress of Griffith ap Madoc.

Impatiently he dropped the hazel-branch, snatched up the reins and rode on. Stinging sprays of trailing branches brushed against his mouth and rustled against his knees, but he bent his head low and pushed forward, while the piebald horse kept shaking his mane and champing on his bit, as if the taste of some woodland weed had turned sour in his throat.

At last there appeared a free open space at the end of their path; and at the sight of this both man and horse strained eagerly forward, the young human body and the old equine body fusing themselves together, in that excited rush, as if they were one creature.

There it was! There before him, towering up beneath a great bank of white clouds and against a jagged ridge of bare and desolate rock, rose the castle of his imagination.

For some minutes he remained spell-bound, absolutely caught out of himself, lost to everything but that majestic sight. It was not less, it was more than the picture he had in his mind.

All ramparts ever built, all towers, all fortresses, all castles, seemed to him mere clumsy reproductions of the ideal perfection of Dinas Bran. It wasn’t that it was so large — and he could see clearly, even from this distance, that it was in a battered, broken condition — but it took into itself that whole hill it was built upon! Yes, that was the thing. Dinas Bran was not the stones of its human walls, not the majestic outlines of its towering battlements, not its soaring arches and turrets and bastions; it was an impregnable mountain called up out of that deep valley by some supernatural mandate. Its foundations were sunk in the earth, but they were sunk in more than the earth; they were sunk in that mysterious underworld of beyond-reality whence rise the eternal archetypes of all the refuges and all the sanctuaries of the spirit, untouched by time, inviolable ramparts not built by hands!

Oh, it was far more than the image of his long hope, far more than what he had prayed for in the audacities and desperations of his long desire!

The season of the year, the climax of June's lavish greenery, had undoubtedly something to do with it. It was this that gave it that apocalyptic look, as of some far-away fairy-tower in some old pre-druidic Book of Revelation.

And the late afternoon light too, under which our traveller saw it, contributed to this enchanted effect. Out of green pastures, in which might have wandered flocks upon flocks of fairy sheep, rose that mystic, castellated mountain, and the horizontal sun-rays falling at their lowest possible angle, ere the crest of the Berwyns beat them back, threw a rose-bloom upon its towers. And if the sunset threw such light upon the stone ramparts, it gave to the grassy precipices from the brink of which the masonry ascended such a glow of incredible greenness that the first thing that came into Rhisiart's head when his trance relaxed was a green shield he had seen a workman painting once in the illumination of a tomb in the cathedral for one of the dead King's beautiful and fatal minions.

Rhisiart's old horse seemed at first, as often happens with animals, to be contemplating that astonishing stretch of landscape with an interest hardly less than his master's; but when the youth jumped off his back and proceeded to go through a ritualistic performance that he had been rehearsing for many years, Griffin gave his bony frame a vigorous shake, causing the armour he carried to jangle loud and clear, and began sniffing about again in the sweet-scented herbage of the wood's edge.

But Rhisiart ab Owen took his crusader's sword from the creature's back and drawing it from its embossed and enamelled sheath planted it firmly in the greensward. Then, kneeling on one knee so that the cross-handle of his weapon rose between him and Dinas Bran, he gave vent to a series of solemn ejaculations; not so much praying to his Creator, or even to the Mother of Christ, as uttering a string of incoherent vows, the drift of which was that he dedicated himself to the super-human task of restoring the honours and glories of his ancestors.

As he made these vows his curious physiognomy lost its sullen self-concentration, and an innocent and childlike look took possession of it. But it must be added that when he leapt to his feet again, and plucked the great sword out of the grass, this look completely vanished, its place being taken by an even more pronounced scowl of truculence and secretiveness than it had previously worn.

Ingrained and obstinate was the pride in the lad's face as he clambered back, not very elegantly, upon his saddle; and even the gaze he kept turning upon his ideal castle as he rode down the hill, letting Griffin choose his own path through the bracken, retained little of that moment of inspiration.

Nor indeed, if the truth must be told, were the thoughts that crossed Rhisiart's mind any more admirable than the expression worn by his hooked nose, his sallow cheeks, his sucked-in under-lip. They were images of fantastical domination, images of himself exercising arbitrary power over multitudes, images of himself revenging himself upon multitudes; and revenging himself not only for every rebuff he had suffered from his Hereford relations, who regarded him as a fool and a failure, but even upon his mother, who never ceased teasing him for his equivocal ways and calling him her "little monk", her "begging friar", her "catch-penny pardoner". Rhisiart had only a few indistinct memories of his father; but from certain scenes that had impressed his childish mind he had conceived the notion that he too had been despised, frustrated, ridiculed and misunderstood.

"You wait!" he shouted in his heart, addressing the whole of Hereford City, "you wait!" And in his mind he saw himself surrounded by an applauding host of rebels as he rode down from Dinas Bran, leaving the "Lion, rampant, gules" of the old Griffith ap Madoc banner floating from its battlements!

Once in the road, with the sinking sun behind him, he began making a few hurried re-adjustments both in his personal accoutrements and in his somewhat singular baggage.

The piebald horse regarded these manoeuvres with cynical lethargy. "For God's sake," he seemed to say, "ride on to the stable; or leave my harness alone while I see what grows here."

But Rhisiart had been seized with a fear lest his precious piece of chain armour might slide off when they moved at a greater speed, and being but a clumsy squire-at-arms it took him some while to adjust it, and the great sword with it, to his satisfaction.

While thus employed, and while Griffin was chewing the grass, he caught sight of a little patch of moschatel, whose small green flowers, thrown into delicate relief by the horizontal sun, brought to his mind many a stroll at vesper-time in the Oxford meadows when Master Stove had astonished him by the noble simplicity of his Welsh heart.

"No," he thought, as he pulled Griffin's head round and threw back his own, "no, if I weren't of the House of Dinas Bran, if I were a poor nameless 'legitimate' like Morris Stove, I'd get my Doctor's gown and serve this crafty king.

“But they say he’s too mean and miserly to use men of birth, the devil take him! They say he lets the Percies fight for him at their own charges. Well, if the worst comes to the worst I must turn clerk and scrivener and copy these new-fangled verses — what did they call them? — Cywyddau — for Cousin Glendourdy.”

The old horse, who now began anticipating better nourishment than wayside grass, had quickened his pace to a fast trot; and it wasn’t long before not only Dinas Bran but the much-frequented river ford leading to the Tassel appeared in full sight.

Our traveller had been recommended as he came through Chirk to take lodging that night at the Tassel, or Tercal, and the recommendation had imprinted itself on his mind owing to the fact that his informant, who was a Salopian humourist, chaffed him on his personal resemblance to the sullen-looking bird whose raptorial beak adorned that famous hostelry’s sign-board.

To Griffin’s chagrin Rhisiart pulled up for a minute or two when he saw, half-a-mile below him, the sacred river winding through its sun-illumined valley. From his present position he could see a great many interesting things; and he wanted to gather his wits together and decide on some clear line of action.

There was quite an assemblage of travellers waiting on his own side of the ford, and on the further side there seemed to be some kind of country fair going on round the entrance to what looked like a farmhouse.

Nearly a mile further on he could make out a much larger group of buildings, the central one of which was evidently built of more solid material than the rest.

“That,” he thought, “must be the Tassel; but what’s going on down there by the river?”

And then he remembered that today was the Eve of Saint John, when in many of the more old-fashioned districts of the country it was the custom to hold local fairs, to which not only the peasants came but to which the castles and monasteries of the neighbourhood were accustomed to send their stewards and caterers. Automatically and perfunctorily our young man decided that before making any move towards an encounter with "Cousin Glendourdy" he would have to attend High Mass somewhere or another; and it crossed his mind that the natural thing to do would be to hunt up the Abbey which his Dinas Bran ancestors had founded in these parts. He knew it was called Valle Crucis; but that was all he knew. "But at least I'll see their tombs," he said to himself; and this secular thought quickened his languid piety into a lively intention.

"But where shall I sleep to-night?" was his next thought, as the piebald horse, with erect and twitching ears, strained at his bit.

"On the Eve of Saint John every room in the Tassel's sure to be taken; and probably the monks' guest-house will be packed too. Well! I'll have to go to some farm or sleep in the woods. Think of having forgotten Saint John! How that damned Lollard would chuckle!"

The obsessed youth had indeed been grievously slack about his religious duties since he left Oxford. His mother had dragged him to church before she would let him say goodbye; but since then, till his childish prejudices had been roused by the Lollard's challenge, he hadn't given the thing a thought.

"I suppose those Chirk people keep a troop of their lazy devils in Dinas Bran," he said to himself, as he rode down the hill.

"Will the Earl go to the Abbey to-morrow? I'd rather like to set eyes on him — and on Lord Grey of Ruthin, too." And the lad's mind reverted to the few famous personages he had had the luck to see in the late King's time.

With less trepidation than many young men would have felt — but his nearness to his ancestral fortress seemed a stronger armour than any that Griffin could carry — Rhisiart boldly advanced to the agitated group of persons who were arguing and disputing at the brink of the ford.

Two dismounted riders leading their horses approached him at once, and one of them, greeting him in a pleasant manner by name, introduced him to the other.

"He gave me the slip, this young gentleman," he remarked in English with an indulgent smile. "Rhisiart ab Owen his name is, if I get it right; but yours, Master, if you'll pardon me for saying so, hardly seems—"

"Seems or not seems, Master Brut," cried the Lollard's companion, "the young gentleman will have to call me what all Powys and Yale and Cynllaith Owen and Glyndyfrdwy and Maelor and Bromfield and Chirkland call me, or he may call me King of the Fornicators. Y Crack, the Scab, is my name, born in Ffinnant near little Llanfechain, where every maid is my cousin and every old trot my god-mother! No, you needn't blush to look at 'em, young master. Birth-marks all, birth-marks all! And by whom were they put on me, think ye? Every jack one of them, by Holy Derfel, when I came out of Sister's belly! Sister Mallt she was, my blessed mother, God give her peace; and Y Crach, of Ffinnant near Llanfechain, I am, young master! Every man born knows Llanfechain where the great hanging oak is, and where Sheriff Burnell's grandmother, he who now's so hot for the new King, were drowned in green pond for a whore of Satan. And there's no Welshman, nor no Englishman neither, between Chester and Chirk that doesn't know Y Crach, the Scab.

"Listen to me, young gentleman," and to Rhisiart's disgust the fellow laid a hand on his black sleeve. "How do I manage it, so as to have no enemy in all the Marches? Is that what you're asking? Well?" and he lowered his voice, "I'll tell you! 'Tis these here rose-petals as does it," and with a wicked grimace he tapped his shocking facial disfigurement, which certainly had the effect of intensifying the halcyon blue colour of his one remaining eye to such a point that Rhisiart found it hard to keep his eyes away from it. "But that's not all," and the Scab proceeded to close this bright window to his roguish soul with a cyclopean wink.

"First and last, 'tis all Holy Derfel's work. He put these rosy-posies on me afore I came out of my poor mother; and do 'ee know who her were? Her were a dedicated nun; and to bear a baban to Derfel were too much for the maid. They didn't have to do nothing to her. She died in peace. She died smiling and whispering to her baban and calling on Derfel. That's who she called on, young man, Blessed Saint Derfel; and seeing you're a friend of Master Brut here, who's the best Christian poor old Scab have met for many a year, I thought it best to tell you who I were and who, in a manner of speaking, me parents were, so that there'd be no mistake. Presently if, as I hope God wills, we'll pass the night together I'll compose a poem for you. I've already composed five for Master Brut; and if he writes them down later, as he says he's a mind to, maybe he'll do the same for yours. 'Tis one thing, young gentleman, to be an inspired bard; 'tis another to understand reading and the art of—"

But Rhisiart, who had already dismounted and left his horse to make friends with the Scab's Welsh pony and the Lollard's mare, interrupted the poet's discourse by enquiring of Master Brut where he intended to sup and to sleep.

"From the look of things over there," he added, "there's a market going on.

"And what are those monks making such a disturbance about? That Prior, or whoever he is, seems to be reading his missal as if he were alone in his cell."

"Prior?" broke in the Scab in high glee. "Where have you come from, Mr. Scholar, not to know a Lord Abbot when you see him? Your Prior's the great John ap Hywel, Abbot of Caerleon, where the Round Table is. See the horse he's riding, my good sir! He don't have to haggle for a lift in a ferry-boat! It's his Chamberlain, his Almoner, his Kitchener belike, or just a pack of his lay-troop who're raising hell. Long Thomas of the Tassel puts his price up, and small blame to him, on such days as these. The ferry's his ferry and the boat's his boat; and though the ford goes with the Barony he's the one they have to pay. I haven't learnt law for nothing in cloister."

"Why doesn't the Abbot intervene? Why don't these Almoners or lay-brothers, or whatever they are, go to him and complain, if that rascal's asking too much?"

"Tell your friend why they don't, for God's sweet bones!" cried the Scab, turning to Master Brut.

And the Lollard explained that Abbot Hywel was known all over Wales for his piety and his passionate temper. "No man dares," he said, "especially when that book's in his hands, approach him with any secular matter!"

The Scab fixed his solitary blue eye upon our young man and winked solemnly. "Temper, you see! That's what he calls it. He thinks a Christian should have command over his high blood. Don't 'ee listen to him, young master! If I wasn't a prophet of Derfel he'd be a dangerous companion for a poor bard. Wait till Hal Bolingbroke gets hold of him! He'll truss him up like a partridge. He'll baste him to a crisp. He's a great baster of heretics is your King Hal. God griddle his—" And the Scab ended with one of the foulest oaths our traveller had ever heard.

The altercation over the ferry-boat rose now to such a pitch that it became incredible to Rhisiart how that formidable-looking Abbot could sit so quiet on his great black horse.

"Here! Catch hold, Master, for a minute!" and snatching at Griffin's bridle Rhisiart tossed it to the Lollard and ran down the slope straight to the abstracted dignitary.

What the impulse was that forced him to do this he would have been hard put to it to explain. No thought he could define, no intention he could describe, made him do it: and yet he would have done it had Abbot John looked ten times more formidable.

"My Lord!" he cried, laying his hand on the black horse's trappings. "My Lord! My Lord!"

Walter Brut watched his friend's audacity with no little concern. "Jesus help him!" he muttered, and then he added, "and help us all, and forgive us our sins, our most grievous sins!"

But the Abbot of Caerleon broke from his trance with a start that made his horse rear. "What? Eh? Who? A messenger from him are ye?"

"My Lord," the young man repeated, "I'm a messenger from no one. I'm riding, my Lord, from Exeter College, Oxford, to my cousin Owen, Lord of Cynllaith and Baron of Glendourdy."

The Abbot of Caerleon gave the excited intruder one searching look. "And who's this?" he asked. "Is he from Oxford, too?"

Rhisiart, who was in the act of making the formal gesture of kissing the Abbot's hand, swung round and beheld Master Brut blamelessly advancing towards them with a serene countenance, while a few paces behind him, as if not to be outdone in this daring move, came the irrepressible bard, trailing in his rear all their three steeds.

"And who's that?" asked John ap Hywel. "He at any rate isn't from Oxford."

Rhisiart stood politely aside as the Lollard came up. "The peace of Jesus be with you, John ap Hywel," he said; and Rhisiart as he heard him couldn't escape a shock of interest at the difference between the two men. Deeply indented with furrows of thought and passion was ap Hywel's swarthy face; whereas the fair, placid countenance of the learned Hereford squire had the angelic smoothness of a Saint Michael in a church window. And it was the same with the tones of their voices. The Abbot spoke English painfully and with a perceptible Welsh accent, but every word was charged with a smouldering intensity of emotion; whereas Master Brut expressed himself casually, easily, quickly, almost as if he regarded the whole business of using words at all as something inessential and irrelevant.

"You know my name so well," replied the churchman, gravely, "that you won't be surprised if I ask you, before we go further, why, in greeting me like this, you make such a point of omitting the first and the third Person of our most Holy Trinity?"

"Forgive me, my Lord Abbot," returned the other, completely unabashed. "I should have supposed that to any high-placed apostle of our faith the name of Jesus was sufficient."

The lines in the dark-visaged monk's face deepened and he seemed on the verge of an angry retort; but to Rhisiart's astonishment, in place of anything of the kind, a sad and tender smile crossed his lips.

"In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost," he murmured in Latin, "may both the peace He brought and the faith He revealed be yours, my son. And now," he went on in English, "may I ask you your name, and the name of this young gentleman and the name of—" But the piebald horse's desire to reach his master gave the Bard of Ffinnant an opportunity of answering for himself; and before his rapid flow of extremely colloquial Welsh, sprinkled with poetical bardic tags, had subsided, an interruption occurred which altered the whole situation.

The excited crowd of monks who so gallantly had followed their Abbot from Caerleon were displaying now a less agreeable aspect of their nature. "It must come," thought Rhisiart, "from their secluded lives that they haggle like this over a penny."

But matters by this time had reached such a point that the ferry-man, who was a powerfully built, grim-looking peasant, was now obstinately pushing his way through the midst of them and making straight for the Abbot.

With a heavy sigh John ap Hywel thrust his breviary into his leather pouch and rode towards the crowd, followed closely by Rhisiart, leading Griffin, while the Scab, detaining Master Brut by his arm, tried to explain in clumsy English the gist of what he had just said to the great man and his assurance that his remarks had met with uncommon appreciation.

"It's always the same," he gave the Lollard to understand. "The higher-placed these fellows are the better they understand me. It's the rag-tag of them, like those idiots over there, that see nothing but the devil in the bardic art."

Rhisiart was almost as astonished as the angry monks at the rough manner in which the ferry-man addressed their Superior; but John ap Hywel received him with courtesy, and helped him, for the fellow was too indignant to be very articulate, to explain the cause of the uproar.

The explanation, though our traveller could make nothing of it, apparently satisfied the Abbot, for, searching in the wallet that held his psalter, he handed him a large silver coin, the receipt of which produced an immediate change in the man’s demeanour.

“What do they call you, my friend?” the churchman asked him.

“Philip Sparrow, your reverence. I be herdsman, your reverence, to Long Thomas of Tassel; but being Saint John’s Eve like, I’ve a-took ferry-boat in place of Mother Kench who be selling she’s pasties and bride-cakes yonder.”

The fellow paused, glanced at the silent and sulky monks with a revengeful scowl, and then looking across the river set himself to listen to the confused uproar that was coming from the further bank. “I wish, your reverence—” he began uneasily.

“Speak up, man,” said the Abbot, who also had been listening with some concern to the sounds that were reaching them. “Out with it! It seems to me there is something more than ale-drinking and cake-eating going on over there.”

“I wish, your reverence—”

“Speak up, man! The Brothers and I were hoping to be at Valle Crucis to-night; but if there’s anything here needing the—”

He was interrupted by an agitated movement towards him of all his monks. Troubled by what they were hearing from across the Dee, their natural instinct, as with a pack of startled animals, was to draw close to their leader.

Walter Brut and the Bard of Ffinnant came forward too, the latter having deemed it wise, in case of accidents, to be on his pony’s back.

For a space they were all, churchmen and laymen alike, awed into silence by the sounds they heard and the mysterious tumult that was rapidly increasing. One wild, resonant voice kept rising above all the rest, and they heard too, and this was curiously agitating to Rhisiart, certain desperate cries for help evidently proceeding from a feminine throat.

“Your reverence—” began the heavy-browed ferry-man and then hesitated again, looking nervously at the crowd of silent faces.

“He’s a simple man, my Lord, a poor, simple ignorant man. Perhaps if you allowed me to have a few words with him I should be able—”

But ap Hywel waved him aside. “Come close to me, Master Sparrow — that’s it — you needn’t be afraid of me — I’m only a poor priest. Closer still, my good friend! That’s it! Now then, tell us what’s going on over there. Is it the King’s justice? Are they hanging those people? Is it a man and a woman? Are they adulterers caught in the act? Have they committed sacrilege? Under whose lordship is this fair? Chirkland? Valle Crucis? And where’s the seneschal of Dinas Bran? Speak quietly. Take your time. No one’s going to hurt you.”

While the churchman was speaking Rhisiart could see his fingers busy with the trappings of his great horse.

“He’ll be across the river in a second,” he thought, “and Griffin and I with him! They’re torturing those two over there! Oh damn this fellow! Let the slave go, and find out for yourself, my good Lord! Oh hurry, hurry, you holy idiot, for God’s sake! That woman’ll be past helping in a minute or two.”

But the low-bent swarthy head of the ecclesiastic and the up-raised equally swarthy face of the ferry-man were so close to each other now in their exchange of deep-throated whispering that though Griffin was licking the neck of the Abbot’s horse Rhisiart couldn’t follow — for all his nurse’s lessons — the rapid Welsh they were using.

Their conversation was drawn out to such a length and the cries, if such they were, of victimized man and woman across the river grew so violent that not only the nerves of young Rhisiart but the more seasoned ones of Master Brut and the Scab began to grow strained.

As for the monks, they were staring at their leader with such anxious faces that no one could have guessed the crude simplicity of the thoughts that rushed through their tonsured heads as they pressed forward. One worthy brother had been occupied all that morning in wondering whether there would be wine as well as beer provided by the Valle Crucis caterer on their arrival. Another had been weighing in his mind many casuistical reasons why, in honour of Saint John’s Feast, it would be advisable to give himself a plenary indulgence in the matter of a small and private vow against eating flesh.

They were all hungry and tired; and this new obstruction to their journey on top of the exorbitant demands of the ferry-man seemed the last straw. Curiously enough — possibly from their own self-mortifications and daily broodings upon death and judgment — they were less disturbed by the sinister events across the river than were the three secular persons.

There trembled through Rhisiart’s young body the strangest tinglings of emotion. He could hardly be called a normal youth in his relations with women. Rarely had he had the faintest flicker of natural lasciviousness towards them. In fact, the only woman except his mother and Mistress Modry who had ever infringed upon his life at all had been an ex-harlot in Oxford, married to an elderly water-man, whose outrageous tales of her first experience of men’s desire, related to him on a sunny bench by the Isis in her husband's garden, he did remember with a certain glow of unholy pleasure.

But that woman's voice across the Dee excited in him such a turbulent flood of sympathy that he could hardly restrain himself from urging Griffin into the river. Her voice seemed to conjure up her figure, her look, her spirit, her whole being! Something in its tone made him convinced that she had eyes like Modry's, very dark, but of a queer greenish tinge, and that her body, like Modry's, was exceptionally long and slender.

And how strangely the towers of Dinas Bran, as he saw them still, straight before him though illumined no more with the rosy glow of the setting sun, became part of that woman's cry.

For some reason, as he listened, he arrived at the conclusion that the outcries of neither of them were the expression of physical pain. If it were so, the man's, at any rate, were triumphing over what he suffered.

Still that everlasting whispering! Would it never stop, so that he could show them how a Herefordshire horse could ford a river and how a Hereford lad could rescue a girl?

In the sinking of the sun a faint grey haze, too delicate to be called a mist, had risen from the water, and had stolen imperceptibly over the whole landscape. It was only very dimly, though he knew exactly where to look, that he could any longer make out the castle's walls. But this mist had the effect of endowing that reiterated double cry with something almost supernaturally disturbing.

Perhaps that was why the Caerleon monks bothered so little about it! They were so much on the inside of the supernatural that the little accidents of daily life, the harshness of a superior, a hole in somebody's sandal, the substitution of wine for beer, a chilly draught in the choir-stalls, a leak in the gutter-pipe, caused them more actual worry than any glimpse into the dark vistas, full of howling devils, of death and pain.

But for Rhisiart and for Master Brut, and in a measure even for the Bard of Ffinnant, these reiterated cries became something that swallowed up everything else.

Rhisiart could see that the Lollard at any rate was deeply disturbed and as anxious as he was himself to ford the river and solve the mystery.

The man had the clearest complexion he had ever seen and the most open countenance. His smooth unwrinkled face, his full red lips, his closely-cropped fair hair struck our friend — for all his prejudice against the tediousness of the fellow's talk — as making a most agreeable impression, along with the modesty of his well-fitting country-gentleman's attire. He felt indeed, as they now exchanged glances in which their mutual impatience was revealed, that he had done injustice to the power of character behind the man's stolid calm and theological prolixity. He went so far as to decide that if they were destined to share any perilous or reckless adventure he couldn't wish for a more trustworthy companion.

Thus much young Rhisiart took in; and it had needed those terrifying cries from across the river to rouse even this insight, as he sucked in his upper-lip and turned his narrow Norman face towards the object of this unusual perspicuity.

But he was finding those double cries more and more disturbing. They made a landscape within the landscape, tragic, fatal, full of ominous premonitions.

In the man's voice was all the desperation of the terrible power of the soul to resist, to defy, to repeat its challenge, against the force of overwhelming odds.

But the feminine voice affected him even more. Yes, all the mystery, all the lawless pity of a woman's soul, all the deadly sweetness of a woman's body were being thrown out upon that summer twilight!

The liquid and tender greenness of the evening seemed to be gathered into it. The cry was richer, fuller, closer to Nature, than the one with which it alternated, and to which it echoed.

To Rhisiart it was more than a sound among other sounds, more than a normal cry for help above a normal tumult. It had in it the curves of a woman's neck, the softness of a woman's breast, and as it reached him out of the green sap of the long darkening of the summer day it had a mystery of appeal that was like the sob of the night-dews upon a thousand hills. Master Brut was in his saddle now and his sturdy grey mare was addressing the piebald in a low whinny, as much as to say "What's the matter with these young men of ours?", while to the jangle of his heavy accoutrements the Abbot's old war horse, lifting his head and sniffing at the air, might have been taken as retorting "Wait a second longer, my innocent friends, and you shall see what life is!"

But the whispering was over now at last. "Get the brothers across!" cried John ap Hywel, while his eyes began to burn like bivouac flames through the thick smoke. "Fall into procession when you're all across and follow us!

"Chant the Illumina, Domine Deus, tenebras nostres! while you're looking for us; but don't leave the river until every one of you is safe over. Now, Master Rhisiart, Master Brut, as fast as you like!"

II. RHISIART DRAWS HIS SWORD

THE SACRED DEE, or Deva, or Dyfrdwy, whose name in Welsh signifies "divine water" or "the water of the divinity", is not always as easy to ford as its firm, un-muddy, pebbly channel would lead a stranger to suppose.

Such a stranger were well-advised to obtain local advice ere he makes the crossing; since many quite historic fords are, within a limited distance, inconstant and variable.

On the present occasion the laconic Philip Sparrow was so busy getting his late antagonists across the river that he lacked the opportunity to show the horsemen the best place for them to enter the stream.

Thus the old black charger and the piebald were soon up to their bellies in the swift current, while the pony and his rider seemed in actual peril. The Scab's small animal was quite as high-spirited as the big horses, but the Bard himself was considerably agitated and incommoded; especially as the little creature displayed a lively desire to resort to swimming before the occasion required it.

The gurgling of the water now quite drowned those appalling cries; or it may have been, Rhisiart said to himself, that death had ended it and the victims were out of reach of all human help. He was in less of a fury of impatience, therefore, when the Abbot reined in his big horse almost in mid-stream to watch the success of Master Brut's benevolent manoeuvres to assist the disturbed prophet of Derfel. This process meant the return to shore of both Lollard and Bard, for Philip Sparrow was now calling to them from his crowded boat and directing them to a shallower spot.

But the old war-horse and the elderly piebald seemed so much to enjoy the swirl of the water that the Abbot had time to explain to Rhisiart what the ferry-man had revealed.

Rhisiart listened spellbound to this account; and as ap Hywel got excited in what he was telling him the youth noticed two things: first that he referred to Glendower with a curious reserve, and secondly that he quoted the ferry-man's speech with the rough gusto of a native.

The ferry-man had evidently small respect for his employer, the landlord of the Tassel, whom he had described as a cringing and contemptible time-server. He had explained that two great Welsh notables, who were notorious Bolingbroke men, Hywel Sele of Nannau and David of the Squint, or David Gam, had been staying for a week at the Tassel and had filled the place with riot.

"It seems," the Abbot went on, "that they wanted to see Glyn Dŵr, and when he refused to see them they fell into a rage and swore they'd stay at the Tassel at his expense. They've been treating all-comers to drink; they've been drunk themselves; and today in honour of Saint John they've been giving prizes for archery and spear-throwing.

"But it appears that Mad Huw, the Grey Friar from Llanfaes, a man all Welshmen know, though I doubt if his fame has reached Oxford, has also come to the fair. He goes about the country declaring that King Richard's still alive. Of course, for all we can tell in this part of Britain, what he says may be true; though they say some kind of a corpse was shown in London.

"But he tells me a girl from Dinas Bran, a mere child, but comely and kindly, follows the fellow everywhere. He says she's still a maid for all her following a man by night and by day, through wet and fine, in sickness and in health.

“He tells me the Friar puts thorns of the rose between them when they sleep, or else thistles and nettles; and at times he says he makes her tie him wi’ ropes afore they lie down.

“But these aren’t tales for a young man’s ear,” and the Abbot gave a grim smile, “save that this black water keeps our erring flesh cool! Oh you’re there, Master Brut? You’re there, Master Bard? On with us then! We’ll let the Brothers pray for us. ’Tis Mad Huw they’ve got hold of; Christ and Saint John be his help!” And crossing himself seven times the Abbot of Caerleon slipped his right hand under his cloak and rapidly numbered as many beads.

Rhisiart was amazed at the change in the great man’s manner and tone. His speech had lapsed into something similar to the peasant’s he was quoting, and in place of a mystical ascetic he saw at his side an excited warrior, his eyes shining with the glow and glory of battle.

The young scholar remembered to the end of his days every impression both physical and mental of that eventful moment. The dark swirl of the sacred river, its noisy foaming over its rocks, the bloodstreaked rack of jagged clouds that now completely hid the real Dinas Bran only to lift in front of him once more, as he had seen them since his boyhood, the enchanted battlements, towering to heaven, of the citadel of his secret thoughts; these things became like a spiritual body, larger, freer, more porous than his fleshly one.

He hadn’t troubled to kick loose his stirrups, as the other three riders had done, and he was wet to the knees; but as they struggled up the bank he fancied he heard that woman’s cry again and all manner of confused imaginings surged through him.

He couldn’t resist, in his boyish way, as he kept Griffin’s head close to the tall flanks of the Abbot’s steed, telling himself one fantastic story after another.

He told himself that it was none other than Princess Myfanwy of Dinas Bran to whose rescue he was riding. He told himself that the moment was actually at hand when he would strike his first blow to redeem from purgatory the arch-traitor of his race.

They were riding into the fair-crowd now, straight between the booths. There were wooden trestles outside the rough tents, piled up with every sort of merchants' wares. There were men's accoutrements, women's ornaments and raiment; there were tanned skins, there was dressed leather; there were every kind of homespun woollens and every variety of horse-trappings and stable-gear.

The Abbot drew rein only once; and that was to enquire of an old Salopian herdsman from over the border whether it was the Lord of Nannau's men who were ill-using the Grey Friar and his virgin.

"They be joined up wi' 'em, your reverence," the man replied. "But 'tis my Lord's steward from Chirk, Simon the Hog we call 'un, tied the man up to burn 'un, and a' said he'd burn the wench too if her didn't stop hollering. She be quiet now, I reckon; so maybe them's given her a finisher. Two companies of the Earl's bowmen be up there. 'Tis them have tied Mad Huw to cart-tail; and them's sent to Valle Crucis for a priest to shrive 'un. Simon swore a' wouldn't turn the Devil himself into Hell without a bald-pate to bless the deed. But what I says, saving your reverence, is that the holy man must look sharp if he's to do his good work. Simon be buying so much for the Earl and be drinking so much for 'isself that them who've got aught to sell don't know he from God Almighty; and seeing he bides at Chirk and holds it for the Earl, I reckon them at Valley Crucis 'ud wink at his wickedness were his lads to start burning the man afore priest do come. They say the Maid's mother, from Castell Dinas Bran, be at market, along with Denis Burnell the Constable, who do hold she for's ‘ooman, and they do say—”

But ap Hywel had heard enough already — and so indeed had young Rhisiart who got no joy from learning that the keeper of Dinas Bran had the English name of Burnell. Simon the Hog, Denis Burnell the Constable, Simon the Constable, Denis Burnell the Hog, he repeated under his breath and, “O great Spirits of the Dead, help me, help me!”

“Blessed Jesus!” he heard the Lollard mutter.

“John Baptist!” he heard the Abbot exclaim.

“Saint Derfel!” cried the Scab; and they all rode forward.

They passed close to one market-counter at which in the warm twilight a large company of men were drinking, and Rhisiart tried to imagine that he could single out among them the unpleasant face of Simon the Hog.

But blessed be God's Mother! There was the Grey Friar himself and still alive! They'd fastened him to the cross-plank of a small dung-cart, his arms tied right behind him, and both the dung cart and the defiant man were exposed to the jeers of a crowd of bowmen on the summit of one of those mysterious mounds that in Wales are to be found everywhere.

The warlike churchman took in the situation with one shrewd glance. There was a motley crowd assembled in front of the bowmen, and many members of it were clearly in a threatening mood.

One of these went straight up to the Abbot and began telling him something that Rhisiart couldn't catch; but he did catch the name “Meredith ab Owen,” and he noticed that both the man and the rider turned their heads towards the wooded slope above the valley.

Ap Hywel was the first to arrive on the scene; Rhisiart followed; while the Lollard and the Bard brought up the rear. Our friend could feel that the approach of four horsemen, when everyone else, including the archers, was on foot, produced a considerable stir among the crowd.

But for himself he had no eyes for anyone except his imaginary Princess from Dinas Bran. She was dressed more like a boy than a girl; but her doublet had been torn at the throat and her girl's neck showed bare. She was running wildly round the half-circle of archers, imploring first one and then another in every tone of vibrant feminine appeal to let her ascend the mound and join the Friar. In several cases she actually pulled some of the younger and more susceptible, or it may be less susceptible, of these fair-haired lads — for many of them came from the Fitz-Alan estates in the south — a few paces up the slippery mound, till the mockery of the others or a rough command from the oldest of the troop made them draw back.

But it was evident that the whole company was deriving an unholy pleasure from the mingling of beauty and desperation in this girlish figure; and it struck even Rhisiart's inexperienced mind that while only the most depraved among them would have hurt her if alone, there was no denying the fact that a dark salt tide of cruelty was stirring in them as a crowd.

Both the girl and the Friar showed signs of lively excitement upon the arrival of the four horsemen, but it was clear to our friend that the Abbot had decided to postpone his interference for a time. "He must have heard something," thought the boy; and he turned Griffin's head a little so as to take a closer look at both the Friar and his Maid. "She's younger than me," he said to himself.

As for Mad Huw, there was something about him that reminded Rhisiart of his friend, the Lollard. The Friar's face was much thinner than Master Brut's and it wasn't nearly so fair; but it had the same kind of spiritual calm; nor, as far as a stranger could detect, did it betray the remotest sign of mental derangement.

It was true that when the man uttered his prophetic declaration about the late King his features lost this serenity. At these times his eyes grew so praeternaturally large that they became as beautiful as a woman's. They became in fact, the lad said to himself, so dangerously hypnotic, that it was no wonder the girl followed him everywhere.

But the Friar's Maid — for Rhisiart had no other name for her save his own secret Dinas Bran one — no sooner caught sight of the four horsemen, if the Scab on his pony be called a horseman, than she burst through the ring of archers, and throwing her bare arms round the pummel of the Abbot's saddle, while her braided hair swayed and swung against the war-horse's belly, begged and implored him to release her idol.

"They've got the faggots to burn him!" she cried in that clear childish voice that had already pierced Rhisiart's heart. "They've got the faggots to burn him! And they're only waiting for a priest! Save him, Father! Save him, sweet Father!"

Some of the soldiers burst into brutal laughter. Others muttered obscene jests. The crowd of common people grew thicker every moment as more and more marketers, pouring up the slope from the sale booths of the fair, pressed forward towards the great black horse and its priestly rider.

The four newcomers were in danger of being separated from one another by the impact of the people, and Rhisiart had all he could do to keep Griffin steady and hold him with his head against the big charger's flank.

Ap Hywel was now bending down over his horse's head and asking the distracted girl a number of grave questions, the bulk of which, because of the tumult surging round them, Rhisiart couldn't catch.

But as he let his eyes linger on her figure he fancied he felt — gradually, slowly, irrevocably — the dew of destiny soaking that moment. She was still clinging to the Abbot's knees and the crowd about her was already uttering dangerous cries, some of which were hostile to the man in the dung-cart and some to the bowmen; but when the Grey Friar himself lifted up his voice Rhisiart was astonished at his own response.

Even from his present distance he could see the light in the man’s abnormally large eyes, and as he looked to see how Master Brut was affected he wasn’t surprised to see a twitching in those plump cheeks and a contraction of those calm lips, indicating in no uncertain manner that the self-possessed heretic was equally stirred.

The Grey Friar in his emotion used the late King’s name as if it had been hardly less potent and precious than the name of Christ. From that dung-cart on the mound there kept rising into the air, and floating away over the weapons of the Chirk men and over the agitated fair-folk, the same reiterated cry; and the fact that the ropes that bound him were cruelly tight and that they’d even fastened some kind of cord round his neck gave to each repetition of the words a vibrant intensity, as though they were projected by some supernatural force in the man through a body that was suffering martyrdom.

So no doubt he would have cried had they been actually burning him, and the fact that his bonds were causing him such pain gave to his reiterated appeals a quivering force that was evidently piercing the soul of that poor Maid. “Our dread and puissant Prince, Richard, is alive! Richard, the friend of the poor, is alive! Richard, the son of the Black Prince, is alive! Richard, God’s wounded rose; Richard, Cambria’s bleeding heart; Richard, the sweet passion-flower of love; Richard, the oblation and sacrifice of love — Richard is alive!”

In her desperate and pitiful pleading her torn boy's doublet had slipped down, displaying her shift beneath it and laying bare part of her shoulder.

Simultaneously with this, some abrupt decision among themselves — or it may have been an order from the one who seemed older than the rest — caused the bulk of the Chirk archers to swing round and face the Abbot, while the rest moved a few paces up the mound towards their prisoner. They had other weapons than their long-bows, but it was by their bows that they made themselves feared, and Rhisiart once more cursed the levelling science of this modern weapon.

"Why doesn't the Abbot tell them who he is?" he thought. And then he thought, "But I suppose in these degenerate days the Church has no power except to burn heretics. They'd put an arrow through him, I expect, if he tried to talk to the Friar as he's talking to that girl. It's these curst long-bows that have spoilt everything. In grand-father's time, on Griffin's back, and with my sword, I'd have soon cut the Friar's cords and cried "Long live King Richard!" and made these English serfs kiss a Welsh Abbot's shoe; but these new-fangled long-bows bring everything down to a common — what is ap Hywel going to do? Why doesn't he stop talking to that girl and tell the soldiers who he is?"

But watching the Abbot closely — a proceeding which gave him an excuse for watching the girl — he decided that the man must be in possession of some piece of knowledge that made the situation less critical than it seemed.

But it certainly seemed as ominous as it could well be; and there was proceeding now from the dung-cart a cry that resembled the croak of a half strangled bird. “He’s coming to us again! Richard, the friend of the poor; Richard, the enemy of the rich; Richard, the sweet rose of Britain!”

But from the half choked Friar it was always back to the girl that Rhisiart’s agitated feelings rushed. That bare shoulder had begun seriously to trouble his senses. His whole soul was in a turmoil. He couldn’t himself understand the conflicting feelings that were whirling up from the obscure depths of his being and struggling with one another in his nerves and brain.

He hadn’t failed to notice that what most upset the Friar’s Maid — and small wonder! — was the horrible regularity with which an evil-looking camp-follower of the Chirk men kept heaping up faggots and brushwood in a great pile round the stump of a dead thorn on the southern side of the mound.

And along with this it hadn’t escaped him that the archers themselves, whose leader in the absence of the Steward seemed to be merely the oldest among them, were always slipping aside to take a pull from a great barrel of liquor. “It’s stronger than beer,” he said to himself. “It must be metheglin.”

Unbelievably brutal were the jests each archer shared with the villainous bonfire builder every time they had a pull at that barrel; and it was doubtless this furtive tippling that accounted for the increasing interest they took in the Friar’s girl; and as the lad watched them he decided that it was the expression of some of the older ones, who weren’t openly taunting her as she clung to the black horse, that was the most ominous thing.

Some of these silent ones had an air as if it would be the greatest pleasure to shoot arrows at that bare shoulder. They were well-disciplined men; they were good natured men; but, even so, with that barrel at their disposal it was disconcerting to see the way they flicked at their taut bow-strings.

Some would point the tip of a long, polished arrow straight at our friend himself; others at the Lollard, but most of them seemed to take their chief delight in aiming at the girl, as if she had been a tantalizing hare or deer.

"The Abbot must have something on his mind," thought Rhisiart, "that he's keeping dark; or surely he'd ride straight up the mound. I pray to God he won't draw that breviary from his wallet."

Our friend could see the unwarlike Bard of Ffinnant making obvious attempts to back his pony a little, a manoeuvre that was entirely unsuccessful, for a mob of bare-legged spearmen from the hills kept pressing him forward.

From several snatches of speech that reached him from these people Rhisiart got the impression that there were some in the crowd who knew nothing of the immediate locality and who thought that the Grey Friar was none other than the late King himself, and that the four horsemen had come from London to arrest him.

He prayed that this incalculable Abbot realized the ticklishness of the situation and that any rash move might bring the discharge of those terrible new-fangled bows. Oh how he hated the look of them!

And how he loathed the power their technical efficiency had of making a man's heroism of small value! He'd been studying the Itinerary of Giraldus de Barri in his college library, and recalled what the Archdeacon had said of the yew-tree bows of that epoch. What would the good man have thought could he have seen these soldiers of Fitz-Alan with their murderous engines of destruction?

Such were the lad's reasonable thoughts; but all the while below these thoughts there was going on a strange ferment in the depths of his nature. Feelings totally unknown to him, sensations that he would have denied were possible to him, rose up and strove for mastery. The sight of that girl with her long braid of reddish hair and her bare shoulder roused more than a simple protective instinct in him. He did long to protect her; and yet in this surge of unwonted feeling he felt a dark, hot, secret sympathy with the arrows that were aimed at her. “I mustn’t look at her,” his heart cried; and yet he kept looking at her, and the sight of her, always with those arrows, made him feel as if he could shoot her and protect her, protect her and shoot her, at the same moment, and get wild pleasure from doing both these things.

And he knew too in his heart — for Rhisiart was no self-deceiver — that it was all due to the way her boy’s doublet had slipped.

“I mustn’t look at her!” one voice in him protested; but, even while it was uttering the words, not only was he looking at her, but he was being swept away on a dark tide that save for certain puzzling moments in his early youth he had never known before.

Below the disturbing whiteness of that soft flesh throbbed a living soul that he longed to guard and protect; but something else in the youthful beauty her torn doublet exposed had a fearful power in it that turned this pity into its extreme opposite and the object of it into a dedicated victim of arrows and spears.

The actual girl over there, pleading so passionately the cause of her idol, the breathing, living girl who had a life of her own as vivid as his life, excited melting pity in him; but this mysterious other one, the maddening prey of his dark urge, was something abstract and impersonal.

What did he want? That was the question. He wanted to protect the owner of that bare shoulder; and yet he wanted to see that shoulder pierced. He wanted to protect against all the world that red braid of twisted hair; and yet he wanted to see it cut off by a sword!

He had once heard the late unhappy King cry aloud at a lost tournament in Worcester a wild and strange oath, the strangest he had caught on any lips: “By the nails of the Cross!”, and something about the feelings this girl roused in him brought back that cry.

But how pearl-white, how smooth, how polished that shoulder was, and how daintily twisted was the red wisp that fell across it! To save his soul from instant damnation, he couldn’t stop himself from imagining one of those terrible modern arrows quivering in that tantalizing flesh.

There would be no blood. No, not one single drop. Between the fluttering wild-goose feathers and the flesh in which their burning head was buried there would be only the long yew-shaft.

But the girl suddenly drew away from the side of the horse, and covering her shoulder stood erect with her head high as if to face a new danger. Rhisiart saw at once what brought this about. It was the appearance on the scene of a personage he felt at once to be none other than Simon the Hog. The fellow was evidently further gone in drink than any of his men; and seeing this quickly enough the archers instinctively unstrung their bows and relaxed their alertness.

Still absorbed in the girl, who was now standing alone, Rhisiart noticed that it wasn’t only the appearance of the Hog of Chirk that had reduced her to this intense quiescence. He could see that she had caught sight of some other figure in the crowd. Yes, she was actually lifting her arm now, in a childish gesture of recognition, to someone on the outskirts of the tumult.

Following her gaze the lad became aware of a richly dressed woman’s form forcing a way through the press, and from something in her appearance, all alert as he was to anything that affected his “Princess Myfanwy", he jumped at once to the conclusion that the two were mother and daughter. He could even see the girl making an attempt to meet the woman, but this she evidently found to be quite impossible, but being both of them tall, he could catch the way they greeted each other, and their exchange of looks confirmed, to his impetuous judgment, his idea of their relationship.

The Hog of Chirk advanced straight towards the black horse; but the Abbot's complete indifference to his authority, for the great churchman surveyed him as if he were unworthy of notice, seemed to sober him a little. He muttered something about being interrupted in his duty to the King; but it was clear to our friend that the look of indignant contempt that the girl fixed upon him was almost as disconcerting as the Abbot's haughty stare. He went on with sulky protests, but his eyes began wandering uneasily over the rapidly-increasing crowd, and all at once Rhisiart saw his expression change to a look that was totally beyond the boy's power of interpretation.

It was a look in which pain, fear, rapture and humiliation seemed all mingled together.

Rhisiart followed the man's glance. Ah! So that was it! It was at the woman our friend had decided was the girl's mother that the wretch was now gazing; and as he gazed all his tipsiness seemed to leave him and his first expression was followed by one of tragic and despairing obstinacy.

Still taking no more notice of the now strangely-transformed Steward than if he'd been a nonentity in the crowd, the Abbot uttered some low-voiced command to his monks who at once began chanting, just as naturally as if they were in their own choir-stalls, the well-known psalm, In exitu Israel de Egyptu. They were monks from the banks of the Usk, and they had no authority on the banks of the Dee, but our friend was amazed at the calmness they showed at this agitating moment, keeping the rhythm of their chant as if it were losing itself amid familiar aisles and arches, instead of in the angry murmur of a menacing crowd.

When the psalm died away Rhisiart wedged Griffin still closer between the black horse and the Hog of Chirk. “Hold your peace,” he whispered bending down towards Simon. “It’s the Abbot of Caerleon!”

But the fellow didn’t seem to understand his words. He turned on him a face so distorted with conflicting emotions that it resembled the face of one of the damned in Dante’s Hell; and shrugging his shoulders began pushing his way through the crowd towards two new persons who were approaching the scene.

Rhisiart’s heretical fellow-traveller had by this time got his mare quite close to Griffin, and the two animals were happily flirting.

“Do you know who those two are?” enquired our friend; and he wasn’t greatly surprised to learn that they were the Lord of Nannau, a cousin of Owen Glyn Dŵr, and his bosom-crony, David Gam, the notorious swordsman from South Wales, each of them ferocious Anglophiles and devoted champions of the House of Lancaster.

Both the rider on Griffin and the rider on the mare watched with interest the complaint that Simon was evidently making to these newcomers about the attitude of the mounted intruders.

As the group approached, the crowd surging away from them with respectful hostility, Rhisiart could see the Hog of Chirk directing their attention to both the Friar, whose voice was still audible though very weak, and also to the sinister scarecrow who with inhuman obstinacy continued his task of piling up brushwood round the stump of the dead thorn.

During the temporary relaxation among the archers which had followed the emotional trouble, whatever it was, that had for a moment paralysed Master Simon, our friend observed with relief that his “Princess Myfanwy” had succeeded in ascending the mound, and was now engaged in ministering as best she could to the victim in the dung-cart.

The Lord of Nannau, a tall, powerful figure with a smooth, sleek, handsome face that made Rhisiart think of a vicious bully he had known in his Hereford school, speedily detached himself from his companion and, approaching the Abbot, began protesting against this delay in "the King's justice" which he and his monks were causing.

The man on the black horse listened to what he said, and watched grimly the hurried recovery of their discipline by the Chirk archers; though none of them seemed to have the heart to separate the Maid, now once she had reached him, from the condemned man.

But what an extraordinary figure the notorious David Gam was! Rhisiart had heard of his prowess as a soldier of fortune attached to the House of Lancaster, but it was a surprise to find him a bosom-friend of this Lord of Nannau, who was at least a distinguished looking person.

Anything less distinguished, anything less of a gentleman, than the famous swashbuckler from South Wales, could hardly be imagined!

Gam was of abnormally short stature but with arms so muscular and so long as to resemble those of a gorilla. He had the peculiarity of always keeping these simian appendages bare, though they were covered, as indeed was his head and his frequently exposed chest, with red hairs of an animal-like thickness.

It was with one of these arms that he was now barring the way, as the richly-dressed stranger, of whose relationship to his "Princess" our friend was more assured than ever, tried to approach the Hog of Chirk.

Aye! But how beautiful her face was — and young, too, perhaps too young to be the Maid's mother. "But I think she is her mother all the same," said Rhisiart to himself.

The lad too could even catch the glint of the cajoling smile with which she protested against the monstrous arms that barred her way. But she made no attempt to circumvent them. All she did was to flash a look at the Steward of Chirk, so full of what seemed to our young friend the most devouring emotion he had ever seen, that he wasn't surprised at the man's tragic discomfiture.

Beneath that Medusa stare the fellow seemed as paralysed as a rat before the eyes of a snake. He made an attempt to speak, and Rhisiart thought he would have spoken if a sudden shout from the crowd and a stir among the archers hadn't turned the attention of everyone to the mound.

And there, ascending the mound and moving straight to the dung-cart, was a cowled figure that our friend for a moment took to be one of the Caerleon monks, till a repeated cry of "Valle Crucis! Valle Crucis!" undeceived him.

The archers showed a respect for this plain monk from their own religious house that they had refused to the mitred Abbot from South Wales, and from our friend's "Princess", as she greeted the newcomer, there came ringing down the slope an exultant cry. "It's Father Rheinalt, Mother! It's Father Rheinalt." This curious name — for from the vantage-height of Griffin's back it could be seen that the cowled figure was bending over the man in the dung-cart, either shriving his soul, or assuring him of his safety — had an instantaneous effect upon both the girl's mother and the Hog of Chirk. They exchanged one look, that to our agitated youth was as startling and inscrutable as a blow in the dark, and immediately turned hurriedly away, the latter to have another word with the red-haired Gam, the former to speak to the Lord of Nannau, who had just retreated with a vicious leer on his smooth face from the imperturbable Abbot.

Rhisiart couldn’t hear what this second pair were saying, but he could hear Simon make a boon-companion appeal to the little red monster, reminding him with a forced attempt at jocularity of some savage escapade they’d had together in Ireland.

Of this brutal tale our friend could only gather that it had to do with some revolting treatment of certain Irish girls; but the little red man refused to be cajoled.

“Peace, good Simon,” Rhisiart could hear him say. “Enough, worthy Simon! If you’re serving the Lord of Chirk.

“I’m serving the Lord of Nannau, the King’s best friend in these parts. Your plain Davy’s on the road, I tell ‘ee, to be Sir David Gam at your service, renowned for generations. So hush, gentle Simon; be at peace, honest Simon; and let’s see how you do your duty to that Richard-loving traitor. Burn the man, good Simon, and without any more dillydally. Is that shaven poll up there a-shriving of him? ’Tis for that, I tell’ ee, and not to gabble about Irish maidens, that I came here. I came here for a burnin’. Burnin’s be rarer to old Davy than the prettiest maidenheads. Oh, a mighty man for burnin’s is King Hal, a grand man for burnin’s. So get on with the job, sweet Simon; or lend me one of your big bows, and I’ll give him ‘Richard’s-come-back’!”

Whether encouraged by these words or rendered desperate by the Medusa-looks of the woman, Master Simon now moved in among his archers and directed them to tighten their ranks.

Rhisiart exchanged a glance with the Lollard and both of them drew their horses as near as they could to the Abbot’s charger, so as to form a solid phalanx of mounted men.

As they did this, the lad glanced at the imperturbable expression with which the Abbot grimly and quietly waited upon the course of events. “I expect he’s heard something,” he repeated to himself; but he couldn’t help thinking how helter-skelter and casual a real battle must be, if it took so long for a single event, like the burning or the release of this Friar, to come to a decisive climax.

“Are all the events in the great world like this,” the boy thought, “so different from what the historians say?”

But at this moment, and Rhisiart knew very well that it wasn’t this the Abbot was expecting, the Scab’s mountaineers, waving their spears like savages, began pushing their way towards the spot where the Lord of Nannau and David Gam, for the woman had withdrawn into the crowd, were standing alone.

The Scab and his pony were thrust forward, surrounded, and then left behind by these excited men. “Saint Derfel! Saint Derfel!” they cried as they brandished their spears; and even in that tense moment Rhisiart was amused by the mixture of alarm for his own skin and pride in the excitement he’d stirred up that was displayed by the one-eyed Bard, though the intrepid pony showed no sign of any emotion save the joy of battle.

The Abbot called out to his monks to draw back; and he himself did the same, for the old war-horse was growing unruly. Rhisiart and the Lollard followed with their steeds; and as the three horsemen backed away it became clear to our friend that if the Lord of Nannau and his precious companion didn’t also beat a speedy retreat he would have the satisfaction of seeing them spitted like a couple of wild boars who have no avenue of escape.

It must be confessed that for one single second our young friend — for, after all, this would have been his first skirmish with real bloodshed — hoped heartily that the two bullies would escape those gleaming points; but whether this automatic prayer, which he might have uttered had they actually been wild-beasts, had or had not anything to do with it, out of that closing circle they did manage to skip; and that was the last seen of either of them that night.

The Medusa-like woman in the rich garments had also vanished; while the Valle Crucis monk, whose name, as the girl had shouted it down the slope, had had such a startling effect, must have succeeded in loosening the condemned man's bonds, for that monotonous and intolerable reiteration about King Richard, though much weaker than formerly, was no longer in the voice of a man who was being choked.

The now quite sober Hog of Chirk had got his archers into good order by this time, all along the slope of the mound; while the Scab's spearmen, gathered now in front of the crowd, were suffering something of a reaction in the presence of those drawn bow-strings.

And there fell upon the scene one of those inexplicable silences that occur sometimes at a crisis. The shouts died down. No one stirred or made any movement except to gaze anxiously at the wooded hills around them. Had Rhisiart's light-hearted mother, now taking her pleasure in the gaieties of Hereford town, caught sight at that moment of the frowning intensity of her son's narrow face, with its abnormally high forehead and big nose, she would most certainly have teased him unmercifully and called him, as was her wont, her "baby Chancellor".

But just as it was an upsetting discovery to him that he could fall in love with a girl simply from imagining her being pierced through the shoulder by a new-fangled arrow, so it was a sinister enlargement to his knowledge of life to see how a place of execution could act like a magnet upon human nerves. Modry used to tell him that there was a magnet in all Welsh souls that always pointed north, to where the mouth of Hades was; and this perpetual cry "Richard is alive!" seemed to act just in that way: drawing that whole motley assembly towards the mound, towards the dung-cart, towards the towering pile of brushwood prepared for the burning.

The Abbot showed no sign that he intended to ride his charger through the archers, or to dismount and climb the slope on foot. “Would I risk it in his place?” our lad thought. And then he thought, “We’re all waiting — on this Eve of Saint John — for a miracle to happen. There! He’s staring up at those hills like everybody else. Do they expect the King and his army back from Scotland?”

A fearful turmoil now began in young Rhisiart’s heart. He felt that if he didn’t ride forward, straight into those fifty arrow-shafts, he would be burnt too, burnt slowly to the end of his days, by a remorse worse than his ancestor’s in Dinas Bran.

Still the man in the cart kept crying, “Richard! Sweet Richard!” but his face now, which was like an angel’s, and Simon’s face, which was like a lost soul’s, were both turned towards the bare-legged spearmen at the foot of the mound.

Rhisiart heard the Lollard whisper something to the Abbot of which he could only catch the word “madness”; but the Abbot’s reply struck him as a strange one. “He won’t let the man be burnt,” he heard him mutter. “He’ll come at the last moment.”

Rhisiart’s brain began to grow dazed under his desperate interior struggle. Who would come at the last moment? Wasn’t fate beginning to lay it upon him to be the one to act at this crisis, be the result what it might? And if such was his destiny it was useless to dodge the logical conclusion; namely that if he did fling himself upon these deadly modern weapons not a soul would ever know that the treachery of Dinas Bran had been redeemed!

It was through a blood-red mist that he heard the hoarse voice of the Bard of Ffinnant invoking Saint Derfel. Modry had told him queer things about Saint Derfel; and he could see from his position on Griffin's back that a mysterious wave of feeling had begun to pass over the people like the wind at Pentecost.

Master Simon appeared to be having an angry dispute with the repulsive individual who was now engaged in pouring some imflammable oil upon the pile he had made. But what the devil was that extraordinary Abbot doing now? Was he expecting a miracle? Did he, a learned Cistercian, have faith in this mad Derfel cult? "By God, I believe the old chap's going to bestir himself. What's he calling to his monks about in Latin? Are they the ones who're going to march upon the arrows?"

"Richard, our sweet sacrifice, is alive!"

Never in his life had the young Rhisiart felt more at the mercy of uncontrollable events than he felt at that moment. His brain seemed stunned, his senses drugged, his power of action atrophied. He suddenly felt very young. He even felt like crying.

In spite of the familiar piebald back on which he sat and his big crusader's sword and his sheepskin bundle his nerves became like those of a child whose pretence had suddenly, to his intense bewilderment, come true. He did his best afterwards to forget his weakness at this particular moment; but those wildly-brandished spears and those wilder cries of "Derfel! Derfel! Saint Derfel for Edeyrnion" approaching him from one side, while those terrible modern weapons menaced him from the other, gave the poor lad a paroxysm of sheer panic.

Instead of thinking of Dinas Bran or even of his red-haired "Princess" he thought of the kindly streets of Hereford, and he thought of his mother.

And fate seemed resolved to put him to shame; for what must his fellow-traveller, this cool-blooded heretic, do at this juncture but slip down from his mare, hand her bridle to him to hold, and completely unarmed as he was, walk calmly up to the pile of faggots on the southern slope of the mound, and taking Master Simon by the arm, begin, to the man's amazement, uttering some eager, long-winded conjuration.

Rhisiart began to feel a curious darkness stealing over his senses. Was he going to faint? But summoning up all the spirit that remained to him he did manage to urge Griffin forward about three yards, dragging the mare behind him. There he stopped, for he saw the glittering point of one particular arrow directed straight to his heart and he caught the cold, resolute, measuring eye of the bowman who was extending the string.

Thankful to be still alive, he tore his gaze from that arrow's point, and half turning his head tried to catch what the Abbot was saying to his monks. It sounded like a mixture of Latin and Welsh, but neither his lessons with Modry at Hereford nor with his teachers at Oxford had given him a clue to the words he heard.

In any case the Abbot was taking no notice of him; and there he was with Master Brut's mare on his hands, the only remaining person in the open space between the arrow-heads and the spear-heads!

To relieve their feelings the bare-legged followers of Derfel were now tossing their weapons in the air and catching them as they came down. From both sides there arose, and in no very gentle terms, extremely blunt advice to the boy on the piebald horse to get out of the way.

It had been however, young Rhisiart's custom, during the solitude of his long ride through the woodland paths, to pretend to himself that he was rescuing Dinas Bran, and though the only eyes that saw his exploits were those of rabbits and sparrow-hawks it had been his delight to draw his crusader's sword out of its scabbard. So accustomed to these heroic pastimes had old Griffin become that the moment his bridle was jerked he would lift his head, advance far enough to satisfy his rider's impulse, and then, realizing that it was all pretence, begin quietly cropping the grass, well-assured of at least ten minutes of peace.

And now, not in the least affected by either spears or bows, being accustomed as a sheriff's state-beast to every sort of warlike pageant, he displayed only a reproachful astonishment at the antics of the Lollard's mare, who was rapidly getting out of hand.

"Richard, our sacrifice!" The Friar's voice was growing very faint, and the yells of the Scab's mountaineers almost drowned it, but through all the turmoil of thoughts and images that made the boy feel as if he were being drowned in a black tide, the thought kept coming to him: "I wonder if, when it's over, they'll take as many arrows out of Griffin as out of me."

And then he thought — but it was rather a flash of electric vision running like a tongue of fire through his body, his nerves, his brain, his heart, than any definite thought— "If I just stay where I am it'll be a quick death; and I'll have died for Myfanwy if not for Dinas Bran. But a gentleman always rides forward!" So strong was his conviction that his end had come that he already felt the arrows piercing his flesh; and though the feeling it gave him had nothing of that dark trembling he had felt when he thought of the arrow in the girl's shoulder, it did bring with it a wild and desperate exultation that seemed to hover in circles above his terror as a hawk might hover over a heron.

But the thought "Will it hurt?" and the thought "I mustn't cry out", wrote themselves in letters of fire upon the wings of this exultation.

And then there fell on him "like a clap of thunder and a fall of mist" a curious cessation of all movement of time. Time stopped; and something else, another dimension altogether, took its place; and in that deep time-vacuum, with an absolute naturalness helped doubtless by the calm assumption of his horse that he was doing what he always did — he drew his crusader’s sword out of its sheath and lifting it high into the air rode forward.

III. MOTHER AND DAUGHTER

IT MUST HAVE been a spectacle evocative of many various impressions, the sight of this tall, dark lad on the piebald horse brandishing his old-fashioned weapon in the face of the best archers in England.

“Why, each one of those fellows,” the more practical onlookers must have thought, “holds that boy’s life on his bow-string!”

To some it must have seemed the very top of idiotic folly, to others the limit of theatrical bravado, to others just the old pitiful tale of youth’s throwing its life away on the chess-board of human wickedness.

To a few it may even have seemed an action prompted by cunning craftiness, timed to a nicety, and calculated to win a particular kind of notoriety at the minimum risk.

There must have been some among the archers, on the other hand, to whose south-of-England humour the whole episode was simply comic. This humorous attitude to it was certainly encouraged by the bad behaviour of the Lollard’s mare who not only plunged and dragged, but did her best in every possible way to make Griffin and his master ridiculous.

It was indeed the necessity of using both hands to restrain this roguish animal that brought the lad to his senses; but he had no sooner recovered his normal wits and had even begun, in a natural human reaction, to congratulate himself that he was still alive, than he realized that the whole situation had completely changed.

Intoning the chant In toto corde meo, and led by their Abbot on his great steed, the monks of Caerleon were moving in procession between the opposing ranks. But it wasn’t because of the bravery of the monks that a great cry was now going up from all the people. As it rose, and rolled away over the hills, it was echoed by what sounded to Rhisiart's ears like thousands of deep voices, all crying the same name, and it was as if the river itself had caught it up, and as if the long-sighing summer night wind were carrying it, and as if the high invisible battlements of Dinas Bran were sending it back!

"Owen! Owen! Owen!" it repeated and then, while the lad gazed in astonishment at the figure approaching him, "Meredith ab Owen! Meredith ab Owen!" was the acclamation he heard around him.

What Rhisiart saw now was a slender young man, plainly dressed save for some kind of hawk's feather in his cap and totally unarmed, coming straight towards him down the slope of the mound while the Chirk men lowered their weapons to let him pass. His hands were bare, his throat and neck were bare, and he walked as easily and leisurely as if he were in the circuit of his own sylvan halls. Round his neck, suspended by a silver cord, hung a richly-decorated hunting-horn, with which every now and again his fingers would toy, a trick that struck the manly taste of our Hereford friend as bordering upon the effeminate.

But Rhisiart forgot all tricks of manner when Meredith ab Owen came up to him and spoke to him; forgot everything but his face and its expression which made him feel as if he were confronted by his own favourite Knight of the Round Table, the enigmatic Gwalchmai!

But Meredith ab Owen was a sad not a gay Gawain. In form he was a dark, slim youth, not so tall as Rhisiart himself though some five or six years older; but what struck our traveller most about his face was the quality of its wistful disillusionment. He had never seen such a depth of gentle life-weariness as looked out at him from this young man's dark eyes.

There was a softness, like that of a glossy dusky brown of certain time-dimmed royal velvets, about his hollow cheeks, while his features, in that gathering dusk, were all soft and nebulous, as if their human flesh were only partially solidified after being called up from the vasty deep by some enchanter.

It very soon became apparent why the Chirk men had lowered their arms. And they were doing more than that now. They were piling them into a great heap beside the unused bonfire, while Master Simon himself, with his hands tied behind his back, was directing this symbolic proceeding.

The whole mound was surrounded by Glendourdy's men. They had descended like an elfin host out of that Midsummer Eve greenness. Especially had they appeared from that particular direction beyond the mound where Master Simon, in his private griefs, had forgotten to place a guard.

Rhisiart instinctively doffed his scholar's cap to this young man as he had not done to anyone but the Abbot all that long day; and feeling ashamed to address him from Griffin's back, he swung his leg over his saddle, extricating it with some difficulty from his big bundle and bigger sword, and slid to the ground.

Here, holding both the horses, he made with some awkwardness his best Hereford obeisance, looking as his mother had taught him to do when addressing a great personage, not at the young man's face but at his feet.

"May I ask," the new-comer earnestly began, while beyond them against the darkening sky the monks of Caerleon chanted their in convertendo When the Lord turned again the captivity of Sion, "may I ask whether it was on behalf of Henry Bolingbroke, or on behalf of King Richard, that you drew your sword and kept the peace?" And then in a much lower and more youthful tone he added quickly, "What a perfectly lovely horse! I've never seen anything like him. Do you come from London? Are you on a pilgrimage to Valle Crucis? May I have the pleasure of knowing the name of one who has faced the Earl's best bowmen? But I see you're wrought-up. My curiosity is ill-timed. But if you're not expected at Valle Crucis I know my father will want to thank you in person; and perhaps you will allow me — I'm expressing myself clumsily — but I keep thinking of how you looked just now — and how you looked" — and with a smile full of a most wistful tenderness he stroked Griffin's heavily-loaded back— "I mean, I beg you'll allow me to take you both to Glyndyfrdwy to-night?"

Rhisiart lifted his eyes and then dropped them, turning his hook-nosed profile first towards the chanting monks and then towards the jubilant crowd. He acted like some agitated young falcon upon whose perch an eaglet has suddenly alighted. Embarrassed though he was it didn't escape him how respectfully the excited crowd kept aloof, leaving a clear open space about the two of them.

But his first duty as a man of honour was to disillusion his new friend as quickly as possible. "I did nothing," he stammered, "I — I just happened to be where I was. It's all a mistake. I wasn't — what you think. It was — my horse"

"I'm sure it was your horse," said Meredith ab Owen with a smile of almost girlish sweetness. "Well! you must bring your horse for my father to thank. Will you tell me his name?"

Rhisiart murmured the word "Griffin" and then once more plunged into a long and incoherent explanation of how he'd become so panic-stricken that he'd been afraid to move, and how— "And this fine old sword came out of his sheath of his own accord?" said the other with perfect gravity. "Well, we'll have anyway to take your sword and Griffin to my father and since you're the owner of these independent beings I'm afraid you can't very well refuse—"

There was indeed something so engaging about this young man, with his dark well-fitting tunic, his bare brown knees, his cap with its hawk's feather, and his puzzling air of belonging neither to court nor camp, neither to cloister nor college, that Rhisiart gave up the attempt to explain his behaviour. "It's fate," he thought. "I've told him; so if he won't believe, it's his own fault! I'm not going on proclaiming my childishness!"

But the young man was now, in his delicate, indirect, and almost feminine fashion asking him who he was. "My father will want to know; and it'll save you the bother of explaining if I can tell him in advance."

"Rhisiart ab Owen is my real name," replied our friend eagerly. "I'm descended on the bastard side from Madoc ap Griffith of Dinas Bran. Your father's the Baron Glendourdy, isn't he? I thought that's who you were, when you came so suddenly, and I'm glad you've asked me to come, because — though only on the bastard side, of course — I am, unless I'm mistaken, a sort of connection of your honoured house."

Meredith gave him at that the most radiant smile he'd ever seen, and bending forward with his cap in his hand kissed him tenderly in the Norman manner on both cheeks.

"Why then we're cousins," he cried, "and cousins well within the ninth degree! I had a queer feeling there was something about you. What do they call you at home?"

"Rhisiart's what I usually call myself," answered Griffin's rider, doing his best to soothe both the horses, for the mare's restlessness was beginning to fret the old piebald. "I've been at Oxford; but I thought — I thought—"

"You thought you'd like to see your Welsh cousins! And so you shall. You shall see us all. I won't tell you yet which you'll like the best! But I know very well indeed. And I'll tell you afterwards if I was right. On second thoughts I think you'd better sleep here to-night — here or at Valle Crucis — and come on to Glyndyfrdwy tomorrow. My father's at Sycharth just now. Our old friend Iolo Goch's lying ill in our place there; and I can tell you when he's ill my father won't stir or think of anything else. But he's better now and we're going to move him tomorrow to Glyndyfrdwy. Father's had a special conveyance made for him out of withy-wands; and our own people will carry him. They may stop for High Mass at the Abbey; but I doubt it. The poet's not over-pious. Few of our bards are. Their religion is like the Scab's yonder, with his Derfel. By the way, I hear another cousin of ours, along with that cut-throat David the Squint, is stopping at the Tassel. Have you seen anything of him here?"

Delighted to have something easier to talk about than his own conduct, Rhisiart launched forth into a vivid description of the two traitors, a description that was spiteful enough and boyish enough to afford their young enemy no small satisfaction. But all the while he was talking his eyes were searching for the red-haired Maid, whom he finally discovered not very far away and looking anything but radiant.

The girl wasn't with her Friar. She was talking to the richly-dressed woman; and now when he saw them side by side he felt certain of their relationship. "Yes, she's younger than I am," he thought. "I don't believe she's sixteen!"

"Well," said Meredith, "I must pay my father's devoir to John ap Hywel now. She's lovely, isn't she?" he added quickly, causing our friend's startled blood to rush to his cheeks. "I don't wonder you were relieved when I asked you to come to us tomorrow instead of tonight. Well, good luck! See you tomorrow at Glyndyfrdwy." And he ran lightly up the slope of the mound.

Impatient to get rid of the Lollard’s horse, Rhisiart now looked about him to try to discover Walter Brut. Yes! There he was, still talking in his obstinately-tender manner to the unhappy Simon.

“Did he think I was unhappy when he talked to me? Does he talk like that to all the unhappy people he meets? God! I couldn’t stand it if I were the Hog of Chirk.” And for some reason, just as it gave Rhisiart a curious pain to watch the wretched Simon submitting to the spiritual consolation of Master Brut, so it troubled his mind to see the Friar’s Maid listening to her own mother.

“Why don’t people leave each other alone?” he thought, as he saw the girl’s head hanging down under what was evidently the handsome woman’s bitter tongue. He glanced towards the exhausted Friar, by whose side was still standing the heavily-cowled monk from Valle Crucis, and he couldn’t help noticing that this same monk kept turning round to stare at the two women; and, unless the twilight misled him, the fellow was as uneasy under what he saw as he was himself.

Master Simon too, he noticed, stole many a furtive glance at the mother and daughter; but the scolding to which the girl was submitting didn’t appear to worry him very much.

“I believe there’s some trouble between them all,” our lad thought; and he tried to pretend to himself that he had had an inkling of this from the first moment he’d seen them. He remembered an occasion in his childhood when his frivolous Norman mother had observed his interest in a complicated social situation. “The little monk’s got his eyes about him,” she’d said to Modry. Yes, he began to feel sure that between these two men and these two women there was a mysterious bond. And how did the mad Friar come into it?

The whole problem provoked him; for if there was one thing he prided himself upon it was his social acumen. And how could there be any link between that tragic-looking Cistercian and this richly dressed woman? Or, for that matter, between such a woman and the Hog of Chirk?

"I wouldn't give any of them a thought," he decided irritably, "if it weren't for that girl."

But how the monk was staring! "Blessed Mary," Rhisiart said to himself, "if I were Master Simon, afraid of that over-dressed sorceress and afraid of that scowling priest, I wouldn't be so patiently listening to a gospel-man! I'd hit out. I'd do somebody a mischief!"

The Maid's head, grown dusky in the twilight, was sinking lower and lower under her mother's words. But what a long braid she had, as she clasped her hands across it behind her back!

Suddenly the woman seemed to lose all patience, vexed rather than appeased by the girl's quiescence. With one last word, obviously as cruel as a blow, she turned impatiently from her and moved off towards the slope of the mound.

Rhisiart's heart beat fast. Now had come the chance he had been passionately desiring, ever since he had first set eyes upon this girl. But he was burdened with two horses, both of them heavily loaded, both of them restless and hungry, both of them in as ill a humour as it is possible for elderly horses to be. She still stood there by herself, biting her lips and watching her mother make her way towards Simon; and Rhisiart felt he must snatch this precious moment, or she would be whirled out of his path and out of his life forever! His knees shook; a hollow emptiness in the pit of his stomach began throbbing like the tap-tap of a sickening drum.

Desperately he dragged the two unwilling beasts towards her, Griffin every now and then turning his head and twitching an ear as if to say, "I know what you're feeling, Master; but I would like to bring my feed of oats before your enamoured intelligence."

She turned her head when she saw him coming, and their eyes met. Then, looking down, she ran the palms of her hands over the folds of her boy's dress. Reaching her side, where Griffin, either out of an old servant's instinctive tact or because of his gnawing belly, induced the mare to drop her head along with his own and crop a few grass-blades, he suddenly found that something had deprived him of the gift of speech. There she was, and here he was, but not a syllable could he utter. All the moisture seemed to have left his lips, his palate, his throat. Nor did the power that had taken away his speech even allow him to look at her.

Luckily it didn't make him shut his eyes, and never has there been a patch of earth so microscopically stared at as the one between her feet and his. In this small radius of midsummer vegetation, great creative Nature had caused to spring up an exceptionally early meadow-orchis, and following Griffin's example the boy deliberately stooped down, and plucking this spike of soft petals, whose colour was lost in the falling night, thrust it hurriedly, as if he were just giving it to her to hold while he adjusted the bridle of his horse, into the maiden's hand.

The crafty old piebald seemed to take a sly pleasure in making what the youth had to do to his bridle as difficult as possible. "Take time, Master," he seemed to say. "It's better not to rush them at the beginning. Pardon me if I taste that bit of clover!"

No classical Pandarus could in fact have been kinder to young Rhisiart than his hungry old horse, and before, as they say, he realized he was in the water, lo and behold! he found he could swim.

While their four young hands were disentangling the confusion of reins, which the immortal fingers of Eros, helped by old Griffin's artfulness, were twisting as fast as they untwisted them, it was Rhisiart who found it easier to talk; and he talked rapidly, saying things that astonished himself a good deal more than they did the Friar's Maid.

He told her that he had heard her voice as well as the Friar's before he crossed the river. He told her what a power over him her voice had had, and how wonderful it was that it could carry so far and yet remain so clear and sweet.

"What's your name?" he finally blurted out, stealing a glance at the curve of her cheek.

"Tegolin," she answered, stroking Griffin's neck. "It's a funny name, but I've got used to it."

He now realized that she had stuck the meadow-orchis into her red-gold braid, where it swung as she moved as naturally as if it were growing there.

But if it was Rhisiart whose tongue was free when they were busy over the horse, the moment their eyes met she took the lead.

"I saw you drawing your sword," she said in a low voice, pressing a finger against the one of her cheeks which felt less cooled than the other by the damp on Griffin's neck. "I've never seen a gentleman's sword drawn before. They use spears and bows in my cantref. How beautiful it looked as you held it up, and you sitting so lonely in front of them all! You looked like Pwyll, Prince of Dyfed, riding against Halgan, crowned King of Annwn."

Poor Rhisiart! If she had never seen a gentleman's drawn sword before she had certainly never suffered from a gentleman's touchy conscience before.

It now became necessary for the boy to enter at full length, with his profile turned sharply away, into every detail of that wretched predicament in which panic, according to his furious pride of self-deprecation, played the part of courage.

She heard him gravely, watching him intently, her blue eyes growing wider and wider as he went on. But when he came to Griffin — how in the midst of his dazed and desperate thinking the old horse shook himself and lifted his ears, thus hypnotizing the man on his back into the automatic playing of his part in their familiar game — a faint smile flickered across her lips.

"I was thinking so hard," he said, "that everything seemed only half-real, everything swayed and heaved and melted; and I suppose I'd so mixed up drawing that sword with vows and resolutions to be worthy of it that in my weakness and cowardice it drew itself, if you know what I mean."

He turned upon her so suddenly that he caught that tender half-smile; and for some reason instead of making him angry or making him more ashamed of himself, it was just the one thing he needed, and the words that followed it became only a roundabout commentary upon the effect it produced and the knowledge it revealed.

"I'm just like you," she whispered: "I'm always begging the Friar not to come to these places and not to cry his message where there's such terrible danger; but when we do come I seem to turn against all I've said and something in me pushes me on, and I push him on, and so it happens."

They were both stroking Griffin now and she looked Rhisiart straight in the eyes. "When these moments come," she said, speaking slowly and very emphatically, "I don't think it's ever we who're brave. I think it's something inside us."

The fact that he was understood in his deepest weakness, and also in this "something" which was in him and yet outside him, brought the tears suddenly to his eyes, and he made such a pathetic effort not to break down and, in doing so, screwed up his queer physiognomy so absurdly that Tegolin, with her own mouth distorted, bent suddenly forward and, snatching up his hand as it rested on the horse's neck, pressed it tightly for a fleeting second against her breast.

This impulsive gesture established no new relation between them. Indeed, ignorant of the ways of women, our friend accepted it as the natural behaviour of a young girl who wanted to comfort him; but from the unconscious way they both acted it was as if their hands had been independent entities for whose behaviour they were in no sense responsible.

"How old are you?" she asked him. "I was sixteen on the first of this month."

Rhisiart smiled proudly. "I was seventeen on the first of this month. So I'm a year older than you."

"Draw the sword again for me," she begged him. "Only a little way! I don't want anyone to see you do it. But please draw it!" And then she added, evidently reverting to his pride at being a year older, "Seventeen isn't much."

Rhisiart obeyed her at once, and in the hay-scented twilight that seemed as if it would last till dawn, he pulled from the ancient sheath about three inches of that exquisitely-chiselled blade. "May I touch it?" she asked.

Rhisiart hesitated and pondered in silence. Did the girl know all he would be giving her if he let her do that? But her long twisted braid had already fallen sideways against his sheepskin bundle and against his ancient tunic of chain-armour, and though it was too dark to see much difference in colour between her hair and the meadow-orchis, a blur of paleness at one spot in that dusky braid showed him it hadn't yet fallen.

There was a broad, expansive yellowish light above the mountains to the south-west, but the river below them was of a cold, metallic whiteness; and the fragment of steel he had laid bare took to itself, as she bowed her head over it, the cold grey of the water of the river rather than the warm tint of the sky.

There were no longer any wild sounds or desperate shouts coming from the people. He could see that the Grey Friar had fallen peacefully asleep and that the tragic monk from Valle Crucis was kneeling by his side. The Chirk bowmen were sprawling on the ground, disarmed now and helpless, but joking in their careless English manner with their captors, and perfectly content at the turn which events had taken.

Glendourdy’s son was standing alone on the slope of the mound, evidently waiting till the Caerleon monks had finished their evening psalms.

The indefatigable Lollard, who was still sticking fast to the Hog of Chirk, was leaning against the faggots; and it was across the great heap of surrendered weapons that he was murmuring his evangelical consolations.

With the constant smell of new-cut hay there came to them on the soft wind occasional wafts of other pleasant fragrances. Some of these Rhisiart took for the scent of honeysuckle; but there were others that may have been exotic foreign perfumes that merchants from overseas had brought to the fair; and once he was sure he smelt a whiff of wood smoke from the Tassel Inn.

The bare-legged Derfel-worshippers had now lighted a bonfire of their own, and round it, with their spears stuck in the earth, they were reclining at their ease, listening to some bardic composition of the inspired Scab.

Thus the Latin of the monks and the Welsh of Derfel’s prophet answered each other across that misty expanse, uplifting in pure haphazard an antiphonic hymn to the powers of the night. Most of the crowd had already vanished and the silences and mysteries of Nature resumed their ancient sway. The sacred gorsedd mound, covered with the same unbroken turf as had covered it before rumour of either Christ or Derfel had reached this place, rose to its proper dignity and claimed its indestructible inheritance.

All these things did Rhisiart feel, but only vaguely and indistinctly as he pondered in his mind whether to let her touch the sword. Conscious of the boy's hesitation Tegolin lifted her head, and it was now too dark for him to see her flushed cheeks.

"If you'd rather I didn't touch it," she said, "of course I won't. Would you rather I didn't?"

Her renewed question forced Rhisiart to make a decision. But oh, it was so hard! to let her touch his precious sword at this turning-point of his life would be to commit himself to her in a way far beyond the flower in her braid or his hand against her bosom!

Hit in her pride by his continued silence she drew away from him and began tightening the leather collar of her boyish doublet. He caught the movement and it brought back a rush of that dark unholy emotion that had swept through him when he had envisaged the imaginary arrow.

It was therefore with the most dangerous thing in him, as well as with the depths of his secret mania for Dinas Bran, that he tore the hesitation out of his heart. It was as if the imaginary arrow had been in him instead of in her, so much did it cost him; but he whispered hoarsely, "Yes, Tegolin, you may touch it!"

All her sweetness, all her submissiveness returned to her as she came close to him and leaned across Griffin's back. But instead of touching the exposed steel with her fingers she bowed her head over it and pressed upon it her open lips.

Rhisiart drew a deep breath.

"How cold and damp it is!" she murmured.

He gave a queer little chuckle. “Steel’s always like that,” he said. “But it’s not wet with blood.” And then, in a low eager voice, “When shall I see you again — Tegolin?”

Her reply was a double question: “Where are you sleeping to-night? Are you squire to Owen?”

“You mean the Baron Glendourdy? No, I’m not his squire yet; but I’m his cousin, and I’m going to see him. No, I don’t know where I’m going to sleep. Meredith said I couldn’t see him till tomorrow night.”

Tegolin looked at him with increased interest, and as she looked at him something about his innocence and unworldliness touched her to the heart.

For all his crusader’s sword and his chain-armour and his hooked Norman nose, she suddenly saw him as very young and very lonely and not a little helpless.

“You heard what the Abbot over there said about taking us to Valle Crucis?”

Rhisiart murmured a gloomy assent. “Oh don’t be afraid. We’re not going there. Brother Huw and I have a cow-stall to ourselves at that farm near the ferry. It belongs to the Tassel, but it’s quite different. If you come later and ask for us — Only don’t tell anyone else; for I can’t have the Father disturbed any more tonight, and if people follow us he’ll preach till his heart breaks.”

Rhisiart had strained his spirit of independence to such a point of late that it was like a sweet immersion in a bath of warm and fragrant water to place his will entirely at her disposal. He thanked her earnestly and gravely; and in that obscure light she smiled at him with a smile of such protective strength that a wave of relaxed peacefulness flowed over him and he drew a long happy sigh.

"I must get Brother Huw away now," she said. "I can see he's awake and listening to Father Rheinalt. Father Rheinalt is good and kind. I'll tell you about him — another time — but I don't want—" She paused and looked round them. "It's my mother who's on my mind now! She's gone up there" — and Tegolin pointed to the dead tree and the faggots and the pile of arms — "to gloat over Master Simon; and I can't bear it when she gets like that. Brother Huw would forgive anyone; even if they were burning him alive. He says King Richard would too, but I don't know! You see I don't believe everything the Friar says! But will you do something for me? Will you get my mother away from Master Simon and find someone who's going to Dinas Bran? She's living in the castle up there with Denis Burnell, the son of the Sheriff of Shropshire. Mother tells everybody Father Rheinalt married them; but, oh dear, I don't know! I was a baby when she married Master Simon; and the nuns brought me up. But it was her going to Simon — I know that — that drove Father Rheinalt into the monastery. But I'll tell you all I know about them another time. But I don't know much. The nuns wouldn't let me see her, and since I've been with Brother Huw — but do get Mother off to Dinas Bran! There must be some of Denis Burnell's people here. The Chirk men will tell you where to find them. Don't go with Mother, mind. Not under any condition! Come to the farm and ask for us. But oh! go quick! Get her away from Simon and find Burnell's—" she stopped abruptly. "Do you mind if I ask you your name? Mother's a distant relation of Owen's; but he doesn't like her, though she's useful to him. My Lord of Arundel's very fond of her, too; so she has two strings to her bow. What's your name?"

No story our friend had ever told himself about his romantic future was as full of conflicting emotions as Rhisiart's face when the words Dinas Bran fell from Tegolin's lips. There flashed across his brain a memory of a summer evening by the banks of the Wye, when he had prayed desperately to the Virgin that some tremendous event might transform his life. And now — “My name is Rhisiart ab Owen,” he said hurriedly. “In Hereford they call me Rhisiart.”

Tegolin turned away her head, and laying her hand on Griffin’s mane began twisting its hairs round her fingers. “What shall I call you?” she enquired. Her shyness communicated itself to him, and he too looked away.

“Modry used to call me Gwion Bach,” he brought out with a wry smile. At that she turned sharply upon him.

“Who was Modry?”

“My nurse,” he said; and she gave a little laugh; and then it became his turn to ask a question. “Have you ever been up to Dinas Bran, Tegolin?”

“Never!” she confided. “Mother would hate to see me there. Besides, Denis might treat the Friar as Simon tried to do.”

“But why don’t you go alone?”

“And leave Brother Huw? How on earth would he get on? And anyway Mother wouldn’t want me up there in these clothes. Don’t you see, Gwion Bach, I’ve got hosen like you? I’m the Friar’s page. He often forgets that I’m a woman at all. Oh you’ve no idea—” she broke off. “Please go quick. Gwion Bach, and take her to the Constable’s people. I can see—” Hurriedly she helped him to get the bridles of both horses round his wrist. “Goodbye,” she cried, giving him an anxious push. “And ask for us at the farm — Gwion Bach!”

It was a strange scene he encountered when finally he’d got the horses to the top of the slope; and he arrived there hot and exhausted and very irritable. Both animals had been a great trouble. The mare had pulled violently at her halter in her desire to get quickly to her master, while Griffin, sulky and hungry, had hung back, knowing that his only chance for oats and hay lay to the west rather than to the east.

Dragging one beast therefore, and dragged by the other, Rhisiart skirted the circle of disarmed bowmen, who, seated on faggots from the stake-pile, were playing cards and drinking and singing and chatting to their captors, till he came to where his Lollard friend stood in the background, looking baffled and nonplussed, listening with an expression of growing apprehension to the ambiguous and cruel words poured out upon his convertite by Tegolin's mother.

The heretic's eyes were wide open and his full lips considerably apart, while upon his smooth face there had formed at least two noticeable lines that Rhisiart had never seen there before. Everything about him, down to the way he was fidgetting with his feet, seemed absorbed in one overwhelming sensation, the recognition of evil of a kind he had never met before!

What a handsome woman she was, this mother of Tegolin, and what a terrifying one! Her hair hadn't a touch of grey in it, but it was much duskier than her daughter's, and was indeed of so dark a tinge of chestnut as to look black in that obscurity.

But no shadow of night obscured the terrible glint in her eyes. It was clear to our friend that the student of the Gospels was spell-bound by what he heard. He stared at the woman as if the wicked emotion she displayed were a conjured-up trick rather than a revelation of reality.

Absorbed in the miserable mind of the Hog, Master Brut had been struggling for hours with profanity and despair, but from the eyes and lips of this beautiful woman there jetted forth a passion so weird as to produce the feeling that it came from a fount of evil infinitely deeper and more dangerous than anything in her wretched victim.

All this after Tegolin's hint was easy enough for Rhisiart to read in the Lollard's face, as he placed the mare's bridle in his hand. "He's been struggling with an ordinary devil," the lad thought, "but with this witch he'll have to change his weapons!"

Master Simon was sitting hunched up on one of the highest faggots, with his back against the dead tree, and he looked to our friend like a man who was deriving some horrible satisfaction from being beaten to death. His lower lip hung loose as if his jaw had dropped. In the dying light you could see that the corners of his mouth were dribbling. His heavy head drooped sideways upon his chest. His hands, as they dangled helplessly across his knees under the torment of the woman's tongue, looked as if they had been cut off in the pillory and unskilfully replaced, so white and leaden-like they hung.

"You've come from my daughter," was the woman's greeting to Rhisiart. "I saw what she was up to! I could almost hear her words. I suppose you're from Sycharth, eh? I wish you would go and tell my Dinas Bran people that I'm ready to go. That was what Teg told you to do, wasn't it? She's always looking after her mother. It's touching, but it's very awkward. You saw how simple she is? She and her Friar are a fair pair. They're shining candles in this naughty world; but you look shrewd enough. Are you one of Owen's scribes? Can you write a good Latin letter? No, no, I'm serious, young man! I must see more of you. I'm in want of just such a — But there they are! Lawnslot! Cystennin! Rhydderch! Well, lads, it's time we set out. They'll think we're murdered as it is. Throw down those bows, my boys. I'll explain to the Constable. Yes! you can keep your other things. I'll explain that to Meredith."

While our traveller was contemplating the strong and athletic appearance of these lads from Dinas Bran, who were evidently like so many others in Wales “serving two masters”, he felt old Griffin give a sudden jerk and make an attempt to swing round. Turning rapidly himself, while the three stalwart young “traitors” gathered close to their mistress’s side, he saw a great war-horse approaching, bearing on his back a most formidable-looking personage, armed in grander and more modern armour than Rhisiart had ever seen, but with no weapon in his hands, and his hands themselves ungauntleted and bare.

This awe-inspiring individual had a weather-beaten, battle-scarred face, piercing grey eyes, an aquiline nose, a grey moustache, and grizzled hair beneath his steel helmet. Though both the man and his horse looked travel-stained and weary, his whole presence breathed an air of proud, habitual and impatient authority.

Everybody present, including Master Simon, the Chirk bowmen and the three lads from Dinas Bran, straightened themselves and uncovered their heads.

Rhisiart pulled Griffin back a little, and took the opportunity, while the horseman turned with a series of angry gestures upon Master Simon, to enquire of the lady who he was.

“Hush; you young fool! He’ll hear you,” she whispered. And then in a tone of bitter sarcasm, “It’s the great man himself. It’s Thomas Fitz-Alan, Earl of Arundel and Surrey, Lord of Oswestry, Chirk-land, Bromfield and Yale! He’s come post-haste from the King. The Scottish war must be over.”

Rhisiart mechanically followed the example of the rest and removed his cap. Then he led Griffin as close as he could to the Lollard’s side. It was a relief to him to observe the calm dignity and unabashed composure of that revolutionary scholar.

But the magnate in armour took no more notice of the two young men than if they’d been pedlars from the market. His whole attention was directed to his unlucky Steward, whom he proceeded to berate unmercifully for the predicament into which his men had fallen.

"I've seen Glendourdy's son," he said, "and he's given me a safe conduct for you idiots to go back whence you came. But look at all these good bows — all lost by this madness. Who told you to take on yourself to burn heretics and rouse the countryside? This is the very thing I've been trying to avoid. I warrant my Lord Grey's hand's in this, the obstinate numskull. This is exactly the kind of thing young Percy was warning us against. It's all wrong, I've told the King over and over again he should follow Percy and not Grey. Grey thinks only of himself and his damned red castle. Well off with you all! Back to Chirk by the nearest road! And don't touch those bows, or I can't do anything for you. If the whole country's not up, it's not your fault. Simon, Simon! I've a great mind, Simon, to tie you up, head and foot, and leave you to our Welsh friends. You've done more harm than you wot of, my little Simon! Oh, I've a mind to leave you. God's holy teeth! I've a mind to leave you to the wolves!"

What struck Rhisiart as so queer, and what made him terribly embarrassed too, was the way the Earl kept turning from Simon and addressing his remarks upon these matters of high state policy to himself and Master Brut. He might have been addressing them to Griffin and the Lollard's mare as far as any recognition of their existence as personalities went; but without acknowledging their presence as separate human entities he evidently required some sort of sounding-board for his quirks and his sallies.

"Oh, it's you again, is it, Mistress Lowri?" and he made a courtly but ironical bow. "How is your gracious mother? I see your daughter has got her Friar safe back. Tired already of our little Constable, eh? Gone back to brave Simon, gentle Simon, faithful Simon, ha?"

This was the first time Rhisiart had heard the woman's name. "Lowri," he repeated to himself in a whisper while he watched her press close to the Earl's saddle and lay her richly-gloved fingers on the trappings of his horse.

"So you've made it up, have you, Mistress, you and Simon? You've got tired of Dinas Bran and our little Denis? Somebody must lend you a mount then, I suppose, if we're to have you back in your old bower in our unworthy domain!" And he cast a hawk's eye upon Griffin and the mare as if their owners had not been present.

The Earl's style of address as he talked to Tegolin's mother was something quite new to Rhisiart's experience. It was an indulgent tone — with an undercurrent of ribaldry — and it was extremely intimate, too. It was such a different thing from the impersonal obliviousness with which he treated our two young men that there was something indecent about it. In fact our friend, who had already taken an extreme dislike to this handsome and shameless lady, decided in his blunt Oxford manner that she was a whore and that the Earl was treating her to a mocking parody of the French Courts of Love.

He came to the conclusion, however, a moment later, though quite likely with gross injustice, that there was an ardent sensual passion behind this mock-chivalric tone. "Oh it's all dying," thought the startled lad, "the high romance of the old days. If this battered, cynical old tyrant were like the Black Prince, how different! He'd at once have spoken to Master Brut and me. Mistress Lowri would have told him how I drew my sword between spearmen and archers; and he would have offered to make me his squire! I wouldn't have accepted; but I'd have liked to tell Tegolin he'd made me the offer."

The Earl was bending down over his saddle now listening to Lowri's whispers.

Master Simon hadn't changed his besotted look of maudlin submission since the woman had first appeared on the scene. Rhisiart concluded that he took for granted that her appearance was his doom, that she had come, like the Erinyes, to hound him to his death, and that there was nothing for him to do but accept the worst and hug it to his heart. Indeed, while Lowri whispered like a she-devil in the Earl's ear, our friend watched Simon with curious interest. He saw him replace his cap on his head and squat down at the foot of the Friar's tree and fold his arms. The fellow seemed to know by instinct that the end of this whispering would be the end of his life. Indeed, he seemed half-dead already.

Rhisiart himself could hear quite enough to gather that the woman was giving the great man lurid and abominable details of Master Simon's behaviour to her.

Every now and then the Earl would interject some indignant and horrified exclamation; such as: "Impossible!" "Did he do that?" "Oh monstrous, monstrous. Such a man pollutes the air! Not that, Mistress? No, no! He couldn't have done that, and to a woman as — oh vile! oh most vile!"

At last she finished her tale and drew away; and she made Rhisiart think of a deadly snake uncoiling itself from a formidable beast it had poisoned.

"Here, you fellows! Come here a minute!" cried Fitz-Alan hoarsely; and all the archers crowded round him. "I'm going straight to Chirk now, my lads, and I want you to come with me. My horse is tired so I shan't leave you in the lurch. But you and you" — and he named the two most brutal-looking of the band— "stay behind and string up this unspeakable devil! Hang him to this very tree where he was going to burn the Friar; and when you've done it come straight after me! Nobody'll touch you if you don't touch them!" He paused, and once more fixing his eye — without seeing them — upon our two friends, “If only,” he muttered, “that fool Grey hadn’t put in his damned voice, and the King had left Percy and me to settle things. It makes me sick to see the King led astray as he is! I’ve told him from the beginning that what we want in all these Islands is simply a wise application of the Conqueror’s Feudal System. Let ’em all do homage to the King — just as I do myself — and remain masters within their own provinces. This Glendourdy of yours — you call him a wizard — but I know a wizardry that would settle him and settle all his sons too, from Griffith to Meredith — simply the old-fashioned Feudal System properly applied, with our Norman Primogeniture in place of this mad splitting-up of estates! But Grey of Ruthin’s a fool. That’s what he is, a damned fool, and, as Solomon says, ‘The Fool will end by begging his bread’!”

Rhisiart found it impossible to lend more than half an ear to this political sermon preached to the air and the darkness through his nonexistent form; but it struck his mind that the man’s only excuse for his inhumanity would be if he really were enamoured of Lowri.

So indignant did he feel at the injustice of the whole thing that he couldn’t resist a murmured protest. “My Lord Earl, may I be allowed — as one who has studied law at the University of Oxford — to inform the prisoner of the charges brought against him?”

“Gorge de Dieu! And who in the wide earth told you to lift up your voice? I don’t know who you are, and I’m in Glendourdy’s power here or I’d soon find out; but this you shall have, young malapert, you shall have the privilege of selling me your horse, to take this lady—” And he actually began fumbling beneath the pommel of his saddle to find Griffin’s price.

But Mistress Lowri came close to him again and whispered something else. Rhisiart presumed she told him she was going back to the Constable of Dinas Bran, and he fancied she may have told him of his cousinship with Owen, for he let the gold-piece drop back into his wallet, gave her a stiff but courteous obeisance, and gathered up his reins.

"Is that your old confessor, Father Rheinalt, over there talking to the Friar?"

"Yes, my Lord. He's praying with him."

"Well! let him stop praying with him and come and pray with your Simon! He prayed too long with one person I know, once upon a time; till that person grew too heavy to go to confession....Well, well, I mustn't tease you, my pretty; but I should have thought it would exactly suit your particular kind of humour to have your Rheinalt absolve your Simon. However! Do as you like!"

He turned to the two archers. "Oh you've found a rope, have you? Very good! Now remember I shall ask you to tell me how Simon died. Gorge de Dieu! There goes the Abbot; and I must have a word with him. Tell all your Welsh friends, you lovely one, that I hanged my steward to make them bread. Au revoir!" And he rode off in pursuit of the monks of Caerleon.

"Gently, Measter! Coom, Measter!" cried one of the two archers, approaching Simon as if he were a tethered beast. He was a Wessex man, and Rhisiart, even at that horrible moment, couldn't help noticing how queer his English sounded. "Out o' the way wi'ee! Us must heave up rope to hang'ee, Measter, to thik wold tree!"

The wretched Steward struggled with difficulty to his feet and cast a confused look round him. Rhisiart fancied that there came a kind of comfort into his face when he saw that the Lollard was still there.

But the other archer — a great hulking South-Saxon from Lewes — began roughly and clumsily putting the rope about the man's throat.

"Stop! I won't stand by and see this iniquity done!" Rhisiart had no time on this occasion to get his crusader's sword into action, but he snatched his dagger out of his belt and in the darkness this looked dangerous enough.

The Sussex man drew back, but the Wessex man caught the boy, dagger and all, round the waist, and pinned both his arms against his sides.

At that point the Lollard sprang forward; and without drawing his sword delivered such a shrewd blow with his fist at the Sussex man's head that it sent him reeling.

"Cystennin! Rhydderch!" cried Lowri in a voice of hysterical fury. "Oh, and there's Lawnslot, too!" she added with hideous exultation. "Come lads, every one of ye! Help to swing him up, or I'll tell your master you failed me."

The three Welshmen came forward, and the noose was soon round the unhappy man's neck.

"Catch hold of the other one, lads, priest or no priest." And the Lollard, whose religious exhortations had misled her as to his quality, was seized and secured in the same manner as Rhisiart.

"One minute!" she cried; and the two young men, struggling helplessly against the powerful arms that held them, saw her approach the extemporized gibbet and begin whispering to the man and even caressing with her fingers the rope round his neck.

"Help! Help!" shouted Rhisiart, while Griffin, to the mare's astonishment, uttered a shrill whinny.

The hanging of the Hog of Chirk now seemed only to await the moment when the woman should choose to stand out of the way. Rhisiart peered desperately through the darkness to catch sight of Tegolin; but she had gone, and the Scab and his spearmen were gone, and monks and the market-people were all gone.

Save for a couple of repulsive looking old women who had come like vultures to the scene, the mound was completely deserted. Nothing remained but the dung-cart, the faggots, the heap of long-bows and the dead tree converted into a gallows.

“One minute!” cried Lowri again; and this time she came so close to Master Simon that their figures, to Rhisiart’s disturbed vision, mingled together. Her words seemed to burn the darkness into smouldering holes

Rhisiart struggled desperately in the arms that held him. “It’s murder! It’s damnable murder!” he cried; and his heart felt as if it would burst under his ribs.

“Jesus forgive you! Jesus receive you!” prayed the Lollard hoarsely.

“Mine’ll be the last face you’ll see, Simon,” she whispered. “The last voice you’ll hear! Hell is deep, but you’ll know I’m thinking of you. You’ll know—”

“Off with you, every one of you!” It was as if his voice came out of the dark substance of the mound itself, but he must have come round it in the darkness. “Off with you!” he repeated, addressing the two bowmen, “and tell your Lord to hang his servants within his own walls. Tell him that my father — do you hear? — that my father makes himself responsible for this man. And now, Mistress,” and he turned to the woman, “I hope you’re satisfied. The man’s half-dead with the fright you’ve given him. I don’t really know” — this he said very much slower and emphatically, and Rhisiart was delighted to see the woman wince— “I don’t really know what my father will decide about you.” Then he turned to the Dinas Bran Welshmen. “Take your mistress back to the Constable,” he said, “and tell him from Meredith ab Owen that he’d better hear Mass tomorrow at Valle Crucis. Don’t forget, you three! Have you got that? Very good. Well, off with you, Mistress! My father will keep his eye on your girl and on her Friar. Remember me to the Constable. And if I were you, I’d keep to the direct highway!”

Rhisiart cursed the darkness that had fallen now, thickened by mists rising from the river; for he was obsessed by an almost sensual desire to see her face in its defeat and for her to know he was seeing it. But this unholy wish was totally denied him; for the lady said not a word to anyone, looked at nobody, gathered up the skirts of her green embroidered gown, laid her hand on the arm of the tallest of her three Welsh servants, and hurried away in the direction taken by the monks.

Rhisiart and the Lollard were left alone with Master Simon and his rescuer. The first thing Meredith did was to sigh such a world-weary sigh that it came near to being a groan. Then he moved towards our friend and began caressing Griffin.

“We couldn’t get our sword out to time, eh?” he murmured; and Rhisiart was so close to him that he caught upon that disillusioned young face one of the strangest smiles he had ever seen. It was a smile that flickered, wavered, faded and vanished, like a candle-flame falling for a moment on a ghostly portrait.

“I didn’t like — I didn’t dare — till I knew—” stammered our pilgrim in shame and embarrassment.

“Do you know now?” returned the other, while they heard the Lollard’s voice muttering some religious exhortation as he bent over the prostrate Steward.

“I know nothing. I’ve seen too much today. But by degrees — do you think, Arglwydd” — he had the wit to use the Welsh word, though they both were speaking in English— “that your father could find some employment for me about his person? I know a little Latin and French, and a good deal of law. And I’d like to be — I’d like to be where you are — and I’d like to serve—”

It may be seen from these impulsive words how much the events of that day had affected our traveller's feelings. In place of any "Princess Myfanwy" he was now compelled to link the mystical fortress of his desire with this Medusa-like mother of Tegolin; and in place of a rich, idle, selfish "Glendourdy" he now visualized as the background of all that was going on in these regions an unapproachable, mysterious figure whose power seemed palpable at every turn but whose personality remained evasive and obscure.

"He wouldn't like me to say too much now," returned the young man gently. "But I do think he might find a use for you. Anyway I know my mother would like to see you. So come to Glyndyfrdwy tomorrow — not too early — somewhere about four o'clock, let's say, if that'll suit you. Have you anywhere to sleep to-night? The Abbey guesthouse will be full; and I wouldn't try the Tassel if I were you."

"I have a place," murmured Rhisiart, thankful enough that the darkness hid the way his cheeks burned. "But may I—" he paused while they both listened to the Lollard's murmurings over the man on the ground. "May I beg you" — and he lowered his voice to a whisper— "if you're really going to take this unfortunate man with you, to let my fellow-traveller, Master Brut, go too? He hasn't anywhere to sleep to night, and his horse'll be a help to you in carrying this fellow."

"You know something else, it seems," returned the young chief, "beyond Latin and French! You know our Welsh tongue uncommonly well, and you speak it with the true Powys Fadog accent. Your teacher must have come from these parts. I'm going to sleep with my foster-parent tonight, who is a swine-herd half-way to Wyddgrug, and I'll leave our prisoner there till my father decides what's to be done with him. Your friend must please himself of course." He politely lowered his voice to a whisper. "Brut, did you say his name was? Why, that's as though we said 'Master Divination'. He acts like a priest but I can see he's a gwr bonheddig, and I expect—" He stopped suddenly, for he didn't miss the droop of Rhisiart's whole body and that it had become an effort to the boy the moment he leant against Griffin to keep his eyelids from closing.

"But you're dead-tired, lad. Up with you! I'll explain everything to your friend; and I'll let him finish his prayers. I'll tell him he can find you at Glyndyfrdwy. Here's a hand now. Up with you! That's the way! And listen, comrade" — Rhisiart bent low over Griffin's neck— "the next time you draw that sword of yours, it mayn't be to separate Welsh and English! God 'ild you."

Though the darkness grew perceptibly more dense as the old piebald cantered down the slope towards the river, carrying a rider whose eyelids soon ceased to droop as he rode, neither horse nor man made any question about the way.

Griffin must have tasted in advance the delicious refreshment, composed of all that the heart of an old horse could most desire, that the practical Tegolin had obtained for him, along with a heavenly bed of clean straw.

Not less sweet, indeed much sweeter, was the soft hay upon which the young man stretched his limbs in the farm's most retired cow-shed. By his side, under his own sheepskin — which indeed proved somewhat too hot for that June night — lay Tegolin in her white smock; while in another part of the shed the Friar slept his deep untroubled holy man's sleep, with his back against the back of a sleeping heifer.

Between himself and this girl — the first feminine being by whose side he had lain since his infancy — was nothing but her linen shift and his own woollen shirt; but they were both so tired out that though his left arm was beneath her head and his right above her breast, their dipping and kissing soon ended in a deep and almost simultaneous sleep.

A maid she lay down, and a maid she rose up; and neither of them flickered an eyelid when, in the first light of dawn, the Grey Friar stood over them before repeating, to the murmur of the river and the breathing of the cattle, his morning office.

All through that short summer darkness he too had slept an untroubled sleep; and when he awoke to whisper his psalms and to extinguish the smouldering wick in the lantern above his head, it seemed to his crazed wits as if the lost King whose return he confused with everything in life that is and yet is not, and with everything in death that is not and yet that is, were present with them in that shed. He mingled King Richard with the sound of the river, with the scent of the hay, with the awakening of the swallows, with the cool dawn airs that stole into their shelter like the fore-runners of an exultant host, but above all with those youthful heads lying side by side! The Maid was his, and this young soldier of his King was the Maid's, and therefore his too; and the great John Baptist whose day was dawning was carrying them all three forward, forward where the river was flowing, forward where the mists were lifting, forward into a new Valle Crucis, a new Wales, where there were no burnings and no Bolingbrokes, no hearts that would not heal, no loves that could not be satisfied!

IV. HAND IN HAND

Neither brother Huw nor Tegolin, when it came to the point, showed much desire to visit the monastery on a crowded feast-day, and since the lad himself was anxious to enjoy their society as long as possible, it was decided that they should all three seek, for the next night at any rate, the hospitality of his formidable kinsman at Glyndyfrdwy.

Tegolin, however, with a woman's feeling for what was meet and right on such a day, persuaded her two companions — for the halfwitted Friar seemed as forgetful as Rhisiart about ordinary religious observances — to pause for early Mass at the little church of St Collen, which lay directly in their path. They found only children and a few very aged men and women entering this small edifice; for it seemed as if the whole countryside was tricking itself out in gala attire to attend the High Mass at Valle Crucis.

There was an atmosphere of undisturbed peace brooding over the small churchyard as they led Griffin up the path to the door; and Tegolin was soon pretending to be gravely absorbed in helping Rhisiart to tether the old horse where it could best enjoy the uncut grass. The Hereford boy was in a state of exuberant high spirits, and he began at once, in his blundering youthful way, teasing her about the manner in which, with a view to baring her head without betraying her sex, she had squeezed her twisted braid of red hair under the collar of her tunic.

His infatuation grew moment by moment; but the thrill of being attracted to a feminine creature was so new to him that he had no idea how to steer his emotion into the channel where it would give him the greatest pleasure.

And indeed, if the truth must be told, he had even less of an idea how to steer it so as to give the object of it the corresponding pleasure.

Thus there arose all manner of trifling but disconcerting awkwardnesses between the Friar's young companions. Such sensual feelings as the boy had kept showing themselves in clumsy, indirect ways. They were so fresh to his experience that he lacked the power of focussing them on the particular differences between a boy and a girl where they would be provocative of delight to both.

All he seemed able naturally and spontaneously to do was to tease her, and to tease her in that particular way that young girls especially dislike because it makes them feel as if they'd become children again.

But Rhisiart was no fool; and when he found that such things as making fun of her red hair and of her blunders when she tried to speak English only brought a flush to her cheeks and a quiver to her lips, while at the same time they produced a discord in his own feelings, he cast about in the depths of his consciousness for the cause of this atmospheric disturbance.

What troubled him was that there seemed such a queer gulf between the delicious thrill that the idea of being in love with a real, actual girl gave him as it diffused itself through everything, and these blundering attempts he kept making to establish a humorous brother-and-sister rapport between them.

Luckily for him, the romantic part of Tegolin's nature was so absorbed in the service of the Friar that she could afford to treat these boyish lapses — all except those that had to do with her braid and her broken English — with a detached maternal indulgence; and she had enough subtlety to surmise that it was because his sensual feelings were all disturbed and bewildered, and because he had not discovered his destined way of love, that he behaved as he did.

But it was all different from last night. Last night it had been so sweet and natural when they lay in each others' arms, overcome by exhaustion. What Tegolin didn't realize was that it was just this innocent sleeping together that had destroyed her strangeness to him without initiating him in the art of love. He wanted to assert himself with her but he didn't know how to do it.

He wanted to touch her, to ruffle her, to disturb her, just as a boy wants to do something — he knows not what — to a bird or a butterfly whose beauty troubles him.

All this ridiculous teasing sprang from the exciting trouble into which she threw him; but had it not been that so much of her nature was already absorbed in her devotion to the Friar, it is likely enough that the difference between what he had been last night and what he was now would have made her seriously unhappy.

Rhisiart indeed, though it would have given him small pleasure to know it, had been placed by fate in an especially favoured position for the enjoyment of Tegolin's identity just because he was not the object of her ideal romance; nor was he without some dim inkling of this when he began to notice certain arbitrary injustices and even cruelties into which her romantic love betrayed her where Brother Huw was concerned.

They had hardly got clear of the environs of the Tassel, and they took care to make a wide circuit to avoid meeting any of the Lord of Nannau's followers, when the Brother began to grow uneasy in his conscience about their decision to avoid Valle Crucis.

Rhisiart, who had at last got her to mount his old horse and was watching with intense delight the engaging curves of her limbs as her body clung in womanly fashion to Griffin's mottled back, was shocked when, instead of humouring the Friar by piling up every sort of reason against this visit, she insisted on dragging out of the poor wretch the tragic and touching weakness of the flesh which was the real secret cause, as she knew well, of his dislike of going near the place.

"Why on earth can't she," thought Rhisiart, "leave this human frailty in her hero alone? Why must she compel him to confess it and acknowledge it? How does she dare to risk arousing in him just the sort of righteous obstinacy that might well ruin us all?"

But now that she was off Griffin's back and all flushed and flurried about this business of going bare-headed into the church, what must Rhisiart do but, forgetting his recent resolution to stop these boyish impulses, begin teasing her again — this time about her page's dagger, an ornament which, according to what she evidently considered the latest fashion, though even in Hereford it had long been given up, she had ostentatiously suspended at the point where her tunic covered her hip. At this she came near to really losing her temper; and giving him a reproachful look she turned indignantly away.

At his wit's end to appease her — for he saw that this was the worst of his blunders — he began a confused apology, when she suddenly softened of her own accord and, touching his elbow, signed to him to note the conduct of their companion. She did this with a smile of such intimacy and an air that linked them so closely in tender amusement at Mad Huw's peculiarities that the boy was astonished.

Indeed he was so absorbed in this novel privilege of being allowed to be one with her in her protectiveness towards Mad Huw that he could only take in very cursorily what it was that she found so touching in the Friar's present proceedings. What she gave him was the look that one girl might give another in the presence of an eccentric man they were both in love with, and if our friend’s response was half-hearted to this it was because he found bitterness in it as well as sweetness.

All that Mad Huw was doing, as far as Rhisiart could see, was interfering not very effectively between an aggressive little boy — hardly more than an infant — and a flock of geese.

It had evidently fallen to the child to look after these creatures in the absence of their proper guardian; who was no doubt at that moment putting on her gala-dress before the family mirror in view of the Feast of Saint John.

The child was a mere baby, but of extraordinary sturdiness and resolution. Nature had not only given him the legs of a giant but also the countenance of a dictator. But Nature had also bestowed on his enemies, the geese, the power of exciting awe; so that what Mad Huw had taken upon himself to meddle with was a war between two irrational thunder-storms, neither of which was able to use lightning,

The child was evidently swayed by the opposite emotions of aggression and panic; and so were the geese. And these emotions came and went in periodic alternation. The infant was armed with the lid of an iron pot and with the leg of a milking-stool. The geese had their voices and their elongated necks. The child stamped at the geese. The geese hissed at the child. Sometimes panic seized the one side and sometimes the other. When the signal “advance!” was sounded at what might be called “headquarters” in the child’s head, he would strike the iron against the wood and rush to the attack; whereas when nature gave the signal “retreat”, it was in the blind confusion of his flight that these objects jangled together.

“Retreat” had been the order of the day when Brother Huw intervened; and the geese had followed in their thin line of battle so hard on the track of the little boy that he was fain to cling to the Friar's habit and hide his face behind it.

The Friar's countenance, as he faced these outstretched loud-screeching necks, was like that of a boy of seven who is protecting a boy of six. He made them debouch in the direction of the river; but they didn't scatter, nor did they draw in their necks. Their instinct told them that these substitutes for the goose-girl who was before her mirror were of negligible authority.

"What's your name, little one?" asked the Friar gravely. "Caswallon," the child replied without emerging from his refuge; and it was impossible to tell at that moment whether it was by accident or by intention that the spear and shield clashed together behind the Brother's back.

"What are you doing, Caswallon?"

"Driving the Saxons!"

"Who is your general, Caswallon?"

"Me," said the child, peeping out at the screaming geese.

"Who is your king, Caswallon?"

"Me," confessed the infant, emerging into the open. "Who is your abbot, Caswallon?" "Me," admitted the little boy.

The Friar bent down. "Do you know who's coming back?" he whispered.

But "advance" must have sounded just then so loudly in that crowded tent of king, abbot and general that there was no time for other thoughts. With a terrific beating of wood upon iron the geese were now triumphantly driven, flapping and screaming, out of the churchyard.

The combatants had hardly disappeared when the old parish-priest emerged from a wooden hut nearby, a hut that looked as if Saint Collen might well have built it with his own hands. He passed close by our three friends on his way to the sanctuary, and glanced at them in some surprise, giving them each a quick searching look; then muttering a hasty blessing in reply to their salutation, he hurried into the building.

They were all three a trifle upset as they followed him, for Rhisiart unthinkingly must needs tell Tegolin that a wisp of hair was still visible; and the Friar received a sharp word from the Maid because of the reluctance he showed to leave the free sunshine.

But when once the Mass began all these troubles ceased. Indeed our friend had never been moved so much by the magic of the supreme mystery of his faith as he was that Midsummer Day, kneeling there between the two wanderers. The sky above them indeed was but a neutral sky. It was neither over-clouded nor was it clear. But it was one of those days when a delicate film of faint mist, floating in diaphanous diffusion between earth and heaven, seems to bring these divided regions close together, while at the same time it endows them both with a curious element of unreality.

The voices of the parish-priest and his solitary server seemed to merge, as they intoned, into the quiet breath of the whole umbrageous valley, while the scent of the hayfields, which flowed in through the open door behind them, mingled as pleasantly with the smoke of the censer as the diffused sunlight filtering down upon that small grey building through a motionless filigree of leafy twigs itself mingled with the pallid light of the altar candles.

Brother Huw had behaved reverently, but he had soon grown rather restless; and it was a relief to Rhisiart when Tegolin allowed them to rejoin their horse and pursue their way. The girl had possessed herself of several St John’s-cakes and a pat of fresh butter at the farm; and as soon as they got well out of sight of the small wooden homesteads scattered about St. Collen’s Church, they began to look round for some suitable spot where they might break their fast.

Rhisiart had had considerable difficulty in persuading the Friar’s Maid to make use of Griffin. Indeed, most of the way from the Tassel farm to Llan-Collen, they had all walked by the horse’s side.

But the Mass had sobered them all, and as they moved slowly along, following the river up-stream, Tegolin sat silent and pensive on the horse’s back. They found a spot at last exactly suited to their purpose, and letting Griffin wander as he pleased, they seated themselves on a dead ash-tree by the edge of a small brook. It was a spot eminently suited to all that Rhisiart was feeling. The little stream made a faint tinkling as it descended into the river. Its banks were covered with ferns and moss; and the St John’s-cakes and the fresh butter tasted more delicious than any repast he could remember.

“Have you ever seen my cousin, the Lord of Glyndyfrdwy?” he enquired of Tegolin. “I’ve always thought of him as a time-serving grey-beard who spends his days tagging bardic rhymes, like that chattering Derfel-idiot, not as a person who’d take any real risk for Wales and her people.”

Tegolin smiled. “You’ve got him wrong, Gwion Bach; though I’ve no doubt that’s exactly what he intends you English should think of him. No, I’ve never seen him. Have you ever seen him, Brother Huw?”

“Seen whom, my daughter?”

“Owen Glyn Dŵr.”

The Friar nodded. “I saw him at Flint when the King was taken. The King looked at him. I can see his eyes now, my daughter. And I saw the look Glyn Dŵr gave him in return. It was a strange look. It wasn’t the look of a Judas; and yet it wasn’t a pitying look. But I think the King got comfort from it.” The Friar paused and muttered something to himself. Then he went on. “I saw him turn and follow him with his eyes as he rode away. And I saw the King fall into a muse, so that he seemed scarcely to notice the evil tongues about him. The man must have said something with that look. But it was a strange look."

"What was it like, Brother Huw?"

The Friar took a sip from the little silver cup the girl passed to him, and handed it on to Rhisiart.

"I've often asked myself that very question, child," he murmured, letting his own gaze wander up the course of the little stream, "and I've told myself sometimes that it was the sort of look that a traveller in Jerusalem might have given Him when they were leading Him to Golgotha. A traveller — a traveller—"

Rhisiart and the girl exchanged glances.

"A traveller," repeated the Friar.

"Did he seem — I mean did he seem to you — old?" asked Rhisiart eagerly. "Was his hair grey when you saw him?"

The Friar's sensitive countenance took on such a stricken expression that the boy added hurriedly, "I know you can't catch a very good likeness from a distance — so don't trouble yourself. I expect you can't bear to think of what happened then. It was only that I wanted to find out something — about my kinsman — before the moment of meeting him. He seems to be extremely difficult to meet. The Scab told me he was much more genial and much easier to get on with before they crowned the new King."

Tegolin was balancing herself now on a portion of the fallen tree a little higher than her companions. She was unceremoniously licking the butter from her fingers and in the process making a little whistling sound.

Rhisiart, who after the experience of the last twelve hours felt that feminine psychology held few secrets for him, said to himself, "She's thinking how nice it is to be a beautiful girl and to be with two men on Saint John's Day."

But Tegolin soon sacrificed these agreeable thoughts to a confession of curiosity; and she begged Rhisiart to tell them about his friend the Lollard.

At the word “Lollard” the large dark eyes of the Friar narrowed ominously, and a cold hostile film came over them. As Rhisiart watched him he realized that the enlightenment he had received about women hadn’t extended to madmen. To this heroic fanatic — himself in mortal terror of all ecclesiastical restraint — the word “Lollard’ was like the word “sodomy”.

“What on earth,” thought our philosophical youth, “is going on now in this fellow’s brain?” And then as he tried to recall what his own vague feeling had been about Lollards before he met Master Brut, he couldn’t conceal from himself that obscene images of ravished nuns and violated virgins, of monstrous outrages upon consecrated wafers, of goats dressed up as apostles and the rumps of apes substituted for holy relics, had inevitably flitted across his mind.

But Tegolin — and this only confirmed certain conclusions he had come to about his mother and Modry — seemed able to speak of “Lollard” quite easily without a thought of bestiality or the Black Mass. Quite calmly she now proceeded to enlarge upon her question, though our friend was convinced she saw — as how could she not? — that forbidding expression on her hero’s face.

“Didn’t you like him, Gwion Bach? You told me he was a Lollard, and then you stopped! I thought he had a lovely face as he talked to the Hog; and how straight he sat on that beautiful-coloured horse!”

It was our friend’s turn now to look less than noble. “Have you ever confessed a Lollard, Brother?” he enquired.

The monk shook his head. “But our Prior,” he remarked after a pause, while his lustrous eyes transformed themselves into the glazed windows of a condemned cell, “our Prior told one of the lay-brothers that he once had to fast for three days after hearing a Lollard's confession — just to conquer the evil thoughts it aroused in him."

"Have you ever seen a Lollard burnt, Brother?" asked Rhisiart viciously.

But Tegolin intervened at this with a quick girlish gesture. "Don't, Gwion Bach! No, Brother Huw, I won't let you tell him. You ought to be ashamed of feeling like that, and you so nearly burnt yourself! Blessed Virgin! Can't you leave these wickednesses to King Harry?"

A curious puzzled look came into the Grey Friar's face, and he fixed his eyes on a great clump of pink campions, near which Griffin was searching for some more dainty growth. That he should be caught sharing any opinion with Richard's enemy was appalling to him; but his gorge rose in equal disgust at the abominations he had come to link with the word "Lollardry".

Tegolin snatched off her page's cap, and began leisurely unplaiting her red braid. But suddenly a troubled look came into her face, and her eyes darkened. She glanced nervously at Rhisiart and asked him whether the Bard of Ffinnant was also on his way to Glyn Dŵr's place.

"God! I hope not!" laughed the boy. "But is he really a Bard? Is he really the son of a nun? He's a comical kind of Merlin if he is!"

His words had a surprising effect upon the girl. She jumped down from her perch, her loosened hair flowing over her shoulders, and stood erect in front of him, her hands behind her head. Her position threw her youthful breasts into prominence under her boy's tunic and added height and dignity to her figure, but her eyes were flashing.

"Why did you say that?" she asked in a low intense voice. But before Rhisiart could reply the Friar hurriedly intervened.

"Don't'ee mind him, child. Don't'ee mind him. He doesn't know what he says. He speaks like a Saxon."

But the girl was seriously upset. In his bewilderment and remorse as he stared with open mouth at her white face and mass of blood-coloured hair she made him think of a Salome in a church window.

"I only said," he stammered, "that if the Scab was the son of a nun he wasn't much like Merlin."

His words brought Mad Huw to his feet, and both the Maid and the Friar stood looking down at him as if the ground had suddenly opened between him and them.

Rhisiart began to feel really troubled. What on earth had upset them so? "But he's such a conceited fool," he stammered uneasily, making a sorry pretence at a laugh. What the devil was the matter now? Into what new blunder had he fallen?

"There are three names, my son," said the Friar sternly — and Rhisiart, even in the midst of his confusion, noticed with interest that while the man spoke he kept his expressive eyes tight shut, a proceeding which gave to his hollow cheeks and the quiet outlines of his face the look of an image carved on a tomb— "there are three names which we of North Wales never allow ourselves to utter lightly: the name of Our Lady, the name of Derfel, and the name of—"

"Hush, Brother!" interrupted Tegolin, actually clapping her fingers in her nervous excitement over the man's mouth. "Don't say any more to him! I should have thought a gentleman like him would show better taste! But it's ignorance, of course. You have to be born and bred a Welshman to understand these things, and perhaps you don't know, though someone must have told you by now, that I'm myself the unlawful — there's no — no! there's no reason why I shouldn't tell him, Brother! — the unlawful child of that Father you saw yesterday — the one who covered his head when David the Squint put his arms round Mother — the one Simon was so afraid of. So you see when you poked fun at Y Crach just now for having a nun for his mother it made me feel — it gave the same shock — as if you were teasing me about Father Rheinalt."

She took a long breath, dropped her hands, and stared frowningly, just as the Friar had done a little while ago, at the wealth of pink campions beside which Griffin was feeding.

But the Friar came up close to her and, drawing her head towards him so that all its torrent of hair fell over his sleeve, began whispering in her ear.

Rhisiart could see her face as she listened, and he was struck by its abandonment against Mad Huw's shoulder and by the way her fingers plucked at the cord round his waist. She made a gesture of assent at last, and then with a gentler look than she had given our friend for some while, she came, and the monk came with her, a step or two nearer. They both made this step — or so the boy in his bewilderment fancied — as if he'd been something under an evil spell.

"Gwion Bach," she said slowly and earnestly, "the Brother thinks, and I think too, that you ought to know before you see your cousin that we're on the verge of great events. Our Lord Owen has just called all the bards and all the leading men round here to come to his house at Glyndyfrdwy for some secret purpose. Brother Huw believes — and I've never known him wrong in things like this — that Owen intends to defy this cruel King, to throw off — what do you call it in English? — his allegiance, and raise the flag of — No, stop, Gwion Bach!" — these words were in answer to the excited cry with which Rhisiart leapt to his feet— "for there's more to—"

She paused, bent her head, and began toying uneasily with the embroidery sheath of her page's dagger. "The truth is the Brother doesn't like all he's heard about what your cousin's doing. The Brother hoped he would tell them of King Richard's return and gather the cantrefs together in his name. Instead of this he's using these Derfel prophets to stir up the people. You English don't understand these things; but in these parts Derfel's held to be more than a saint. Many people think he wasn't a saint at all, but something else — something beyond what is—"

She dropped her dagger and let it swing against her side again. Then she moved still nearer to him, laying her hand on his belt. "We girls," she whispered, "girls like me at any rate, are always being warned by the priests to have nothing to do with these Derfel men. They tell us" — she lowered her voice to a whisper— "that there have been cases when — when children have been born — whose mothers — girls like me — have cried out in their pains — that it was Derfel's! So now you see, Gwion Bach" — and she raised her voice again and glanced proudly at the Friar with the air of a pupil who has said her lesson correctly— "why we wish our Lord Owen would put more trust in the Friars, who are all friends of King Richard, than in heathen Bards like the Scab. Of course I know the way the Scab boasts, and what a fool he is, and what a drunkard and coward he is, and all the rest — but you know, Gwion Bach" — here her voice became almost inaudible — "very cunning and wicked people can wear a mask like that, and it isn't only Brother Huw who's told me of girls taken by Derfel. You won't find a maid in all Edeyrnion who doesn't beg her lover to marry her quick, and all for fear of Derfel. It's maids in love they say he visits, not the others. He always knows when a girl's in love because his Horse begins neighing when he rides round the house. It's when the wind's in the west and rain's coming that he rides; and when a girl hears Derfel's Horse she knows she's found out."

Rhisiart's countenance, while he was listening to these surprising matters, was a picture, but Brother Huw; when his King was in his thoughts, became oblivious to what went on in the minds of others, while Griffin, who might have been disturbed if his head had been directed towards his young master, had wandered off between the pink campions and the bracken.

Our friend had attended lectures on Aristotle at Oxford, and had even been led, by one of the magnates at his own Exeter College, who was of a bold and sceptical turn of mind, to an investigation of the arguments against occult superstitions in Cicero's De Divinatione. And so, while his senses were stirred to their depths by the girl's words and the nearness of her soft body to his own, and while only the Friar's presence prevented him from hugging her to his heart and swearing that he would guard her from a thousand Scabs and a thousand Derfels, he felt it was only just to himself and to his University to bring the light of a little modern rationalism to bear on this ticklish subject.

"I have given much time," he began gravely, "to the study of Incubi and Succubi; and though many authorities hold the view that they are descendants of Lilith, the writers most to be trusted argue with convincing force that they are a creation sui generis and are only to be feared when—"

Though these bold words brought Mad Huw several steps nearer to Tegolin's side, and caused a shiver to pass through his frame and his beautiful wild-deer eyes to peer nervously among the thickets around them, Rhisiart felt that it would be childish not to put at his friends' disposal the results of his scientific research. "Only to be feared," he went on in a high-pitched rapid tone, for he was fearful lest his mind should suddenly become a complete blank, "when the normal animal spirits have been debilitated. Master Morris Stove — a learned Welshman with whom I lodged — told me he had studied the works of eleven Doctors of Divinity on this point and not one of them but demanded in such cases the word of more witnesses than the victim's; that is to say, of the woman visited by the Incubus or of the man visited by the Succubus. Master Morris Stove assured me, as the result of his studies, that if the girl visited by the Incubus could prove that it was impossible at the time referred to and according to the reasonable sequences and progressions of nature, for any masculine being other than a supernatural one to have had access to—"

But his discourse was interrupted, not by the Friar, for he was too agitated to speak, but by the approach of Griffin, who with the armour and the sword jangling on his back came hurriedly trotting up and incontinently thrust his heavily-breathing nose into his master's bosom.

To the unphilosophical mind of Tegolin there was something comical about this interruption of what promised to be a topic of more legality than liveliness; and she gave vent to a little laugh. Our friend tried not to feel hurt by this, and all would have been well if the Friar, thrust unceremoniously backward by the horse's bony flanks, hadn't nearly fallen.

Now Mad Huw had been compelled ever since he escaped from the hands of the Hog of Chirk to struggle with the demon of jealousy. With the help of his Guardian Angel, for we may believe that to madmen as well as to children are such special protectors granted, he had until now restrained his feelings.

But although as a saint it had been possible to repeat his psalms while the outward form of Tegolin lay by his rival's side, it was as a man impossible to bear a jostling from the rump of this rival's horse. Giving way therefore to his long-suppressed feelings, when the mottled rear of this young rationalist's steed thrust itself between him and his Maid, he snatched at the nearest weapon that presented itself to his hand, which was nothing less than the great sheathed sword lying across the offending back, and with the heavy handle of the old weapon struck the animal several violent and vicious blows.

A dangerous flash shot for a second out of Rhisiart's eyes; but Griffin only swished his tail and blinked, while Tegolin rushing to the Friar's side pulled him quickly away.

"They didn't mean it!" she cried in her penetrating voice. "They didn't mean it!" and many a time long afterwards Rhisiart remembered those words. They seemed to him like an appeal from the heart of the whole round earth against the blind folly of men's childish quarrels.

What exactly Tegolin had implied in them the lad never knew. Did they include all three of the girl's masculine companions or only himself and the horse? At any rate he felt ashamed of his momentary fury and thanked Heaven it had done no harm. Removing his cap he advanced humbly to the offended man and began with a charming earnestness making excuses for Griffin's clumsy movement. "In fact he thought I was reciting a lesson," he concluded, "and perhaps," and this he added with a smile that would have disarmed a harder heart than the Friar's, "perhaps I was! For indeed this question of children born without human fathers is one about which Master Morris Stove and I have had long disputations. Master Stove made it the subject of one of his official theses when he was studying for his Doctor's —"

"Hush!" interrupted Tegolin, pushing back her hair and listening intently. "I thought I heard something."

It appeared that Griffin heard something too, for he swung round and raised his head. They all instinctively moved nearer to each other and then stood transfixed, staring nervously down the path up which they had come. Presently Rhisiart, noting his horse's quivering nostrils and erect ears, began making the warlike preparations, such as loosening his great sword in its sheath and adjusting more conveniently the dagger in his belt, that a lad brought up as he had been upon tales of less civilized epochs would naturally make when he found himself the sole protector of a woman and a priest.

"They're not riders, whoever they are!" whispered Tegolin at last, "and I don't think they're armed either. Listen! Do you hear?" — and she drew a deep sigh of relief— "I'm sure they're bare-footed!"

They all listened; and even to Rhisiart's city-bred ears it seemed as if the low murmur of the human voices that he now could hear approaching were unaccompanied by any footfalls at all! It seemed to him as if they were being approached by the ghosts of voices travelling along a familiar path.

"They're only herdsmen from the mountains," whispered the girl, "coming back from Saint John's Mass."

But Mad Huw shook his head, or rather to be exact, he nodded his head like a person who congratulates himself upon his own secret perspicuity. "Those men are religious men," he said. "Those tones are the tones of religious men debating a fine point of doctrine."

"Impossible!" replied the girl. "Your ears mislead you, Brother. No religious men could possibly be walking away from Valle Crucis at this hour. No, no! Don't be so absurd, Brother Huw. You know yourself it can't be what you say. Those are neat-herds or swine-herds coming back from Mass."

A flickering smile crossed the Friar's face at this positive declaration from his young disciple. But as the murmur of voices drew nearer he began to show signs of alarm.

"Don't give me up to them, young gentleman!" he whispered anxiously. "I'm sorry I hit your horse. They want to shut me up in Valle Crucis. That's what they've come for — to shut me up!" He paused with his hand on Rhisiart's belt, while his great, beautiful hunted-deer's eyes fixed themselves beseechingly on the lad's face.

"Of course he won't give you up!" cried Tegolin. "Not one of them shall touch you. Gwion Bach! let him get up on Griffin! That'll give him faith in you — more than anything else."

Our friend obeyed her without hesitation; and bending his knee to serve as a stirrup-stone he helped the Friar, who had never mounted a horse in his life, to seat himself somehow on Griffin's broad back.

The old piebald turned his head with a peculiarly human gesture, as if to investigate the temper of this new burden; but he was evidently satisfied by what he saw and made up his mind to forget those unfortunate blows.

Thus, with the Friar in the saddle, Tegolin holding the bridle, and Rhisiart with a shining dagger-blade clutched in his hand, our three friends and their sagacious companion awaited the arrival of the strangers. Yes, Mad Huw was right. It was unmistakably the figures of two Cistercians that were now advancing towards them.

Their own appearance on the summit of that small eminence was evidently no surprise to the two monks. Either they had heard of their movements as they came through Llan-Collen, or they had been to the Tassel-farm to make enquiries. All they did as they came forward was merely to cease their animated discussion, exchange a quick word or two, and accelerate their pace.

"It's Father Rheinalt!" cried Tegolin in high excitement, and without a thought of the others she ran eagerly down the slope to meet the two monks.

Rhisiart hurriedly replaced his dagger in his belt, and rather shamefacedly began concealing his big sword under the edge of the sheepskin.

"Don't let them—" whispered Huw in his ear, and then, with an evident moral effort, the poor madman straightened himself on the back of the piebald; and though Rhisiart could feel he was trembling — a weakness that all Simon’s piled-up faggots had been unable to produce — he began proclaiming to the newcomers, just as if they had been a procession instead of a couple of pedestrians, that King Richard was still alive.

So loud and resonant was this challenge that Rhisiart, though he was all ears to catch what his red-haired Maid was saying to the man she had admitted to be her earthly parent, couldn’t overhear a syllable of their dialogue. He did notice, however, that while the girl knelt to receive the man’s blessing the other monk — out of delicacy perhaps — moved aside and began absorbing himself, or pretending to absorb himself, in the examination of some wayside plant.

Tegolin’s father seemed so stirred by the girl’s pleasure in seeing him, and so moved by her tenderness, that he paid not the smallest heed to the familiar cry, “Richard, our sweet sacrifice Richard, the chosen of God!”

But the other monk, whose appearance, though our friend only gave it a glance, was indeed sufficiently striking, did make a curious little gesture of assent, or at least of sympathy, raising for a second his great shaven poll and making a gentle, half-acquiescent, half-deprecatory movement with one of his plump hands.

Having been brought up by his mother to behave with courtesy to all ecclesiastics, Rhisiart made an effort to lead Griffin down the slope, so as to meet the Cistercians. But after each of his official pronouncements about the late King Mad Huw clutched at the boy, imploring him pitifully not to give him up. Then, as if not content with these appeals, he straightened himself in the saddle and thrust his feet, and the stirrups along with them, as far forward as he could, while he made desperate pulls and tugs, sometimes at the reins, sometimes at anything he could lay hold of on the horse’s back. These frantic movements, which resembled those of an obstinate and sulky child, struck Rhisiart as so pitiful that he threw politeness to the winds and remained where he was. He was afraid that if he left the Friar for a moment the fellow would slip off the horse and in his wild fear of losing his liberty make a bolt up the mountain; and so, though it hurt his sense of proper behaviour and even made him feel a fool, standing there like a sentry guarding a prisoner, he patted Griffin's neck and tried to recall his feelings when he had first listened to this man uttering his mad cries.

But Father Rheinalt and his daughter had now overtaken the other monk, and in a few seconds they were all standing together, with Griffin in the centre, asking questions, exchanging news, and discussing that mysterious summons to Glyndyfrdwy.

It soon became clear that the Friar was more afraid of Father Rheinalt than he was of the other Father, and, to confess the truth, our friend shared this feeling.

"It's all getting beyond me," he thought, as he watched that white face in its blood-coloured frame turning from her begetter to this madman she idealized. He noticed how whenever she spoke to the man on the horse she kept her fingers in contact with the monk, either upon his shoulder, or his wrist, or upon some fold in his raiment. Was it before he became a monk that this man begot Tegolin? And how with such a past — for he could never have been married to Tegolin's mother — could he have risen to the high honour of being sent to represent their foundation at Glendourdy's conclave?

The two had no physical resemblance that he could see. The monk was as swarthy as a Moor. Rhisiart had never seen such black hair or such dark flashing eyes. One thing was quite clear: the man was a volcano of smouldering and tragic passion. His burning eyes seemed to drink up Tegolin, as if she had been a water-spring in a boundless desert.

No wonder Mad Huw was afraid of him! How could a father with such a passionate feeling for his child let her wander about like this with a vagabond hedge-preacher?

"I suppose," the boy thought to himself, "it's what old Stove at Oxford used to call a case of mass-obsession. All the country holds Mad Huw for a saint and her for an innocent; and this dark monk — God comfort his soul! — gains glory with the other Fathers, if not with the Abbot, by being known as her begetter."

But the lad sighed as he looked at the three of them. What place could he hope to have in the heart of such a girl? Oh, how deep he had got landed in the drama of life! He could well remember an occasion when, on his way to his elegant school under the newly decorative wing of the big church, he had cried aloud for something real in life, cursing the monotony of the conventional pageants and gaudy processions of which his mother was so fond, with the same fashionable colours always repeating themselves and the same everlasting flags and banners. He could remember catching sight of an old-fashioned, brown-robed begging friar under a heavy Norman arch amid the flamboyant modern buildings and thinking how much more simple, more honest, more close to Nature life must have been in the old days.

"Oh life, life, bring me something real!" he had cried out on that occasion; and now, here he was, actually in love with a vagabond girl whose mother was the mistress of the Constable of Dinas Bran and her father a Valle Crucis monk! Here he was, drawing nearer and nearer every moment to the presence of this mysterious kinsman, whose character — even more than the problem of Incubi and Succubi — had been the subject of interminable discussions with his Oxford friend.

Rhisiart roused himself from his reverie to find that Father Rheinalt and Tegolin between them, by the simple process of asking him to tell them the whole story of his encounter with the late King, had already succeeded in allaying Mad Huw's fears. With our friend's help they now persuaded him to descend from Griffin's back; while Father Rheinalt explained that it was due to the powerful intercession with their Prior of Father Pascentius — here the other Cistercian made a smiling bow — that at the close of High Mass he had been allowed, on condition that Father Pascentius accompanied him, to obey an urgent summons he had received from the Lord of Glyndyfrdwy.

The man told them all this in abrupt short sentences. It was evidently a nervous trouble to him to use words at all. He was like one who has been rendered hoarse from solitary confinement. "Father Pascentius is a great authority on Saint Thomas," he finally blurted out; a statement that was received by this authority with what Rhisiart soon found to be his most characteristic gesture — an expressive wave of his heavy hands which seemed to wipe out from the scroll of destiny every certainty that man could desire and every assurance that prophetic foresight could reveal.

Mad Huw opened his great beautiful eyes to their fullest extent and gazed upon this marvel of erudition with renewed comfort. He had, it appeared, in his experience at Llanfaes, found that the learned among the Brothers were kinder to mental eccentricities than the more worldly and bustling.

As for Rhisiart, he gazed upon Father Pascentius with awe. He had learned at Oxford to respect theological learning beyond everything else except proficiency in civil law. The great metaphysician, however, was now discoursing to Tegolin about the flower he had seen; and it was evidently a more stimulating experience to him to talk to a girl about the nature and properties of plants than to his usual pupils about the mystery of the Trinity.

Father Rheinalt meanwhile was trying to discover from Mad Huw how far the Franciscans of Llanfaes were actually prepared to go in their opposition to the usurping monarch. Thus the field was clear for our young friend, as he mechanically plucked the grass at his feet and offered it to Griffin, to take a good look at the commentator upon Saint Thomas.

Rhisiart's own teachers in the fashionable monastic school at Hereford had been inclined to mock the Cistercians as an unpolished and rustic Order, as negligent of scholarship as they were averse to the enterprise of great cities, and he had suffered so much from those modish and foppish people, cringingly obsequious to their wordly rulers, that it filled him with malicious joy to contemplate this great imposing theologian whose presence, before he spoke a word, would have made those sycophantic Hereford priests look like sleek little mice.

But all the same Father Pascentius was an enigma to our traveller. He had an enormously fat body, unwieldy and awkward, huge gross hands, unnaturally large feet, while his great tonsured head was remarkable for nothing but the gleam of his eyes. He might have been compared to a clumsy trireme carrying at its bows two burning lanterns.

But what puzzled our friend about the man as he watched him talking to Tegolin — and at one point he saw him take a wisp of her hair in his coarse fingers — was the feeling of distaste his eyes excited. Rhisiart didn't feel in the faintest degree afraid of him, nor apparently did Tegolin or Mad Huw. But he certainly had insatiable eyes. They were as radiant as small globes of transparent jet, in the heart of which Nature had placed inextinguishable flames.

Rhisiart's knowledge of human character had hardly less than trebled itself in the last four-and-twenty hours, not to speak of the insight he had won into the darker aspects of his own nature, but Father Pascentius was too much for him Those little insatiable eyes seemed like astronomical spheroids that possessed devouring intensities and absorbing interests of their own, completely unconnected with the corporal frame of the man and indeed only remotely connected with the undistinguished countenance they transfigured. Other human eyes, especially with persons of character, tend to resemble deep holes descending into subterranean worlds; but though the eyes of Father Pascentius were far too intense to be called shallow, they didn't seem to lead into his personality. They were things in themselves. They were like that solitary eye of the daughters of Phorkys that could be transferred from one Phorkyad to another.

Nor, our friend decided, could the eyes of Father Pascentius be said to express either good or evil. He couldn't imagine himself demanding tenderness from them; and yet he could very well imagine himself appealing to them for help, as he might appeal to a philosopher's stone or to an inanimate magic crystal. They certainly were the most intelligent eyes he had ever seen. Immortal intelligence shone out of them! They were undying eyes. After a thousand years they would be still shining in Father Pascentius's sarcophagus amid the ashes and the dust; but they would be no more human then than they were now!

Rhisiart began at first by feeling uncomfortable when he saw these singular luminaries fixed upon Tegolin's loosened hair, for it seemed to him that the intellectual voracity in them transformed itself then into another sort of voracity. But by degrees this look the man was fixing on Tegolin became the lad's own look! There was nothing that it communicated comparable to the dark emotion he had felt when he thought of the arrow in the girl's shoulder; but it was an exultation of the senses; and it struck him as amazing that he could feel like that under the influence of another person, especially when his own feelings when she lay in his arms had been so very different. His cheeks grew hot — lightly as the man did it and lightly as the girl took it — when the theologian toyed with that wisp of blood-red hair.

A fierce liberation of free desire such as he had never known before rushed through his nerves. And the strange thing was that this feeling didn't bring with it that sense of remorse which had seized him after conjuring up that image of the arrow. It seemed to carry with it its own justification and an immense sense of freedom, springing from the release within him of an interior urge that gave him a new and reckless strength.

And in the rush of this strength he suddenly felt a rebellious hostility not only to that smouldering passion of Father Rheinalt but even to the pathos of Mad Huw. It was against both the tragic possessiveness of the father and the clinging helplessness of the Friar that this new feeling rose; and it seemed to him as though those undying Phorkyad eyes in that undistinguished head were liberating both himself and Tegolin from some enslaving fatality.

And mixed with all this, as he kept furtively glancing at that negligible mask with those burning eye-slits, was the curious feeling that, without a word addressed to him since their original greeting, Father Pascentius was not only giving him the courage to be himself, but revealing to him a self that it would certainly need some courage to be.

Yes, the wretched modelling of the man's shapeless features gave our friend the sense of surreptitiously consulting some inanimate wooden idol whose wonder-working eyes — brought from some far-off prehistoric shrine — possessed an older and more formidable authority than the image into whose sockets they had been irrelevantly thrust.

It was Father Rheinalt who finally gave the signal that they should move on. It was clearly a passionate excitement to him to be taking his daughter for her first visit to Owen, and the girl's nervousness made him unusually loquacious. He was the only one of the party who had been to Glyndyfrdwy before, and he explained that they should aim at making their appearance an hour or two before the chief meal of the day, which took place, he told them, soon after four o'clock.

"Owen is peculiar in certain things," he said. "He likes to keep up the old customs; and though our young friend here" — and he gave a friendly nod towards Rhisiart— "must expect neither the grandeur of a castle nor the ceremony of a court, he will, I think, be impressed by what—".

"But, Father!" interrupted Tegolin "You don't mean that Gwion — I mean that Master Rhisiart — will be asked to sit at the high table with—"

The monk's swarthy face relaxed in the first smile that our friend had seen upon it that day. "My good child!" he protested. "We're in Edeyrnion, aren't we, where you and I were born, and where Father Pascentius was born. Where have you and the Brother been in your travels that you've forgotten how things are done at home? We shall all, of course, every one of us, sit at the high table; and if we had servants — which, being what we are we haven't — you'd see them being well-feasted not so far away! Yes, and you too, my good friend" — and he patted Griffin's neck— "will have your entertainment within a bowshot of where we're all sitting. Owen's own horses will be further off; but the house-stable is close by, and he keeps it free for his guests' beasts."

"But Father," the girl murmured, and our friend noticed that she instinctively began braiding her long hair, "I'm not dressed for — there'll be the Arglwyddes and the young ladies — oh, I should die with shame to be seen among them like this. You don't understand, Father. When we were in Mona—"

"Hush, silly child!" said the monk sternly. "You've made your bed and must e'en lie in't. All Gwynedd, all Powys, know our Friar and our Maid. The Arglwyddes is a sensible woman. Does she think a girl can do what you do, and go where you go, and be the plague to Hal Bolingbroke that you are, and be dressed up like a court lady? Besides, if it shames you to sit at meat with Owen's people in your tunic and hose, you can get tricked out to your heart's content in their women's chambers. The Arglwyddes has better serving-maids at Glyndyfrdwy, and bigger robing-rooms, I warrant, than any you'd find at Chirk or Ruthin or Chester! You speak like a gipsy-wench, child — not like the Maid of Edeyrnion that all Wales wots of."

Tegolin bit her lip and hurriedly finished braiding her hair; but Rhisiart could see she was by no means reassured.

He himself began wondering with a good deal of nervous anxiety when and how he would be able to snatch an opportunity to put on some of the fine things he'd got concealed in his sheepskin bundle. Until Tegolin expressed her fears this disconcerting aspect of the matter had never occurred to him; and now as he helped the girl to mount Griffin, and persuaded the Friar to add his small bundle to the horse's burden, it flashed through his mind how calmly he had assumed that his attendance upon this famous Maid of Edeyrnion and her notorious friend would be accepted by everybody in the same light as it appeared to himself.

And how did it appear to himself? How far was his own heart irrevocably committed? And what would happen when the Maid and the Friar set out on their travels again? Was he intending to accompany them, mounted on Griffin, wherever they went, with his crusader's sword at their disposal?

"What's the matter with you, daughter?" enquired Father Rheinalt after the four men had walked some distance in silence by Griffin's side. "You haven't spoken a single word since I told you about the high table at Glyndyfrdwy! Are you still fretting over your clothes? I tell you it's the fashion now among noble ladies to dress as you're dressed when they travel. And when they're hungry and thirsty — you should see them at our refectory! — they don't mind us seeing them like that. Why should you be more particular about the Arglwyddes of Glyndyfrdwy than about the Abbot of Valle Crucis?"

"It's quite different, Father" the girl retorted. "But what's the use of arguing? You could never understand! Master Rhisiart knows what I feel."

Never had there fallen from feminine lips a more ill-advised retort than this. The monk turned upon Rhisiart with a smouldering flash of instinctive hostility.

"I've no doubt," he remarked sarcastically, "that this young gentleman has seen a great deal more of the world than I have. It is true I've only lived very briefly in Rome and Paris and Padua and Verona. It is true I wasn't lucky enough to see Constantinople when I was in the land of our Redeemer. It is true I never visited Toledo when I was in the household of Don Alvares in Salamanca. But I've seen what I've seen; and I tell you this, you proud wench — and you can pout as you like! When at our Prior's advice I didn't interfere with you following the Brother across the country — no! excuse me, Father Pascentius, I must speak to her now or forever hold my peace! — it was because I knew what honour it would bring to Edeyrnion. And you've done nobly, Daughter, and all Edeyrnion is proud of you! I'm right, aren't I, Father Pascentius? My little girl's a famous figure in North Wales. Isn't that so?"

Father Pascentius made his characteristic gesture; and with a wave of his plump hand reduced to metaphysical equality all feminine achievements.

Then he turned quickly to Rhisiart who was looking at Father Rheinalt with a defiant and threatening stare.

"He's never been to Oxford anyway," he remarked, "nor have I! And I doubt if he's ever — in all his travels — seen a city as sophisticated as Hereford. You must remember, Father," and he turned to his fellow monk, "that young people are much more sensitive about their appearance than we old recluses. You who've seen the great world in Paris and Rome and Padua and Verona, and have been in what's-his-name's household in Salamanca, should know young people better than to speak to them like that! Our daughter here doesn't follow the Brother to win glory for Edeyrnion, or even for Wales. She follows him because he needs her and because she believes in him. I'm afraid some of our clever politicians" — he lowered his voice so that Mad Huw couldn't hear him— "have been using both the Maid and the Friar as pawns against Hal Bolingbroke. But we'll see what Owen ap Griffith says. It may be—" Here he murmured something into the monk's ear, and drew him forward a little, keeping a heavy hand on his shoulder.

Mad Huw had picked up a stick and was amusing himself with it in the most youthful manner. He kept digging it into the ground and leaning his weight on it and making grotesque little jumps.

Tegolin signed to our friend to come to Griffin's head. "I ought to tell you more about me and him," she whispered, nodding towards the Cistercians. "It's true he's been in all those places. He wasn't boasting, so you mustn't be angry with him. He's jealous about Oxford and he hates England. He was a bonheddwr — what do you call it in England? — a small landowner — when he met Mother. She was the same as she is now. She was his — how do you say it, Gwion Bach? — his paramour — when I was born; and then she left him for the Earl, under cover of marrying Master Simon. It was then he took the vows. But he loves her to distraction still. The sight of her drives him mad. Sometimes I think she's afraid he'll kill her. And I believe once—"

"For sixteen years?" threw in Rhisiart in an incredulous tone. "Can men feel like that for sixteen years?"

"Hush!" the girl whispered and touched his lips with her finger. "Perhaps they can't in Hereford, Gwion Bach; but they can in Edeyrnion!"

They were both silent. She trying hard to imagine what the hooknosed lad at her side would look like in fifteen years, and he telling himself a story about breaking into Dinas Bran at the head of a Welsh host, and giving Denis Burnell his life at the piteous supplication of both herself and her mother.

The sky had grown a little more cloudy, though they were still only thin, filmy clouds, when our party of friends arrived at the outskirts of Owen's manorial abode.

The first intimation they had of the approach of their journey's end was a somewhat startling one. They were following a narrow path between the river and some heavy over-hanging woods when they were aware of the shrill note of a horn among the trees above them. This sound was answered by another of the same kind higher up the mountain, and then by another, sounding more faintly, from the opposite side of the river.

"Come on, Brother Huw! We must keep together!" cried Rhisiart; and he himself was astonished at the instinctive authority with which he spoke.

But he seconded his words by dragging Griffin hastily forward, while with his other hand he clutched at the Friar's habit and unceremoniously pulled him along. The monks in front were at first too engaged in their conversation to catch these sounds; but the horn in the woods above them soon approached so near that they couldn't help hearing it, and they at once swung round and waited for the others to come up.

They were hardly together when two figures burst from the brushwood about five hundred yards above them, one pursuing and one pursued; and began leaping and scrambling down the slope. The fugitive was evidently at the end of his tether and must have been hunted for some time, for his clothes were stained and torn and he was both bare-headed and bare-handed. He was rushing down the hill so desperately, and was in a state of such panic, that for a moment he didn't notice the group of people gathered round the girl on the piebald horse.

But it may be believed that all our friends noticed him; and for a moment or two they remained spell-bound, lost in that curious state of mind, at once complex and very simple, with which human beings contemplate a life-and-death chase.

As for Rhisiart, his heart beat wildly, beat more than it had done since he lifted his sword between the archers and the spears. The infinite duration of time crumpled itself up into a little round ball. He looked at those two figures, the pursuer and the pursued, in a throbbing trance. There was something in the sight that seemed to arouse instincts in him old as the world. The fleeing figure was himself. The pursuing figure was himself. To escape, to keep his life, only to keep his life, was the spinning, dizzying, hurling, crashing bolt of his blinded passion. Into water, into fire, down precipices, into oblivion — so that somehow he might escape!

But to overtake, to have the prey at his mercy, to overcome in this straining, groaning, panting contest, to break his heart in one frantic sob, but to have him down, down at last, down beneath his feet!

In Tegolin, however, there was no such division of feeling. Long before the other watchers came to their senses the heart within her was calling out in a tongue older than thought, older than justice: “To me — to me — to my breasts, hunted! Here, here! Here to me! No, not there! Here to my heart, here to what doesn’t question, doesn’t judge, doesn’t waver, doesn’t think! Here to what is life merely, life only, life beyond all dispute, all argument, all justice, all reason!”

And all the while in the shining black eyes of Father Pascentius, those little black eyes of the everlasting blessing on the event, gleamed burning interest. Would he catch him? Would he escape? Yes, no — no, yes? Double sixes again! Being, Not-Being, Not-Being, Being; so runs the world away!

As soon as the fugitive noticed our group of onlookers he stood for a second stock-still, just as an animal might have done, who, hunted by another animal, is suddenly confronted by human beings, and stares at them, gasping, panting, desperate.

Then, as he recognized the familiar Cistercian dress, the man swerved in his flight and began scrambling and stumbling, in the same wild-beast haste, straight towards them. But he was still more than three hundred yards away when his enemy, who was leaping after him, overtook him.

Had the wretch continued his descent uninterrupted he might possibly have gained the river, but his moment’s delay was his ruin. He stretched out his arms in wild supplication when he saw that the monks had seen him, and uttered a cry for help, but the cry was soon turned to a piercing and heartrending scream, when feeling his pursuer to be just behind him he tripped on a rock and rolled over in the bracken.

It was now the other man’s turn to catch sight of the group of people whose appearance had given his enemy into his hands; but all he did was to wave haughtily with his left hand for them to remain where they were while he proceeded to despatch his victim. In this process he evidently didn’t intend to hurry himself.

The victim was disarmed, exhausted, done for, and the pursuer apparently felt justified in keeping him waiting for his death until he had regained his own breath. Thus both the man crumpled up upon the bracken and the man holding the spear above him panted out their long-drawn gaspings in a fearful unison and in complete disregard of five strangers.

It must be confessed that Rhisiart’s first instinct was the law-abiding Hereford one — more than natural in the scion of a legal family — the instinct to assume that a man in such haste must be a malefactor and that the death held over him was a lawful execution.

Tegolin, however, who had been brought up in a less well-ordered society, felt nothing of this. All she felt was the spear of the hunter at the throat of the hunted; and jerking Griffin forward she lifted up her voice in a shrill cry of protest. The sound of her cry made Mad Huw recall his own recent predicament and he began leaping up the rocks with such agility that it was soon clear he would reach the scene of the killing before she could.

Meanwhile, the man with the spear, who was a tall personage with a heavy protruding forehead, deep-set eyes and shining teeth, seemed determined to get his own breath before despatching his panting enemy.

He kept lifting up his spear as if pondering where to strike, but he was clearly reluctant to waste his stroke, and the memory must have come to him of some unpleasant recent occasion when he couldn’t draw out his weapon from the victim’s body.

So, panting still, he deliberately bent down, and pulling the man round by the hair of his head, shortened his grip upon his weapon, and experimentally, but without breaking the skin, pressed the spear-point against the man's throat.

It was more with the feeling that he must, right or wrong, support Tegolin and her Friar, than that he ought to interfere in what was probably a mere deer-stealing execution, that Rhisiart followed his friends to the spot.

Meanwhile, what might be called a double-spouted jet of ultimate human emotions rose up from the green hollow where the man lay under the spear-point. It cannot often happen between slayer and slain that such a vivid exchange of consciousness takes place as occurred between those two breathless men.

The man with the heavy brows and gleaming teeth had become unconscious of everything else but of the ecstasy of thrusting his spear into this human throat. He felt the throat with his thumb and the point of his spear with the same thumb. An intensely vivid foretaste of what in a second he would feel, when, rising from his knees, he leaned his full weight upon the spear and pinned the man to the earth, came over him mingled with the extraordinary sweetness of crushed bracken.

And then he forgot everything in the expectation of having that throat under his spear, and of pressing his full weight upon it. The actual words "I pinned him down like an eel!" came into his mind; and he thought of the gurgling sound the soul would make as it left the body.

"Down, down!" his pulses drummed. "You below; I above." And side by side with this up-jetting emotion on the part of the slayer rose a parallel spurt of mortal feeling on the part of the victim. Are there perhaps invisible students of such ultimate human feelings whose business it is to make notes of the varying degrees in the gamut of this music?

If there are such, and if these parallel vibrations had been weighed in some psychic balance, it would have been found that the expectation of imminent death was less intense on this occasion than the rapturous expectation of inflicting it.

The truth is that for the man panting on the ground the bitterness of death had already passed. It had come in a crescendo of despairing sobs when he had felt his pursuer gaining on him. And when he stumbled and fell on that slippery stone it reached its consummation. Then it broke and ebbed; and though he could suffer still, he couldn't suffer with an intensity equal to the other's triumph.

An infinite weariness had come upon him as he lay supine on that pungent-sweet bracken, while the other pricked at his throat. His thoughts took physical shapes. They took the shape of a neck-bone bending under iron; and he even began to confuse the bone which was his life with the iron which was his destruction. The idea of pain no longer existed. The fear of death no longer existed. The humming in his ears and the panting of his lungs became the grinding of the iron which was his enemy upon the bone which was himself.

"Stop! Stop!" shrieked Mad Huw, as he came leaping like a wild goat up the steep ascent. "It's Richard you're killing! Hold your hand, you murdering slave!"

The man's answer was to bring down his spear with the full weight of his body upon the fragment of space occupied a pulse-beat ago by a naked throat.

But Mad Huw's cry, though unheard by the prostrate man's benumbed reason, was heard by the life-impulse of his body. And his body, making a movement like a galvanic fish, twitched out of the way, so that the flashing spear-head pierced nothing but the earth; and at that point Mad Huw flung himself upon him.

"It's Richard! It's Richard!" he kept repeating, as he wound his lean arms round the tall man's person. "Don't — you — know — that he's — the sacrifice — for us all?"

It took more than a moment even for the fellow's immense strength — and his spear still quivered in the earth — to free himself from the madman's clutch; and no sooner was he free than he found himself confronted by a girl with a swinging braid of blood-red hair, to whose knees his victim was now clinging.

The shock of this combination of events catching him at the moment when the electric explosion of his savagery had run like lightning down the shaft of his spear into the ground dissolved the magnetism of his mood. A struggle took place in his distorted lineaments that was most curious to see. He bit his lip till the blood ran down his chin.

"Who in Holy Mary's name—" he began, then, shaking himself free from the Friar's grip, he saw Rhisiart by Tegolin's side with an ugly looking dagger in his hand.

"Mercy! Mercy!" cried the hunted man. "Don't let him kill me, my sweet people! I'm a priest of God!"

"A priest of God? You scurvy scrivener! Lady, he's a spy of Bolingbroke's. He's a filthy parchment-eating lawyer, lady. He'd have taken service with Owen to damn us all! And he'd have done it too, if I hadn't chased him out like a stinking fox. Look at him, the mangy cur! Does he look like a priest?"

The wretch at the girl's knees made Rhisiart think of a criminal he had once seen hanged in Hereford for coining the King's money.

“Get up, man!” he cried, with the air of a sheriff’s proctor, pulling the kneeling suppliant to his feet. “Here are those who’ll know whether you’re a priest or not!”

It was then that to everybody’s surprise Father Pascentius stepped forward.

“Haven’t I seen you before?” he asked.

Rhisiart, who was still supporting the culprit with the grandiose air of a pillar of Hereford justice, felt it proper to repeat the monk’s question as if his prisoner had been an idiot. “He’s asking you if he’s ever seen you before!”

But the fellow took no notice of anybody except Tegolin, upon whom he continued to cast desperate and appealing looks.

“I’m sure I’ve seen you before,” repeated the commentator upon Saint Thomas; and then, while a gleam of something like amusement lit up his heavy face, he made his characteristic gesture; and remarked with a finality of authority that seemed indisputable, “This man is no spy. He is—”

But the personage with the spear interrupted him. “I don’t care who he is! The point for you, my good Father, is who I am!” And at this he unslung his horn from his neck and blew a resounding blast.

Rhisiart dropped his prisoner’s arm so suddenly when he saw and heard this blast of the horn that the poor wretch — staggering, as the psalm says, like a drunken man at his wit’s end — reeled close up to Tegolin, who was now standing with her arm across Griffin’s neck, and clutching at the belt round her waist swore to her by Saint Tysilio, by Saint Collen, by the majestic Festival of Saint John, per festum Sancti Johannis Baptistae, that he was a priest of God!

“A parish-priest, dear lady, a respected and learned priest, sweet lady, and though it is true not altogether unknown at the court of the King, a good

Welshman at heart, and above everything else anxious to lay all my legal learning at the feet of the rightful Prince of Wales!"

Rhisiart who now held the savage stranger's hunting-horn in his hand, for seeing his interest in this symbol of romance the man allowed him to examine it, heard this tremendous and fatal utterance— "the rightful Prince of Wales" — with a curious shock. It struck him in a double way. In the first place it awed and moved him profoundly; as if with the impact of an oracular word, a word that the tossing wind of destiny had only after long hesitancy brought itself to pronounce.

In the second place, falling as it did from the white and twitching lips of this runaway lawyer, the word had an artificial sound, an unnatural sound, a sound smelling of parchments and sealing-wax, rather than of chariots and horses.

It would sometimes come back to him, all his life after, when he heard that magic title Tywysog Cymru, this unpleasing memory of a hunted lawyer's frightened, reckless, unscrupulous, and infinitely crafty face!

Father Pascentius was now talking rapidly to the man with the spear, while Rhisiart, after a friendly nod of permission from its owner, was himself trying to blow the horn. He would have got on better at this job if he had been able to keep his eyes, as their gaze wandered here and there above his distended cheeks, from focussing upon the psychic encounter that was going on between the girl and her "respected parish-priest."

This encounter, which at first had been a matter of clinging looks and then had become — when he clutched at her belt — a matter of clinging hands, had now become a curious exchange of words.

After some extremely quavering notes, that made the spearman smile as he listened to Father Pascentius, Rhisiart took the horn from his lips and under pretence of polishing its silver-rim retained it in his hand, while under his bent brows he spied upon Tegolin and the fugitive. A woman’s power of pity — Christ and God, he had never realized it before. But what a world of secret treacheries this hinted at, what a world of yieldings, sweet and furtive, that not the most jealous love could guard against!

“She’s got a look in her eyes,” he said to himself, as he licked his fingers and polished the horn’s rim, “that she’s never had for me, or Rheinalt or Huw. And why the devil does she keep her lips open as she listens to him? And she’s got her knuckles pressed against one of her breasts now, as if it was just, there she felt the pity — this damned unfair pity for a sneaking lecherous scrub whose soul ought to be in Hell! Yes, and I swear there’s a tear on her cheek, too. What a little goose she is! A fool, that’s it; just a silly fool.”

In truth it did almost seem as if the man’s narrow escape from death and that heart-rending scream he uttered when he tripped had really, as girls love to say, “done something” to Tegolin. It seemed as if the fearful vibration of the life-and-death struggle he’d been through had projected a charge of magnetism, quivering and irresistible, that was seducing her innermost nerves.

“Why had she followed Mad Huw?” our friend thought, as he watched this subtle process going on. “Out of pity! And why did she let me take her in my arms last night? Out of pity!”

But the boy soon realized that he wasn’t the only one of their party hit to the quick by the girl’s concern for this runaway scribe. He soon became aware that both Father Rheinalt and Brother Huw were watching the pair as jealously as he was himself. This at once consoled him; and even brought a slight reaction in her favour.

Wasn’t the girl free to extend her pity — granting that it were a sort of vice — in any direction she pleased?

But the tension came to an end now, and in a surprising enough manner. Father Pascentius had at last, it seemed, quite won over the impulsive warrior with the spear. Both of them came forward; and the man, who a few minutes ago had been fumbling at the fellow’s throat, now stretched out his hand to him and made the sort of blunt and bluff apology that he might have offered had he killed a dog or brought down a horse.

The person he addressed pulled himself together, moved away from Tegolin, swept a guarded reproachful and defiant look round the assembled company, and clasped his hands behind his back.

At his pursuer he didn’t look at all, nor make the least acknowledgment of his apology.

“I remember you now perfectly well,” said Father Pascentius. “You are Master Young, Incumbent of Llanwys in Dyffryn Clwyd, and Canon Elect of Bangor. No, listen to me, Master Young! Your name was mentioned I understand in the new King’s Court as a candidate for the Archdeaconry of Ardudwy. But it was over a point of canon law that I had the honour of your acquaintance, Master Young; nor do I think you will have forgotten the occasion quite so completely if I remind you that you took up a position, in regard to the Bishopric of Bangor, and the Holy Father’s consecration of Lewis of Aber, that was somewhat contrary to our Welsh hopes. No, hear me out, Master Young! This worthy gentleman, deceived by your appearance, misunderstood your business here. He was mistaken; at least let’s hope he was mistaken! But all this can wait till we reach Glyndyfrdwy. It will be in our company that you’ll come to Baron Owen; and this gentleman assures me he’ll give us his escort and the benefit of his—”

Rhisiart had all this while been closely watching the face of their ambiguous captive, and the longer he had looked at it the less he had liked it. It was a flat face with very small features and a mouth whose thin lips accentuated the prominence of a narrow, projecting, and extremely pointed chin.

The man’s eyes were pale, and had a wandering, restless, furtive look; but what puzzled our friend in his prolonged scrutiny, and confounded his analysis, was a certain indescribable air of formidable power and self-possession.

Liking or disliking, however, had now to give way to obvious humanity, for what interrupted the Cistercian’s remarks was nothing less than the sudden collapse of Master Young, who fell, as a dead man might have fallen, with a decidedly unpleasant thud, upon the grass at their feet.

To our friend’s vexation, and to the equal annoyance of Father Rheinalt, it fell to Tegolin’s lot, with the aid of her silver flask and some water from the stream, to recover him from this well-timed swoon; and the end of it was the very issue that Rhisiart had been for some while dreading — that it became his destiny to hoist the fellow up upon Griffin’s serviceable back, and even to remain by his side when once they’d got him mounted.

By this time our friends had found themselves surrounded by quite a number of wild-looking spearmen, whom their leader’s horn had brought to the spot; so that when the party finally moved forward again on their way, their company was a large and formidable one. Father Rheinalt took exclusive possession of his daughter during the rest of their march, so that our friend had at once to support Master Young and listen to Mad Huw’s incoherent rhapsodizing.

At one point indeed the commentator upon Saint Thomas was thoughtful enough to come to the lad’s side and explain to him, and to the man he was supporting, the identity of the impulsive huntsman.

“He’s a friend of Iolo Goch,” the theologian explained, “and a landowner from Cwm Llanerch in the Vale of the Conway. He heard that the old bard was dying, and he heard of this gathering at Glyndyfrdwy.

“So he came with his tenants, and Owen has kept him. He seems to have become a kind of outlaw since” — and he lowered his voice so as to be unheard by Mad Huw— “since Richard’s death. His name is Rhys. They call him Rhys Gethin, Rhys the Savage; and my own impression is” — and he spoke more kindly than he’d done before to the man on the horse— “that the less you yourself make of what happened just now, Master Young, the more likely it’ll be that your over-zealous pursuer will get a shrewd rebuke! Owen doesn’t like tale-bearers. But you may be sure our rough friend won’t hold his tongue; and your discretion will win all the more favour.”

With these politic remarks — and Rhisiart began to think that if Father Pascentius was as good a philosopher as he was a diplomat the Cistercian Order would certainly hold its own — the discreet sage drew back to the rear of the company and fell to botanizing.

For several miles Rhisiart had all he could do to keep Master Young from slipping from Griffin’s back. The nervous reaction from what he’d gone through, combined with complete physical exhaustion, produced intermittent spells of extreme sleepiness, at each access of which he would lose his balance and sway violently to one side or the other.

However, by degrees, he recovered himself, and as his strength revived his normal intelligence revived too, and he began to question his young escort.

Rhisiart replied at first in unsympathetic monosyllables; but few young men can for long resist talking of themselves to an ingratiating listener and it wasn’t long before the crafty lawyer-priest had heard all he wanted about our friend’s life in Hereford and Oxford.

Rhisiart grew in fact more and more disarmed by the man’s tact as a listener; and the next stage of their conversation took the form of a brilliant disquisition, to which the lad listened with absorbed interest, upon the nicest and most delicate points of Welsh politics.

The astute cleric was at pains to make clear to the young Oxonian that Father Pascentius’ tone towards him was due to the bitter rivalry that existed in Wales between the regular and the secular clergy. The Friars, he told him, were all for Richard, whereas the Cistercians were struggling to retain a diplomatic neutrality between the House of Lancaster and its enemies.

And then, while his curiously level face with its round toothless mouth and projecting chin grew animated with frank confidence, he began without shame to confess to the young man that he was in the greatest personal quandary whether to range himself openly with the new nationalist movement among the Welsh, or to return to Henry’s court and content himself with advocating the Welsh cause in the councils of its enemies.

This frankness in an obviously formidable man of affairs was exquisitely flattering to our friend’s vanity. He found himself even going so far, under the stimulus of the other’s confidence, as to speak freely of his own secret ambitions. It must be remembered that this was the first time in his life he had presumed to discuss public affairs with a man who could boast a personal acquaintance with the reigning monarch; and as he walked by Griffin’s side, watching the subtle play of Master Young’s mobile face — which he kept mentally comparing to a certain recently-carved gargoyle, through whose mouth the roof of his College Chapel drained itself of the rain — he began to feel a sense of worldly superiority to his recent companions, none of whom, he felt sure, was capable of following Master Young’s statesman-like thoughts.

Of his own ambitions he began to speak more and more freely; avoiding, however, with an instinctive shyness, any reference to Dinas Bran. He questioned the archidiaconal candidate very closely about the character of the Lord of Glyndyfrdwy, and was delighted to find that his own suspicions about his famous kinsman, as being more addicted to poetry than politics, were fully shared by this virtuoso in human character.

“No, I’ve never met him,” Master Young declared, “and to tell you the truth I am exactly in your own position with regard to him. Indeed, the chief purpose of my journey — so rudely interrupted by that uncivilized brute — was to judge for myself the chances that this cousin of yours would have, in case these Burnells and Arundels and Greys did drive him into revolt.”

“Shall you,” enquired our young friend impulsively, warming to a man whose opinions jumped so closely with his own, “shall you, do you think, follow Father Pascentius’ advice, and say nothing to my kinsman of this murderous attack? And what, by the way, if I have an opportunity of talking privately with him, would it be best for me to say about the matter?”

Master Young didn’t reply for a moment. His eyes wandered thoughtfully over the slopes of a bracken-covered range of hills that now appeared on the right of their winding track.

“I think I must leave all that,” he said at last, with a melancholy sweetness, “to the natural discretion of an Oxford scholar. No, I think the good Father was right, absurdly prejudiced as he is! No, I shall say nothing to Owen myself, unless — No, I shall say nothing.”

He paused a moment and then, leaning his hand against the edge of Rhisiart’s little bundle of books whose parchment-covers were protruding from the sheepskin, he twisted himself round, as if to assure himself of the whereabouts of Rhys the Savage, and remarked lightly, “Of course, if I hadn’t been a priest I should have stood up to that ruffian. It’s the first time in my life I've had to take to my heels. Holy Mary! And I'd be a dead man now, if I hadn't bestirred myself."

In spite of his mental affinity with the would-be Archdeacon it did cross Rhisiart's mind that though the fellow had indeed "bestirred himself, and done so with the agility of a hunted rabbit, it was the intervention of Mad Huw rather than his personal activity that had saved his skin.

Master Young must have divined the drift of his new friend's thought, for he now remarked that he had only recently heard of the wandering Friar of Llanfaes. "I'd like to thank him though, for his assistance just now."

Once more Rhisiart couldn't restrain a fleeting thought that the word "assistance" was a somewhat modest one for what the Friar had done while Master Young panted on the ground; but anxious to further this laudable duty he raised his voice and speaking authoritatively and loudly, as if to a deaf child, called the Friar to their side.

"I almost believe, Brother," whispered Master Young, "yes, I really almost think that I owe you my life."

Mad Huw contemplated him in astonishment, his beautiful eyes wide open. "It's the blessed King," he replied in awe-struck tones; "it's he who's come back and will be with us soon, who saves all our lives. That's why we're all going together. That's why you and the Maid and that man with the shining teeth who wanted to make your death a quick one, and the Father who tears up flowers to put under his vest, and this young man who draws his sword and puts back his sword are going to beg Owen to deliver the land from this enemy of Christ, this scourge of innocence, this plague-spot Bolingbroke!"

Rhisiart had already grown so accustomed to treat Mad Huw's words with tender solicitude that it made him think of the legal parchments in the sheriff’s office at home when he saw Master Young’s pragmatic mind curl up like bonfire shavings under these fiery words.

But he was really shocked when the priestly lawyer thrust his hand into the stout wallet he carried at his waist and fishing up from its recesses a couple of silver groats held them out to Mad Huw with the words: “For your little necessities, Brother! I am not a rich man, or—”

But the lad never supposed that the Friar would have had the wit, or indeed the gall, to do what he did with these two glittering coins.

A couple of Rhys Gethin’s somewhat ragged followers were trailing their spears at a little distance; and the Friar, calling out to them in the rustic idiom of the Vale of the Conway, flung the coins towards them and chuckled like a mischievous boy when the men nearly fell into the Dee in their struggles to pocket these precious pieces.

The sight of Master Young’s disconcerted face and the way the small, well-modelled features of its oblong expanse contracted, as if they had received a smart fillip from the back of a lean hand, lessened considerably our friend’s disgust. But he did make a mental note that it is possible to be a great statesman and a very questionable gentleman.

Tegolin from her position in the little cavalcade by Father Rheinalt’s side must have noted with indignation this offer of money to her hero, as if he’d been an ordinary begging friar, for she came hurrying up to them, and Rheinalt followed her. It was impossible for our friend not to feel a certain amount of malicious joy when he heard his intellectual acquaintance receive some lively home-thrusts from the impetuous and impulsive girl.

“So you pay for your life with silver groats, Master Young?” and her tone had a texture of delicate fury in it that made the boy think of the polished slipperiness of his mother’s voice when she came upon his father and Modry in the rose-garden.

What, however, puzzled the boy about it, and by no means pleased him, was the manner in which Master Young received his punishment.

His curious pale eyes seemed to darken in a kind of withdrawn and abstracted delight and out of his thin-lipped toothless mouth, that seemed to round itself in sensual expectancy, came a faint purring sound. It was an intense relief to Rhisiart when Father Pascentius enquired politely of the would-be Archdeacon what his view was about Owen's chance if there were a rising. Master Young replied at once with grave authority.

"The worst," he remarked, "of a gathering like this, with all its ridiculous mystery and its bard-business and its bandits from the Conway and its" — he lowered his voice with a glance at Mad Huw— "its Franciscan fuss about Richard, is that it's all local and provincial! The stage is set for great events — that I grant ye; but it's a bigger stage than your bards and bandits realize. I'm as good a Welshman as any of you, but I can tell you this, if the red dragon comes back it'll be because the lions and leopards have fallen out among themselves. There must be trouble in Ireland, trouble in Scotland, and all Northumbria rising; yes! and a war-cloud from France too, before the House of Lancaster's shaken. I know the Prophecies of Merlin as well as any of you; but if Owen ap Griffith thinks he can drive the English out of Wales by magic and sorcery, he's—"

The Friar's voice rang out so loud that Rhys the Savage with a couple of his followers came hurrying down upon them through the bracken from the higher path they'd been following; and at his enemy's approach Master Young fell silent.

Indeed they all fell silent; and the murmur of the river and the chirping of a small bird in the undergrowth and the harsh croaking of a raven poised above the high rocks were the only audible sounds, save when Griffin's hooves struck against an unseen stone.

Then Tegolin's voice became audible; though it seemed as if the girl were rather talking to herself than to any of the men round her.

"Only a terrible, only an intolerable wrong, worse than any I've heard of yet, would justify the lifting of the red dragon, and all the burning and all the spoiling and all the torrents of blood that would follow a struggle between Welsh and English. Baron Owen must die one day, as we all must, and how will he feel if, for some paltry quarrel with my Lords of Chirk and Ruthin, he has covered our land with blood, and blackened it with fire, and made—"

"Hush, girl!" interrupted Father Rheinalt, his features distorted with the intensity of his feeling. "Hush, or you're no daughter of mine! As John ap Hywel said to us in the guest-house last night, it is the Lord Himself who is sowing dissension between Henry of Lancaster and the Percies; and what I say is, if all Gwynedd, and all Powys, and all the commotes of Deheubarth were soaked in the blood of their children, it would be a small price to pay for a Wales free and united as it was—"

"As it never was!"

The words fell harshly and brutally from between the gleaming teeth of Rhys the Savage. "Pardon me, Gentles and Fathers all," he went on, while his two shaggy-haired, bare-foot followers glared at the man on Griffin's back as if at the least stir of contradiction they would wring his neck, "but when I hear these Lollardy-words about peace and unity and all Welshmen linked in love, and think of the proud warriors of old and the free princes of Gwynedd, who'd as soon see a scurvy South-Walian on the banks of the Conway as they would a dirty Saxon, I could spit on the earth! In those old times," he went on while his followers' eyes flashed in sympathy, "there were real saints among us! Saint Derfel, Saint Tysilio, Saint Collen — wouldn't any of them as soon fling a spear at a Gwyddel from Ireland, or a Silurian from Gwent, as at any serf-Saxon or bastard-Norman?"

Rhys the Savage uttered these words in furious jerks, rolling his eyes and baring his teeth. Like spouts and jets and flukes of hot blood they whistled about that little company's ears.

What with the spear he held in his hand and kept toying with, and what with his followers' barbarous looks, neither the cloistered monks nor the secular cleric uttered a word.

But Mad Huw cared nothing for this beastly chatter, nothing for this brandished spear.

"Holy Saint Francis!" he cried. "What talk is this? Was Blessed Francis a Lollard? Was the Son of Mary a Lollard? Is sweet King Richard, who gives his life for us all, a Lollard? Yes, go on! Gnash your teeth and roll your eyes at me, Rhys Gethin! I snap my fingers at you. Haven't I read the secret of the years in sweet Richard's eyes?

"And it's love that will conquer, in spite of your teeth and your spear! King Arthur wasn't born in Conway nor Dewi Sant in Edeyrnion. It wasn't in Mathrafal that Merlin found the red dragon for Gwyddyrn the Goidel! Holy Saint Francis! what Devil's coil is this, Rhys Gethin? Not a word will King Richard say through me for Owen; not a word will poor Huw say for himself, unless Owen is out to bring all Wales together!" He stopped breathless and let the lean arm he had stretched out sink to his side.

The irresponsible chief from Cwm Llanerch lowered his spear and stared frowningly at the earth; and it seemed to Rhisiart as if his ferocious tribalism really had received a shock. Inspired, however, by a not unnatural delight at seeing his enemy discomforted, Master Young deemed it a propitious moment to thrust in his diplomatic oar; and he proceeded in carefully-chosen words to bring forward the legal aspect of the subject.

"And if Owen," he said, "did bring all Wales together, as Brother Huw desires, his success could never be lasting until he made peace with England. And the only way he could make peace with England would be by paying homage to the King in London. This, just this, and nothing less than this, has been the wise policy of all our greatest princes. A free Principality — and I would even go so far as to say a Principality with a Parliament — rendering without question that geographical, that legal, that historical homage to the crowned King in London that has been paid since the days of King Alfred — that is the line to follow!"

For one beat of his agitated pulse Rhisiart felt sure the lawyer's end had really come this time. The spear was raised, and he could see it actually quivering in the Conway man's reckless hand. He himself was moved by no rush of automatic impulse to defend Master Young, but he did, as soon as he had taken breath, lay a firm hand on the hilt of his crusader's sword which offered itself so easily to his hand.

But Tegolin had moved by an instinctive impulse — and it can be believed how our friend went over this incident again and again in his mind — and if Rhys Gethin hadn't held back just in time the spear would have passed through her body rather than Master Young's.

It was a toss of the dice, too, whether the fellow's uncivilized henchmen would do what Tegolin's rush forward had prevented their master's doing; but with an angry oath in which he included the whole party, Rhys the Savage called off his men as if they'd been a pack of dogs, blew his horn as a sign to his little army on the upper path, and scrambled up the rocks to rejoin them. Half-way up he paused upon a platform of stone for a final word, and pointing at Griffin's rider — for the whole party had stopped to follow his ascent with their eyes— “Wait till you find yourself,” he shouted, “you scurvy Carmarthen spy, in Owen’s prison at Carrog! You’ll only come out of that like a trapped rat — to be baited by Conway puppies!”

They were now actually in sight of the tall flagstaff in the centre of the enormous circular stockade which surrounded Owen’s dwelling. This flagstaff, made out of an untrimmed spruce-fir of exceptional height, was planted on the top of one of those ancient mounds, centres in Wales, as doubtless in ancient Greece, of mystical entombings for the dead and of magic enchantments for the living.

They could see the patrimonial pennon of Owen’s ancestors floating from that fir-pole top, bearing, though from that distance the whole flag showed smaller than a butterfly, the solitary “lion rampant” of the chiefs of that ancient princedom. It wasn’t long — for at the sight of the mound and its flagstaff they instinctively quickened their speed — before they saw much more of this fortified palace. It was built mostly of gigantic planks of wood, but of wood supported and foundationed upon a system of massive stonework.

It was clear that none of our friends, even if they had been ten times more numerous than they were, would be without shelter that night. Owen’s domain was indeed a Llys, as the old romances call such a place, worthy to be compared with those primeval ones of the ancient Welsh myths, mentioned so constantly in the “Four Branches of the Mabinogi.”

Like the Homeric palaces it was two stories high, the upper one devoted to the women of the family and their feminine attendants and the lower occupied almost entirely by one enormous hall strewn with last year’s bracken, with an open fire in the centre, round which at night, when the tables had been cleared, the whole company of warriors and their retainers could sleep.

But this was by no means all; for quite clear of the main edifice there were outbuildings and guest-houses and extensive stables, not to speak of bakeries and kitchens and laundries and cattle-sheds. The place, in fact, could offer food and shelter, and frequently did so, to a population much larger than many villages.

Unlike the great Norman castles, however, and unlike such purely Welsh castles as Rhisiart’s Dinas Bran, Owen’s Llys would have been at the mercy of a body of foes formidable enough to defeat its defenders. That indeed was its essential character. It could extend a more lavish hospitality than the largest castle; but its strength lay in its warriors, not in its walls.

Rhisiart’s emotions as they approached the main entrance to the place, the general effect of which rather resembled an immense stockade than an embattled fortress, were so deep and overwhelming that he kept sucking his lips into his mouth and tightening his belt, and twisting the hairs of Griffin’s mane between his fingers, in complete unconsciousness of anything but the romance of the moment.

With a gesture that touched Tegolin far more than anything he had done since he held up his crusader’s sword between the archers and the spears, he finally slipped his hand into hers, and in complete oblivion of the fact that Master Young had descended from Griffin’s back and was supporting himself or pretending to support himself by leaning upon him, he clutched her fingers and pressed close to her side, much more as a child with an elder sister might do than an armed lover with a timid maid.

The summer afternoon had by this time clouded over and the wind was beginning to rise; but this only stirred the folds of the pennon which he could still see waving from its mound, into that occasional slow unrolling on the air, which gives to a flag the appearance of being woven of some rich, heavy heraldic stuff.

In an instinctive movement of awe and excitement the whole of their little company advanced close together, Tegolin holding Griffin's bridle, Rhisiart holding Tegolin's hand, and Master Young leaning heavily, like a sick or wounded man, on the lad's other arm.

On arriving at the barred gate of the enclosure they found two horsemen waiting patiently on their respective steeds, one of which was coal black, and the other of a dark roan colour.

Rhisiart was in too deep a trance of excitement to take in anything save a vague impression of patient men upon patient horses. His inmost being kept saying to itself, "With my girl's hand in mine I've come to the palace of my fathers."

One ridiculous little thing did, however, considerably bother him, disturbing in a measure his ecstatic trance; namely, that across the illuminated parchment of the one among his books that protruded itself from beneath his sheepskin bundle there hung down in full view — probably because of the fidgety movements of Master Young — a considerable portion of a stout pair of knitted drawers, with which his mother had insisted upon providing him when he left Hereford.

Nothing would have induced him to release Tegolin's hand in order to thrust this domestic object out of sight, but the image of that curst underwear might have taken to itself quite monstrous proportions if Tegolin hadn't whispered in his ear, "Mother of God! if it isn't the Abbot and the other one!"

She had hardly uttered the words than the impetuous Father Rheinalt rushed forward and boldly greeting the Caerleon prelate, and kissing his hand, introduced to his notice the less presumptuous Father Pascentius.

Luckily for the harmony of the occasion it was only the girl and our friend himself who knew that the calm smooth-faced layman in the dark clothes of a scholarly country squire was the notorious Walter Brut, whose trial for heresy before his bishop had already made him infamous to the orthodox.

Whether the warlike Abbot from Caerleon knew the identity of his companion, Rhisiart had no idea; but the great man kept it to himself if he did, and the whole company of them were soon greeting one another with the happiest friendliness, Master Young assuming a prominent part in the exchange of courtesies, and taking stock of Master Brut with a lively and interested curiosity.

The Abbot from the banks of the Usk was indeed in his most genial mood, his powerful features more animated than our friend had ever seen them; and though he had evidently been wiling away the time in his usual manner, his Psalter was no longer open and he was soon waving it in the direction of a taciturn and heavily-armed Porter, who was seated with his back against the closed gates, polishing a murderous-looking battle-axe.

“I suppose you Valle Crucians,” he remarked with a chuckle, “are well known to that surly gentleman over there; whose name I gather is Glew the Gryd. And, if you are, you’ll doubtless also know how impossible it is to disturb him. He has, however, revealed to me that Owen is at the death-bed of Iolo Goch, whom he’s just brought over here from Sycharth; and until the old Bard wakes from the coma into which he’s fallen everything must fain be at a stand-still. It’s a blessing my almoner isn’t here. The man’s such a stickler for the proprieties that what he’d say to see his Superior, and his Superior’s worthy friends, waiting the pleasure of Glew the Gryd is more than I dare imagine.

“But here’s our brave Brother Huw; and if I mistake not, this pretty lady is the famous Maid Tegolin. Give me your hand, daughter. The last time we met we had a worse reason for possessing our souls in peace than we have today.

"And how goes it with my silent lad of the big sword and Hereford horse? If we can't see the great Owen yet awhile, we must e'en make the best of his cousin."

The formidable Abbot of Caerleon was evidently in one of his relaxed moods when nothing could upset him, and when, as long as he could speak Welsh and not Latin, and there were none of his convent at hand, he was free with everybody.

Rhisiart's acknowledgment of his greeting — and the boy wasn't too dazed to notice Master Young's astonishment at the broad rustic dialect in which the Abbot's sallies were expressed — was interrupted by the necessity of distracting Griffin's interest from the Lollard's roan mare.

There was a huge horse-block before the entrance to the Llys, adorned with ancient bronze rims and rings; and to one of these rings our friend proceeded to fasten the piebald's bridle, remembering, as he did so, that other horse-block at the gate of another Welsh palace, upon which, as his Modry loved to relate, the great goddess Rhiannon, in the tale of Pwyll Pen Annwn, had to sit for penance!

Meanwhile, as behind him, and he noticed it with extreme displeasure, Tegolin was taking the opportunity of introducing Master Young to the Abbot, in front of him the indignant Father Rheinalt had walked straight up to Glew the Gryd.

"What do you mean by this? Is Welsh hospitality gone forever? I thought Owen's gates were never shut. Have you no respect for a Lord Abbot?" Such were a few snatches of the monk's observations that reached Rhisiart as he fastened the piebald to the horse-block.

“You come here and talk to him, lad!” cried the Cistercian at last. “He’s always been a brute,” he whispered when our friend with some reluctance drew near. “Owen spoils him because he saved his life in Scotland. He’s a great—”

He raised his voice so as to pierce the Gryd’s inflexible ears. “I’m telling this young scholar from Oxford, who is studying how to drive out devils, what skill you have with the battle-axe!”

“She wants sharpening,” was all the answer he got.

Then Rhisiart shot his bolt. “Why have we to wait till your master can leave his friend?” He raised his voice till he could feel it penetrating every crack and cranny in that obstinate gate. “Couldn’t one of his sons open the door, or his High Chamberlain, or his Chief Butler, or even one of his cooks?”

“Don’t you think,” the boy shouted, raising his voice still louder and using a pitch that had always had great success at his Hereford school, “that you could just slip in for one little moment, and tell the Arglwyddes that her kinsman from Hereford waits outside?”

“Her be blunter nor the mischief,” said Glew the Gryd, “but I’ll sharpen the bitch yet or starve for’t!”

Rhisiart gave vent to a blunt English oath; but the imperturbable Glew only shrugged his shoulders, and continued applying the sharpener to the edge of his weapon.

The lad looked hopelessly round. He was aware of plenty of people coming and going among the outbuildings. Sometimes a group of them would stop to stare for a moment, talking and gesticulating to one another; but when either the Lollard or Father Pascentius began cautiously moving towards them, they disappeared like rabbits into their burrow.

He went back to the old horse-block and began stroking Griffin. Mad Huw had already seated himself on a bench under the wall and was contentedly watching a flock of pigeons, several of whom, doubtless recognizing him as a creature nearer themselves than normal humanity, seemed on the point of alighting on his knee.

All at once the lad's impatience vanished from his mind like a puff of smoke. He suddenly remembered another of Modry's tales, where the porter at Arthur's gate refused admission to Kilhwch the son of Kilydd. "The knife is in the meat," he repeated to himself, "and the drink is in the horn... and none may enter therein save the son of a king or a craftsman bringing his craft."

"Can it be possible," he thought, "that in this civilized day and age, when life has become so scientific and safe, and men question everything — even the existence of Incubi and Succubi — and when freethinkers like this Lollard read the Scriptures in place of the Missal, that I should see with my own eyes a figure like this porter?"

And then as the Lollard rode up and began explaining how he had left the unhappy Simon in the herdsman's hut in order to appeal personally to Owen on his behalf, Rhisiart found himself thanking all the saints in his heart that Tegolin had braided her hair again before exposing herself to the gaze of so many! The Lollard smiled as he watched the lad thrust his offending under-clothes carefully into hiding; but catching sight of the bundle of books that now emerged, as a result of these adjustments, he asked him in a friendly tone what they were.

Our friend replied courteously but a little vaguely, for the works in question were more classical than scriptural; but as he equivocated and muttered something about old school-texts, his mind became more and more concerned about the welcome he would receive from his kinsman, and whether, if he did get employment under him, it would mean a temporary separation from Tegolin.

“If it does,” he thought, “can I stand it? And what may not happen to her without my protection? Oh, how hard and terrible life’s great decisions are!”

And then as he watched the girl standing there between Master Young and the Abbot, “What I’d like,” he thought, “would be just simply to marry Tegolin, and live quietly with her here under my cousin’s roof; making excursions now and then against Chirk and Ruthin, and perhaps, with the help of that savage knight and his men, assaulting Dinas Bran in some surprise attack, and being met by Tegolin with her hair all unloosed, when with Burnell dead and her mother a captive I return at this very—”

His reverie was interrupted by the sound of some considerable stir going on inside the great gates.

Master Brut ceased talking, and both the piebald and the roan pricked up their ears.

Rhisiart turned hurriedly round to see if Tegolin had heard anything, but she was too deep engaged with the Abbot and Master Young.

As for Father Pascentius, he had calmly seated himself by the side of Mad Huw, and with his garments hitched up above his great unseemly legs was examining a fragment of moss.

“Iolo Goch must be dead,” said the Lollard suddenly; but Rhisiart was silent. Death? Well! it had to come; as he’d seen it so nearly come to Mad Huw and to Master Young; but that was death in its violent form. What of dying in a closed chamber with only a little square hole to let in the air and the whole outer world?

And Rhisiart suddenly realized, as he stood by the old horse-block and in preparation for the opening of the gates began to loosen Griffin’s bridle from the bronze ring, what it meant for Iolo Goch to be dying. Till this moment the Bard's being at the end of his long life had been no more to him than if they'd been waiting there for the death of a cow or an ox. But now, as he watched Tegolin's delicate figure in her page's dress and noted its soft curves and the slenderness of her neck compared with all these men, a vague obscure thought that he couldn't have put into any words took possession of him. It was something so passive, so receptive — but there was no real word for it! — in Tegolin's pose, something that suggested, compared with the compact and concentrated energies of all these men, the deep, soft, yielding, silent growing potency of Nature herself! Yes, there was an aura about her, an aura that even those monks were feeling — the greatest mystery in the world! And between the old Bard's death inside the gates and this young girl's life outside the gates there seemed to the lad then — only it was all vaguer than words and subtler than thought — a magical reciprocity, a reciprocity between two things that were both of them deeper and more real than any waving in the wind of that "lion rampant."

What was this? Surely he heard the sound of iron bars being drawn and of iron chains clanging and jangling as they were unfastened!

But the imperturbable axe-sharpening of Glew the Gryd didn't cease; and it was an obvious supposition that obstinate though the Porter was he could hardly remain seated in the centre of the gateway when the gates were thrown open!

"This gate must lead into a court-yard," our friend thought, "where there must be stables for our horses. I shall certainly see where they put Griffin. But not at once. I'll let my cousin's servants take him away when we first get in. Will my cousin be on the steps of the great hall to welcome me? Will he perhaps have heard rumours already about how I lifted my sword?"

Ah! the axe-sharpener had skipped aside like a great disturbed goblin and the gates were opening! They opened very slowly; so slowly that Rhisiart fancied he detected some ritual motive; for surely the natural thing after all this delay would have been to fling them wide in one grand burst!

But opening they were; and the Abbot got down from his black charger and with great dignity advanced alone, allowing Father Rheinalt to lead the horse behind him. After Father Rheinalt came Father Pascentius supporting Master Young, and after them came Master Brut with his mare.

Thus it was that Mad Huw, made aware of a rich concourse of people — suddenly revealed like a sumptuous picture between the posts of the great gate — fell to crying out that Richard was alive, that right would now prevail over wrong and that the oppressed would be comforted. And as he proclaimed this message at the top of his powerful voice he pushed eagerly forward, squeezing himself between the mare and one of the gateposts, in a desperate attempt to overtake the Abbot.

Thus, by what seemed to the boy a special providence, he and Tegolin, with Griffin pulled along by his bridle behind them, were enabled to enter the Llys of Owen side by side; and it may easily be believed how spontaneously their hands sought each other and clung tight together, as they followed the rest into that crowded court-yard.

V. GLYNDYFRDWY

THAT HE WAS taller than the rest of them, that his legs were bare above his high, tightly-fitting, chamois leather shoes, that he had a dark tunic with broad purple belt and a purple mantle over his shoulders clasped by a massive gold brooch, that his yellow-grey beard was forked and carefully trimmed, that round his head was a twisted golden thread and from his belt hung a short two-edged sword of antique shape, were all things that Rhisiart only took in after several minutes had passed.

What he noted at once about Owen ap Griffith's appearance were his eyes. These were of a flickering sea-colour, sometimes grey and sometimes green, yet always with an under-glow of light in them that had the effect of an interior distance.

And something else Rhisiart noticed very quickly about his kinsman's eyes, and indeed about the whole expression of his face, and this was a sudden change that would every now and then bring a kind of paralysis of all animation, not so much as if he were engaged in thought as if his consciousness had been transferred to an interior plane.

Owen's forehead was low and broad, the hair thick and wavy; but his locks were so neatly trimmed, and the thread of gold so carefully disposed across his brow, that the general effect was courtly and regal rather than shaggy or leonine. His nose was of the type sometimes called Roman, but it had nothing of the aquiline, and its nostrils were unnaturally large. His cheek-bones were decidedly prominent, his cheeks hollow and curiously white against his yellow-grey hair. His skin was obviously of the texture that responds to exposure by growing freckled rather than tanned.

But it was the curious change that kept coming over his lineaments as he turned to greet first one and then another of his guests that arrested our friend most. It seemed to occur quite independently of the person he was addressing, and it didn't affect either the flow of his own words or the politeness with which he listened to the words of others. To our highly-strung traveller it seemed there was something startling and rather troubling about this phenomenon. He told himself several times that he must be imagining it, for none of the man's interlocutors, as the boy watched them, showed the slightest awareness of these curious psychic withdrawals.

"I must be imagining it," he repeated to himself. But then, as Owen turned from Master Brut to Master Young, it seemed to him that this intermittent paralysis — just as if the man's soul had left his body altogether — descended so palpably that he found himself making an instinctive movement forward as if the chieftain might suddenly reel and stagger.

Rhisiart had never in his life concentrated such a mental intensity of scrutiny as he concentrated during those first brief moments upon Owen Glyn Dŵr.

Apart from these queer "attacks," for so our friend regarded them though nobody else seemed to notice them at all, the lad was amazed by the courtly manner in which Owen handled his guests, greeting them rapidly one after another, and yet leaving each of them obviously delighted with his reception.

Another peculiarity of Glyn Dŵr's which interested Rhisiart was the man's way of talking in so low a voice to the person he was addressing that no one else, however close they were standing, could hear what he said. This especially struck the lad because all the English magnates he had known in Hereford were wont to prove their importance by the high pitch of their voices.

All these impressions, though he could have put them into words at his leisure, passed through his brain in that rapid mental sequence which resembles the flow of images rather than of thought; but what startled the lad most was not the nature of any particular observation he made as a surprising upheaval in his whole emotional attitude.

In his secret feeling about Dinas Bran, that feeling into which he had thrown all the shy and obstinate idealism of his furtive pride, he had deliberately thrust away the image of this lawful head of his tribe as an unworthy inheritor of the high tradition; but now that he stood there watching the man’s every movement with such passionate interest he was conscious to his absolute astonishment of a mounting feeling towards him, the quality of which disturbed him to the centre of his soul. And the curious thing was that the dominant strain in this feeling was neither admiration nor awe. It was an up-welling of fierce protective pity.

Owen’s presence affected him with the tremulous heart-beating feeling such as a young savage might experience who finds that the god of his race — upon whose rough image he had long cast a negligent and even critical eye — has suddenly appeared to him in the wistful and helpless beauty of his real identity out of that familiar and neglected shrine. It was partly the scrupulous delicacy of the man’s forked beard and of the thin gold thread round the brow that evoked this feeling, for in some curious way these details bore an infinitely pathetic look, as if the figure thus adorned and tended had been prepared or had prepared himself for some mysterious sacrificial rite.

Rhisiart never again got’ quite the impression he received that midsummer afternoon, and there came moments when its memory grew blurred. But it never altogether left him; and the Owen he saw that day took his place, easily, naturally and with a fatal inevitableness, on the ramparts of Dinas Bran and gathered into himself their mystic enchantment.

All this while Rhisiart had been clutching tightly the hand of the red-haired Tegolin and waiting patiently till the chieftain thought fit to approach them. Once or twice the girl made an effort to free herself, and the boy knew perfectly well that she was growing anxious about Mad Huw who was behaving rather oddly.

The sight of Glyn Dŵr evidently brought back to his distracted mind a lively remembrance of the fallen King at Flint; and indeed it was clear that the Friar's mind was grievously confused. Rhisiart expected him every moment to lift up his voice about the late King as he always did in the presence of any new group of people; but in place of doing this he was standing in troubled amazement, sometimes gazing intently at Glyn Dŵr and sometimes staring wildly about him, as if he expected to see Richard himself.

In her concern lest the Brother should make a scene and prejudice their host against him, Tegolin now implored Rhisiart in a loud whisper to let her go to him. But Rhisiart took no more notice of her appeal than of the voice of a group of starlings who in that crowded court had begun to show agitation.

But at last Owen himself went up to the Friar and both Rhisiart and the girl gazed with astonishment at the scene which took place. Mad Huw must have known that the man was not Richard, but the fact that he had seen them together on the only occasion when he had ever set eyes on the King evidently had a bewildering effect on his troubled wits. Down on his knees he sank and began kissing the hand with which Owen tried to lift him up; and when Glyn Dŵr did at last get him to his feet the poor man fell to blubbering like a child.

At this Rhisiart did let go of Tegolin's fingers, and the girl shot off like a released arrow to the Friar's side while our friend followed more slowly, leading Griffin with him. He paused out of politeness when he was about a dozen yards away; for he saw that the chieftain had addressed the girl, and was now speaking to her in that same low voice in which he had conversed with the rest. He could see what a comfort it was to the Friar to have her at his side again; and he noticed the touching pleasure with which the man watched her as she replied to Glyn Dŵr's questions.

Presently he saw that the chieftain must have said something that concerned both Tegolin and the Friar, for the girl turned and evidently repeated his words, at which Mad Huw, now quite calm and happy, nodded a vigorous assent.

This seemed to our friend the moment for which he had been so patiently waiting; and with a heart that beat in an emotion that it was impossible to conceal, and still leading Griffin by the bridle, he went straight up to his kinsman, and dropped down on one knee just as his mother had made him to do in his childhood.

"Why, Cousin Rhisiart, you put us all to shame with your pretty manners! No, no, dear boy, you mustn't do that, even though I am old enough to be your father!"

Thus speaking Owen raised the lad to his feet and kissed him tenderly on both cheeks. For a second our friend's lip quivered, and he could easily have followed Brother Huw's example and burst into sobs; but he pulled himself together, blinked a little, swallowed the lump in his throat, bit his lip, and stammered something about his mother sending her respects and about his father being many years dead. “And I thought perhaps, my Lord, that you might — that I could — that there might be—”

“Something you could do for me, cousin, eh?” said the other kindly. “Certainly there is; and not only one thing! There aren’t so many Oxford scholars drifting about Wales that we can afford to miss the help of one who is of our own blood. We must talk more of this later, lad, and about Hereford too. But meanwhile — no, keep your horse! we must introduce him to your cousins. And we must present our Maid of Edeyrnion too, and this good Brother of Saint Francis.”

As Rhisiart followed the chieftain towards the steps that led up to the main building, his heart was so over-brimming with emotion that everything and everyone he set eyes on showed like visionary shapes in the translucent depths of a magic crystal. He never forgot that moment. Moving behind Mad Huw and Tegolin, who were both at Owen’s side, the twisted braid of the girl’s hair, as it hung below the bottom of her tunic, became to him in his exultant mood like a blood-red ladder up which he was climbing into a Jack-and-the-Beanstalk felicity.

With each step he took there seemed to fall away from him a great segment of his past identity. The image of his pleasure-loving, frivolous mother, calling him her “little monk,” appeared for a moment and was swallowed up. The image of Morris Stove bending over their Oxford fire and pouring forth disparagements of Owen materialized for a second, like a bubble on a stream, and was lost forever.

Before he knew where he was he found himself confronted by the assembled group of all his fellow-travellers. The Abbot was talking earnestly to a portly lady dressed in a thick green mantle over which fell a crimson scarf; Master Brut was being politely questioned by a dark anxious-looking man of about thirty who bore an obvious resemblance to the matron in the green mantle.

A servant was leading away the Abbot's charger while another had just laid his hand on the bridle of Master Brut's mare. But stroking the roan's silky flanks, and being talked to by the commentator upon Saint Thomas across the animal's back, was a startling vision of girlish loveliness.

Rhisiart's politeness altogether deserted him under the shock of this apparition, so that in place of falling on his knee as he had done before, he merely lifted the fingers of the portly Arglwyddes to his lips and responded as vacantly as any Hereford clown to the stiff greeting of the lady's eldest son.

"Come here, Catharine," cried her father, "and don't stare at our cousin as if he were a Legate from the Pope."

"I think Cousin Rhisiart finds more to look at in Catharine than he does in Mother or me," remarked Griffith ab Owen in a penetrating high-pitched voice that was totally at variance with his stocky figure.

"Answer that question, Catharine, that Father Pascentius asked you," said the Arglwyddes, "before you run away."

"You see," said Owen quickly laying his hand on Rhisiart's shoulder, "you're a member of the family already! We're scolding you and our little Catharine as if you'd been brought up in the same nursery! No, no! Kiss your cousin properly, my pretty! You give him as cold, shy, and distant a cheek as if he were young Grey of Ruthin!"

"Catharine has answered my question already," said the theologian placidly, and Rhisiart, as the blood receded from his flushed face, enquired with studied ceremony of the Arglwyddes whether he might accompany the servant to the stable so that he might know where to find his horse.

“Our cousin doesn’t trust you, Gwalchmai,” said Griffith to the man who was waiting at the mare’s head and had already possessed himself of Griffin’s reins. “He thinks your Welsh oats will be thin fare after his English ones.”

The fellow evidently got the drift of this speech, though it was deliberately spoken in English, for he cast upon this bastard relative of his master a look of such hostility that Rhisiart resolved that he would see what was done with the horse.

He found it difficult to move, however, and quite impossible to retort, as he would have liked, to the Arglwyddes and her eldest son.

Everybody seemed to be talking at once, and yet all their voices seemed faint and far away. He knew very well what he wanted to do himself. He wanted to say something, something important; something that had just come into his head. But he couldn’t think, and the man they called Gwalchmai was already leading off the mare and Griffin. He felt like a traitor to the old horse.

But the Arglwyddes was speaking again. “When you’ve stopped staring at your cousin, Catharine, I wish you’d run upstairs and tell Nurse—”

“This is our Maid of Edeyrnion,” interrupted Owen, addressing his wife in a sterner voice than Rhisiart had yet heard him use. “Mistress Tegolin! Come here, child. Yes, and bring the Brother too. The Friar must have that little room upstairs, near the women, so that the Maid can look after him. They’ve been together so long that he’d feel—”

The Arglwyddes came forward and greeted Tegolin more warmly than Rhisiart had expected, and the way she spoke to the Brother too was a surprise to the lad. “She’s nicer than I thought,” he said to himself, “though she’s taken a dislike to me. Did she see me holding Tegolin’s hand? Does she think I’m her lover?”

He still felt that the many voices round him, as he stood at the bottom of that flight of steps, kept receding into the distance, and he still felt that he had something important to say, something that it was absolutely necessary that he should hear himself say.

And there was still that long blood-coloured braid of Tegolin’s as she leaned forward with bowed head listening humbly yet proudly to the Arglwyddes; and he could even see a small withered flower twisted into it where its plaits were knotted. “And we’ll put you, my Lord Abbot, in the blue chamber,” Owen was saying, “and Father Pascentius and Father Rheinalt with you — and I think, with your leave, Arglwyddes,” and he smiled at his wife, “we’ll put Master Brut under the care of Cousin Rhisiart in the ‘Saracen’s chamber’. Some of my good men are subject to silly superstitions, Master Brut; otherwise I’d tell them to give you the guest’s place by the hall-fire. But the nights are warm now; and I daresay you young men will be glad enough to be out of the heat and smoke. The Saracen’s chamber isn’t often slept in, but there are no lack of warm rugs and I — What’s that, little one? Oh, no! Cousin Rhisiart won’t be afraid. Besides he won’t be alone.”

These last words were addressed to Catharine who had whispered something to her father. Having reassured the young girl Owen paused for a moment with an arm round her waist and his eyes fixed on Rhisiart; and even though the boy and Catharine were still staring at each other the lad felt that one of those curious attacks had seized the chieftain and that the look the man fixed upon him had no “speculation” in it.

A great rack of clouds, that had been sending several advance-guards across the sun, now swept in its whole bulk completely over it; and it seemed as if this palpable darkening of the earth had a psychic effect upon the group of persons standing there.

The Abbot who, with Father Rheinalt and Father Pascentius, was waiting, half-way up the steps for the Arglwyddes to tell someone to show them where the “blue chamber” she’d referred to was to be found, proceeded calmly to take out his psalm-book.

“He’d read that,” the lad thought, “if he were dying on a battle-field or sinking in a ship.”

The omnivorous intelligence of Father Pascentius was, however, totally unaffected by this solar lull in the movement of events, and he proceeded to break the spell by approaching the Arglwyddes and begging her in a series of rapid plausible sentences to allow Master Young to share the Saracen’s chamber with Rhisiart and the Lollard.

“If Owen is afraid,” he remarked, “of letting Master Brut sleep by the hall-fire, he surely will see that it would be unwise to allow an unattended clerk in Orders with such an English name to sleep in so public a place and be at the mercy of any dissension that might arise?”

“But I don’t believe there are enough rugs for three guests, Father, in the Saracen’s room,” replied the lady, a little disturbed. “Catharine! Haven’t you gone yet? Didn’t you hear me tell you to go and see Nurse, and explain to her what your father — No! wait, child! You’d better take Mistress Tegolin and the Friar straight up to Nurse and tell her that Griffith Llwyd ap Dafydd ab Einion — and don’t forget to repeat his full name if he’s up there now, for he doesn’t like people to take liberties with him — will have to sleep in the hall to-night. But tell Nurse he can bring his harp down and that if he plays it very quietly he can even refer to Iolo Goch. Oh yes, and tell Nurse—”

But the young girl had already gone up to Tegolin and taken her by the hand; and it was our friend’s destiny to see the blood-coloured braid passing through the gate into the hall side by side with Catharine’s slender figure.

"Is it white samite she's wearing?" Rhisiart asked himself, "or is it that stuff Modry used to talk about, called pali, that Branwen ferch LJyr and Kicva ferch Wyn Gloyw, and Rhiannon ferch Heveyd Hen always wore, and that Modry said was really French silk?"

When the girls and Mad Huw had vanished, Rhisiart felt as if the figure in pali had diffused itself like a spiritual essence through every object he looked at. The heraldic stone pedestals on each side of the steps shimmered with silvery gleams. The velvety darkness of the interior of the building contained a flickering perspective of pali-wearers.

Owen himself was talking to the Arglwyddes now. They were evidently debating the point raised by Father Pascentius about Master Young; and, while this went on, Master Young himself, with diplomatic indifference, was asking Tegolin's father about the antiquity of certain great stones that had been built into the masonry of the steps.

How the man's countenance managed to convey such a feeling of power, when every feature of it, especially the toothless mouth, was so negligible, puzzled our friend a good deal; but he tossed the problem aside, and going up boldly to Griffith, asked him whether he might see where his horse had been put.

Owen's eldest son gave him a hostile glance, almost as vicious as Gwalchmai's had been; but when Master Brut, to whom Griffith was speaking, seconded this request and made some joke about Hereford horses being more brittle than others they received a sulky nod of assent, and the young chieftain went so far as to offer to show them the way.

The Lollard's unfailing sweetness of temper did, however, by degrees work a change in the young man's tone; and though Rhisiart continued to feel ill at ease with him, his boyish interest in the stables and in the Welsh ponies they were shown clearly mollified the man's unfriendly humour.

Rhisiart was glad enough too that they had the son of the house with them when he found that his precious bundle had been taken into the hall instead of into the Saracen's chamber; and when at last the fellow travellers found themselves safely established there with all their belongings, and with a promise from Griffith to come himself and conduct them into the hall when the proper moment came, the boy felt that he had been spared just that particular nervous discomfort in strange quarters that he had been dreading as they approached Glyndyfrdwy.

He was gratified, too, to find that in spite of its being Midsummer Day the Arglwyddes — or that mysterious potentate of the upper floor who had been referred to as "Nurse" — had caused a small wood fire of birch logs to be lighted in the great open hearth of the Saracen's chamber, for the place certainly had the chilly air of a long-unused apartment in a great house.

The Lollard's travelling equipment turned out to be a good deal more extensive as well as more carefully packed than his own, and Rhisiart found himself several times thanking Heaven that the duty of being tactful in social matters formed an obvious part of this person's evangelical principles.

Both the young men — for it turned out that Master Brut, though he looked older, was only twenty-five — set themselves to wash and dress before taking much notice of their accommodation.

Rhisiart did however observe, as after dipping his face in a silver bowl of clear water he rubbed it violently with a linen napkin, that above their fire, where the smoke disappeared through a blackened aperture leading into the central hall, there stood on an elaborately carved stone bracket a large, headless crucifix. He observed too, as he pulled on his tight scarlet hose, and thrust his head through his black armless tunic, that the walls were hung with faded tapestry in which, though the figures had long ago become discoloured with smoke, he could make out several episodes from Virgil's story of Eurydice.

Master Brut's change of garments proved a good deal more fashionable than our friend's, for the Lollard assumed, in place of the lad's sleeveless tunic, a long loose gown of dark blue velvet, caught up at the waist by an enamelled belt, trimmed at the skirt by a thin band of twisted silver.

Master Brut carried no weapon, and Rhisiart fancied he caught him looking with an amusement he couldn't quite conceal at the meticulous care with which our friend arranged his rather pretentious ivory handled dagger; not dangling it, however, in the fantastic style that Tegolin had affected, but fastening its sheath with two short cords to a slit in his tunic.

When they were dressed they took care to throw more logs on their fire, agreeing that they would retire from the banquet as soon as the potations of mead began and enjoy themselves in peace, exchanging their impressions of Glyndyfrdwy.

"They must have disposed of our lawyer-friend somewhere else; and I must say I'm glad of it," remarked Rhisiart, contemplating the two comfortable beds, each of them raised about a foot from the ground and covered with soft rugs, that filled most of the space beneath one of their walls.

"I hope the poor man won't have to sleep in the hall," murmured the other uneasily; and his silence after this remark somewhat disturbed our friend, for knowing the Lollard's reckless goodwill he felt afraid he would get it on his conscience that he ought to exchange places with Master Young!

To distract his companion's mind from such evangelical qualms he began examining their quarters. A rough painting of what looked like a decapitated turbaned head, held up by a mailed arm, and wearing an expression of undying ferocity, hung from the wall opposite their fire; and the young men soon discovered that the Saracen's chamber had two windows, both mere slits in the wall, and so deeply set that, though they were unglazed, it wasn't possible to see much through them.

One of these, no larger than an arrow-slit in a castle stairway, led into the open air, and the other, though the young men could only see a tiny segment of what it revealed, opened directly into the hall.

"Let's see where we are, and whether they keep guards in these passages," urged our impatient friend, placing his fingers on the bolt of the door with the intention of opening it.

At first Master Brut showed lively signs of disapproval of this bold enterprise — even going so far as to lay a restraining hand upon the boy's arm — but when the door was flung open, he took as much pleasure as his companion in the various mysteries it concealed.

They found themselves in a low-roofed, narrow passage-way, which at night must have been lit up, for they could see the iron brackets for the torches; but by day, even on a day like this, it was very dark and gloomy.

"Wait a moment," Master Brut said. "I always make a mental map of a strange place before advancing," and on Rhisiart's giving him an impatient and puzzled frown, "I saved my skin," he added, "in my heresy trial, by making a mental map of the Bishop's mind!"

"We'll talk about that later," said Rhisiart. "Shall we explore this way a little? I think it was that way Griffith brought us here."

"Listen!" cried the Lollard; and the two tall young men in their rich dark attire, the light from the Saracen's chamber falling dimly on our friend's scarlet hose and on the other's enamelled belt, stood side by side, hushed and intent.

A low faint sound, like the sound made by a deeply-convoluted shell when held to the ear, became audible to both of them. It began very low and as it increased in volume it no longer resembled that initial shell murmur, but became more like “the rushing mighty wind” of Pentecostal visitation. Then it changed again and it seemed to the two listeners that it was the sound of distant voices, in fact a confused whirl of voices, voices in different keys and tones, voices of lamentation, voices of supplication, voices of wild and terrifying triumph.

“What the hell— “whispered Rhisiart; and then with an access of sheer childish panic he clutched Master Brut’s wrist. But, following the same graduations of sound in its dying down as it had followed in its mounting up, the noise now subsided into its original sea-shell whisper and soon ceased altogether. Absolute silence followed. They could hear each other breathing. It was as though they were in a tomb.

“Why the devil can’t we hear any stir of life in this place?” murmured Rhisiart; and to his considerable dismay a distinct echo came down the passage towards them, repeating “in this place”— “in this place.” Boy-like he must needs revenge himself upon his own trepidation by a clumsy challenge to this phenomenon. “Who are you down here?” he murmured, as loudly as he dared. “Down here! Down here!” replied the echo.

“You don’t suppose that damned Griffith has forgotten to call for us?” whispered our friend.

The Lollard smiled at him. “If we were really shut up here,” he said, “with that sound and this echo, I should certainly beg you to stop cursing like that! Don’t you remember how Griffith had to get a great key from somebody to open the door we came through? It was when you were asking him where Owen himself slept.”

“By God, you’re right, Master! I can see him now as he shut it and put the key in his pouch! I’d forgotten. Shall we go that way and bang at the door? I’d sooner go that way than the other after hearing that noise.”

The Lollard made no reply. What Rhisiart could now detect on the blurred countenance beside him was a completely new expression. Master Brut’s calm features had tightened into the technical intensity of a man of science. He made various grave motions with his hand, drawing lines and angles in the air; and then proceeded to regard the invisible map with his head a little on one side.

“What the — what is it?” enquired our friend, regarding these proceedings with some uneasiness. “You’re not doing anything, I hope, that’s—”

But Walter Brut straightened himself briskly and replied with eager precision. “As we stand now, with our backs to our chamber, we are looking due north, that is to say, at right angles to the entrance of the palace. That direction,” and he pointed down the passage whence the noises had proceeded, “leads directly to the mound where we saw Owen’s banner. That way,” and he pointed into the gloom where in his imagination Rhisiart could see a veritable dungeon-gate, “leads to the great hall. Do you remember where he told us Owen slept?”

Rhisiart shook his head.

“Well, I do remember,” and in the light of that open door a look of the most childish complacency came into the heretic’s face. “He said it was up the passage leading out of the north end of the hall, that’s to say over there!” and he pointed at the wall opposite their door. “I see it all now like a map. Have I made it clear to you?”

Rhisiart shook his head. He found it difficult to interest himself in these architectural plans of Owen’s abode. His mind kept running on two things:

the unpleasant thickness of the door that made this passage so silent, and the inexplicable sound they had just heard.

"Our passage led out of the hall due west," continued the Lollard, "and, as I said, at right angles to the one leading to where Owen sleeps. You noticed, I suppose, that great latrine we passed before we came to the locked door? It must drain into some stream outside. We're lucky in our chamber, I mean to have one of our own! And I hope you noticed what a modern one it is! I've never seen such a neatly made disgorge. It must drain into the same stream as the common one. Owen must have had it cut in the wall when he came back from Scotland. I've always heard that the nobles in Scotland disposed of their excrement more scientifically than—"

"Pardon me, Master," interrupted Rhisiart who had begun to say to himself, no wonder this chap became a Lollard! "I'd like to ask you one little question. What will you do if this sulky Griffith — damn his soul! — doesn't come for us? Our window's too narrow; and nothing would make me go a step down there!" and he indicated the passage from which those sounds had come.

Master Brut smiled. "Let's have a look at that door he unlocked," he said. "He may have left it open and we're disturbing ourselves for nothing."

With more uneasiness than he would have cared to confess Rhisiart followed him. Huge rafters, dark with the smoke from the torches, crossed the roof of the passage, and the walls, as far as they could make out in the gloom, were partly of blackened oak and partly of rough stone.

They soon came to the door which looked, as they approached it, as though it might easily be four or five feet thick and which soon proved as unyielding to their united weight as if it had been a wall. Rhisiart put his ear to the crack where the hinges were.

“I think I can hear something,” he began. “No, I can’t! It’s a humming in my own ears. Mother of God, Walter Brut, but I believe we’re prisoners!”

The Lollard laid his hand on his shoulder. “Nonsense, lad,” he said. “And you a Welshman, too! I would be less surprised to hear that Prince Hal was preaching the Gospel than that Owen’s hospitality—” But both the young men stepped suddenly backwards, for, even as they were staring at it, the door began to open.

It opened towards them, and with its opening such a confusion of sounds emerged that Rhisiart felt dazed. But almost immediately it closed again, and left them in the same tomb-like silence.

“Come back to our room,” said Master Brut. “I don’t want him to find us here shivering like a pair of thieves!” They hurried back, closed their door, pulled a bench in front of their fire and sat down.

“What would this place be like in winter,” our friend remarked, “if a fire is as nice as this on Midsummer Day?”

“It’s our nerves make us chilly,” said the other. “When I was in our Bishop’s prison it was mid-August, and yet I was always bribing my gaoler to bring me logs.”

Rhisiart was silent. That iron-studded, sound-proof door had imprisoned his imagination.

“Do you often think about death, Master Brut?” he suddenly enquired. “What would you have felt, what would you have done, if that door had never opened again?”

The Lollard smiled and laid his hands on our friend’s scarlet-covered knees. “I should have prayed for the spirit,” he answered.

“I should have prayed for a miracle!” cried the other.

“The spirit is a miracle,” retorted the heretic.

"Owen's daughter — the girl in that shimmery dress."

The Lollard half-rose from their bench and at some risk to the long skirt of his decorous dark blue gown threw on the fire another log.

"That tall little child? Oh, I don't know; I didn't look at her particularly. About twelve I should think — Yes, that tall fair little thing; yes, I saw her. I expect the Arglwyddes has her hands full correcting Owen's spoiling! She looked a capricious little baggage to me. But I daresay in ten years she'll have grown into a sensible and beautiful girl."

"Don't you think she's beautiful now?"

Master Brut shrugged his shoulders; and after turning to glance at the window began making calculations with extended forefinger over the spluttering logs.

"Making another map?" our friend enquired.

The man lowered his hand and contemplated Rhisiart with a grave frown. "I believe I misled you just now," he remarked, "but the truth is—"

"You did admire Catharine?"

"The truth is, this palace of Owen's isn't built even with the points of the compass. Owen's sleeping-place — I believe the Arglwyddes sleeps upstairs with the women — isn't due north of the great hall but northwest by north, and this of course means—"

But both the young men now jumped simultaneously to their feet for there was a low but very distinct knock on their door.

"Come in!" cried Rhisiart in Welsh; and in his excitement he added an old-fashioned greeting that Modry used in her fairy-tales, "and God be with you!"

To their immense relief, in place of the sulky elder brother, it was Meredith who entered their room. He was in the same plain hunting garb that he'd worn when he came to Mad Huw's rescue; but he was perspiring and out of breath, and his clothes were stained, muddy, and disarrayed. He flung down a bundle he was carrying, shook hands warmly with Master Brut, and after a second's hesitation kissed Rhisiart shyly.

"Look after the fire for a while, will you, you two!" he said. "I want to use your conveniences for a moment and wash and change. Griffith and I sleep in the ante-room to my father's chamber, but my mother has put some lawyer-priest there to-night, a fellow they say Rhys Gethin nearly killed. Griffith swears he'll read all my englyns, and eat all the Moorish sweetmeats Catharine bought from a pedlar for us. He certainly looks as if he hadn't teeth for much else! But look after your fire — I'm as finicky as my father over being watched at my toilet!"

The two guests proceeded to obey him to the letter, and, returning to their bench, fell for politeness' sake into a low-voiced rather forced conversation between themselves. Meredith seemed to take an unconscionable time over his ablutions and his change of clothes and long before they heard his voice again they had lapsed into silence, Master Brut even nodding a little in the aromatic heat of the burning logs.

"Now, gentlemen, we're ourselves again!" The young men rose to their feet. Turning to face him it was all Rhisiart could do not to utter an audible cry of admiration.

Meredith's banquet-attire was cut after a style the lad had only seen once in Oxford among a group of students who had been to the University of Paris. The tunic was quite short, leaving the limbs in their tight-fitting yellow hose uncovered half-way up the thigh. His neck and chest were bare save for the links of a heavy gold chain, and his tunic, which was of a rich moss-green, had wide loose sleeves, showing a white satin lining.

In place of the dagger worn by our friend in the manner he regarded as so much more à la mode than poor Tegolin's, Meredith ab Owen wore nothing but an exquisitely-embroidered velvet pouch with a golden clasp, hanging from a belt that was fastened beneath, not above, his moss-green tunic. Round his dark hair, which fell in wavy curls upon his shoulders, was a thick gold "torque" of antique design, clearly a family heirloom; and his feet, like those of his father, were slippered in some sort of soft light-coloured skin, drawn-out, however, beyond his toes, into curious narrow points.

"Don't laugh at my finery, coz," the youth cried hurriedly, "You mustn't think I dress like this often. It's only to do honour to the Abbot of Caerleon. Mother has made Griffith, as the eldest son, put on King Eliseg's belt, given him by Arthur. They say Merlin made it for Arthur's sword. Father's never worn it. He thinks it would be sacrilege. But Griffith cares for none of these things! I hope it won't bring us all bad luck. Mother made him do it. Mother's half-English you know, and I sometimes think she — doesn't — quite — You see it was meant for a belt but Griffith doesn't care, and Mother doesn't understand; and he's going to wear it round his neck! Father looked at me when they were talking about it — the way he does! But he said nothing."

Rhisiart could see that all this flow of talk was chiefly to conceal the youth's embarrassment at his extravagant attire. The young man had blushed deeply when they first turned round; and he hadn't finished speaking before he began prodding the birch-logs with the iron-prong as if to cover his discomfort in a blaze of sparks.

"How did you leave the prisoner?" enquired Master Brut.

"Oh, I ought to have told you before," burst out Meredith eagerly. "He's getting better. I sent my foster-father to find the Scab, and the Scab bled, him and gave him a sleeping-draught, and my foster-mother's looking after him. He clings fiercely to that little psalter you gave him. The Scab tried to take it away when he bled him, but he couldn't open the fellow's fingers. What spell did you work, Master, to turn the Hog into a scholar? Scholar! he can't read or write! It's only because you gave it to him. What did you do to the fellow, Walter Brut, to get this power over him? I believe he'd do murder for you! You'd better take him as your disciple, Master, if my father doesn't want him, and somehow I can't see—"

"Oh my Lord," interrupted the Lollard, catching sight of the stained and torn clothes the youth had thrown down on one of their beds. "I ought to have left my horse with you! You've been—"

The man's concern was so spontaneous and sincere — and certainly to see Meredith as he was now it did seem hard to imagine him struggling and panting and covered with mud and blood — that Rhisiart was shocked by the flash of cold steely anger with which he received these friendly words. His face went hard and hostile and his dark eyebrows under his golden torque twitched like a haughty girl's.

"We Welshmen don't need to depend on our guests' horses, fine as they are," he muttered; and Rhisiart thought to himself, "I know exactly what you felt just then! Master Brut will have to learn that kindness and simplicity aren't enough when you're dealing with us."

He found himself glancing at the Lollard with malicious curiosity while Meredith, trembling with the effort of controlling himself, folded his dirty clothes and carried them to the other side of the room.

Our friend was absolutely amazed, and to confess the truth caught by a spasm of sheer terror, when he saw Master Brut step with complete aplomb across the chamber and pat the aggrieved son of Owen familiarly and coaxingly on the shoulder.

Meredith jerked himself up, and presented to the well-meaning intruder a countenance so convulsed with fury that Rhisiart could see the Lollard draw back as if he'd trodden on a snake. In a flash our friend saw the two men locked together in a deadly struggle. But no! Nothing of the kind occurred.

Meredith drew back a step, with a movement — in his rich dress — like a turn in a dance; and then in place of leaping at the other's throat he made very deliberately a low obeisance before him, so low that the golden torque around his head fell with a metallic ring on the stone floor.

The young man retained this pose of hysterical emotion, or of vibrant malice, or of inspired restraint, for it was totally beyond our friend's fathoming to decide which it was, for quite a few beats of the younger guest's pulse; but when he straightened his back, with a flutter of his loose green sleeves, it was with one of the sweetest smiles that Rhisiart had ever seen.

The Lollard picked up his fallen torque for him and an interchange of looks beyond our friend's comprehension passed between them.

"Could I smile at anyone like that," thought Rhisiart, "and still hate him?" for curiously enough it never entered the lad's proud head to suppose that Meredith didn't hate the man still; though from the easy way the two of them talked, as they left the Saracen's chamber, it was as if they were better friends than before the incident occurred.

As soon as they were all three in the passage, Master Brut spoke of the strange sound they had heard.

Meredith showed a lively interest at once. "I'm glad you mentioned this to me," he said, "and to nobody else. We're all rather touchy about those sounds; and on the whole, if I were you, I wouldn't refer to them — except with me, of course! You've been to the end of the passage? No? Well, there's nothing to see; not even a closed door! The passage ends in a block of stone. Long ago, in my great-grandfather's time I believe, it was closed up. It used to lead — I expect they've told you — to somewhere below the mound. My brother knows more about it than I. They tell the eldest son, whatever there is to be told, in each generation. No! I've never heard those sounds. I expect," and in the dim light from their door our friend caught a look of complicated sadness on his face, "I'm too modern to hear such things. But Catharine's often heard them. She says — but I mustn't tell a young girl's secrets!

"May I shut your door, gentlemen? You'll find it easily enough after the banquet, for the torches will be lit then. Well? Are you ready? Shall we go?"

But when they reached the door at which the young men had recently stood their guide turned. His face was now a mere blur in the darkness and all that was visible of his dress was the white lining of his sleeves.

"I brought the Scab with me," he remarked. "Please be civil to him! And I brought bad news for us all. The King is on his way from Scotland; and Grey is back at Ruthin."

Though Rhisiart could see that he'd lifted his arm by the moving gleam of his white sleeves, he couldn't see what he did to make that huge oaken mass swing towards them on its hinges. When it closed behind them, however, the visitors found themselves in a vaulted stone vestibule into which a confused rumour of movement and voices reached them from the hall beyond.

There were narrow window-lights here through which the daylight entered, making pale the flames of a couple of torches against the wall, and adding a queer effect to the wisps of fragrant smoke that floated up among the arched mouldings of the roof.

"Sit down a minute, will you?" said their guide, pointing to a rough smoke-blackened bench.

Here he left them and disappeared between some heavily-hanging curtains into the tumult of voices.

"Did you notice what he said," whispered Rhisiart to his companion, "about Catharine's hearing those sounds? What a strange life it must be for a young girl in a wild place like this. But I think he's a favourite of hers, don't you, from the way he spoke?"

Master Brut nodded. "As we're sitting now," he remarked, "we're undoubtedly facing the entrance to the hall. That must mean just as I thought, that the building faces — I hope," he interrupted himself, "that that lawyer fellow is being looked after. It would be easy in all this uproar for someone—"

But at that moment the green sleeves and yellow stockings of their elegant friend reappeared, accompanied by none other than Owen himself.

The young men rose. Rhisiart bent his knee and the Lollard his head. Owen approached them with a smile of recognition and laid his hand on our friend's shoulder.

"How nice you look," he said. "Both of you!" he added, including the young heretic with an appraising eye. "I'm afraid you'll think, with your English taste, that we're too fond of gaudy colours in Edeyrnion. Well, it's not every night we wear such fine feathers, is it son? What I came to settle with you two — and his tone changed to something almost apologetic— "is a small point of family punctilio. You won't be offended, I hope, Master Brut, if I put you just — only just — below the dais? You'll be within our reach, so to speak. In fact you'll be just below us, and close to our Bard. But as we must have the good Fathers with us up there, and we know the little points of variance between you and them, the Arglwyddes thought you'd feel more at your ease—"

Rhisiart, upon whose shoulder Owen was still resting his hand, didn’t dare to look at the Lollard’s face. His own face, he knew, was flushing darkly and deeply. Oh, this was an insult — and an insult to him as well as to his room-mate! How differently would his mother, for all her frivolous snobbishness, have acted! These were French ways, like those of the flaunting nobles that Richard brought to Hereford! Master Brut was a truer gentleman, as he was a far nicer man, than any of those insolent priests. And what about Master Young? He would no doubt be on the dais, to make up for his cowardice, and because he was a canon in a cathedral!

But the Lollard’s own easy and friendly words — for he spoke at once, assuring his host that he had never sat on a dais in his life, that he was a simple farmer who always avoided such state-occasions, that his trial for heresy had got him far more notoriety than he deserved, and finally that he would have felt extremely awkward and embarrassed among the monks and the ladies — considerably soothed our friend’s mind.

He caught Meredith, however, watching the man as he spoke with intense concentration and with a curious little flickering smile on his lips.

“He’s thinking what a simple fellow he is,” was what passed through Rhisiart’s mind, “and how silly it was to get so angry. No, by God, I’m wrong! He’s looking at him as if he can’t understand him, as if he’s completely puzzled by him!”

When he had finished explaining why he would prefer not to be on the dais, Master Brut turned upon them all an open countenance of such serene friendliness that Rhisiart felt puzzled himself. “Can he really be a simple farmer?” he thought. Then he noticed that a pause had arrived in which they all stood waiting in silence — waiting presumably for Owen to make some move.

But Owen, though no one but Rhisiart seemed aware of it, had been seized by one of his “attacks”. Doubtless, to the rest of them, the chieftain looked merely like a statesman-like warrior, pondering some nice point of court etiquette, and plucking as he did so first at one side of his forked beard and then at the other; but to Rhisiart he looked like some delicately-carved statue, hung with sacrificial wreaths, awaiting the ritual-dance. The man’s soul, so it seemed, had left his body altogether and carried its consciousness into a different region.

But now with what to our friend was quite a startling shock Owen threw off this lethargy, and lowering his fingers from his beard extended them to Master Brut and shook him warmly by the hand.

“Well done, sir,” he said, “you’re a magnificent liar, a triumphal liar, an heroic liar! You shall sit wherever you want to; but you must come and see me when the banquet’s over” — and he turned to the puzzled Meredith— “you’ll bring him, son, won’t you? — for I’d like to ask the advice of such a liar as you, Master Brut, on a great many questions!”

To this unexpected command the Lollard only turned the same serene unruffled face, acknowledging it with a glance into the chieftain’s eyes, but without even a nod of acquiescence as far as Rhisiart could see. He wasn’t surprised, however, as they followed Owen to the door of the hall, to overhear Meredith whisper in the “simple farmer’s” ears, “I’ll look out for you as soon as he leaves. He won’t stay when the drinking begins. You must have made an extraordinary hit with him. I’ve never heard him speak to an Englishman like that before.”

“But I’m not an Englishman,” Rhisiart heard Master Brut reply; “and your father seems the only one here to know what ‘Brut’ means!”

As the three young men stood back to let Owen enter the hall alone, they heard him being greeted with a cry that made the blood rush tingling through Rhisiart's veins. "Owen ap Griffith, Prince of Powys!" they heard again and again; and then, in words that were yet more applauded, and in which our friend thought he recognized the shrill voice of the Bard of Ffinnant, "Owen, the Elect of Saint Derfel!"

Nor was our friend greatly surprised, when the clamour had subsided and Meredith was ushering them in, to catch the familiar voice of Mad Huw. Not even in such a gathering as this could they persuade the Friar to relinquish his allotted task on earth; but he was not quite oblivious of the spirit about him. "Owen," Rhisiart heard the Friar shout, "Owen, the friend of King Richard! Owen, the friend of the sweet sacrifice of God!"

The first thing Rhisiart did, when Meredith, having safely disposed of Master Brut in a snug position just below him, placed him in a seat at the end of the dais, side by side with Master Young, was to choke and sneeze. The hall was thick with fragrant birch-wood smoke from the fire in its centre, round which what looked as many as fifty men-at-arms were grouped, some seated on rough stools, some lying on heaped-up bracken, into which every now and then gleaming sparks from the fire would drift down, to be extinguished as soon as they fell.

Up and down among the banqueters, servingmen and servingmaids were already circulating, filling the guests' wooden bowls with steaming stew and piling their earthenware plates with meat and hot cakes. Through the high, narrow windows a pale diffusion of the mellow afternoon light of that Midsummer Day fell upon the scene, but not in sufficient strength to make pallid or negligible the bright flames that shot up amid the smoking logs. Jugs of beer and of light wine followed the meat and stew, in the hands of lively and chattering boys, all dressed for the occasion like little pages in the black and yellow of Owen's ancestral livery, and carrying on their breasts the single lion, "rampant and sable," of the old princedom.

As he had been promised, Master Brut had as his neighbour below the dais the striking figure of Griffith Llwyd, Owen's private Bard, whose harp was suspended from a bracket in the wall just above the Lollard's head.

All the privileged assembly on the dais sat facing the body of the hall, Owen himself in the centre, with the Arglwyddes on his right and his eldest son on his left. Rhisiart, as he sat with the lawyer-canon of Bangor at the end of the long table, was able to scan the figures of the whole company; and his swarthy face darkened in a hot excited flush when he simultaneously caught the eyes of both Tegolin and Catharine who were seated side by side.

And what was this? In place of her page's attire the Maid of Edeyrnion was dressed in a rich green gown, almost as sumptuous as Meredith's tunic, while her blood-red hair, free of its braid, flowed long and loose about her shoulders. Mad Huw was safely ensconced by the girl's side, and Rhisiart could not help being touched by the appealing way the man kept glancing at her, just as though he were a child at some grown-up ceremony for which he had been carefully schooled.

"How much brighter the dresses are," thought our friend, "than those at home. And yet," so he commented in his mind, "they're worn much more carelessly, much less as if their wearers were conscious of them, than ours are."

For himself he was most uncomfortably conscious of his new suit; and he found himself wondering whether Catharine had noticed his scarlet hose before he sat down, and whether Tegolin had seen the real way, in modern civilized circles, that young men wore their daggers.

Every now and then he would steal a furtive glance at the two girls; and almost always when he did so Tegolin would give him a frank, brave, encouraging smile, while Catharine would hurriedly look away. Feeling that it was incumbent upon him as a relative of the family to make the Canon of Bangor feel at his ease, Rhisiart interrupted the good man's absorbed enjoyment of a slice of savoury meat-pasty by remarking to him how like a prince of the old days Owen looked as he sat at the board with a great silver flagon at his side and the hilt of his sword gleaming above the dark oak of the long table.

"He'd be fitter for the part," murmured the legal expert hoarsely, "if he would listen more and think less."

"Think less?"

"Look at him now. He's not listening to anyone, or noticing anything! I believe that half the time he's composing these damned cywyddau."

"Look at the Abbot, Master Young! Is that the place of honour by the Arglwyddes' side? How fast he's drinking that red wine! Will he make a speech to the company, do you think? Look! He's telling her a story now, but she's only half-listening. She's watching over her shoulder that old witch with the black wand."

"King Harry," commented the world-wise Canon, washing down his pasty with a draught of beer, "won't have a woman near him when he's at table; but our good natives here are so gross in their cups, that if it weren't for the sharp eyes and sharp tongues of an old beldam like that they'd be drunk before the harp-playing!"

Rhisiart followed the old woman's movements with interest and wonder. Every now and then she would hobble up to the Arglwyddes and whisper something; then she would return to the back of the hall and point out to the serving-men with her staff some group among the warriors by the fire whose platters or flagons needed replenishing.

She wore an amazingly tall stiff cap, from which a long white wimple descended to her shoulders, and her spotless gown, made of some grey woollen stuff, hung about her form in stiff creases.

"She must be the Nurse," thought Rhisiart; and then as his eyes, which were always hovering about the two girls, met Tegolin's glance again, and again were evaded by Catharine's, he was arrested by the sight of Rhys Gethin who appeared to be narrating some murderous personal encounter with the most irreverent and reckless abandon to none other than Father Pascentius. The Father's expression of lascivious interest in what, from the warrior's gleaming eyes and flashing teeth, must have been a tale of blood and rapine, was the more noticeable because of the expression, full of a disgusted loathing of what he heard, upon the passionate countenance of Father Rheinalt.

Indeed, it was clear to the lad that Tegolin's begetter was completely out of his element, and sitting there, separated from his daughter, was angrily brooding upon one single wish, to get safe back to his cell!

"Is the poor monk," thought Rhisiart, "reminded of the Hog of Chirk by these blood-thirsty tales?" Regarding it as a dedicated topic of conversation with a man of the great world, and a topic to which he himself could display some degree of penetration, our friend commented to his companion upon this angry aloofness of Father Rheinalt and compared it with the almost liquorish interest displayed by the theologian.

"I'm afraid the man's an idealist," responded Master Young; and then, with a tone of weary acquiescence in the aberrations of the human race, he added, "I have always found that idealism gets more in one's way than actual wickedness; but the only thing to do is to expect it, allow for it, and discount it. You are beginning life, Master Rhisiart, and will have to learn these things by experience but I can assure you—"

He was interrupted by a disturbance just below where they sat, and Rhisiart saw his friend, the Lollard, pushed unceremoniously from his place by the side of the Bard by none other than the loquacious Scab.

Derfel's prophet was already a little drunk, and in his whimsies and humours had taken it into his head to give personal advice to Griffith Llwyd as to the direction his bardic impulse should take when the moment arrived.

The Lollard himself only smiled agreeably, and found a place on the bench behind; but our friend felt such indignation on his behalf that he couldn't resist calling out to the intruder and telling him, in no unsparing language, that he was taking a better man's seat.

The Bard himself acted like one whose sole concern was to keep his flowing beard from coming into contact with the foaming beer and the broken morsels of meat and pastry from which he was selecting his long-anticipated feast.

Rhisiart had always been told that Welsh Bards were insatiable trenchermen; but he had never seen such a zest for the flesh of sheep and cattle as was manifested by the descendant of Einion.

The Bard had a wizened, puckered little face, like that of a harp-player among pigmies. His pinched nose, pale blue eyes and twitching lips peeped out from his tangled mass of hair like a squirrel from an ivy-tod; and it appeared to our friend, as after a reassuring nod from the dispossessed Lollard he gave himself up to the amusement of watching the little hairy man's reception of the Scab's advice, that his vanity was so impenetrable that not only Derfel's prophet but Derfel himself would have had no effect upon him.

Like an owl under its feathers the Bard seemed to be of so small and brittle a frame that it was incredible to our friend not only how he could dispose of so much bodily nourishment, but upon what, in that wrinkled nut of a skull, any kind of awen or inspiration could find scope to work! The prophet of Saint Derfel, drunk as he was, recognized at last that it was harder to make headway with a bard at table than with spearmen in the field and began to become abusive. So noisy did he become — and Rhisiart could see that the rougher element among the warriors by the fire were entirely on his side — that it became necessary for Owen himself to intervene; and Meredith was sent to pacify the disturbers.

Our friend noticed with satisfaction that it was from the Lollard that this ambassador from the dais tried to arrive at the cause of the fracas, and he also noticed how oblivious he was to the rough usage that his green sleeves and yellow hose underwent as the Scab's supporters jostled him, and squeezed him against the greasy trestles and benches.

Rhisiart long remembered one particular moment of this scene. It was when Meredith was being more hustled than the lad had supposed could be possible under this roof, and when the sagacious Master Young had whispered in his ear the opinion that the Bard being a virtuoso was naturally unpopular with the rabble, whereas the Scab was a born demagogue, that the picture that arrested him so limned itself upon his mind.

Meredith was being hopelessly shouted down. More and more of the rougher warriors were leaving their seats by the fire and crowding forward. The Bard, afraid that someone would meddle with his harp, had drawn an ugly-looking knife.

And it was then that all Meredith did was to raise his arm, which in its loose sleeve rose above the tumult like the flag of a sinking ship, towards his father. And Rhisiart caught, as he watched the father and son, a look pass between them of such weary amusement that everything else in that smoky hall faded away, and the man with the forked beard and the man with the black curls created between them a gulf of intellectual detachment into which all the fever of life sank.

A wordless conclusion was evidently reached between the two, for Owen said something to the Arglwyddes and something else — across the lady — to the Abbot; while Meredith, extricating himself from the press, returned to his place on the dais.

"He's got more sense than I thought," whispered the worldly-wise Canon in Rhisiart's ear. "He's going to get up and speak."

Our friend shook his head. Master Young might know the ways of King Henry. It needed a returned native to know that a Welsh chieftain never rose up at a feast, but always left the art of oratory to his bards and his prophets.

But what actually happened was different from what either the gentleman from London or the gentleman from Hereford expected. Owen did rise to his feet— "And Blessed Virgin!" thought Rhisiart, "I'll be damned if he doesn't look like Modry's Pryderi!" — but instead of making any attempt to forestall his prophet or his bard, he stretched out his great two-handed cup at arm's length away from him, and leaning forward over the table dipped into it the fingers of his other hand.

His rising was the signal for a great wave of silence to flow over the company. It was like enchantment. Where each man stood or crouched or sat — there he remained. But when he stretched out the silver flagon and dipped his fingers into it a second silence followed the first silence, like a soft volcanic cloud following a tidal wave; and at this, and Rhisiart himself felt it, all the petrified human shapes in the hall — those tragic, laughable, fevered shapes whose tumult had been swallowed up in a hush deeper than the mere negation of sound — drew their breath with an audible sigh. It was at that moment that he met Tegolin's eyes and clung to them for an instant; an instant of tension so vibrant that it resembled the tinkling fall of the hands of time's clock upon the marble base of space.

Then he turned back to Owen and saw him sprinkle drops from the cup in every direction; and he was aware of a shiver of consciousness in the people, mounting up and up, until it became one universal living nerve suspended in the air. Then Owen let his left hand fall to his side and with his right lifted the flagon high above his head.

And as he held the cup he raised his head so high and tilted it back so far that Rhisiart, from where he sat, could see the soft white flesh of his neck under his grey-yellow beard. Then, not in a loud voice, indeed in a voice that was almost like a whisper, he uttered some words that were totally unintelligible to the Hereford boy. They sounded like Welsh; but they were no Welsh that Rhisiart knew. But whatever the words were, their effect was electric. Every man in the hall, following Owen with the rhythmic consentaneousness of a familiar ritual, repeated the words he had used; and, after that, with a movement as spontaneous as if it had been practised for a thousand years, they lifted their cups to their lips.

And if it had been an extraordinary experience to our traveller to sink, with Tegolin, into that underworld of silence, it was hardly less of a shock when, on Owen's resuming his seat, the hall became filled with a confused uproar of excited voices.

Derfel's obstreperous representative had already pushed his way back to the fire and the descendant of Einion had already risen to take down his harp, when Rhisiart noticed the old lady with the tall head-dress and black wand go shuffling in an evident fever of excitement to the Arglwyddes' side. Between these two there then ensued a long and intense discussion, to which it was plain that both Owen and the Abbot were listening with absorbed attention.

Rhisiart couldn't see Owen's face, but he saw the face of his eldest son, as the torch-light in that midsummer twilight gleamed on the belt of Eliseg, and what he read there made it clear to him that something of very serious moment had happened or was on the verge of happening.

And then, as was natural enough, the news was passed along the dais till it reached Rhys the Savage and his theological neighbour; "What is it? What is it?" our friend whispered to Master Young.

At first the Canon of Bangor was too occupied in straining his own ears to reply; but presently he turned and, with that smile of egoistic satisfaction with which the imparter of important news betrays his advantage over the recipient, announced to Rhisiart that the aged Iolo Goch had expressed a desire to attend the harp-playing.

Whether Master Young's words were overheard by the harpist himself the lad couldn't tell; but he had never seen any human being isolate himself so completely from all contact with his kind as the Bard did then, pushing back his masses of hair from his ears, touching one harp string after another as if they had been the lips of the dead, and literally drinking up the faint sounds which he evoked as if they had been sound, touch, sight, smell, taste, and ecstatic spiritual absorption, all in one!

The smoke from the fire was now so thick that the noise of loud coughing became audible from many quarters, and when the "Nurse" had retired from the scene Rhisiart could see the Arglwyddes giving a new set of instructions to one of the men-at-arms.

The upshot of these last orders became manifest almost at once, for the great oaken doors of the hall were presently flung wide open, revealing, in the blue-grey twilight, a large throng of peasants of all ages who had been attracted by the prospect of Griffith Llwyd's famous performance. Master Young sighed heavily when he perceived this addition to the audience.

"I understood," he whispered to our friend peevishly, taking unnecessary care that the Bard should not hear his words, "I understood that this was to be a serious council, what in Wales we call cynghor, but evidently it's going to be a country fair. Didn't I tell you," and his voice and manner were full of a bitter contempt, "how he over there misses every opportunity? The man's a fool, I tell you, even if you are his cousin. He's a play-acting fool! Where, I'd like to know, does all this bard business and Derfel-business lead? Here is news just arrived — did they tell you? — that the King's back from Scotland, Lord Grey back at Ruthin, and Fitz-Alan — you told me yourself — at Chirk, and what's Owen doing? Pouring out libations to Merlin, and setting up one Bard on his death-bed against another Bard in his dotage! Listen, Master Rhisiart, you're one of this extraordinary family; can't you manage—"

Our friend's heart bounded. In a flash he saw himself in the role of a trusted intermediary between this cosmopolitan statesman and a newly-proclaimed Prince of Powys. But he soon found that the would-be Archdeacon's final words had a more immediate significance.

"Can't you manage," Master Young insisted, "to get that old trollop over there to bring us some French wine? I can't last out these mummeries much longer. Bah! and what a chilly air they've let in! I must have something more wholesome than this sickening-sweet mead!"

But another and more serious reason now presented itself for the shutting out of the peasants and the night-air. There were sudden cries in the court-yard, and loud agitated voices, and the high-pitched clamour of women; and while Owen and Griffith rose to their feet and the warriors by the fire clutched at their weapons a jostling body of men hurled themselves into the hall, and behind them, against a yell of protests from outside, the great doors were shut and barred.

Everyone in the place — except the descendant of Einion — made a hurried movement to see what had happened and who had entered; and in a moment the cry rose up, “A spy! a Ruthin spy! Kill him, kill him! Throw him in the fire!”

Rhisiart saw the Abbot of Caerleon hasten round the top of the dais, as if to intervene; but Rhys Gethin was too quick for him. With a bound the man vaulted over the table, leapt down into the hall, pushed his way through the crowd, and presently his abrupt, hard voice could be heard giving hurried and drastic orders.

To see what was going on our friend instinctively climbed upon his seat and from this point of vantage he could make out the figure, bound and helpless, and with blood streaming down his face, of a powerful, fair-haired man in the dress of an English archer.

“Kill him! Throw him into the fire!” rose a howl of innumerable voices.

“My Lord, my Lord,” came the deep voice of the Abbot, “this man must be heard, lest his immortal soul—”

“He won’t speak! He won’t speak! To the fire with him!”

Then came the murderous voice of Rhys Gethin; and Rhisiart could see through the smoke that he had taken hold of the wretched captive— “Now will you speak?”

Rhisiart glanced at Owen expecting some intervention, and to balance himself on his stool he pressed his knee against the neck of Master Young. But it seemed to him as if Owen’s soul had fled far away from the whole tumult.

“He’s got one of his attacks.” he said to himself. “But I must do something. I can’t stand this.”

“Now will you speak?”

“Stop, stop!” came the ringing tones of Mad Huw, while he could be seen forcing his way towards the victim. “Stop! he may be Richard!”

But at last there came a sign from the victim himself, and it came in the familiar accent that brought back all his Hereford childhood to our friend’s mind.

“God save King Harry!” cried the Englishman, “and may his—” but his voice ended in a long-drawn death-cry.

There was a moment’s appalling hush; and then, over the whole assembly, there rose, more piercing, more pitiful, even than the man’s last breath, the rending shriek of a young girl; and Rhisiart, stumbling down from his stool, saw Owen lift up his daughter in his arms and carry her out, while scream after scream, cutting into the smoke and cutting into the murkiness of that murder like a knife, quivered back into the hall as she was carried away.

VI. BARDS AND HERETICS

THE DEATH OF the spy and the collapse of Catharine broke up the first part of this midsummer banquet. But more was to follow. Owen had carried the girl away; and his absence was a signal for a wild clamour of voices from every part of the hall. But Rhisiart was amazed at the presence of mind and calm authority displayed by the Arglwyddes. Leaving the dais she called first one retainer to her side and then another, giving them abrupt and decisive orders. There ensued a general clearing away of boards and trestles. Water was brought to wash away the blood of the dead, while fresh supplies of green bracken were strewn on the flag-stones round the fire.

Then he saw her approach her elder son and give him what were evidently careful and explicit instructions as to the nature of the Bard's performance.

"She's told him, I warrant," said the lad to himself, "that he'd better confine himself to playing on his harp and not attempt any improvisation in words."

He watched the lady follow Griffith with her eyes as with Eliseg's great belt twisted so absurdly round his neck the chieftain's son made his way to the harp-player. And he noted how as soon as the self-centred artist had understood her commands and was prepared to obey them she despatched one of the little pages to fetch Rhys Gethin to her side.

Since the monks and the Abbot with them had followed Mad Huw into the body of the hall, and since the legal-minded Canon had slipped down from his seat to discourse to the Lollard, Rhisiart found that Tegolin and himself were the sole possessors of the dais. The girl was standing up, following Mad Huw with her eyes, but evidently uncertain what to do. Her tall figure in its green robe, with the mass of blood-coloured hair framing her white face, brought in a flash to the lad's mind one of the few Homeric passages — and this was only a quotation in a Latin manuscript in his college library — that he had ever seen.

It was a description of the ill-fated Cassandra; and it only came back to him because it was connected with over-turned goblets and a desolated board and with blood and wine spilled together on the floor; but it returned to him often, this impression, and whenever it returned it wasn't only the girl he saw, standing alone in front of that tenantless table. He saw a vision of the strange beauty that could rise — but it was all vague and blurred in his brain — out of the very depths of tragedy.

It came and went in a moment, the impression he got then, but when it passed he found himself already at the girl's side. His approach decided her. "Come," she whispered hurriedly, "let's go to the man they killed. I want to see—"

How cold her fingers were as he took her hand! He glanced quickly at her face; but her smile reassured him; and they made their way without difficulty to the scene of the killing. The men-at-arms fell back with a murmur of awe and admiration to let the Maid of Edeyrnion pass.

They found Mad Huw on his knees by the head of the corpse whose wide staring eyes gazed frantically at the ceiling; while standing at the victim's foot were the two Cistercians and the Abbot of Caerleon, intoning in low anti-phonic alternation certain solemn verses over a soul that had perished without the rites of the Church.

The Maid fell on her knees by Mad Huw's side; but in place of bowing her head in prayer she began at once closing with her fingers the dead man's staring eyes, wiping the blood from his face with a handkerchief she drew from her own bosom, and with deft womanly touches smoothing away all she could of the distortion and horror of such an end.

The only dead bodies Rhisiart had seen hitherto had been the unhappy mangled remains of victims of Hereford justice, and as he stood looking down on this youth, obviously only a few years older than himself, and saw the girl's hair cover the lad's breast as she folded his dead hands, a recurrence of some half-forgotten night of childish fear, fear of the tumult and the violence of life, came over him, the shouts of the street, the howling of the wind, the patter of the rain, and the ineffable safety of Modry's presence and the flickering firelight and the warm bed in which he lay; and for a second he became this stranger laid to rest under Tegolin's soft hair.

But the girl rose up now and roused Mad Huw from his trance. She must have known what was on the Brother's wild brain for she whispered to him something about the dead being alive, and Rhisiart saw a strange swift smile pass between them, as though, by reason of some secret confederacy with Rhys Gethin's victim, it had become unnecessary just then to name the late King's name.

The Arglwyddes herself and her son Griffith now appeared on the scene, and our friend noticed that Rhys Gethin, with five or six of his men-at-arms, was unbarring the door of the hall to let himself out.

This was a relief to our friend; for it seemed better for the dead and better for them all that the corpse should be carried to the house-chapel without having to pass that man of blood.

The Arglwyddes herself, when this had been done, carried off Tegolin and the Friar to their rooms on the floor above, and Rhisiart was consoled for the Maid's departure by being treated as sufficiently one of the family to help Griffith and the pages in arranging the benches and composing the audience in preparation for the harp-playing.

He found himself finally reclining by the Lollard's side on a fresh heap of bracken, the fragrant smoke from the fire quieting his pulses, while he listened with half-dazed senses to what struck him even in his benumbed abstraction as a fantastic dialogue between the tipsy Scab and the inquisitive Master Young.

The Abbot and the two monks having returned from the chapel — the exact geographical position of which, in the corridor leading to Owen's chamber, was now being demonstrated to him by the Lollard with the aid of sundry little fragments of firewood — and having been comfortably installed within a convenient distance of the harp-player and an equally convenient distance of a capacious bowl of steaming metheglin which stood between the fire and the empty dais, Griffith gave the signal to the Bard to begin.

As Owen's eldest son it was evidently this young man's privilege to sit by the Abbot's side in the state-chair, and to represent the chieftain at this traditional performance. In the absence of both Lord and Lady, and freed, as the night fell and more torches were lit, from the formidable presence of Rhys the Savage, the company disposed themselves in easy relaxed postures to give themselves up to what — as far as the majority were concerned — was the great event of the evening.

Rhisiart could see that Griffith was abstracted as he sat in his father's chair, and it was clear that the impatient Abbot was chafing for something to happen more germane to the cause for which he had come so far; and as for Father Rheinalt our friend felt that like himself the unsociable monk was struggling against a strong tendency to fall asleep. Like himself too, Tegolin's parent kept casting furtive glances at the particular door that led in the direction marked on Master Brut's invisible map as north-west by north.

Both the monk and the youth had evidently come to link this “north-west by north,” as they sat in the hall, with the apparition of desirable shapes, and the more the birch-tree smoke and the heady, sweet, hot mead drowsed their senses the more did they hope against hope that this blessed quarter of the compass would repeat its beneficence.

Rhisiart indeed, as he stretched himself out in the fire-light by the Lollard’s side, soon reached such a point of confused expectancy that the dusky portals of this particular exit managed at once to shimmer like pali and to gleam like blood-red hair.

But the son of Dafydd ab Einion had now really begun to play, and though the Scab might criticize and the Canon of Bangor might groan at such irrelevance, the mass of the audience, soldiers, servants, and pages alike, were caught up into an ecstasy of response.

Large as the place was it was crowded from wall to wall. New groups of people had been slipping in all the while ever since the murder of the spy. Almost the whole of Owen’s enormous household must have been present, together with a considerable percentage of countryfolk from the vicinity who possessed friends at court to smuggle them through the kitchens.

At first the Bard played very low and almost timorously; but as he warmed to his task his fingers seemed to gather strength and swiftness and his whole personality seemed to melt into the instrument and become an organic part of it, so that it appeared to Rhisiart as if that little wizened head, small and brittle as a nut under a mass of foliage, were a physical portion of the harp, and as if the harp itself, endowed with a figure-head of its own, were plucking at its own breast and making music of its own heart-strings.

The man was so little and the harp was so large, and he threw himself with such absolute abandonment into every motion he made, that another impression our friend received was that of an aged “atomy”, or fluttering insect, clambering at intense speed up and down the shining strings, and, as it moved, evoking all manner of subtle halftones and fractional modulations such as are audible to the sub-human ears of the creatures of the air, but until touched by this winged scarab of divination inaudible to the ears of men!

And then without leaving behind these hummings and dronings, these wailings and whimperings, these gnat-cries and shard-borne moans, this singular virtuoso began invading the sky and plundering from its invisible registrations such sounds as the screaming of eagles, the croaking of ravens, the quiverings of larks.

But the spirit of the descendant of Einion was not content with these limited regions of naturalistic vocalization; though even by this time, as our friend gazed at him through the smoke, the little head with its hairy burden had vanished completely, and a towering, formless, shapeless personality had taken its place, an irresistible, non-human personality that shook the notes out of the frightened harp as a god might shake music out of a shell.

But it was Nature’s more grandiose reservoir of sounds that the spirit dominating these obedient strings now began to ransack. Sweeping the instrument with stronger fingers, till it seemed as if more than a mere framework of strings responded to his touch, he began to evoke the winds in their voyagings, the cataracts in their crashing falls, the wild rains in their torrents.

The Hereford boy was sitting straight up now, hugging his knees. All lethargy had passed from him, as apparently it had from that whole crowded assembly. He ceased turning his glance “north-west by north.” Even the tipsy Scab had been reduced to silence and Owen’s eldest son had stopped fidgetting in his chair. The Abbot had pulled out his psalter and put it back again many times, not knowing what he did.

The Lollard had risen to his feet. Master Young himself had allowed the fate of nations to recede into the background, while his toothless mouth became as round as a wood-pecker's hole.

A queer sensation began to invade Rhisiart's nerves, as if not the harp alone but the whole torchlit hall were the instrument the obsessed player was using, and as if his own secretest fibres, and those of all the company about him, had become the strings at which the man was tearing.

But what was this? Lost in his blind inspiration, the player had forgotten the Arglwyddes' command that the harp only was to speak. At first with low sounds that seemed hardly human syllables, and then, as he went on, with words that took their meaning as well as their music from the notes that accompanied them, he began a celebration of his Lord's prowess in battle. "With a broken sword," he said, "the son of Griffith Fychan mowed down the enemies of King Richard! With a red flamingo's feather in his helm he flamed through the battle, and the sound of his onslaught was like the sound of the waves of the sea when they roar over the sand-dunes! The dead, the dead fight for the son of Griffith Fychan, and the spirits of the air gather about the rush of his onset, like the winds out of their dark pavilions in the track of the hurricane!"

As the man's voice rose in his wild excitement the notes of the harp seemed sometimes to follow, sometimes to lead his utterance; but what Rhisiart, as he listened, found most extraordinary was the way a certain hard, clear, conscious, almost cold intention continued to retain in the midst of the wildest excursions of his frenzy the symphonic unity of his performance.

He went back upon himself, he gathered up his earlier motifs, he reverted to those hummings and whisperings, like the vague stirrings in the air of thousands of summer afternoons. He reverted to the screaming of eagles, to the pipings of curlews, to the cawings of rooks.

Into the rhythm of the hooves of Owen's war-horse, into the rush of the flying track of that flamingo feather, into the cleaving of skulls under that broken sword, he tossed the roar of the falling cataracts he had plundered, he flung the wailing of the journeying winds he had invoked.

Rhisiart couldn't follow all the words he used. Many of them were old archaic words, words borrowed from Taliesin, from Aneurin, from Llywarch Hen. Some of them he suspected to be words coined for the occasion by the Bard himself. Nor could he follow all the strange rhythms of the accompaniment. Many of these seemed to him to be conjured up out of the very abysses of prehistoric time. He heard the crashing of ice-floes in the glacial era; he heard the moaning of winds in forests roamed by mammoths; he heard the hissing of the lava in prehistoric volcanoes as it was drowned in the tidal waves of nameless seas.

There came a point when the lad actually couldn't see the form of the man who was playing. A cloud of conjured-up shapes, like the shapes of the first day of creation, blotted him out. The descendant of Einion had ceased to be a harpist in a smoky hall. He had become the beating of immortal wings in a great void! He had become the breath of the ultimate spirit moving on the face of the waters.

"The poor little hairy man!" Rhisiart heard Master Young exclaim with a gasp of wonder to Derfel's prophet. "He'll fall down in a fit soon. He ought to be stopped."

"Hush! for Christ's sake!" responded the Scab. And our friend, rising like a deep-sea fish, or descending like an empyrean-bird, from the regions into which he had been transported, said to himself that a player who could make Master Young sentimental and the Scab cry “Hush! for Christ’s sake!” must indeed be an artist.

“But what in the Virgin’s name—”

The startling, indeed it might be called the shocking, effect of the sudden cessation of the Bard’s performance was felt by everybody in the hall.

Owen’s son jumped up from his chair and stood transfixed. The Abbot and the two monks crossed themselves as if in the presence of something supernatural. Rhisiart himself leapt to his feet, and the Scab and Master Young rose so hurriedly that their bench fell with a thud on the flag-stones.

Borne in on a litter, upon which rugs and cushions had been hurriedly flung, appeared a tall lean figure, with a drooping red moustache, hollow eye-sockets in which burned a pair of literally blazing eyes, a high, bald, unwrinkled brow, upon which the torch-light as it flickered shone like pallid gold, and a thin elongated neck, whose veins and muscles, as the man lifted his head, seemed to be almost anatomical, so naked of flesh they were!

Straight up in his litter the man heaved himself, leaning on his own wasted arms; and it seemed as if his blazing eyes swept round upon every separate person in the company as if they were searching for someone in particular. The dying man was carried slowly and carefully by four men-at-arms, while Owen himself, his face cold and hard with the emotion he was at pains to control, walked by the side of the litter, every now and then bending down with his hand on the man’s shoulder, rather, it seemed, to catch the murmur of his wishes than to prevent him from rising.

They carried him straight towards the fire but very slowly; and he might have been Owen’s father from the impassioned solicitude the chieftain displayed, holding back with difficulty, as must have been clear to all, the tempest of emotion he felt. Soldiers, archers, servants, guests and pages —

all crowded round the dying man. Many fell on their knees. There was the sound of the weeping of women, and harsher and stranger than that the hoarse heart-shaken sobs of battle-scarred veterans.

Rhisiart in an impulse of shyness and awe fell back as the cortège advanced, and so did his friend, the Lollard; but the Scab and Master Young moved forward to meet the litter, and even tried to draw some notice to themselves from the absorbed Owen.

When the bearers reached the fire they put down the litter, which was really a sort of wooden couch, and themselves drew back, leaving Owen alone by the dying man's side.

The great Bard — and our friend was near enough now to see that he was much older than his red moustache implied — was evidently struggling desperately to make clear to the chieftain something that he wanted done; but though he had the physical strength to hold himself erect his voice came in feeble sighs, weak and faint, and was accompanied by a curious whistling sound that was distressing to hear.

Rhisiart could see that Owen couldn't catch the import of what he was struggling to say, and the scene grew more and more painful, great drops of sweat appearing on the chieftain's brow and unmistakable flashes of angry impatience in the Bard's burning eyes.

At last Owen straightened himself and glanced hopelessly round. He caught Rhisiart's eye and beckoned to him.

"Where is Meredith?" he murmured when the lad approached. Griffith ab Owen, who was standing near by, caught this whisper, and as Rhisiart turned to look for Meredith, he saw the elder brother's face grow suddenly distorted with passion and saw him snatch Eliseg's belt from his neck and fling it upon the foot of the litter.

Owen himself seemed totally oblivious of his son's anger and he stared at the sacred belt as if it had dropped down from the ceiling.

To Rhisiart's immense relief he now caught sight of Meredith's green tunic and yellow hose, and he called out to him that he was wanted.

Owen was still staring at Eliseg's belt as if he had never seen it before.

"It's one of his attacks," our friend said to himself; and when his eyes met those of the dying man he caught such a desperate appeal in them that he couldn't bear it.

"Perhaps, my Lord," he cried impetuously, facing that forked beard in his rashness, "the other bard would understand him!" He could see that Iolo the Red understood his words for the great bald head was slightly shaken, but Owen mechanically obeyed his young cousin's hint and summoned his harp-player to his side.

Griffith Llwyd ap Dafydd ab Einion, oblivious of everyone and everything, was just then meticulously wiping every separate string of his harp with a piece of cloth; but to our friend's surprise he obeyed his lord's summons and came forward, his slight frame staggering under the weight of his instrument.

"Put that down!" commanded Owen sternly, but the Bard took no more notice of his words than if they had been addressed to the smoke. Dragging the great harp towards them he finally balanced it against the knee of the dying Iolo, and then bending down kissed one of the poet's knotted hands as it pressed against the side of the litter.

Pantingly and feebly came another desperate gust of whistling words; but it was clear to Rhisiart that though the harp-player was able well enough to follow the first wind of creation he could make nothing at all of this same mystic breath when in its sighings and groanings it expressed the heart's desire of a dying man.

Meredith was with them now and it was obvious that with his failure to understand what Iolo was trying to say Owen gave up all hope.

The old man was getting more and more desperate. He kept rolling his eyes from one to another in frantic supplication, and Rhisiart could see that his long moustaches were actually dripping with foam as he struggled to give to these death-whistlings some sort of coherence.

The Scab had already been pulled away twice from Iolo's side; though it seemed to our friend as if the dying poet himself had a stronger hope of being understood by this disfigured scaramouch than by any of the others.

As for the Abbot and the two Valle Crucians the dying Bard wouldn't allow them to come near him. Rhisiart already had received hints of Iolo Goch's dislike of ecclesiastics. Scraps and tags attributed to him, containing the most blasphemous animadversions upon both the regular and the secular clergy, had spread as far as the Hereford border, and no doubt many scurrilous quips and jibes from the controversies of a much earlier epoch were attributed to this modern enemy of the Church.

There was one moment, and the spectacle of it sent a quiver of agitated though not altogether unpleasant awe through our friend's nerves, when even the powerful soul of the Abbot of Caerleon met its match in a collision of eye-glances that was like the bandying of buffets at a spiritual tourney.

"Priests and bards!" the boy said to himself as he watched not only the Abbot, but even the simple-minded and patriotic Father Rheinalt draw back defeated from this heathen death-bed; "priests and bards — aye! but they'll be enemies to the end of the world!"

The whole assembly, gentle and simple, men and women, were now crowding round the singular death-bed, and an awed silence held them as they listened to the incoherent sounds that came from beneath that red moustache.

Rhisiart was struck by the popular reverence that left a clear space round the litter where Owen stood alone with big unnoticed tears running down his set face into his forked beard; and he remarked too how not one of the soldiers and servants, however eager they were, pushed forward into the circle of the family and their guests.

The harp they had been listening to still remained propped up against the litter, and at the feet of the dying man still lay the belt of King Eliseg, untouched since Griffith had flung it down.

Every eye was fixed upon the face of Iolo, and though not a sob was heard, Owen's tears weren't the only tears that fell. The two Valle Crucians mechanically tolled their beads but did not lower their heads, and Rhisiart was conscious of a certain discomfort as if in the presence of something indecent as he caught the look of devouring interest with which Father Pascentius stared at the great bald head before them and listened to those whistling sounds.

Suddenly the dying man seemed inspired by a new hope. He lifted one of his hands to his face and covered his eyes, and it was clearly a relief to most of the onlookers to escape those wild supplicating glances.

Owen made a movement to support him but he shook off the offered hand. It was plain to them all that the man was desperately, quietly, passionately exerting his will-power in some intense interior concentration. A faint gasp, a perceptible murmur, arose as from one man from the whole of that spell-bound crowd. But an audible word broke from one of them.

"He is calling upon Derfel!" cried the irrepressible Scab. The baldheaded figure before them, supporting itself in that erect sitting-posture by one lean muscular arm, swayed backwards and forwards in the intensity of the willpower he was exerting.

“He is praying to God!” sighed the Abbot of Caerleon. “Into thy hands, O Lord, I commend—”

But to the amazement of all present the passionate tension of the dying man suddenly relaxed. He removed his hand from his eyes. He accepted with a nod, and even with something like a smile, the support which Owen offered him. Thus he remained for quite a considerable passage of time, with every feature of his face as completely relaxed as was his body.

“Jesus receive him!” murmured the voice of the Lollard.

Rhisiart too thought that the end had come; but that terrible whistling sound still continued, and the great head, though the tension of the neck was eased, didn’t droop or sink.

Suddenly he made a slight movement to the left — towards that direction which Master Brut had so carefully designated as “north-west by north,” and our friend following that movement with his own eyes gave so lively a start that the watchers in front of him turned their heads, too. There in the doorway, in a long child’s night-gown, and with her fair hair tied back from her bare shoulders, stood the young Catharine! The girl was struggling to free one of her wrists from the grasp of the old woman they called “Nurse”; and even while she struggled she lifted up her voice and cried in tones that rang through the hall, “They’re killing someone! I know they’re killing someone! Where are you, Father? I must go to my Father. They’re killing some-one!”

Owen signed to Meredith to take his place and swung round. “Let her go, Nurse!” he cried. “Come here, child! No one’s being killed. Be a brave girl and come here.”

The crowd parted in silence to let that white figure with its staring feverish eyes rush into his arms. He hurriedly unclasped the brooch that held his great purple mantle and wrapped its thick folds round her.

“Say goodbye to your friend, Catharine. His spirit’s struggling to get free.” For a second the girl hesitated, as well she might, for the eyes of the dying man burnt more feverishly than her own; but his whole face was illuminated as she bent over him.

“What do you say, Uncle Iolo? Say it again, slower! Whisper it, Uncle Iolo! I can hear you.”

Owen raised his hand for silence. But there was no need. The whole hall had become silent as death. From the Abbot to the youngest page, everyone held their breath. Not a soul present but knew this was the man’s supreme moment, his last chance of being understood.

And she did understand him! How she did was a mystery to Rhisiart. But it may have been that the girl’s instinct in making him whisper was the secret of it. Perhaps all the while if someone had held their face close to his lips that terrible whistling wouldn’t have drowned his words.

“Oh women, women!” thought our young psychologist. “It’s you we want, and only you, at such a moment!” The lad was astonished at Catharine’s calm. Sinking down by the man’s side on the litter she pushed her brother away and let the full weight of that heavy torso fall against her young body. And balanced there, her father’s mantle brushing the strings of the harp and her own white gown touching Eliseg’s belt, she resolutely and clearly, in a voice that didn’t even tremble as she spoke, repeated after him in her own words all he whispered to her.

Rhisiart could hear some little page behind him struggling pitifully not to cough as the smoke from the fire got into his throat, and some serving-wench at the end of the hall sneezed once or twice; but except for that every word the girl uttered fell like a smooth stone into the unrippled pond of absolute silence.

"He says he willed someone to come," she interpreted. "Me to come," she corrected herself. "He says you must all swear on the king's belt to be his men against the English. He says September the—" Here she paused and Rhisiart could see the frown of intense childish trouble with which she struggled to catch the difficult word. "September the — the fifteenth — no! the — the sixteenth. He says on September the sixteenth you must all come here and — and — and proclaim my father Prince of Wales. He says on Saint Matthew's Day we must—"

She broke off for a long tense moment while it became clear that the pressure of the gaunt shoulder against her had suddenly grown too much. Then in something almost like a cry of pain she repeated the single word "Ruthin," and sank sideways under his dead weight.

That word "Ruthin," the name of their bitterest enemy's stronghold, must have been the last word uttered on earth by Iolo Goch, and so closely involved was the girl's body with the man's death-spasm, that when Owen and Meredith had lowered his head on the cushions of the litter, Rhisiart could see the Nurse, into whose arms the exhausted child flung herself, wipe from the front of her night-gown a smear from the red froth that had come from that desperate mouth.

What, however, chiefly worried our young adventurer's mind, as the old woman in the tall head-dress disappeared "north-west by north" with her young charge, was whether the final glance that Catharine flung back towards them included himself in its farewell.

Her father had clearly forgotten her as he bent over the corpse of his old friend, while he himself saw nothing save her vanishing figure; but had her eyes met his, as he gazed after her, or was it an illusion? She still had Owen's purple mantle wrapped round her as the Nurse took her away; took her down that corridor which was now fraught in our friend's mind with all the perfumes of Arabia, but the image he retained of her, the image that remained in its cloudy niche in his soul all the while he was staring at Eliseg's belt lying at the dead man's feet, was the image of her as she had appeared when the crowd divided to let her pass, her flaxen hair all braided for the night and her eyes so wide and staring.

There was now a surge and clamour of voices, loud as the roar of the surf when some heavy postern door looking seaward is suddenly opened, and there was a general rush forward.

Owen was still standing by the Bard's head. Without his purple robe he looked like a statue carved in gold, and he looked younger, too; though his forked beard stood out more clearly than it had done before. Rhisiart could see he was totally absorbed in his grief. He seemed to have grown oblivious to everything in the world but Iolo's death; and our friend asked himself whether that final request or command or prophecy uttered by the dead man was going to be obeyed or not. "Probably not," he thought, as he watched Owen's distraction. But he was counting without the impetuous Abbot and without the reckless monk who'd begotten Tegolin.

Both these men now advanced to the foot of the bier, and their deep rich voices, trained to the intoning of ritual, rose simultaneously above the hubbub. "I swear by the belt of Eliseg to be true man and liege servant to the puissant Prince Owen ap Griffith Fychan as long as my life shall last!"

The rolling resonance of these two patriotic priests' voices hadn't died away before they made room at the litter for Father Pascentius. He uttered this formidable vow in the same words but quite slowly and quietly; and Rhisiart observed that he didn't hesitate to take hold of the sacred heirloom and examine it with curiosity and that as he moved away he made that characteristic gesture with his hands that had become a habit with him and that seemed to absolve all the makers of vows from all the vows that they had made since the beginning of the world!

The clamour and shouting in the body of the hall had now become so vociferous that it was evidently a trouble to Owen; for he kept frowning vaguely; and staring round; but there was a film over his eyes as he did this, and since he neither spoke to quiet them nor raised his hand for silence the shouting grew louder and louder.

“Make the damned Lollard swear, my Lord Abbot!” cried another,” so us can see how one of these heretic dogs takes an honest Christian oath!”

“My Lord Abbot,” cried a third, “make the lawyer swear! Don’t let the lawyer sneak off without risking his neck!”

With that natural human instinct that causes the persecuted to cling together both Master Young and Master Brut now came forward to our friend’s side.

But the Lollard only paused to give Rhisiart a humorous smile and to whisper hurriedly, “Here we are following John ap Hywel again!” before he boldly advanced to the litter.

But in place of touching the king’s belt as he made his vow, he laid one hand on the thigh of the dead man and the other on the hilt of Owen’s sword. The action startled the chieftain, and even for a second seemed to anger him, but when he saw who it was who had touched his sword a faint smile crossed his lips. “You too, Master Brut? Well, well! Don’t go to bed to-night without coming to see me!”

Aroused by the Lollard from his trance, Owen embraced the situation in a moment, with Rhisiart and Master Young hesitating as liege subjects of King Harry about committing such an overt act of treason.

“Make the Hereford cousin swear, my Lord!” shouted a voice from the rear as soon as it was seen that Owen’s consciousness had come back to earth.

“Make the Canon of Bangor swear, my Lord!” came the harsh voice of the Scab. “If an Abbot can be a good Welshman, a Canon can!” But Owen was himself again.

“No need for any of our family to swear!” he said easily and with careless dignity. “And we shall want Master Young,” he added gravely, “to represent us at Henry of Lancaster’s Court. So it would be a mistake to narrow his freedom by oaths and vows. But it would be a great comfort to me and my family, too,” and he raised his head with a gesture so princely that it filled our friend’s eyes with tears, “if everyone here tonight will vow with me, by Our Lady of Valle Crucis and Saint Derfel of Edeyrnion, that we will not sheathe our sword in this righteous cause till Henry of Lancaster —”

He was interrupted by a thunder of voices and a savage clatter of arms, as every hand and every weapon that was to hand was raised in the air.

“Saint Derfel for Edeyrnion!” cried the Scab in an ecstasy, and not only that great hall but the whole of the palace seemed to rock and sway to the shout that arose: “Saint Derfel for Edeyrnion! Saint Derfel for Owen Glyn Dŵr!”

Rhisiart never forgot the conflicting tumult of his feelings at that moment. He longed to have Tegolin’s hand tight in his. He longed in some queer way for the Modry of his childhood. Along with all his emotion at the sight of that tall, grief-stricken, golden figure, and along with all his response to this high moment, he was aware of an obscure stab of home-sickness for the familiar faces and voices of the old Hereford streets; and deep in his heart he was grateful to Owen for saving him just then from the irrevocable plunge of taking the Abbot's vow.

"And now," Owen was saying, "the Arglwyddes and I have only to tell you all that there will be mead and wine in this hall till midnight. Griffith Llwyd ap Dafydd ab Einion will remain with you. He will sing for you of the dead and of the living, of our wrongs and of the day of our vengeance. He will sing to you the glory of Iolo; he will sing to you the destruction of Mathrafal; he will sing to you of the rise and the fall of Dinas Bran. He will sing to you of the great king of our house upon whose belt we have sworn." He paused, while throughout the hall there was a general movement of relaxation, the spearmen and men-at-arms resuming their places about the fire, and the great gate being unbolted to admit the villagers and to relieve the guard.

Then appealing once more for silence he reminded them how the dead Bard had named with his last breath the sixteenth day of September as the day of their re-assembling.

"Let the word go forth," he concluded, "to the north and south and east and the west; but let it be a word for our people only. If a Saxon from Ruthin or Chirk or Castell Goch ask you, 'What is this September? What is this sixteenth?' say in answer that it is the day of the threshing of the wheat and the day of the burning of the weeds!"

While Owen was uttering these final words, Rhisiart watched how the young man Griffith sat down gloomily on a heap of bracken close to the fire, where he bent forward and stared at the burning logs. The fragrant smoke swept over him and hid him from our friend's sight; but, when it swept away, there he was still, his powerful shoulders hunched up, and his big hands rubbing first one shin and then another, as he felt through his hose the scorching heat.

What were that young man's thoughts? our lad wondered. Did he hold all this business of swearing by Eliseg's belt as arrant tom-foolery? Did he despise his father for his womanish grief over Iolo? Did he hate Meredith as an obsequious popinjay in his green sleeves and yellow hose? He couldn't surely hate Catharine? But he certainly hadn't looked at her, as she bent over the dying Bard, with a very tender eye. "On my soul," our friend concluded, "I believe both he and the Arglwyddes are critical of all this Welsh enthusiasm. The Arglwyddes comes from the Hanmers, a good solid border family, and no doubt Griffith takes after her. If these damned lords of Marches had had the least tact, the Arglwyddes and her son between them would never have let Owen go so far. Yes! that fellow warming his shins hates his Welsh blood. He wore that belt round his neck just to mock them; and he flung it at Iolo's corpse as you'd fling down a glove!"

Our friend was so absorbed in his attempts to pluck out the heart of Griffith's mystery that the Lollard had to address him twice. "The Abbot's speaking to you, Master!" he repeated.

But when Rhisiart turned round, the impatient autocrat from Caerleon had hurried on with the matter in hand and was giving directions to the pages for the transporting of Iolo to the chapel.

Owen had already disappeared and the hall was now full of bustling servitors of both sexes, dispensing the new supply of mead in a manner so lavish as to reduce to positive niggardliness all that our lad had ever seen of baronial hospitality.

"Beati pauperes spiritu," began the Abbot in his great bass voice; Father Rheinalt, who was clearly a mighty intoner of penitential passion, answering at once with the next beatitude, while Father Pascentius, his eyes roving wantonly, so Rhisiart fancied, towards the serving-wenches and the mead-cups, followed their lead more leisurely and mechanically.

“What are we supposed to do now?” enquired Master Young of the Lollard and our friend, when the corpse had been carried out. There was in the man’s tone such a mixture of querulous grievance, of amused and indulgent disapproval, and of philosophical patience, that our friend felt quite drawn to him. After all he was from that great civilized world, of London and Paris and Rome, the skirts of which he himself had touched in Oxford, but of which, except Owen, nobody here knew a single thing!

“I believe Meredith will come back for us in a moment,” Rhisiart replied. “For there’s to be a sort of council in Owen’s private chamber; and I fancy we—” He spoke in his grandest Hereford voice, picked up in the sheriff’s court; but the Canon of Bangor had had occasion to propitiate too many proud young men in his time to allow the faintest smile to cross his diplomatic features.

“Hasn’t everything been decided already,” he said, “by my Lord Abbot? I don’t see what’s left to hold a council about! Though I confess it was to be present at some kind of a meeting of that sort that I risked my life with our friend, le Capitaine sauvage. By the way, Master Brut, don’t you think our young patron here, who as one of the family has already been so kind to us, had better warn the gentleman in the yellow hose when he does come back that all the guards from the base-court are in here, getting drunk, and that none — for I’ve been watching these little arrangements very carefully — have been sent out to replace them, and if Grey or Burnell or Fitz-Alan happen to be on the prowl — and we know that at least one of their scouts has been caught already — this feast-night of Saint John would make a perfect psychological moment for an attack! One good bonfire would bring the yard-gates down, and another would bring those down, and where would Glyndyfrdwy be then? Up in smoke, my young master; up in good pinelog smoke, and all these sinful Christian souls with it; though I daresay they wouldn’t take the life of that little girl we saw just now. They certainly wouldn’t if they came from Chirk!”

And the Canon gave vent to a cavernous “hee! hee!” out of his toothless mouth. The fellow was addressing Rhisiart, but he looked at the Lollard; and our friend, too outraged by the allusion to Catharine to meet his eye, also looked at the Lollard, and it was a deep satisfaction to him to see the expression of stern disgust on the heretic’s face. There followed an uncomfortable silence between the three of them, but a distraction offered itself in a comical dispute hard by, between the Scab and the nervous harp-player, in the course of which the tipsy prophet presumed to lay hands on the precious instrument, actually drawing sacrilegious fingers across the strings.

While the three visitors were watching this clash between prophet and musician and observing how the indignant artist wiped each string the other had touched, as if it were a living creature, they heard a loud and prolonged battering at the bolted door.

“Just what I said!” whispered Master Young. “By the Baptist I believe it is Grey or Fitz-Alan!”

As he spoke, Rhisiart saw him thrust his hand into his doublet, as if to make sure of the safety of some secret packet that he kept hidden there.

But even while our friend was wondering what line he ought to take if there were a rush of Englishmen into the hall, a man-at-arms deliberately unbarred the door and let in none other than Rhys the Savage. Rhys was followed by quite a large company of spearmen, many more than the few who had left the place with him, and by the manner in which these fierce warriors stared round them it was clear they were unaccustomed to scenes of such courtly revelry.

Upon Master Young’s face might be read the struggle between two emotions; immense relief at this timely addition to their defenders, and a natural dislike of being under the same roof with the man who so recently had made him bolt like a rabbit.

“Pray God,” he whispered to Rhisiart, “the brute is no drunkard, and will keep the liquor away from those ruffians of his! Well, at any rate, Owen’s palace is safe pro tem; and if it gets known outside that the place is manned to such a tune, those Ruthin fellows will clear off, even if they are on the prowl. Yes, they’ve lost their chance, the fools; just as Owen has lost his by telling the world what he’s going to do — oh, my dear young man, I sometimes feel as if the whole human race is so brainless that it deserves to suffer what it does! But here’s your handsome cousin; and, by cock, he’d make a pretty Lord Chamberlain to the little Dauphiness of France! Where do you suppose he picked up that pattern for his tunic? It’s the very mate to the one my Lord Beaufort wore at the King’s coronation!”

Rhisiart saw Griffith ab Owen get up with an impatient gesture when his brother approached them, and walking round the fire enter into conversation with Rhys Gethin.

“Father wants you all in the ‘magician’s chamber’,” Meredith began hurriedly. “Oh, there’s my brother talking to Rhys! That’s just what I hoped he wouldn’t do at this juncture. Rhys is our perdition in council, as he is our salvation in the field. Griffith is angry about the oath, and angry with my father for mentioning September the sixteenth. He never liked Iolo. He thinks my father was infatuated. He’ll do what we decide, but he thinks it’s silly to break with the King just because of Grey. He thinks the Abbot’s a hot-headed firebrand, and of course” — here the dark youth smiled his weary and whimsical smile— “that’s just what he is! But Father feels, and I daresay he’s right, that if Wales is ever liberated it’ll be through hot-heads and madmen, through bards and Derfelites, through Rhys Gethins and Father Rheinalts, rather than through the counsels of the prudent.”

Master Young’s eyes narrowed in his flat, featureless face and the muscles around his mouth twitched so much as to cause hairs on a wart on his chin to emerge into an emphasis that hitherto had escaped even the observant Rhisiart.

“Wise counsellors,” he remarked in a whisper, “must use all weapons; but they need not keep them!” The tone in which he uttered these last words was so sinister and formidable that our friend had a vision of Rhys the Savage and John ap Hywel and poor Father Rheinalt being handed over to their enemies.

But he caught Meredith looking so anxiously at him that he asked if there was anything he could do for him.

“Perhaps, if you,” Meredith began, with a pondering look at his elder brother whose saturnine countenance was evidently responding heartily to the savage Captain’s discourse; “perhaps, if you were to—” They were interrupted by some new disturbance going on outside the bolted gate.

Rhisiart even thought he could detect the sound of a woman’s voice. Rhys Gethin leapt from Griffith’s side and rushing to the door shouted some unknown Welsh words through its thick resistance. These must have been a password of some sort; for, apparently satisfied by the response, he pushed back the iron bolts. A couple of his spearmen entered at once dragging a woman with them. She was a young woman of a pleasing figure but somewhat plain face; and the poor thing was weeping so wildly that many in that hall half turned to see what was the matter. But a woman in tears who was neither a pretty girl nor a Welsh girl excited little interest; especially as Einion’s grandson had begun to play a mournful and tender dirge over Princess Myfanwy of Dinas Bran.

A certain number of the Captain's spearmen did, however, put down their flagons and lurched towards the new-comers and their wretched captive.

"From Ruthin, from the castle," our friend heard Meredith murmur with a sigh, and in a tone that certainly showed more weariness than commiseration. "They're always finding sweethearts outside the walls and then they get caught. She'll be put to work here or married to one of our men. You needn't waste pity on her. But pardon me, gentlemen, this is my chance to get hold of my brother."

"Shall we try to find this astrologer's cell he speaks of?" suggested the Canon after a pause. Rhisiart hesitated. Meredith had already taken his brother by the arm and led him aside. Instinctively he followed the Lollard, who had already advanced a step or two towards the group round the English girl, for he said to himself, "After all I haven't been invited to this council any more than you, you clever rogue; but Master Brut I heard being invited! I wish I knew whether I am expected or not. I would hate — Christ! how women can cry! And she doesn't look hysterical either. She looks a sensible, sturdy kind of wench — I suppose she doesn't want to be married to one of Rhys's men or to serve under that old woman with the head-dress! But I expect these women of the people don't feel things as Tegolin or as Catharine would."

With this unsympathetic thought in his head he caught, as he was advancing still nearer, a glimpse of such wild trouble in the woman's face that it was worse to see than her weeping was to hear; and the idea suddenly seized him, "What if it's that dead Englishman who was her lover?"

Rhisiart was standing near the Lollard, but still a little way behind, and he noticed that Master Brut was clasping and unclasping the fingers of his right hand, as if he were about to use his fists. "He may be a Welshman," our friend thought, “and he may be a heretic, but I’m damned if he’s not going to give that savage a good Herefordshire clip!”

“Well, I’ll swear to it then,” Rhys Gethin was snarling through his wolfish teeth. “I’ll swear to it on my honour.”

“Come off that, Captain!” cried one tipsy spearman. “Honour ain’t naught on Saint John’s Day!”

“On this then, you scoundrel!” and he held up the cross-hilt of his dagger.

“Here! Here’s me own mother’s death-cross! Swear on this, Captain, and then Hell-fire’ll have’ee if a don’t keep word!”

There was a dead silence in that portion of the hall save for the woman’s sobs, while Rhys Gethin stretched out his hand and took the little iron crucifix.

Rhisiart saw the fingers of the Lollard’s right hand clench themselves and remain closed. A rush of wild thoughts raced through the lad’s brain. I don’t care if it is the finish of me here, he thought. If Master Brut goes for him, I’m with him, Owen or no Owen!”

“I swear on my Saviour,” cried Rhys hoarsely, “that the man who hands over a good silver groat — a good one, mind you, no Scot counterfeit! — shall have this woman, ring or no ring, from this day forward; and the man who lifts a hand to take her from him will have to deal with me!”

Rhisiart heard the Lollard draw a deep breath while his shoulders stiffened. There was a low murmur of voices among the group of men gathered round the sobbing woman.

One of the men who had brought her in kept his hand on her wrist, or, as Rhisiart saw by her face, she would have rushed across to Owen’s sons who were now pacing to and fro on the other side of the hall, absorbed in some heated argument. “They don’t care!” he thought. “I suppose this sort of thing’s always happening.”

Meanwhile there must have been something about that little iron object in their Captain’s hand that made those dare-devils hesitate. And in addition to this, as our friend quickly divined, a murmur of protest had begun to arise among a group of the Arglwyddes’ servingmaids who had been drawn to the scene.

“Well,” repeated Rhys Gethin, “if none of you white-livered mothers’ sons have the guts to take this bitch — and she’s a plump wench though she’s not as well-favoured as some I know — I’m damned if I won’t throw down the groat myself! I deserve one night of—”

But at that the Lollard walked straight up to the man, our friend at his heels. But it was a great silver piece he held out to the ruffian, not a clenched fist.

“It’s more than a groat!” thought Rhisiart as the resplendent coin, fresh from the King’s mint, flashed in the torch-light.

Rhys Gethin took it, tossed it in the air, caught it again, bit it between his shining teeth, and thrust it into the pouch in his belt. “Take her then, Master Scholar,” he said. “She’s yours, such as she is! And if any of you staring fools try to meddle with Master Scholar’s property, you know what I’ve sworn! There she is, Master; and there’s your mother’s death-cross, my son!” and he returned the crucifix to the man who’d produced it.

Then he turned to the woman who was swallowing her sobs and staring at the strange gentleman in the dark velvet gown as if he were an angel.

“What’s your name, my pretty?” he jeered.

Rhisiart couldn’t catch the girl’s murmur; but apparently her questioner did.

"Alice!" the outlaw roared. "Her name's Alice!" And then he burst into a tavern song:

What matter her name, Clerk Waters said.
With books at my feet and books at my head,
There's room for the doxy who makes my bed!

"But off with her, Master Student, or she'll have no tears left to cry tonight. And bring me drink, my kittens, and stop that giggling!" And he turned to one of the girls who were carrying the mead and possessed himself of a double-handled flagon.

Rhisiart felt a more murderous desire to stick his dagger into the fellow's ribs than he had felt with regard to anyone in his whole life. He glanced hurriedly at the Lollard, but that worthy had laid his hands already on the woman's shoulders and was murmuring something he couldn't hear.

"Bring her away," he whispered, going up to them. "Let's take her to Meredith."

The kindly servant-girl had made room for them and they were crossing the hall, the Lollard still whispering God-knows-what in the woman's ear, when Master Young intercepted them.

"What madness is this?" he protested. "Those sons of Owen have no time just now to dispose of camp-followers. Are we never to reach this council-chamber? Let the woman go, for Christ's sake! She'll look after herself all right, now that Savage has forgotten her. Let her go to the kitchen as Meredith said. She isn't such a great beauty. The scullions won't draw blood over her."

Thus protesting, but to no purpose, the Canon of Bangor followed them as they went up to the brothers.

"The crusader's sword again?" laughed Meredith. "There, there, my girl! You're all right now. The gallant Captain's fully occupied. Nurse will find you a place to sleep upstairs, unless—" and he glanced with a sly questioning look at the two Herefordshire youths.

"I don't want her to be—" began the Lollard. "I mean I don't want to lose sight of her till I have—"

Meredith smiled while Griffith gazed gloomily upon the silent woman, as if she were a window into a receding corridor of trouble.

"Till you have decided what to do with her, eh? All right, Master Brut! Our guests' belongings are as sacred as our guests' heads. Well, bring her along. We'll get hold of Nurse. She'll look after her for tonight. My father wants you both in the magician's chamber and you too, Canon! I'm sorry we've kept you waiting; but Griffith and I had a certain little point to settle," and he gave his elder brother the same half-tender, half-mocking smile that he had given the Lollard.

"'Twas lucky," he whispered to Rhisiart, as they all moved to that "north-west by north" door that our friend had come to know so well, "that you settled it without blows with the Captain! If this woman comes from inside the castle she may be useful to us. But don't let your friend worry about her. I don't want to disturb my mother; but Nurse will look after her."

They came to an arched door carved in stone that struck Rhisiart as the oldest piece of masonry he'd yet seen in the place. Here, a flight of steps, lit by a couple of dimly-burning torches, led up to the women's quarters. The same sluggish door-warden they had seen guarding the outer gate sat nodding on the lowest step.

"Nurse!" cried Meredith over this sluggish person's head. "Nurse! Nurse!" he repeated, when only a faint feminine titter sounded in the distance, "Nurse!"

Then they did at last hear the tap, tap, tap of the ebony wand and the shuffle of the rabbit-skin slippers, as the old crone, with an extremely irritable face in the smoky torch-light, came feeling her way down.

“Will you take this woman—” began Meredith. “Her name’s Alice!” threw in Master Brut, and there was something about the Lollard’s insisting on her name at this moment that gave our friend a very queer feeling. For one thing it seemed like a humanizing seal set upon this helpless creature’s form, and for another thing it aroused an obscure pulse of sensuality in him.

It suddenly made the anonymous body of this “woman from Ruthin” something precious and desirable, the neck, the bosom, the waist, the limbs of a nameless victim of chance becoming the sentient personality of Alice.

And indeed it seemed that the woman herself was struck by the tone in which the Lollard had said “her name’s Alice”, for, with a hurried glance at the wrinkled unsympathetic face under the tall headdress, she laid both her hands on Master Brut’s velvet sleeve. “Come here, girl!” commanded the Nurse out of the gloom of the staircase.

“Leave it with me, Masters!” cried the old woman hobbling down the remaining steps, and laying her bony hand on the girl’s shoulder. “It will soon learn its place with me.” She spoke in broken English, apparently for the benefit of Alice, but the effect of her words was clearly the reverse of reassuring.

The girl began to cling frantically to Master Brut’s arm; and over her bowed head the heretic appealed to Rhisiart.

“Perhaps your friend, the Maid—” he murmured.

“May I call Tegolin?” asked Rhisiart of Meredith.

“Tegolin!” Our friend had anticipated Meredith’s consent, and his voice rang loud and clear up that dark stairway.

Griffith muttered something about disturbing the Arglwyddes, while Master Young shrugging his shoulders edged away from this meddlesome boy and gave vent to an ostentatious sigh of disapproval.

“Hush!” cried the Nurse indignantly; and pointing at Alice with her stick she uttered some querulous instructions to the lethargic porter who scrambled stiffly to his feet.

But at that instant there were voices and lights and laughter and hurried footsteps above; and down the stairs came Tegolin, her red braid coiled round her head, a blue mantle thrown over her night-gown, and her eyes shining with excitement and high spirits.

To Rhisiart’s romantic mind there was something annoying in the fact that he had caught the Maid of Edeyrnion thus revelling in the society of girls of her own age. “She wasn’t with the Friar at all,” he thought in a spasm of reproach. “She was laughing and enjoying herself with those hussies!”

It was clear that the lad’s masculine objection to such a waste of sparkling eyes and panting bosoms was fully shared by the old woman in the head-dress. She pointed her stick again at Alice, who now had lifted her head and was staring at the Maid. It was evidently a profound surprise to this English girl to find anybody in this stronghold who was different from Rhys Gethin.

But our friend was now speaking hurriedly to Tegolin while Meredith with a movement of his hand reduced the porter to his normal sluggishness.

Never had our lad felt such complete trust in any living creature as he felt in this red-haired apparition smiling down upon them from those dim stairs. Tegolin seemed to absorb the whole situation in one laughing glance.

“How clever she is!” the boy thought. “No, there’s no one like her.” And then he sighed; and this sigh of his, like so many motions of the perplexed human heart, had more causes than one.

One of its causes was that he had seen the Maid so radiant as she was at that moment, coming fresh from that circle of young girls and the warmth and glow of their admiration. “Neither Mad Huw nor I,” he thought, “can make her happy like that.” But another cause of that sigh was the discord in his own heart brought about by the vision of Catharine and by the queer spasm of sensuality which his pity for this Ruthin girl had excited. This latter feeling still subsisted after Tegolin, followed by the old woman, had disappeared with the girl up the dark steps.

It was still with him when a moment later they passed the open door of the little chapel, in which he got a glimpse, under the red lamp of the Sacrament, of two black-draped forms lying motionless before the altar, with lighted candles at head and feet. “It’s because the beauty of her figure,” he thought, “is so insulted by the plainness of her face! But am I so much more depraved than these Welsh people that I can’t feel pity for a girl without this other feeling?”

He set himself, as they went down the long passage, imagining how that dead boy, if he were indeed her lover, must have forgotten the plainness of her face when he embraced her those warm summer evenings under the Ruthin walls; and he rubbed his fist against his forehead in the darkness as he followed the sons of Owen. His brain felt so dizzy with all the impressions he had received this day of Saint John that he began to envy old Griffin who had nothing to adjust himself to except the smell of Welsh ponies and a strange bed of Edeyrnion straw.

A very different kind of porter stood at the door of the magician's chamber when they came to the end of the passage. He was a youth of short stature but of singularly athletic build, and his bare arms rested, as he stood there, on the cross-handle of a long naked sword not unlike the old crusading one that now lay at the foot of our lad's bed.

"Well, Madoc ab Ieuan," said Meredith, "we've come at last! Has he got tired of waiting?"

Madoc smiled as he moved aside. "You know what he is," he answered. "If you hadn't come till midnight he wouldn't have known it, Masters! He's deep in his books."

"Are you sure it's his books?" returned Meredith. "I was afraid from your tone that it might be—"

But Griffith ab Owen had already knocked impatiently at the door; and at a word from within they all entered, while Madoc, entering with them, took up, as was the custom in that court, the same position inside the room as he had occupied outside.

As the young man had warned them Owen rose from a massive reading desk so arranged that the light Of no less than three brightly burning torches fell full on the parchment page he was deciphering.

"In God's name, welcome!" cried the Baron of Glyndyfrdwy, "and be seated, every one of you! Welcome to all, and welcome to each, and may the Holy Virgin and all the Saints be with you! But where is our good Abbot and the Fathers?"

Griffith muttered a Welsh proverb about the best council being a council without a priest; and Rhisiart caught Master Young scrutinizing Owen with a very sly and searching look. “He believes it’s all put on,” thought our friend. “He believes he’s dodged having the Abbot here on purpose! He believes he’s playing the sort of game King Harry must usually play,”

“They must have gone to their sleeping-place to chant the night office,” said Meredith. “I heard them in the chapel an hour ago, but they weren’t there just now.”

“Go and fetch them, son, will you? It would be wrong to the Abbot to begin our discussion without them.”

“Shall I fetch Rhys Gethin and the Scab, too, sir?” enquired Meredith.

But Master Young hurriedly intervened. “Wouldn’t it be wiser, my Lord, to come to our decision first, and then call the Captain and the prophet? Indeed, I submit to you, sir, that we might make — what might be called a — a tentative decision — and then call the Abbot and the good Fathers? I’m a churchman myself, but I’ve sometimes found—”

“You’re quite right, Canon, you’re quite right,” interrupted Owen hurriedly. “We’ll leave Rhys and the Scab to their cups and we’ll leave Griffith Llwyd to his harp. But I think, my boy, you must fetch the Abbot and the Fathers. They came especially for this, and if they found—”

But Rhisiart noticed that when Meredith had departed on his errand Owen made Master Young sit down by his side on the Oriental divan that extended along the whole length of one of the walls, and entered at once into a low-voiced consultation with him.

Griffith ab Owen began nervously pacing up and down the chamber; while the Lollard proceeded to examine with a scholar’s interest the vast shelves of folios that rose on either side of the hearth. Above the divan with its Arabian rugs there hung from the ceiling an arras of some richly-woven stuff that gave the room a curiously sumptuous look, more like the apartment, Rhisiart thought, of some effeminate Saracen than a warlike

Christian prince; while under the lancet window, through which, in the summer darkness, could be seen several glittering stars, stood two mysterious objects which suggested the abode neither of a Gothic baron nor of a Paynim knight but rather of some Nostradamus or Albertus Magnus engaged in the arts of black magic.

These two objects excited our friend's curiosity so much that he couldn't resist approaching them, although as he did so he noticed that the young squire with the sword watched him with suspicious alertness.

One was an enormous crystal globe supported on an ebony pedestal; while the other was a great square board of ancient wood-work, upon which, on a white ground, were inscribed a series of astrological symbols that our friend supposed, in his complete ignorance of such things, to be the signs of the zodiac.

The lad knew well that it was only the effect on his own mind of that orb of crystal, upon whose equivocal depths the bright torch-light from the neighbouring reading-desk was shining; but the thing certainly did have the power of materializing his thoughts, for the longer he stared at it the more vividly did his imagination conjure up in its orbic depths the three feminine forms of his recent experience. In truth he was still pondering, just as if they had been really imaged in that crystal, upon the red braid of Tegolin and the shining pali of Catharine and the simple garment that covered the alluring figure of Alice, when Madoc flung open the door of the chamber to admit the Abbot and the two monks.

Owen rose at once and greeted them as ceremoniously as a King might greet an Archbishop. Rhisiart tried to stand as humbly, as patiently, and yet with as much self-possession as Madoc ab Ieuan; but not having a sword to lean upon, he felt awkward and embarrassed. He envied Master Brut his calm, frank, unabashed aplomb; but he thought to himself, “I should never dare to behave as he does.”

He couldn’t help glancing at Master Young while these high-flown greetings, almost Chinese in their ritualistic courtliness, passed between chieftain and the churchmen, and he felt a pang of innocent and youthful envy at the flawless manner of the learned lawyer.

The Canon was leaning a little forward, as if in habitual reverence to all the potentates of Christendom. His face was contracted into an expression of alert and confidential gravity. His thumbs were in his belt, and his thin shoulders, discreetly raised, indicated a supercilious indifference to all earthly considerations except that of obeying the caprices of the great without infringing the law of the greater.

To reduce his respect for this perfect demeanour, which was indeed beyond anything he had seen in Hereford or Oxford, our friend was driven to recall the headlong, scurrying speed, mad for dear life, with which this consummate courtier had bolted into their arms when Rhys the Savage was about to rip him up.

The Lollard in his easy unabashed manner had already asked an eager question of Meredith concerning some particular book he had found which contained, so he declared, certain daring free-thinking speculations which went much further than those of which he himself had been accused in the Bishop’s court.

Griffith ab Owen, interrupted in his sullen perambulations by the Abbot’s entrance, silently pulled out from beneath a pile of folios an ancient duskily-painted chair, upon whose back was carved an elaborate coat-of-arms, and in this the Abbot was now installed.

Owen still continued to address John ap Hywel in what struck our friend as rather excessive propitiation, but by degrees he realized that this was the chieftain’s Welsh way of leading up to a very ticklish question, the delicacy of which, following so hard upon all this effusive ceremony, evidently discomposed the worthy man.

As far as the lad could make out, and Owen’s courtly Welsh was interspersed with several French phrases that clearly confused the Abbot as much as they did our friend, he was enquiring now in some subtle and roundabout way as to the possibility of Masses being said for the soul of Iolo Goch, and incidentally whether the Abbot of Caerleon would use his influence with the Abbot of Valle Crucis — in spite of the Bard’s having behaved so obstinately on his death-bed — to get permission for his entombment within the Valle Crucis precincts.

Turning hurriedly, as if to consult a living register as to the drift of these high politics, the Abbot instinctively glanced at Master Young, who was beginning to strike our friend as the kind of man who by his mere presence had the power of compelling great personages to appeal to him.

The Canon answered the Abbot’s look by a few hurried words in ecclesiastical Latin, and then himself with indescribable deference appealed humbly to Father Pascentius, who promptly replied — fixing his insatiable black eyes upon the book under the three torches — in such a stream of scholastic “buts” and “ifs” and “in-as-much-as-we-might’s” that the bewildered Abbot, after producing and replacing his old battered psalter, had nothing to do but to nod gravely several times with his tonsured head.

“What,” he enquired hastily of Owen in obvious anxiety to let the soul of the obstreperous Bard rest in peace, “what are the royal arms against which I am now resting my poor mortal back?”

Owen with a deep sigh of relief, and with the first smile our friend had noticed on his face since Iolo’s death, hastened to explain that they were the arms of the old princedom of Powys before King John burnt the palace of Mathrafal; and no sooner had he offered this explanation than Master Young, snatching at such a heaven-sent opportunity of plunging in medias res, rose to his feet, and while all the company, except our friend who played nervously with his dagger and Madoc ab Ieuan who leaned abstractedly upon his sword, found seats for themselves, began a lively and vivid statement of the present political situation.

The Abbot frowned, Father Rheinalt fidgetted, Griffith rested his arms on his knees and covered his face with his hands, Meredith stretched out his shapely yellow-stockinged legs and toyed, as a woman might have done, with one of his green sleeves, while the Lollard smiled sweetly and innocently into the devouring black eyes of the commentator on Saint Thomas.

"I am, as Lord Owen knows, a Welshman with a bar sinister," the lawyer began. "He knows the secret of my birth. He knows the great family from which I spring. He knows too, I think, that though I serve in my official capacity the House of Lancaster, my heart is always with the land of my fathers, and when the moment comes I shall be at his side.

"But the moment — and this, my Lord Abbot and reverend Fathers, is the point I wish to make to-night — the moment has not yet come. France is not ready to help us. Scotland is still divided against itself. The Holy Father at Avignon" — here all the ecclesiastics gazed at him in consternation— "though recognized by two powerful nations, is still weak compared with the Holy Father in Rome. The Tudors in Môn, though restless and dissatisfied, are not yet strong enough, or indeed united enough, to be of much help; while above all, my Lords and Fathers, the rift between the Percies and the — the King de facto — has to grow wider before the break comes. The break will come — I can assure you of that from the highest possible authority — indeed from the lips of my Lord of Northumberland himself — but they are not ready yet. The Earl of March is in Henry's hands; and though by his marriage-link with Hotspur, who by the way has expressed to me over and over again his admiration for 'our brave friend Glendourdy', as he is pleased to call you, sir, my Lord Edmund is committed to their side, the great House of Mortimer is still in need of reassurance as to what would happen to their Welsh estates in case — well, in case we were successful! My conclusion, therefore, gentlemen, and I have risked much and travelled far, as Lord Owen knows, to lay this humble view before you, is that we have everything to gain by delay and everything to lose by being hasty and precipitate. I heard, as did we all, those noble and inspired words from lips that are now silent, but in justice to our great cause I must say—"

"You made a mistake there, my friend!" thought Rhisiart, when Owen, with a stern gesture and with less courtesy than the lad had ever seen in him, motioned the speaker into silence. "Why the devil must you drag in the Bard?"

But the Abbot was speaking now, and though he was no orator, and though from that old Powys throne his words came in crude jerks and angry spasms, and though before he had gone far he relapsed into the rough peasant dialect that was natural to him, there was an intense moral fervour in his words that moved everybody present. Griffith sat up straight. The Lollard ceased to smile. Father Rheinalt's swarthy countenance gleamed with delight. Owen himself leant forward, plucking nervously at his forked beard.

"Does the God of battles wait," cried the passionate churchman, "till all the wretched pawns on the chessboard of human politics think the right moment, the safe moment, the crafty son-of-Belial moment, has come for striking for the right? No man, I say no man, can predict the future, can calculate the issue, can foretell the event. All we can do is to obey our consciences and strike boldly at the oppressor. It is God, Owen Glyn Dŵr, it is the God of our race, who will give us the victory, not the nice calculations of clever mortal men! The great rising we intend is the rising of the oppressed against the oppressor! It is the rising of—" here he stammered for a word, and then groaned angrily and forgot what he was going to say. "I mean," he added with a noble simplicity, "if we remain pure in our motives, if we remain righteous and Christian in our lives, if we strike for justice and liberty and not for malice and revenge, we shall need no Percies or Mortimers, or French kings or false schismatic Popes; we shall need only our good Welsh spears and our good Welsh Prince, we shall need only our" — his voice became hoarse, and he bent forward, clutching the arms of his chair and bowing his forehead over his knees, while his powerful shoulders shook with emotion— "our trust in the God of our fathers, our faith in the Blessed Virgin and all the—"

Here his voice broke, and so overwhelming was the man's feeling that even so young a lad as Rhisiart couldn't fail to see that he was putting into these simple and even commonplace words the accumulated passion of a life-time.

But Father Rheinalt could no longer contain himself. "My — my — my Lord Abbot," he stammered, leaping to his feet, "and my Lord Owen, I never — I never thought to hear such words spoken in Powys Fadog as those I've heard from the Canon of Bangor. Our land is stirring with the breath of a new hope. From Bangor to St. David's, from Llanfaes to Strata Florida, the clergy of our race, regulars and seculars, friars and monks alike, are crying aloud to the Holy Father to free us from the yoke of Canterbury. With a Prince of our own blood and Bishops of our own blood, and Abbots like — like thee, my Lord — the Holy Father will be brought to know the truth, that — that at the last Day — when the Souls of the Faithful rise to meet their Judge — Wales will be — will be — of all the company of the blest the land nearest to — nearest to — the heart of — of the successor of Peter, of the Vice-Regent of Christ upon earth! But oh, my Lord Abbot, we must strike them down, these oppressors! With fire and sword we must smite them! We must burn their habitations, for they are of Satan! We must tear down their castles! We must kill and kill and kill in this holy cause. It is a Crusade, my Lord Abbot; it is a new Crusade — to smite and burn and kill till there isn't one of these accursed English left alive — no, not in Ruthin, not in Chirk, not in all Powys, not in all Wales, from Mona to Deheubarth!"

He sank back exhausted, and there fell a troubled and embarrassed silence over the whole company. Then Owen spoke; and his words came slowly, gravely, sadly. "He has been deeply wronged. His heart burns. Out of its cruel burning he utters these things. Aye! and there are many hearts between Mona and Gwent that burn as his does. But if the Lord Abbot will allow me, I would like to ask Master Brut here, for he is a good Welshman — a Britonibus ex utraque parente originem habens — as he declared when tried before an English court, what his impressions are of our chances. Master Brut, my Lord Abbot gives you permission, and we ourselves ask you as a favour—"

Rhisiart noticed that the chieftain's astute use of the Latin tongue had its intended effect, but he noticed also the obstinate frown with which the Abbot gave his curt nod of assent.

The Lollard, however, turned upon them all his calm and unperturbed smile; and after a time, so frank and conciliatory was his manner and so gentle was his tone, even John ap Hywel began to contemplate him with a relaxed indulgence. The gist of his speech, as far as Rhisiart could make out, was that it was the destiny of the Welsh race to give a new and more spiritual significance to the Catholic Faith, a significance in closer harmony with the actual words of Jesus as reported in the Gospels than anything at which the unimpassioned and worldly temper of the English prelates could possibly arrive.

The general feeling he got, before the man’s hopeless long-windedness made him feel drowsy, was that any real practical success of Owen would be to the advantage of this new spiritual revival, this escape from materialistic superstition into the “glorious liberty of the children of God”.

But the Lollard’s arguments were so monotonous, and so garnished with tedious quotations from the Scriptures, that our friend’s mind began to wander. His eyes began to wander too from the placidly arguing countenance of his room-mate. They fixed themselves upon that mysterious crystal; and the moment they did so his sleepiness passed away and all manner of troubling images obsessed his brain.

He thought of how Alice had looked when she hung her head and wept so pitifully in the hands of Rhys Gethin. He saw again with an irresistible stir of his senses that contrast between her rounded figure in its scanty woollen garment and her uncomely face.

But was her face so uncomely? Her eyes were heavily-lidded, and had an expression, for all her tears, that suggested to him — he couldn’t have explained why — a nature disturbingly amorous and passionate, a nature dedicated to every kind of sensual response. The longer he stared at that crystal globe the further his thoughts carried him and the more shameless they became. He imagined — but in the heat of his imaginings this unconscionable crystal thrust before him those two black-covered forms he had glimpsed in the chapel! Dead, stone-dead and mortuary-cold they were, the great Bard and the unknown spy, and the merciless crystal seemed to force the lad, full as he was of the hot sweet shame of filling those heavy-lidded eyelids with fresh tears, to lie down there, before that very altar, in direct physical contact with the deadly chill of mortality.

Still, still the Lollard went on; and at last Griffith actually got up from his seat, and going over to the young man with the sword began whispering to him.

“It’s his spirituality,” thought our friend, “that Griffith can’t stomach; but why doesn’t he make us feel this spirit without so much sermonizing? That’s his damned heresy I suppose!” And into our friend’s youthful brain the obscure question insinuated itself whether all this spirituality, so logically defended, was “meant” for a race that produced people like the Scab and Rhys the Savage.

“The Church,” he thought, turning his eyes to Owen’s signs of the zodiac, “knows what it’s doing when it keeps these preachers in their place.”

But Griffith’s restlessness had now spread to the whole company, and Master Young who had sat since his rebuff with an expression of protesting innocence, his toothless mouth open and his reproachful eyes staring into vacancy, permitted himself an ostentatious yawn followed by a resounding sigh.

Owen alone preserved his pose of concentrated interest in the Lollard’s discourse.

“Good luck to him if he understands all this!” the boy thought. But suddenly he decided that his wise kinsman was deliberately letting the man go on so as to clear the air from the electric bloodthirstiness of Father Rheinalt’s “burn, kill and slay”.

Back to the crystal wandered Rhisiart’s eyes, and while the Abbot brought out his psalter, and Father Rheinalt groaned aloud, and Madoc ab Ieuan pressed his lean stomach so heavily against the handle of his sword that its point made an audible scraping upon the stone floor, the images in the boy's mind were accentuated by a red wave of hair falling over one corpse and a shimmer of silk pali over another; and so impishly did the crystal go to work that in some outrageous manner he was actually making Alice cry while that burning hair lay upon one cadaver and those warm childish breasts pressed softly upon the other..

But the Lollard sat down at last, and if Rhisiart had been amazed at the tedious arguments with which he defended his sublime notion of the unimportance of all sublunary happenings compared with the life of the eternal spirit, he was still more amazed at the incredible good temper and complete lack of injured vanity with which he smiled upon them all, and even went so far, so it seemed to our friend, as to direct towards him a boyish wink as he resumed his seat. Were all epoch-making councils of history as undecided and confused as this one? the lad wondered; and then at a nod from Owen Father Pascentius stood up.

"By God and Christ," thought Rhisiart, "what eyes the man's got!" And there was Griffith arrested in his pacing, and there was the Abbot eagerly clasping his bony knees with his great hands, and there was Master Young coming to life again and sniffing the air like a badger who smells a fox. "If he manages Saint Thomas as he does all these people," thought our friend, "he's the greatest philosopher the Church has ever had."

But why wasn't Owen caught by the fellow's black eyes and magnetic talk? It was natural that the Lollard wasn't; for even Rhisiart had the wit to recognize that in Father Pascentius' words the pure clear air of the spirit, which the heretic's earnestness had evoked, disappeared as completely as the tedious arguments with which he had supported it. Every mortal object of human interest, Welsh independence, revenge upon the English, the reign of justice, the advisability of burning Ruthin, the sweetness of slaughtering every living soul in Chirk, all fell into their places, all became parts and parcels of the complicated nature of the unknowable First Cause!

Everything was allowed for, every event, every emotion, every human possibility. A united Wales under Owen was allowed for, to be followed, as far as our spellbound friend could make out, by a united England, Scotland, Ireland, if not France too, under some problematical descendant of Owen— “A child of Catharine’s” rushed through our friend’s mind — and as for the Lollard’s appeal to the words of Jesus, it became Rhisiart’s destiny to learn how these also, even these, must be regarded as relative to the limited comprehension of the human mind; while in the universal stream of the Church’s tradition the Absolute revealed itself.

All the tags and scraps of scholastic, training the lad had accumulated at Oxford fell into an illuminated synthesis as he listened to this amazing speech. And the wonderful thing was it really did seem to have its connection with the problem of whether or not to defy the. House of Lancaster!

How far the Abbot and Father Rheinalt understood what the man was saying it was hard to tell, but they were deeply impressed; and the legal intelligence of Master Young was evidently fascinated too. It was like being present at some miraculous creation, out of the air, of the veritable tree of faith, extending its branches, all relative but all rooted in the Absolute, over every aspect of human controversy!

Our friend was startled, and indeed, to confess the truth, a little shocked, by the attitude of Owen to this masterpiece. The chieftain smiled at the Lollard, glanced at his astrological map, caressed his beard, and finally went so far as to take down from a hook beside his desk a long, dark satin gown ornamented with strange hieroglyphs and slip his arms into its sleeves! He then laid his hand upon the crystal globe; and in this position, wrapped about in that dark mantle, he made our young man think of Elymas the Sorcerer listening to the inspired metaphysics of Saint Paul!

When the theologian at last sat down, making quite unconsciously with his plump hands his usual gesture of universal futility, his black eyes seemed to drink up at one gulp every person in the room.

But Master Young was on his feet again now. “It is clear,” he said in his most insinuating and velvety voice, using his lips as if they were teeth, “that the learned Father feels exactly as I do about this, rising; feels in fact that for my Lord Owen to commit himself to lift his standard as soon as the Feast of Matthew would be one of the worst mistakes he could make. I don’t mean,” he went on hurriedly, for Owen had made a dangerous movement forward, “I don’t mean to underrate the wrongs we’ve suffered. But if we can only wait till more nations have joined the Holy Father at Avignon; if we can only wait till the Percies break with the King; if we can only wait till France—” And he went blandly on, introducing the little Earl of March again, and Sir Edmund Mortimer’s link with Hotspur again, and the Mortimer estates again.

“He’ll come to Ireland soon,” thought our friend. But Rhisiart’s mind wandered off before he came to Ireland. And what abominable speculations that crystal kept calling up! It even set him wondering which of the corpses in the chapel — the great Bard or the unknown spy — would begin to stink first. In veritable shame he turned away from this heathen globe, turned away hurriedly, before it had time to lead him back to Alice of Ruthin and her salt tears. Then, for Master Young still hadn’t got to Ireland, he began wondering why the Lollard’s speech was so dull and Father Pascentius’s so arresting. He felt a glow of pride at his penetration when he decided it was because Father Pascentius included so many evil things in his clue-word “relative”. It was, Rhisiart impiously decided, just as if God had burning black eyes that enjoyed everything as it was on the easy ground of its being all "relative".

Suddenly, and not without wicked pleasure, he caught sight of a wasp moving gingerly and tentatively around the top of the Canon's pointed slippers; and a shameless desire seized him that this great Doctor of Decrees might be stung ere he reached the question of Ireland!

To distract his attention from the wasp's explorations he boldly took upon himself to carry a log to the fire and lay it down as quietly as he could upon the now smouldering embers. When he turned from doing this he was astonished to see the young Madoc regarding him with a look of uncontrolled fury.

"Heavens!" he thought, "what have I done now?"

And then he remembered how in one of Modry's tales there was a young knight whose special privilege it was — and his alone — to replenish his lord's fire.

"This is the third enemy I've made," he thought, "Gwalchmai the stableman, Glew the Porter, and now this young fool!"

But he soon lifted his head and looked at Master Young, who had not only reached Ireland but had passed it and the Mortimer estates, too. Then he heard the Canon say: "And so, my Lord Owen, and so, my Lord Abbot, I think I have made it plain to you why the death-bed words of our venerated friend and his allusion to the sixteenth of—"

"Enough, sir!"

At these words from the indignant chieftain, the Canon's toothless mouth closed on what it was uttering, half of the sentence hanging in the air, and the other half, like a creature decapitated by the spring of a trap, disappearing down the man's throat.

Glyn Dŵr’s sea-green eyes flashed ominously. He made a quick movement with one of his hands, but it wasn’t a weapon he drew but the great signet-ring from off his finger.

As Master Young stepped back in consternation, he moved straight up to him and pressed the ring into his hand.

“Return,” he said in a low vibrant voice, a voice audible to everyone in the room, “return to Henry of Lancaster and tell him he may raise the devil in every shire in England and burn every heretic and every friar; but never shall he — But keep my ring, Master Canon, keep my ring; and when your hour comes, your ‘relatively suitable’ hour” — and he gave Father Pascentius a look like a flung dagger— “you may use it to claim free access to our presence, whether it be here or in some other place!” He drew back from the abashed lawyer and glanced at the Abbot whose eyes shone in sympathy like an old war-horse who hears the trumpet; and then he said in a gentler voice, “Stay with us here for a day or two longer, Master Young; and be assured of this, that when you do return, that ring of mine will be a safe passport wherever Welsh is—” He was interrupted by the sound of hurrying feet in the corridor and a tumult of excited voices.

Madoc ab Ieuan gripped his sword and stood listening intently, his head on one side like a blindfolded hawk. Rhisiart moved impulsively to the young man’s side, and everyone in the room, including the Abbot, rose to his feet.

“Open the door,” said the chieftain quietly. As soon as he was obeyed there stumbled into the room, panting, indignant, perspiring, and yet full of pompous authority, a little, stocky, swarthy foreigner, dressed in a rider’s garb of outlandish pattern.

With the point of his sword Madoc drove back the revellers who had followed, and in spite of many angry and tipsy protests bolted the door in their faces.

Then the pompous stranger, glancing hurriedly round the room, saluted the Abbot, gave Owen a formal little bow, and drawing a heavily-sealed document from his cloak waved it in the air as if it had been an enchanter's wand.

"From Rome," he said, with the solemnity befitting an emissary from the Metropolis of the Universe, "from the Holy Father, in his Holiness' own hand and seal!"

Our friend caught the eye of Master Brut; and in a moment, for some deep instinctive reason, all the three English-bred travellers, Master Brut, Master Young and Master Rhisiart, moved close to one another and remained apart from the rest.

The Abbot advanced with dignity but with a reverence that struck our friend as almost comical. After a second's hesitation the squat little man, whose shrewd inquisitorial eyes had narrowed at the sight of the great crystal globe and the zodiacal map and whose dark eyebrows had lifted a little at the array of questionable folios, allowed the respectful churchman to inspect the document he held.

"It is as he says, gentlemen," the Abbot reported solemnly. "I have seen it before and I know it," and falling humbly upon his knees and with a touching expression of awe on his rugged face the burly prelate reverently pressed the Pope's superscription to his lips. Father Pascentius first, and then Father Rheinalt, imitated the Abbot in this pious recognition of the papal missive.

As soon as they had risen to their feet the aggrieved Italian burst into an indignant account of what he had undergone from the drunken revellers in the hall. Dogs, caitiffs, insolent and ignorant serfs he declared them to be;

and worst among them all — this he made very plain — was the blasphemous Capitano Rossi.

At this Italianating of Rhys the Savage, our three visitors from over the border couldn't help exchanging a smile; though in the lawyer's case it was a somewhat wry one.

But the extravagant airs assumed by this bearer of the Pope's sign-manual didn't seem to arouse any mirth in the rest of the company. Even Meredith looked grave and thoughtful; and the sulky Griffith appeared as abashed with awe as he might have been had this comical little official been an angel of God.

As to our three travellers, however, whatever traditional piety the word "Rome" might conjure up within them, they had imbibed for too long the humorous independence of the shires to feel anything but amusement in the presence of this grandiose messenger from the papal city.

The whole incident was of absorbing interest to Rhisiart; not from any respect for the touchy little Italian, but as a revelation of the imaginative quality of his fellow Welshmen. He was conscious himself of an irresistible up-welling of malicious detachment. He could hardly bear to see the dignified old Abbot and the heroic Father Rheinalt looking like respectful school-boys before a fellow who after all was only a fussy mountebank, and who looked like the leader of a band of Tuscan Mummers whom one of King Richard's favourites brought in his train to Hereford! He felt a warm longing to jump up and down in front of the Pope's ambassador making jeering faces and calling out, as the Hereford prentices had done, "Blanco! Neri! Blanco! Neri! Punchinello! Arleguini!"

It was quite evident that Master Young, who had been many times to Rome and knew in person several of the Papal Secretaries, would soon intervene if this prating little man didn't stop repeating over and over again to the Abbot, in his Tuscan accent, “Troppo avem sofferto!” — Too much have we endured! — and come to business; for he whispered loudly to Master Brut that it was the custom at baronial houses all over Europe for a messenger from Rome to present his credentials to none but the person designated, and above all not to reveal them to local ecclesiastics! “You can see,” Master Young whispered to the Lollard, evidently hoping that Owen would hear, “how necessary such a rule is when you realize how often His Holiness must wish to communicate with some noble foreign gentleman without the knowledge of the local clergy.”

Rhisiart was vastly entertained to note how this well-timed rebuke from a personage who might have been an archbishop’s secretary changed in a trice the tune of the querulous Tuscan. “But I am forgetting my duty,” the fellow now murmured, “I am much to blame — but Capitano Rossi has upset me and I am not myself yet.” Then at last he did move across the room to where Owen was standing and gave him the document.

Owen took it with a bow and raised its seal to his lips, and though he didn’t bend his knee as the monks had done his face remained solemn and reverential.

Master Young at that point glided like a well-meaning and serviceable ghost to Owen’s side. He didn’t offer to interpret the scroll, but he gave the fabric of its parchment an appraising pinch with his finger and thumb, as if to indicate that there was nothing in this document, not even the kind of calf-skin used, with which he was unacquainted.

But Owen did ask Master Young to read and interpret the missive to the company. “I have nothing to keep secret from these friends of mine,” he assured the Tuscan.

As Master Young began to read, Rhisiart said to himself, “It’s just like the old days! Here are we Celts and Saxons disputing over our tribal feuds and suddenly the long finger of Rome is stretched out into our midst and we all bow down and cry, ‘To Rome be the power and glory!’ On my soul, the Canon’s perfectly right to remind us of that anti-Pope at Avignon. A Benedict for a Boniface and Britain for herself!”

Whether it was the heresy emanating from the unruffled countenance of his friend, or whether it was his youthful reaction to the dangerous new ideas which had buzzed about his ears in Oxford, it seemed to our lad that there was something pathetic about the way these Welshmen cringed before the emissary from Rome.

“I suppose their women,” he pondered sententiously, “intermarried with the Roman legionaries.” And he decided that over his fire that midsummer night in the Saracen’s room he would introduce this illuminating thought to the notice of Master Brut. “But oh dear!” he sighed, “our fire will be out!”

“This document,” Master Young was saying, “is what we call an indult; and I will now proceed to translate it into the vernacular. ‘From his Holiness; Pontifex Maximus, Servant of the servants of God, Boniface the Ninth, under our paternal hand and seal, to our beloved son in Christ, Owen ap Griffith, armiger baron in tenure of Sycharth and Glyndyfrdwy. By the authority given to us by Almighty God we do hereby permit and allow the aforesaid Owen ap Griffith’s ordained Confessor to give unto the aforesaid Owen, and unto Margaret his wife, not only in the hour of their death, but at any other time, plenary remission from all their sins.”

It may have been the weight of conclusive legality that Master Young gave to his paraphrase of this imposing document or it may have been that the solemn words “remission of sins” carried a personal poignancy for all present; but there certainly fell a grave hush upon that group of men, and our young friend himself experienced a definite reaction from many of his recent thoughts.

Owen himself seemed the least moved of them all; and Rhisiart noticed that he and the Lollard exchanged a long enigmatic look full of God-knows-what unholy reservations.

But the Pope's messenger seemed to recover his spirits and began to assume an air of almost indecorous levity. He approached the hearth, where the logs, thanks to our friend's interposition, were blazing high, and expressed his wonder at the disappearance of the smoke.

"I've heard of these new-fangled chimneys," he said, speaking in French with a broad Italian accent, "but the Holy Father is afraid to tamper with his walls. How rich you Welsh gentlemen must be, how very rich, to afford — hee! hee! — such luxuries as chimneys!"

Owen gave the man a curiously haughty look and made a gesture with his hand as if to dismiss as irrelevant and even indecent this homely topic; but Rhisiart could see that the chieftain was listening to a second hullabaloo that had arisen in the passage. He himself fancied he could detect the drunken voices of both Rhys Gethin and the Scab out there, and Madoc ab Ieuan had assumed once more that intent expression, with his head a little on one side, that made him resemble a blindfolded buzzard.

The Abbot and Owen's sons were also listening with some nervousness to the tipsy voices outside, and the irrepressible Tuscan was beginning some jest about the folios, when Master Young, who had been standing by himself lost in thought, suddenly confronted the fellow with an outstretched menacing forefinger and said to him in sharp clear French, "May one enquire, sir, if the message you're bearing from his Holiness to the King of England has to do with the new statute? I refer to the recent royal edict entitled 'De Heretico Comburendo'."

Owen swung round on his heel; and the Lollard, as if to bear off some tragic mental image, began making one of his architectural maps in the air.

But our friend, watching the Pope's messenger closely, saw the colour leave his face as he began gesticulating and protesting and denying. "You've got him, Master!" Rhisiart said to himself; and he looked hurriedly down at Master Young's pointed shoes to see if the wasp was still in view.

"May you never be stung till the end of your days!" he prayed. "And I wish to God Owen would take your advice, in place of those drunkards outside there!"

Owen now stepped up to the lawyer's side and, taking not the least notice of the agitated and protesting Italian, said curtly in Welsh, "I thank you, good Master Young! I hope your time will come before any of us expect it. I shall remember there is another Pope."

Rhisiart's impression was that the noise outside had risen to such a pitch that the Abbot didn't catch this last remark; but he fancied he caught the black eyes of the theologian gleam with an ominous comprehension.

"Open the door!" commanded Owen Glyn Dŵr.

Madoc surlily obeyed; and there appeared in the entrance, both of them hopelessly drunk, the figures of Rhys Gethin and the Scab.

"This fool says — says, my Lord — this fool says," cried il Capitano Rossi, "that it's on Saint Matthew's Day we're to raise our flag — but I tell him it's on the sixteenth we're to do that, and on Saint Matthew's Day we're to burn—"

"Listen, you two; listen, both of you!" interrupted Owen, tearing off his mantle and drawing his sword, "if I hear any more of this, if I hear a word more of this babbling and bragging, by the head of my father it won't be on Saint Matthew's Day but on the night of Saint John that I'll raise my flag and burn — and burn Nannau! Yes, by Saint Derfel, Master Scab, I've a mind" — and he lifted his sword and pointed it at the drunken prophet— "I've a mind to raise my flag now and march you both across the Dee and across Ardudwy till we see how you'll stand up against Cousin Sele's arrows! Get back to the hall, both of you, and tell them all, all who're not too drunk to listen, that we've decided in council — yng nghyngor, do you understand? — to burn my cousin's house to the ground, and David Gam's too, tell them! Now off with you both — and no more of this."

Totally bewildered, reduced indeed to a sort of drunken stupefaction, but muttering the words "Nannau" and "Hywel Sele" as they went off, the two revellers retreated and the door was shut.

Meredith dragged his brother aside and began whispering to him, while the Abbot and Father Rheinalt stared blankly at Owen as if he had lost his wits.

"You shall sleep in this chamber to-night, sir," the chieftain remarked quietly to the messenger from Rome. And then, as he put up his sword, "You'll find Henry of Lancaster on the Scottish border if you ride fast, and if the Douglas doesn't catch you! What you heard just now has to do with a family feud; and you'll have to ride hard if Henry's to save Nannau — can you remember that word? — on Saint Matthew's Day. A family feud, good sir, a family feud! But remember, Scotland looks to Avignon, not to Rome; so if the Douglas does catch you — a family feud, my good sir!'"

Master Young who was still holding the indult now handed it to Owen, who received it gravely.

"The Abbot of Caerleon," he said, looking significantly at the puzzled group of churchmen, "is my confessor, and if Nannau is burned on Saint Matthew's Day, it will be one of the sins he must remit." And he laid down the indult beneath the crystal.

VII. VALLE CRUCIS

Rhisiart knew at once, when he awaked on the following day, that he had slept late. The first thing he realized was that his room-mate had already dressed and was sitting, so as to get the benefit of the light from the window, on his big sackcloth bundle, reading à small unbound book.

Our friend soon interrupted this peaceful orison. “Why the devil didn’t you wake me?” he cried indignantly.

Master Brut closed his book and jumped to his feet. “For à purely selfish reason, my good lad,” he replied with his everlasting smile. “I like to read the Gospel in absolute quiet the second I’m dressed.”

Our friend stared at him. “The office for the day you mean — like a priest?”

Master Brut’s smile deepened. “No, my friend, the sayings of Jesus which put priests in their place!”

“Is that a whole Novum Testamentum?”

“Wasn’t Latin the original?” enquired Rhisiart.

“Well, lad, well, not exactly the original,” replied the Lollard as tactfully as he could. “Some authorities hold the view that the Greek is earlier.”

“Don’t they say the same thing?”

“Not always, son, not always.”

“But in essentials they do; they must!” protested our friend, tossing off the rugs and sitting on the side of his bed and hugging his bare knees. His pride was hurt by having slept so late, and he felt the righteous anger of Orthodoxy burn in both his cheek-bones.

"Is the proclamation to the world by 'multitudes of the heavenly host' of the birth of a Redeemer an essential thing?" enquired the Lollard with Socratic deliberation,

"Of course," growled our friend, "if it was a miracle attested by the Church and "recognized by the Holy Father, It is reported by Saint Luke. Well? What then? What are you driving at? Some damned trick of devil's logic I warrant!"

He rose, as he spoke, and began, without thinking what he did, to pull on the scarlet hose he had worn the night before.

"You're not going to wear those?" protested his friend. But Rhisiart, standing like an irate long-legged heron, with one white shank and one red one, seemed to tell him by his glaring scowl to get on with his argument.

Master Brut hesitated. He was evidently torn between his passion for theological discussion and his inherent good-nature. But the worthy man's conscience must have helped his disputatiousness to overcome his tact by persuading him that "he owed it to the truth" to enlighten his stubborn friend.

"What Saint Luke in his Greek," he went on, "makes the angels say is, 'Peace on earth; good-will to men,' whereas what the Church's Latin makes them say is, 'Peace on earth to men of good-will.' Now it is clear that there is an essential difference here. In the one case—"

"Come in!"

Rhisiart uttered this permission with unnecessary violence; but his relief in escaping his friend's logic was so great that he turned quite a cheerful face to the page who entered. This was a boy about twelve, pretty as a maid, with clear-cut features, white skin, and long eyelashes, which, when he shyly cast down his eyes, pencilled themselves with exquisite delicacy on his soft cheeks. His limbs in their tight hose were certainly modelled more beautifully than any maid's, and the "lion rampant and sable," embroidered on his tunic, set off to perfection his ivory-soft neck and coal-black curls.

Rhisiart, under the warm glow which the beauty of this boy evoked, became anxious at once to make his own person as manly and well accoutred as possible, and hastily removing his scarlet hose began pulling on his student's breeches and tunic and even went so far as to draw from its sheath, in order to inspect its edge in a careless and martial manner, his formidable Toledo dagger.

But the dark-eyed page, after giving each of them a timid smile, took no more notice of the dagger than if it had been a brush or a comb. He set up a rough table which he had brought with him; and then, going several times to the open door, where from certain suppressed gigglings that entered the Saracen's room it appeared that he had colleagues of both sexes, he placed upon the table an enormous flagon of foaming beer, a substantial joint of cold beef, a rabbit-pasty, and a platter of hot newly-buttered scones.

Finally he carried in and set by the table two rough three-legged stools, polished smooth by use, but bearing on their shiny surface not a few neatly-cut inscriptions, the amusement probably of many a long winter evening in the Glyndyfrdwy kitchen. Not content with this, having lifted his long eyelashes and shown his bright teeth to explain to our friends that the wind was easterly and the weather unseasonable, he carried to the hearth a bundle of straw and a faggot of sticks, and made for them, to their great comfort and cheer, a blazing fire.

Before he left them to themselves, Rhisiart, anxious for any excuse to keep so attractive an attendant by their side, and with a delicious feeling that he had been transported into one of Modry's romances, called him to their table, and pledging him in a draught of ale and playfully drawing him to his side with an arm thrown about his waist, as he had seen one of Richard's followers do with a wine-bearer at Hereford, he began asking him various questions.

One question led to another; and it wasn't long before such singular revelations began to fall from the boy's diffident lips that Master Brut felt it his duty to dismiss the coy prattler.

Our irascible friend was on the point of making this into a new grievance, if not into a mortal insult, when the Lollard began, in so grave and gentle a tone that it was impossible not to be disarmed, a direct appeal to his honour. Very tenderly and with such real affection and concern that it touched the lad to the heart, especially as Master Brut deliberately used the rustic Herefordshire dialect, giving a touch of nostalgic homeliness to his elder brother's tone, he warned the boy of the danger of these fashionable flirtations with beautiful pages.

"I know the temptation only too well," he said. "It has many times overcome me, and will no doubt do so again — God help us all — but I swear to you, lad, there are no cunning whores in Paris more treacherous and dangerous than these pampered pages; and it's just because" — and he spoke with such frank earnestness that the ribald feeling Rhisiart was indulging, that the whole thing was a bagatelle subsided a little— "just because it's such a temptation to me that I can speak with knowledge about it. It begins with just such toying and dallying as you indulged in a minute ago, which no doubt was perfectly harmless; but after a time, if the Blessed Christ doesn't help you, the thing becomes an obsession. Think of Edward the Second! I've no doubt that at your age he played harmlessly enough with the pages of the court, but you remember to what it led? Do you know, Rhisiart" — and he lowered his voice— "certain things, like what the chronicles say of the shrieks of Edward the Second, have come near to making me an atheist. But of course lots of men who're not kings have known — But pain like that, my lad, when it comes to the shrieking point, is what I can't — Do you know, Rhisiart, there've been times when I've cursed God, yes, cursed him, for making a world where such things can be; and if it wasn't for—" He stopped suddenly, and a strange wild look that alarmed his companion crossed his placid face. Then he said quietly and in his ordinary voice, "But I needn't have dragged in Edward — Christ give him pardon and peace! — our poor late King, Mad Huw's Richard, ruined himself in just the same way. These unhappy men's minions — all fatal, all treacherous — are only grown-up pages. Oh, my dear lad, if I could only tell you all I've seen—"

Our friend was moved beyond his wont. It wasn't so much what the man said; it was the revelation of the feeling that lay beneath that calm exterior. He stretched his arm across their wooden table and grasped the other's hand and their eyes met in embarrassed sympathy.

Then Rhisiart raised the great two-handled flagon to his lips. "To Wales and Owen Glyn Dŵr!" he cried, and gave it to his comrade. "To Wales and Owen Glyn Dŵr!"

Their meal went on after that in desultory talk about last night's events; but as they rose from the table Rhisiart said abruptly, "What do you suppose that boy meant by saying that Griffith and Meredith have left the palace and that Rhys Gethin has gone back to Conway? Do you think Owen was upset by the way things turned out? And did you hear what he said about giving up his room to that ridiculous Italian?"

"And the way he lied about Nannau?" responded the other, as they moved to their bench by the hearth. "He wanted to keep the man from questioning the servants, I fancy. What puzzles me about it all," the Lollard went on, “is Owen’s attitude to Master Young. How could he be ready to let the man go back to Henry, with that ring of his on his finger and without any security? I don’t know what you feel, lad, but it struck me the fellow must hold some sort of commission from Avignon. Did you notice how he was always coming back to that?”

Rhisiart bent forward over the fire, turning his Norman profile to his friend as he drew in his lips. “He’s a clever man,” he remarked after a pause. “He knows more about state affairs than anyone I’ve ever met. Maybe it would be a wise move to play off Avignon against Rome?”

Master Brut smiled. “Oh, you orthodox believers!” he burst out. “Can’t you see how it upsets the whole system for there to be two Popes?”

Rhisiart waved this aside. “Owen must know more about him than anyone else. I heard someone say in the hall that he’s the bastard of one of the greatest of our Welsh families. Anyway, Owen trusts him; and I don’t believe he’d do that if he didn’t know something that we don’t. Do you think Rhys Gethin’s in disgrace that he’s going back to Conway? You should have seen how he ran the bastard to earth. If it hadn’t been for Brother Huw, Avignon would have had to find another champion. But wasn’t it amusing the way he exposed that Roman? He talked better French — that’s how he did him down — that and his lucky guess that the chap was going straight to Bolingbroke and that he had—”

But Master Brut begged his friend not to forget what he was going to say next; and retired for a minute or two to make use of their newfangled latrine invented by the Scotch nobility.

While he was thus engaged there came a soft knock at the door; and Rhisiart, thinking that at any rate for that moment he could tease the pretty page without interference, hurried to open it himself.

But in place of the white cheeks, long eyelashes and delicate limbs of young Elphin, there stood Meredith ab Owen in full warlike array! He wore a steel breast-plate, sharp-pointed steel greaves and a small steel helmet, without any visor, fitting tight to his head. Even as he stood there he began fidgetting with his helmet to conceal some straggling dark curl, and in a flash our friend was reminded of the peevish way Tegolin had struggled with her locks at the door of the Church of St. Collen.

"They call us bare-foot savages," Rhisiart thought, "but on my soul, that boy Elphin would suit the court of Constantinople!" And he allowed Meredith to take all the time he needed over his military adjustments so as to give Master Brut an opportunity to regain a strategic position by the hearth before their entrance.

Meredith had brought his fighting-spear to show his young allies; and it was upon this weapon, when they were all three sitting on the bench by the fire, that the general interest concentrated.

"Do you ever use it as a javelin?" enquired our friend.

"I've always heard so much of Welsh spear-throwing, but I've never held a real Welsh spear in my hand before. This must be the sort of thing that our ancestors, the Trojans, used, mustn't it? With such a spear as this" — and our friend couldn't resist getting up from the bench and brandishing it— "Hector must have wounded Patroclus!"

"Who was Patroclus?" asked the son of Owen; and then with a sad little smile that contrasted quaintly enough with his flashing armour, "I'm not like my father. I never went to Oxford; and they've got only a few scraps of Homer in Valle Crucis; and I don't believe even Father Pascentius can translate what they have got!"

Our friend was quite prepared to enter at some length — as the headless crucifix looked down upon them and a chilly draught descending the new-fashioned chimney made the birch-logs smoke — upon the inexhaustible learning of his teacher at Exeter College; but Meredith in a quick change of mood stirred the fire with the point of his spear and confessed to them he had brought bad news.

Both the young men looked anxiously at him.

“That Roman?” they exclaimed simultaneously.

Meredith propped his weapon against the side of the hearth and laid his helmet down beside him. “You’ve hit it, lads,” he said. “That smug rogue’s let the devil himself loose, and the fat’s in the fire with a vengeance. You know he went off last night? Yes, he wouldn’t stay half-an-hour after we broke up. Our lawyer-friend’s attack on him burst his bubble. He had a message to the King from Rome, had it under his vest all the while! In a fit of panic when the noise in the hall grew worse he confessed as much to my father, claiming immunity as King’s messenger; and then, calling for his horse and his servants, off he rode — straight to Valle Crucis.

“As luck would have it, the guest-house there was full of our enemies. Grey and Fitz-Alan had dined at the refectory and were staying for the night. They sent down to the Tassel for Cousin Sele and Davy Gam; and young Burnell from Dinas Bran was brought down, too. I wonder Lowri let him come; but at any rate there he was. Not one honest Welshman among them! They must have stayed up, plotting trouble for us, half the night. That curst Roman was at the bottom of it. I think he’d have made trouble anyway, but Master Young’s attack on him set the gunpowder off! And now, quite early this morning — Griffith and I were still asleep, but father was awake: I think he’d been in the chapel all night praying over Iolo — what must arrive but a nice little set of demands from old Abbot Cust. It’s the Prior of course who composed this precious document. He’s the master there, and a worse enemy we've never had. But at any rate, what they demand is:

"One, that your friend Alice, whom they call a house-serf at Ruthin, though the gossip in our kitchen is that she's young Grey's paramour, be carried over there and delivered to her master;

"Two, that Mad Huw and the Maid be brought before the Abbot's court; and

"Three, that one Master Brut, of the Manor of Lyde in the County of Hereford, be also handed over to the aforesaid court to answer why, how, and on what authority he, a declared heretic, should travel at large through His Majesty's fiefs of Ial, Bromfield, Glyndyfrdwy and Edeyrnion, to the danger, peril, risk and injury of His Majesty's faithful and pious subjects of the aforesaid manors, baronies and jurisdictions!"

It would be hard to say which of his guests was more staggered by this blow; and harder still to say whether it was of Tegolin or of Alice or of his friend, the Lollard, that Rhisiart first thought. But they both kept silence, waiting to learn more before committing themselves to any comment.

"Well," Meredith continued, bending down to ease the clasps of the steel plate that covered one of his knees, you can imagine what I said when Father came and told us. But I could see Father had made up his mind before he gave us a chance to speak. He said we must give way on every point except in the matter of giving you up, Master Brut. To that, he said, nothing would make him consent. But he thinks his submission about the Friar and the Maid and about that girl was the only thing they hadn't counted on.

"He said our reputation for hospitality and their knowledge of our touchiness about the honour of our house and so on was what set them — Prior Bevan especially — on making these demands.

"He thought the whole thing was only to give colour and excuse to a move on which they'd already decided. He said the only alternative to submission was to leave this place, and leave our place at Sycharth, and take refuge in the mountains of Snowdon. But he said this would ruin our plans for the rising in September. You see he's got those unlucky dates — the sixteenth and the eighteenth — lodged like a doom in his head! It's what we call a fate or a tynghed on him. He loved old Iolo so much that he makes everything depend on carrying out his prophecy. Griffith and the Arglwyddes are very upset about it. They don't care, I'm afraid, what happens to your Alice, Master Brut; but the idea of giving up the Friar and the Maid seems monstrous to them. And, of course, it is monstrous; but so is the idea of giving up that unlucky girl!

"But Father's got it into his head that nothing worse than temporary captivity could possibly happen to the Friar and the Maid, though I don't suppose he gives the fate of Alice much thought — but, as I say, his absolute conviction is — since his night with the dead Bard in the chapel — that if we hoist our standard in September, as Iolo prophesied, every victim of those monks and every prisoner in Ruthin and Chirk will be set free!

"Well, having decided on submission, except in your case, Master, the next thing he decides, since they won't dare to attack such obedient servants of Holy Church as we shall be then, is for Rhys Gethin to scour the Conway country till he gathers a regular army of spearmen, and for Griffith to rush to Mona to get help from the Tudors, and for me to hurry off to our place at Sycharth and bring over here all the money" — he lowered his voice in what might have been a mock imitation of a Jewish usurer— "about five thousand silver groats, that he's got hidden there. Some of this sum Rhys Gethin will want for his new army; but the bulk of it Father will hide in the mound, where, if Grey does burn this place, it'll be absolutely safe."

"But what about the Arglwyddes and Catharine?" our friend enquired.

"Oh, we'll have our scouts round here! We shan't take them away; and at the first news of danger in the offing the ladies'll ride across Moel Goch to a perfectly safe hiding-place."

"And your father?" asked the Lollard.

The youth smiled. "Oh, he can be left to take care of himself!" And then, seeing an expression of shocked amazement on his hearers' faces, he burst out laughing.

"You think I'm frivolous and callous, do you? Well — you'll soon feel just as I do when you see more of him! Everybody here feels the same; even the Arglwyddes, even Catharine."

"What do you mean?" asked Rhisiart.

"Oh, it's not a thing you can easily put into words," replied the young chieftain, rising from the bench and picking up his helmet. "It comes from living with him. I don't say it gives you any especial confidence in his success — I mean in his triumph over our enemies — but it makes it impossible to imagine him — him himself I mean — helpless in their hands."

Master Brut looked up at the face of the young warrior, who now towered above them, the firelight flickering on his breast-plate. One dark lock from beneath his steel cap crossed his forehead and the glint of the metal made his eyes even more animated than their wont.

"Pardon the question if it seems impertinent," said the Lollard gravely "But is your father a religious man? Does he pray more than most of us ordinary people?"

Owen's son smiled his sad ironic smile. "If he wasn't praying last night I don't know what he was doing. Our Porter told me he was on his knees for hours."

“Christ have mercy on him and on us all!” murmured the other.

“But I don’t want to give you a wrong impression,” Meredith went on. “He’s always reading that crystal you saw, and he’s always studying astrology. Our old wives consider him a necromancer. Nurse told Catharine once, when she caught her listening at the mound-stone, that she was going the way of the master. She thinks he’s sold his soul to the Devil; but I know — Rhisiart’s a relation and you, sir, are” — he hesitated a moment— “an honest man, so I needn’t be squeamish — but I know Griffith and the Arglwyddes sometimes think—”

He stopped and listened. “I thought I heard it — the mound I mean — but it was only the rain — that he’s committed to Saint Derfel.” He paused again; and once more he smiled that sad ironical smile. “There! I’ve said enough; and too much, my lads! Saint Derfel means nothing to you, and why should he? God! Why should he? Why should he?”

His voice, as he repeated this, had a wild, high-pitched, hysterical note that troubled his hearers not a little. But his mood changed in a flash. “Blessed Mary!” he cried, “what nonsense I’m talking! It’s this midsummer rain. Well, comrades, wish me luck with that damned silver! It’s the sort of job I hate. I wish I were going to Mona, and Griffith to Sycharth. But when Father makes up his mind — well, goodbye, my lads!”

But the Lollard was on his feet now. “Just one little thing,” he said quietly. “Will you tell your father, before you go, that I shall accompany the Friar and the Maid and — and the other. It’s a small point, among all the rest, but I’d like him to know it. In this way all their demands will be satisfied. But in any case, tell him, I’ve decided to go. I can leave my horse, eh? and my clothes and books? — and then, if I don’t come back—”

It was Rhisiart’s turn now to jump to his feet. “And tell Cousin Owen,” he announced emphatically, “that, with his permission, I would like to go, too. It might make his obedience, our obedience, more clear and definite if his" — and he gave a little forced laugh— "if his hostages were accompanied by a — by a sort of relative of the family."

Meredith fixed upon them both a grave and absent-minded stare. He had turned at the door, and they could see from the abstracted look that he was still listening to something outside the room. At last he shrugged his shoulders.

"It's a pity," he said. Then, after a moment or more of listening, "A pity," he repeated. Then, while his face took on a hard, rigid, mask-like look, "Up in smoke it goes then, my chance of having someone to talk to. I must play chess again with Madoc ab Ieuan and hide-and-seek with Catharine! So you've decided, have you, Master Brut? And you too Rhisiart? Well, I think your idea of a member of the family bringing our — what did you call them? — our 'hostages,' may appeal to my Lord. I'll send you word, anyway." And with a stiff little bend of his steel-clad head the gleaming figure was gone.

Then our friend turned peevishly to his companion. "What made you do that?" he said. "Owen wanted you to stay."

"Tu quoque!" retorted the other. "What do you know about Welsh etiquette and honour? A member of the family! A member of my family of combustible heretics is what they'll make of you, lad, riding with Master Brut along the King's highway and drawing your sword against the archers of Chirk! But there it is. We've both done it now; and there can be no going back. Meredith knew Owen would agree, or he wouldn't have looked like that at the last. Poor lad, I expect he does pine for someone to talk to, with only that spoilt child and her taciturn brother."

Rhisiart made no reply. He walked across the room to where his sheepskin bundle lay and pulled out his crusader's sword. No, I must leave you behind," he said to himself, "just as I must leave Griffin."

Following one of his little private rituals he drew his dagger and laid its blade for a moment across the blade of the old sword. Then, replacing this latter, he straightened himself, tightened his belt, brushed away some crumbs from his doublet and remarked rather peevishly to his friend, "No one'll meddle, I hope, with our things here while we're away?"

The Lollard, who was transferring his precious Gospel manuscript from his bundle to some hidden receptacle about his person, hastened to point out how extremely unlikely it was, at this particular juncture, that any other guests would be put in the Saracen's room. "But if you're fussy about your things, I'd say a word to that old woman. She's the one—"

"Gentlemen! Gentlemen!" the interruption came in a high-pitched tremulous voice from outside their door, and upon the door itself fell sundry vigorous blows from something harder than human knuckles.

"Talk of the devil—" cried Rhisiart, "By Gis! if that's not the Nurse!"

"She's come to tell us they're ready to start," said Master Brut; and both the young men, standing there in their neat students' garb, cast that curious look round their chamber that most human beings and many animals throw round the already familiar outlines of their lair of the past night. Then they flung open the door and slipped out side by side. Yes! There was the tall head-dress. There was the white wimple suspended from its grotesquely elongated peak, and there was the black staff.

"Oh Masters, what goings-on!" the old woman cried. "Oh gentlemen, sweet gentlemen, what a coil is here! 'Tis my precious Missy that be the cause; for the pretty honey-bag has shrieked and battered at my Lord's door, where 'a be turning wet to fine with crystal-gazing, and calling up of spirits from below, and now, seeing he won't open to her; or change his hard heart, dost know, honey-gents, what's gone and done? 'A's gone and barred herself up, along with they naked men, and them ready to stink too afore sun-down, and all in chapel-vault. I've never let her blessed little knees touch they cold stones all her days, no! not at Holy Mass, and there my sweet lamb be — for I've squinnied through door-crack and seed 'un — along wi' they naked dead — and crying her heart out! She do think the world of thee, Master Rhisiart, though I shouldn't say it, and the man that gets her, oh, my daisy-gents, the man that gets her! will know what I alone do know, who've washed her and combed her since her first cry."

Rhisiart felt too nervous, too agitated, too puzzled, in short too young, to do more than stare blankly at the old woman and fumble awkwardly with the wallet in his belt. There did just enter into the shrewd sheriff's-officer portion of his youthful consciousness that what the old lady was really after was a tactful, casual, discreet and timely offered half-ducat or even a silver crown; but since like the Lollard his whole stack of funds consisted of a few fresh-minted gold nobles and a quantity of king's pennies, neither of which seemed appropriate to the occasion, he contented himself with allowing his fingers to remain in contact with the wallet in his belt.

His companion, however, was less tongue-tied. "Go and tell your silly child," he said, "that her cousin is going along with the Maid — if that's what's bothering her — and you can add, if you like, that I'm going along with her cousin and that I've got great influence! Influence at Court, you may say; and you needn't tell her that I speak of the King of Heaven; but will you please tell me, my good lady, where the Abbot's room is, for I would dearly like to have his venerable blessing before we all set out."

"John ap Hywel are you speaking of? Bless my stars, young man! Let me see; let me see. So that wench is going with you to Abbot Cust's court, is she? And you gave the Captain a whole groat for her? Marry of God! Enough to make a grand lady unpin her smock, not to name a poor Ruthin girl! Abbot John, do you say? Why he rode off on his black horse before ’twas light. They say he’s gone to raise men for my Lord from Usk to Dynevor! But if you want a holy man’s blessing on your dear face there’s Father Rheinalt left. He’s going to monk it no more, ‘a says! We’ve never had a shaven priest in hall since old Father Jenkyn died. He were a one, Father Jenkyn. Couldn’t abide sour wine nor sharp-tongued women. And ‘twere the poor gentleman’s sweet tooth, I reckon, in this sad world what took him off at the last. I mind well his end. There weren’t a dry eye in kitchen or bower. And when I laid him out — Marry of God, what didn’t I see! And him that couldn’t abide sour wine or stand-off women. ‘A wore against his poor skin what must have tormented him night and day! Us don’t know nothing of a man, that’s what I tells the maids, shaved or unshaved, till us lays him out! So go to Father Rheinalt, young man. He’ll bless your kind face and absolve your sweet sins!”

Our friend all this while had been listening with only half an ear to the Nurse’s chatter; for it seemed to him that he too — just as Meredith had done — heard something out of the darkness by the mound-stone that was more than rain or wind. But he was surprised at Master Brut’s affability to the bawdy old trot, and still more surprised when he saw him put into her hand some loose silver from his pouch, with the words, “Well gossip, whether your confessor be Jenkyn or Rheinalt don’t ‘ee forget with all your ‘Paternosters’ and ‘Hail Marys,’ to say a prayer to the Saviour now and again, in plain Welsh.”

“Where is Father Pascentius, Nurse?” our friend enquired abruptly.

“Him? Don’t you talk of him to me, Master Rhisiart. He went off last night with that false proud priest who brought all the trouble on us; and before he went what must he do but come up to me where I stood by the stairs, listening to the harping, and ask me more questions in five blessed minutes than I’ve heard all my days. You can believe he got God’s truth! He got as much truth as a fish of the sea gets air. That’s what he got for his pains!”

By this time, hearing the Nurse’s voice and seeing in the light that issued from the open door of the Saracen’s chamber her familiar figure in close colloquy with the two guests, a group of inquisitive pages had arrived on the scene, and among them the pretty lad who had brought them their meal.

The Nurse was now relating to the Lollard a new story about the deceased Father; so that Rhisiart in that dim light, feeling himself a reckless soldier about to risk his life, hesitated not to pull the boy to him, and while he fondled him, to ask him whether Master Young had yet gone off.

The boy replied that the Canon was at present closeted with their Lord in the Astrologer’s room, but that a considerable band of spearmen under the command of Madoc ab Ieuan had been deputed to conduct him to the border. He also whispered to our friend in that conspiring dimness that Mad Huw was already in the hall.

The mention of the Friar brought about a remorseful reaction in Rhisiart’s impulsive blood and, changing his manner abruptly if not rudely, he packed Elphin off to find out if the ladies had come down. The boy, sulky and loitering, had scarcely reached the entrance to the vestibule when Mad Huw himself came hurrying past him. The door of their chamber had been closed by this time and the remains of their meal had been divided with a good deal of suppressed squabbling among the pages. The Nurse herself was locking the shut door with one of the great keys that jingled at her side, and the Lollard was watching this performance with an interest that even a student of the Greek Testament might legitimately feel where the bulk of all his worldly goods was in question, when Mad Huw came down upon them.

Our friend detected at once that the man’s sojourn in a civilized abode, short as it had been, without fear of molestation or of mockery, had had some deep psychological effect on him. He had ceased, at least under this roof, all noisy proclamations of Richard’s return, and in place of these vociferous outcries he had acquired a trick of hurried, secretive, mystic communications.

This new form taken by his ruling passion may have been due to the hours he had spent among the lively and sympathetic maidens of the Arglwyddes’ entourage, or to some deep impression made on his mind by the presence of the two dead men in the chapel, or even, it may be, to his consciousness of the great conspiracy in the wind. He certainly acted now as if he were in the midst of some dramatic secret transaction and in the presence of a perpetual audience of spies from whom this transaction must be concealed.

“He’s being moved across Wales,” he whispered in our friend’s ear as soon as he emerged out of the darkness, “and it’s because he’s expected at Valle Crucis that that Roman came here last night. Richard loves the Grey Friars just as Owen does; and that’s why the Pope is so spiteful. The Popes have been jealous of them from the beginning. And every house, every wall, every tree, has a spy in it now; and that’s why we have to be so careful what we say and whom we talk to. And there’s another thing, my son, that we mustn’t forget. Not all Grey Friars are Grey Friars. Skulking wolves some of them are, and cunning foxes! You have to look out all the time. You have to look for their pointed ears and their sharp teeth.”

“Have the Maid and the woman from Ruthin come down yet, Brother?” enquired the Lollard.

“No, no, no, Master Brut; they’re waiting, just like we are. We’re all waiting, so that Bolingbroke won’t hear a sound when He’s brought across Wales.”

At that moment the pretty page, Elphin, came back, and in order to punish Rhisiart for his abrupt dismissal he remained, in spite of the passage being so dark, proudly and coyly out of our friend’s reach.

“Hist!” cried the old woman fixing the key of the Saracen’s chamber to her girdle. “There’s Derfel making his moan! He’s asking for a new maidenhead! Who was that last Derfel-bride in Edeyrnion, Brother Huw? Can’ee remember her name? ‘Twere’nt Gwen were’t? No, her bastard were Tom Ifan’s. Nor it weren’t Sibli ferch Rhys either; for her man was Davy Ddu of Bonwm. Which were the last Derfel-imp, Brother? I can mind when Crach Ffinnant were born; but her what bore he were a convent-maid. Were it Sara Llwyd of Trawsfynydd? But she—”

“Come, Masters! Come, Masters!” interrupted Mad Huw. “The Maid must be down by now. I always know when she’s near. No, daughter, I can’t remember the last one’s name any better than yourself; but I know the unhappy licence that God, for his own mysterious purpose, has allowed to Satan in the name of Derfel. Saint Derfel” — and the Friar crossed himself devoutly— “is in the company of the Blest; but there are those, in the heathen places of this land, who conjure up terrible evil in that blessed one’s name! Would that Lord Owen relied, as our Richard does, upon the humblest Brother of Saint Francis, rather than upon all the powers of the air! But come, Masters, come! The Maid is calling.” He paused for a moment, and then turning towards the mound stone drew himself up, a tall grey figure in the gloom, no longer — so it seemed to Rhisiart — a poor distracted half-wit, but a formidable priest of God. “In nomine Christi et omnium sanctorum,” he cried sternly, “be silent, unhappy spirits!

His words were responded to by a sound that Rhisiart, with his sceptical Norman blood, took for a receding wail of discordant echoes; but a dead silence undoubtedly succeeded this, a silence that was only broken as they followed that grey figure towards the hall, by a plaintive, “Marry of God, sweet men!” from the bewildered Nurse.

An hour later, with the two girls mounted upon Welsh ponies, and a boy from the stable, who was to bring back the animals, following after them, all five hostages were making their way, and doing so quite leisurely, towards the famous monastic house.

Rhisiart’s nature was stirred to its depths by what was happening. Tegolin and Alice exchanged casual and friendly remarks as they rode along together, with the Friar at the Maid’s left and the two young men on the other’s right, while their youthful escort, humming and whistling to himself and throwing stones at the rabbits, loitered carelessly in the rear. Luckily for them all the rain had ceased, and though the wind was still in their faces and blowing fresh and chill there was a feeling in the air as though the sun might break through at any moment, and the yellow and green of gorse and bracken stretched away up the slope above them and down the slope beneath them, with a rich reassuring welcome.

They were all of them young, and the rain-washed air of that summer afternoon, and the spacious curves of the great mountains above them, overlapping each other like prone giantesses, and the foxgloves in the hollows beneath them, and the yellow trefoil under their feet, made it hard for them to believe they were heading for pain or disaster.

“I’ve been thinking out,” said Rhisiart to Master Brut, “the exact line I’m going to take. I’m going to make a lot of being one of the family. So for God’s sake, don’t contradict anything I say! And I’m going to make a lot of being a law-student — do you understand? — from Oxford. What do you think’s become of our Abbot’s monks? I take it they’re not rushing after their leader half across Wales. And if they're still at the Abbey — well! we've got some friends at court."

The Lollard chuckled. "I doubt if even the monks of Caerleon would stand up for a sworn gospel-man like me. But Abbot Cust knew me as a child. So I can't believe — But it's Prior Bevan who's my danger, and our Friar's too, I'm afraid. From all I hear about him, and they tell me he's a bullying Salopian and has got the old man under his thumb, you'll need your best forensic eloquence — especially as everybody saw us together on Saint John's Eve."

Rhisiart's thin Norman face contracted with a spasm of boyish arrogance. "You wait, partner!" he announced proudly. "I've been thinking it out; and I'm not at all sure Father Bevan won't find himself checkmated!"

The Lollard watched a rain-ruffled brown butterfly pursuing his less heavily-winged mate across the patches of yellow trefoil. "I hope you're right, comrade," he said, "but it'll be a bad look-out for us if Hywel Sele and Davy Gam are still on the scene. That rascal from Rome must have done his worst. Oh, these Papalists! These Papalists!"

Mad Huw caught the trouble in his tone and peered back at them over the pony's mane. "Mum's the word, Masters!" he murmured. "He may be there by this time. But he'll be disguised. If you see him you must take no notice. I shall know him and he'll know me; but neither of us will make a sign! Mum's the word, my lads, till we've got him safe to London."

Both the young men nodded respectful assent to these instructions; but the Ruthin girl, whose desirable figure as she rode by Tegolin's side had shared with the swaying red braid and with the yellow gorse they were passing not a little of our friend's concentration, turned her head quickly and self-consciously now from the Maid to the men and back to the men, and said with some embarrassment and with hot cheeks, "Will you tell them about me, Mistress, please? I want them to know; especially the lawyer-gentleman from Oxford!"

"Won't you try and tell them yourself, Alice?" protested the Maid.

But the girl gave Rhisiart a heavy-lidded enigmatic look from her pony's back and shook her head. "I can't do it," she said. "I'm not ashamed, and I know the gentlemen are kind. But I just can't do it. The words cling to something in here" — and she indicated her bosom— "and I can't drag them out."

Tegolin frowned. Rhisiart could see that the self-consciousness of her companion irritated the Maid and that she hadn't any overwhelming sympathy with her in her present predicament.

"Alice wants you to know," she said, speaking hurriedly and rather brusquely, "that she lives with her parents in the English quarter of Ruthin. Her father's a master-baker, from — Coventry didn't you say, Alice? — yes, from Coventry, but her mother's Welsh. Her father wanted her to marry the lad we saw murdered last night, and Alice had to consent, and they were betrothed, but she never loved him; so that his death last night was — what did you say it was, Alice? — not a Providence, for that would have been too heartless — well, an escape anyway! But Alice has been working every day since she was a child in Ruthin Castle; and she thinks Lord Grey's son Ambrose wants to — how do you say it in English? — treisio, to violate her; and she would much rather — that's what you said, Alice, wasn't it? — leave Ruthin altogether than risk such a thing. She says her parents don't believe that Ambrose would hurt her, and short of that — stop me if I'm wrong, Alice! — she says they're rather proud he notices her and gives her presents."

The Maid paused; but Alice turned quickly towards her. "Tell them what I said just now; for I did mean it, and I do mean it!"

"Alice said just now," repeated the Maid in an almost mechanical tone, "that she'd like above everything else to be my servant and to go about with me and Brother Huw; and when I told her that we both have now sworn to support Owen and join his household, she said — stop me if I'm telling them wrong — that she still wanted to be my servant. She says she hates kitchen-work and is very good with her needle."

"And what did you say to this, Tegolin?" our lad sharply enquired. He had noticed all the way through her speech that she felt anything but really friendly towards this girl, and in his secret heart he attributed this entirely to jealousy. "She has the Friar," he said to himself, "and yet she won't let a person think of anyone else!"

"I told you, didn't I, Alice?" replied the Maid gently, "that I've never had a servant since I was little and I'm too old to begin now."

"Mistress! Mistress!" protested the other, "when you know you're not seventeen! I shall be nineteen come Michaelmas. All born ladies like you have their tire-woman, if it's only to comb their hair." And with a tender protective gesture the Ruthin girl extricated from the plaited coils so near her hand a couple of dandelion-seeds.

Watching this slight movement, Rhisiart suddenly wondered if the Maid of Edeyrnion had kept that meadow-orchis he had given her when she wanted to touch his sword. It wasn't, of course, in those plaits any more. She had loosened her hair last night. But had she preserved it, or just forgotten all about it? And did she ever think now, after so much had happened, of how honourable he had been when she slept in her smock under his sheepskin?

The tale of Alice's troubles must have made her hearers think of their own, for all that youthful company fell now into gloomy silence, from the influence of which Mad Huw found it necessary to escape by turning repeatedly to watch their childish escort throw stones at the rabbits.

It gave Rhisiart a very queer feeling when at last, through a gap in the mountains, the bases of which were now heavily wooded, he caught a glimpse of Dinas Bran. How much had happened since he had planted his sword in the earth at the first sight of that extraordinary stronghold!

He still gazed at those towers with reverence and awe, but with how much more knowledge of life than when from old Griffin's back he had first observed them! He thought of Modry. What would she have felt if she could have looked into the future and seen the young listener to her wild tales riding beneath those battlements with a mad priest, a reckless heretic and these two disturbing young women?

And then he thought of his light-hearted Norman mother. How she would have laughed could she have foreseen to what use he was going to put the expensive legal education she had given him! "She would think I'd been just a fool to let Tegolin get up from that straw the same as she lay down. And she'd say it was all in the game and à la guerre comme à la guerre if I stole Alice away from Ambrose Grey!"

But they were getting near the monastery now, and it wasn't long before they reached a grassy hill-side, flecked with patches of yellow trefoil, and interspersed with grey rocks and a few ancient, solitary growing birch-trees, from which the walls and pinnacles of the Abbey itself were visible in the vale below.

The girls brought their ponies to a stand-still; and the young rabbit chaser came running hastily to their side, panting and excited, to inform them in rustic Welsh that he had been forbidden to go any further.

His tone struck Rhisiart as more perturbed and imperative than was suitable to the occasion. He seemed almost rudely anxious to get the ladies out of their saddles; nor did the three big copper coins bearing the bearded countenance of Edward the Third which our friend rather nervously thrust into his hand lessen his feverish desire to be off.

When he had mounted one of the ponies and got a firm hold of the bridle of the other he barely stayed to acknowledge with a word their final salute. Off he went at a wild gallop, and it was only after watching him disappear round a bluff of the hillside that they realized the cause of his haste. They had been so absorbed in their first view of the Abbey that it had escaped their notice that in a narrow defile just below them, under a group of tall chestnuts, was a party of men-at-arms, upon whose helmets and spears the sun, as it fell through the wet branches in the fresh breeze, cast a proud flicker of lights and shadows. There was nothing for them to do but to advance as boldly and calmly as they could; but the path having narrowed itself between slippery banks, they were compelled to proceed in single file, Rhisiart leading the way and the Lollard bringing up the rear.

Partly in order to display his calmness to Tegolin who came behind him, and partly because the presence of danger brought his kinsman to his mind, Rhisiart turned when they were half-way down the declivity and asked the Maid in an easy, casual whisper why it was that Owen hadn't come out to see them off.

"I saw him at the foot of the stairs," she returned hastily. "They said he was so upset about Master Brut going that he couldn't bear to meet him. He was in a strange mood. He stood and stared at me just as if he didn't know me, and then just bowed like a man in a trance and went back to his room." She paused; and then, in a low hurried tone, "Gwion Bach," she whispered, "you won't forget me, if they separate us?"

"They shan't separate us!" he replied boldly; but she shook her head, and although he turned too quickly to see it a sad little smile crossed her face as they went on.

They were soon confronted by the armed men, who turned out to be fewer in number than the gleam of their armour under the chestnut trees had suggested. Not more than half-a-dozen they were; but they straddled across the path, while their leader, a singular looking young man, advanced a few steps alone.

“It’s Master Ambrose!” whispered Alice to Tegolin, plucking her by the arm. “Tell the young gentleman to leave him to me; and get quick into the precincts! He can’t touch us in the precincts.”

Tegolin caught Rhisiart by the belt. It was his crucial moment, when he was straightening his shoulders and collecting his wits for the encounter; and he turned impatiently, frowning crossly. It was just like a girl to go and disturb a person when it was all worked out in his mind exactly what to do.

“It’s young Grey,” the Maid dutifully whispered. “She says to leave him to her, and for us to get quickly into the enclosure where they can’t touch us!”

“All right,” said Rhisiart brusquely. Her words made him suck in his lips till they were as queer looking as Master Young’s. But to have a couple of girls deciding what was to be done at a crisis like this!

“Who are you?” he asked in blunt Hereford fashion, just as if he were interrogating some fancy foreigner in the old law-office in Worcester Street.

“Grey of Ruthin,” replied the young man haughtily. “Are you Glendourdy’s cousin or are you his secretary?”

“I’m his cousin and his secretary, and I happen to have just taken my degree in civil law at Oxford and I have come to represent my cousin in the Abbot’s court, and it is at my advice that he has acted so legally and so properly in the sending of Master Brut of Lyde in the County of Hereford, of Mistress Tegolin, commonly known as the Maid of—”

"Tut! Tut! Master Cousin Legality! Didn't you hear who I am? I'm Ambrose de Grey de Ruthin 'commonly known' as the son of my father, and I've not come here to be lectured on law, but to possess myself of — of — of the person — How could you frighten me so?"

The discontinuity of this curious young man's speech was due to the fact of Alice's slipping hurriedly past both the Maid and Rhisiart and spiritually — though not actually — throwing herself into his arms.

It must be admitted in our friend's favour that he didn't allow this grievous shock to his self-esteem to interfere with the working of his intelligence. He was angry, he was humiliated, he was ashamed of himself, and he felt extremely young, but his wits seemed to work all the quicker for this, and to work quite independently of his irritable and outraged dignity.

Beckoning to Master Brut, who either had caught the Ruthin girl's shrewd whisper or was acting in accordance with evangelical principles, for he remained amenable to every ripple in the stream of events, he hurried them between the Ruthin soldiers who were staring with absorbed interest at Ambrose and Alice, and led them through a small wicket gate into the precincts of the monastery.

Here a diminutive little monk, with his robe tucked up under his belt, was gathering herbs for some culinary or medicinal purpose, and he advanced tentatively and politely towards them.

Rhisiart, however, took no notice of this friendly advance on the part of the monk, for all his interest — like that of the Ruthin men-at-arms — was absorbed in the conversation between Ambrose and his runaway girl.

The heir of Ruthin was certainly one of the queerest-looking youths Rhisiart had ever seen. He was well above middle-height, indeed of much the same stature and build as our friend himself, but his face was sickly-white, and his mouth oddly twisted awry. He had been disfigured by a sword-cut in his boyhood; and this disfigurement, though he wore on his upper lip a small black moustache, could not be concealed. His chin was abnormally long and pointed, and this with a pair of protruding ears, which stood out grotesquely from beneath his steel cap, gave him the look of some kind of animal — our friend couldn't decide what animal — that had been endowed by an impish freak of Nature with a human form.

But whatever animal it might be that Ambrose Grey resembled it was, Rhisiart felt, not only a sick animal but an animal obsessed by a veritable demon of desire. He had hollow eyes of a pale blue tint, and the fact that they seemed, at the distance our friend now stood, to be entirely devoid of eyebrows, increased the besotted craving, as if he could drink her up, body and soul, with which he gloated over Alice.

For some reason the very strength of the youth's desire, unholy and carnal though it was, had a poignancy that made it hard for our friend to despise him, much less to hate him. There was something at once grotesque and tragic in such unbalanced emotion, which resembled that of an infatuated beast for its mistress, rather than the passion of a seducer for his victim.

The Ruthin girl had said "leave him to me," and it was clear that she was justified in her confidence. By gestures and whispers and low voiced murmurs, like a crafty white pigeon fooling a demented jackal, the girl led him nearer and nearer to the wicket, and just as one of the men-at-arms, more on the alert than his master, was on the point of intervening, she slipped through the gate and closed it in the young man's face. Even then, it seemed to our friend, as the herb-gathering monk approached them, that the obsessed youth had no idea of what this meant, or of the fatal barrier which that flimsy trellis-work offered.

Automatically, all armed as he was, young Grey pushed the gate open, and heedless of the astonishment of Mad Huw who was whispering to the Lollard, he took the girl by the arm and made an attempt to drag her back.

But the little herbalist indignantly intervened. “Sacrilege! Sacrilege!” he cried, and our friend had never seen such a transformation. From every feature and from every limb of that slight figure there emanated the spiritual authority of a thousand years. “Holy ground! Holy ground!”

“Get back, Master Ambrose, or I’ll—” And, with that, waving his bunch of weeds as if they were the “bell, book and candle” of an outraged Christendom, he hustled the bewildered Ambrose outside the precincts, and closed the gate.

But it wasn’t only the little Cistercian who was transformed; for no sooner was the man outside, with the indignant monk guarding the closed gate, than the Ruthin girl sprang to the fence and began in viciously honeyed tones a series of mocking taunts.

These taunts, in her rich sensual voice, were uttered without the least tremor of anything hysterical. She didn’t seem bitter, or even angry. There was a voluptuous unction in her tone.

“Better luck, next time, stupid! Why don’t you try it with Molly Price again who was born blind? Or with Sibby Saunders who’d let a toad do it? Or with Polly Walker who says you waggle your ears when you get anyone down? Do you know what Mother Pusey who keeps the whore-house calls you? — Monsieur Point-du-Tout! And do you know what—”

But the monk intervened. “Come away, woman,” he said sternly. “You shall go to the Prior! And you, Master Ambrose, take your men off at once and never—”

But something in the young man’s livid and ghastly face made him stop abruptly. Skilled as a good priest in sounding the depths of mortal passion he recognized that this was no ordinary case of sexual brutality.

"If you or my Lord of Ruthin," he said in a gentler tone, "have anything against this young woman, you can take off your armour, lay down your weapons, and come now, at once, to the Prior's court. Is it your pleasure to do this?"

But the youth in armour seemed hardly to understand what was said to him. In a curiously helpless manner, and stumbling a little as if some vital contact between his brain and his limbs had been severed, he moved to the gate again. His eyes had never left the face of the woman, and he now began fumbling with the wooden catch of the gate as if his fingers were paralysed and his wits drugged.

But his men came crowding round him and, though Rhisiart couldn't catch their words, it was clear they put some pressure upon him that was more than he could resist. With his head hanging in a curious sideways manner over his steel gorget, as if he'd received some wound in the gullet and was bleeding internally, he let himself be led away; not, however, before one of his men had flung a threat into the girl's face of so shocking a character that Tegolin made a protective movement towards her and the monk indignantly lifted his hand.

But the Ruthin girl merely narrowed her eyes under her heavy lids and smiled contemptuously.

Rhisiart was conscious as he looked at her of a wild drumming in his pulses and of a sensual stir that made his eyes darken and the pit of his stomach turn dizzy. He had hated her when she said those things to that stricken youth in armour, and he hated the way she was smiling now under that ruffian's appalling threat; and yet something about those heavy-lidded eyes and those rounded flanks made this hatred quiver and vibrate with a craving to hug her till she cried out under his grip.

But Mad Huw had come over to him now. “Not a word, not a word of him!” the Friar whispered. “This Prior’s court is a trick. They know we know where he is. But if they torture us we mustn’t breathe a word.” Then he glanced anxiously at the Lollard. “Does he understand? Will he be silent?”

Rhisiart assured this innocent conspirator that if anyone “understood” anything it was Master Brut; and they all followed the little monk as, walking by Tegolin’s side with eyes modestly cast down upon his bunch of herbs, he led the way towards the Abbey.

They soon arrived at the imposing west front, where, above the rich Gothic entrance, several delicately-carved windows seemed calling upon the sun with a beguiling and living welcome to mingle its rays with the smoke of the incense and the rhythm of the sacred chants. Here their guide paused. “You must pardon me, gentlemen,” he said, addressing the two young men, “for you, Brother,” and he turned to Mad Huw, “will understand how it is, but I must call for Sister Cunlap to take the ladies to the women’s guest-house.” Thus speaking he took hold of a rope which dangled from an orifice above the gate and gave it a gentle pull.

There was a faint tinkle from inside the building, and a small iron-grated shutter in the frame-work of the door was shot back disclosing a tonsured head and a pair of inquisitive eyes. “Is Brother Jenkyn there?”

“Yes, Father.”

“Is he free for a moment?”

“Yes, Father.”

“I want him here.”

There was a brief pause during which Tegolin came close up to our friend and whispered hurriedly, “Don’t believe any message you get from me unless the messenger says, 'Crusader.' Do you understand?" He nodded assent. "Kiss me, Gwion Bach!"

Their lips met. His were hot and dry, hers cold as a stone. She drew back to Alice's side; and our friend, though he felt her gaze was upon him, and he wanted to meet it, was aware of a sensation like the pressure of an iron bar across his forehead which compelled him to turn away.

Then the gate was cautiously and partially opened and an elderly lay-brother squeezed himself out, crossed his arms upon his chest, and bowed to their guide.

"Tell Sister Cunlap I want her, Brother. Tell her to come at once. And tell her there are some visitors for the women's guest-house."

The lay-brother glanced at the two girls. "For the night, Father? Or just to lie down, Father?"

The monk frowned and shook his head, as if by this introduction of the image of night combined with the image of the lying down of ladies Brother Jenkyn had gone too far.

"Tell the Sister to come at once, Brother! Tell her we're waiting." Although that queer bar of iron still weighed on his eyelids, our friend spent most of his time during the uneasy interval that followed the Brother's leisurely disappearance in trying to catch Tegolin's eyes; but Alice was holding her in eager whispered conversation, and he had no success.

Meanwhile, through the chink of the great door which had been left ajar, but was now crossed by a heavy chain, there came the sound of chanting.

"What office can this be, Father?" enquired the Lollard. "I thought in the Cistercian Order—"

"It's choir-practice, Master Brut," replied the monk with a smile. "No, no! As I said just now, the Prior receives complaints in his cell today; but tomorrow, owing to his age and ill-health, the Abbot's court will be held in the chapter-house. I believe" — and he lowered his voice so as not to be heard by the door-keeper— "that today the Prior will only request you to submit to a few questions in the library. That is his usual procedure in cases of — in cases like yours. And then — after the Librarian's report—"

"But I hope," interrupted Rhisiart, trying in vain to remember a particular Latin phrase that was always used in the sheriff's office to denote privilege, "I hope you'll explain to Prior Bevan that I've come as Baron Glendourdy's emissary, I may say as his representative, to show his pious observance of the wishes of Abbot Cust by placing at his disposal—"

But here Mad Huw, breaking in with what he evidently considered the most diplomatic of casual gestures, caught our friend by the arm and murmured portentously, "Hush! Hush! Mum's the word, sweet sir, and don't forget it!"

It was while he was reassuring Mad Huw with vigorous asservations of his constant discretion that he caught sight of a little drama between Master Brut and the Ruthin girl that sent the hot blood to his cheeks again and disturbed his senses. He heard the Lollard suddenly request the Father to pardon him, and quite calmly and naturally as if he were saying goodbye to a well-intentioned pupil he walked up to the girl and deliberately tearing a page out of his precious Gospels and folding it up very carefully, and indeed with some difficulty, for the parchment was unyielding, he thrust it into her hand.

And the Ruthin girl never lifted her eyes while he did this. That was what absorbed and startled our friend so. She dropped her eyes when she felt him near and kept them lowered. Rhisiart was in front of her, so he couldn't be mistaken. She didn't look at Master Brut all the time. She held her eyes down while her hands kept fumbling and twitching — our friend was sure of that too — at the rough clasp of her dress. He saw her take the bit of paper the man gave her — she raised her eyes enough for that — but the Lollard's sturdy back intervened just then, so that he couldn't see what she did with it. Did she unclasp that pin she was fidgetting with, and slip it into her dress?

But through the monotonous reiteration of conspiring whispers breathed into his ear by the Friar he heard her now; and though the Lollard's back hid her face her voice was so rich and clear that he could catch every syllable, especially as she spoke in English. "I'll burn, before they get it from me!" he heard her say; and he surmised that the Lollard uttered a startled protest and made an attempt to get the paper back; for there was certainly some sort of struggle between them which was ended by Tegolin; but whether Tegolin made her give back that gospel-page Rhisiart couldn't tell, for Master Brut's broad back hid them both at the crucial point.

"Sister Cunlap says, Father," began lay-brother Jenkyn as soon as he reappeared. The fellow's eyes were gleaming with excitement. What he'd caught of the Sister's orders to her subordinates had evidently quickened his lively imagination. But he wasn't allowed to finish his report, for rapidly behind him, wearing a heavy veil, came the Mother of the guest-chamber herself. Sister Cunlap was clearly an amiable woman and not less clearly a very simple one, and her countenance, when she lifted her veil to speak, reminded Rhisiart of their old cook at home. He could see that both the girls were extremely relieved by the unveiling of that ruddy face and those homely grey eyes.

"The Lord be with you, Father, and with you, gentlemen," she began at once; and though a little out of breath her voice had a pleasant ring. "And the Lord be with you, my daughters!"

Mad Huw stepped up to Tegolin and laid his hand on her wrist. "The password's 'mum,' child, till we meet again; and the same here," and he tapped his forehead with an air of theatrical cunning.

"The Maid of Edeyrnion will be all right with me, Brother," said Sister Cunlap reassuringly.

"I know it, I know it, I know it!" chanted the Friar in childish spirits, "but we walk among pitfalls and our paths are beset by evil men!"

"Forgive my question," enquired the Lollard, "but how comes it that you all know us by name?" And he looked with his frank disarming smile from the Father to the Sister and back to the Father.

"Everybody round here knows Friar Huw of Llanfaes," said the good-natured woman, looking as she spoke so much like his mother's cook that Rhisiart had a vision of that cheerful, friendly English hearth, with its turn-spits and burnished pots, its smoky roof and brown flitches of bacon, "and everybody knows our brave Maid! Be you her serving-wench, my pretty daughter?"

Alice laughed outright at this. "I hope to be, Sister," she broke in eagerly, "but Mistress Tegolin—"

"I have come from the Baron of Glyndyfrdwy," interrupted our friend, "in obedience to—"

But Sister Cunlap's blank and bewildered face cut short his words. Feeling something of a fool he turned to the monk for corroboration, and once again searched his mind for that curst legal phrase about privilege; and then it seemed — as he went over it afterwards — as if the two girls had been whisked away under the voluminous wing of the worthy Sister with such discreet rapidity that, however much he'd been on the alert, no final glances could possibly have been exchanged.

As soon as they were well inside the nave of the Abbey church, which seemed full, at the same time, of a rich quietness and of a warm stir of sacred movement, their guide, after passing by with a searching glance several of his fellows, selected for his purpose a monk with the face of a happy but stupid child, and handed over Mad Huw to his care.

The choice was a singularly good one; and indeed, as our friend looked about him in this muted fragrance, where the afternoon sun as it fell through the high windows was so mellowed by the incense and the candles as to become something dim and sacrosanct, as if the great heathen orb itself had been lured into obedience, he came to the conclusion that this kind of ascetic fraternal life evoked a sort of "sixth sense," a sense by which, without any overt instruction in worldly diplomacy, a certain exquisitely subtle and sagacious handling of intruders from the outside world was practised. It was almost, he felt, as if some invisible cocoon of sanctified silk, impalpable as the surrounding incense, was made to encompass the recalcitrant motions of normal humanity, under the power of which such visitors from outside became docile and pliable, losing, without realizing what was happening, the vital urge of their natural self-assertion.

It was a great comfort to him — for in Tegolin's absence he felt responsible for Mad Huw — when he saw the respectful wonder, and even awe, with which this childlike Father went off, with the Friar's hand on his shoulder and all those obscure hints concerning Richard's movements hovering about his ears.

Yes, under this high carved roof and in this atmosphere where the very beams of the sun fluttered down like the locks of a shorn Samson before the altar candles, he felt as if there existed between all these silent, muffled, mysteriously busy Fathers a wordless understanding; an understanding that fathomed all, directed all, assuaged all, and no doubt could punish all, without the exchange between them of so much as a sign!

His instinct was justified when, after a merest whisper, in passing, with one of his colleagues, their guide informed them that he would leave them to their own devices for a few minutes while he went to inform the Prior of their arrival.

The fact that the chanting that was going on had no connection with any particular office made it possible for our two friends to wander where they pleased; and the first object of note they stumbled upon after making their formal genuflexion to the high altar was the pulpit.

Rhisiart made a gesture of wanton boyish hostility in the presence of those narrow steps and that carved rostrum. Aye! how he had hated the sermons in the Cathedral, and more still the laboured logic of the dean of his College! But the Lollard entered at once into a careful and scientific calculation of the acoustic properties of the screen above the preacher's desk.

"I believe you'd enjoy haranguing the whole establishment," Rhisiart whispered to him. "I warrant you'd make the Abbot squirm!"

But the face of his friend showed nothing but a sad earnestness. "I would like once, just once," he murmured, "to preach the Gospel of the Saviour up there!"

But leaving the pulpit and following side by side one of the narrow transept-aisles, they came upon a tomb that moved our friend to unforeseen excitement. It was his turn now to show emotion; and Master Brut was astonished to see him fall on his knees and even close his eyes in prayer. When he got up he pointed out to his companion the word "Madoc" carved on the great stone, above a two-edged cross-handled sword.

"Think of his having actually lain here," he whispered, "under this very stone, for nearly two hundred years!"

"Who is he?"

"Why, man, he's the founder! He's everything! And he's my ancestor, too. It's his blood that was in the blood of that traitor—" The lad stopped, overcome by his emotion. Like an avalanche of rubble, all the lesser impressions that had been absorbing his mind fell away, and the towers of Dinas Bran, as he had seen them that first moment from the edge of the wood, rose up in undiminished magic before his eyes.

But he swallowed his tears. "I must come here again," he thought, "and I must come alone!"

Respecting, though they were completely obscure to him, the feelings of his friend, the Lollard moved on. But Rhisiart, already a little ashamed of his agitation, soon followed him and found him puzzling over the inscription upon a most striking effigy, the like of which neither of the young men had seen before.

It was the figure of a woman, lying supine as if in a bed of granite; and what especially struck the two friends was that her form was hollowed out, not super-imposed upon the stone in raised relief.

Once more it was Rhisiart's destiny to interpret to his well-meaning but unenlightened friend the historic treasures of Valle Crucis.

"Read! Read, man! Can't you read what it says? It's Myfanwy herself!"

"She has a lovely name," murmured the Lollard cautiously, "but I don't think I recall — Is she mentioned in Giraldus?"

But Rhisiart waved Giraldus aside without a word. Bending reverently down he kissed the effigy's chilly feet in its hollow coffin.

"Princess," he recited, when he rose, as if the syllables were an incantation that could only be uttered in a special tone, "Princess Myfanwy of Dinas Bran; and that" — and he pointed to an effigy at her side— "is her husband. The story is that she loved — but you don't want to know the story. But she's been my ideal ever since I was a child. She must have come down from up there every Sunday for Mass! I expect her lover came too —

"No! you can glare at me all you like, Jennap ab Adam! If you couldn't do it while she lived you can't do it now. You can lie by her side, Monsieur, with the sword that killed him. But he's lying in her heart; and he'll lie there for ever! You can't cut love out of a girl's heart, Monsieur. You by her side, he in her heart — that's how things are. And that's how they'll be at the Judgment Day, though she goes to Hell for it!"

They were moving towards the Lady chapel now when the herb-gathering monk who'd brought them in suddenly appeared as if out of the wall.

"He's ready to see you," he said. "But he won't keep you long. Father Pascentius will then see you in the library. Will you come this way? He's in the cloisters."

He led them half across the entrance to the Lady chapel on whose altar was a gleaming array of candles evidently newly lit. The fellow stopped and began muttering under his breath so many "Hail Marys" that the suspicious and touchy Rhisiart began to feel as if everything that happened to them here was part of a deliberate plan to guide their souls into the way of peace.

"Would you like to go nearer?" said the monk when he rose. "It's a beautiful altar. Edward the son of Yeo is buried beside it. Some of us think that our Blessed Lady is already beginning to work miracles there. She certainly protected Edwardus filius Yeo with special favour when he took sanctuary here. He gave very liberally to our necessities. We pray for him daily. Won't you come nearer to the altar?"

But Rhisiart suggested that they mustn't keep Prior Bevan waiting any longer, while the Lollard enquired what crime Edwardus filius Yeo had committed that he had to pay so heavily to the servants of Our Lady. The monk had got them as far as the little passage leading into the sacristy before he replied to Master Brut.

But at this spot, well out of hearing of both Our Lady and her protégé, the man seemed automatically to assume a totally different tone. He now expressed nothing but natural horror at the nature of the crime committed by this subject of heavenly intervention. “Our Lady of Valle Crucis,” he said, “has melted many hearts, black with appalling sins, but her power has never been more miraculous than in the case of Edwardus filius Yeo.”

Rhisiart was too much perturbed by the extreme stuffiness of the sacristy, and by wondering whether what was obviously woman’s work being done there upon these embroidered vestments was a penance, to feel much inquisitiveness about the bones in the chapel. “God forgive us all!” he murmured watching the exquisite measures being taken to mend and clean a certain pontifical garment, through whose embroidered purple, to all appearance, Caesar himself might have been stabbed to death.

“Those poor fellows!” he thought. “They must feel like those wretched moths Modry used to catch and kill in my blankets at home.”

But the Lollard was totally unaffected either by the mustiness of the place or by the patience of the men doing that women’s work. He still went on sounding the monk about the sins of the son of Yeo. “Do you mean to tell me that Our Lady protected a rascal like that by a miracle?”

The monk’s face lit up. To be permitted — and in the presence of these penitential colleagues — to argue with a heretic in defence of the maternal clemency of the Mother of God was an unlooked for gift from Heaven.

“Surely all good Catholics must feel that the greater the sin the more wonderful the divine mercy?”

“Blessed is the intercession of the Holy Virgin,” said the Lollard, “but the Son of God alone, in the power of the Father and of the Spirit, can give absolution.”

The brow of the little monk beneath his big tonsured head knitted itself into wrinkles of incontrovertible logic as he set out to explain that just as the Vicar of Christ and the Priests of Holy Church have power on earth to forgive sins, so it is impossible not to suppose that the same power —

But our friend could think of nothing but these sacristy monks. "They're like those pictures in our new Cathedral window," he said to himself. No, they didn't once raise their eyes while this dialogue proceeded, though there was a faint shuffling of sandalled feet on the stone floor. "They'll chatter about it like magpies, I warrant, as soon as they get to their dormitory."

But a great booming voice interrupted the colloquy, and there in the doorway leading from the sacristy to the library stood Prior Bevan himself! He was a big, burly middle-aged man of over six feet, with a large, plump, unruffled visage, small searching eyes, and a jaw like the prow of a river barge.

Rhisiart made a little stiff obeisance and went boldly up to him. "I am the Baron of Glyndyfrdwy's cousin," he began, "and in obedience to Abbot Cust's message I have brought—"

But the Prior's deep voice intervened. "Just so, just so, exactly so," he bellowed. "You, sir, are Rhisiart ab Owen of Oxford, and you, sir, are Walter Brut of the Manor of Lyde, near the City of Hereford, lately under trial for heresy by your Bishop." He paused for a moment, while his piercing, screwed-up little eyes moved from person to person among everybody in sight.

"Abbot Cust is in bad health, in bad health," he went on. "It is to be feared he may have to leave tomorrow's court as well as tomorrow's chapter to me, leave 'em to me. We must pray that it may not be so; but it looks as if it would be so, as if it would be so." Prior Bevan's habit of repeating the final words of every sentence struck our friend as curiously disconcerting. It was as if he were dragging in to his support, to crown his most casual utterance, a great thundering echo from some invisible judgment-seat. You might presume to contradict that barging jaw and those imperative eyes; but there would still remain this portentous echo to bring you down.

“Father Pascentius,” he proceeded, “though engaged with a novice in his cell, engaged with a novice in his cell, is ready to receive you both. He will prepare you for the court tomorrow with a few little necessary questions, little necessary questions; and after that you will retire to the guest-house for sleep, for sleep. The Lord be with you, Master Rhisiart, and the Lord be with you, Master Brut — ne forte offendas ad lapidem pedem tuum!” And with this rather ambiguous last word for the benefit of the Lollard, and some low-voiced instructions to their guide, the Prior walked solemnly past them and entered the church.

Their guide now led them past a little alcove at the end of the stuffy sacristy which served for a library. Master Brut allowed his unruffled countenance to relax into a sly smile in our friend’s direction and even into a profane wink; for the collection of folios presented to their eyes was very meagre, not a twentieth part of the books they’d observed in the Astrologer’s chamber at Glyndyfrdwy.

One young monk, who cast down his eyes at their approach just as the sacristy ones had done, was engaged with a camel’s hair brush and a pot of glue over a volume in worse condition even than the vestment they had just seen.

Their guide, in the quick, subtle manner acquired by living so long and so silently cheek by jowl with other men, detected in a second what they felt and hurried to explain that all the real treasures of their collection had been conveyed to Father Pascentius’ cell to assist him in his labours upon Saint Thomas.

Out into the cloisters the little man now led them; and since these pleasantly-vaulted promenades occupied only two sides of a spacious lawn with a clear fountain in its centre both our travellers paused in admiration. On a stone bench, covered with a piece of well-worn matting, sat a couple of monks, who had evidently just come in from working in the fields and were contentedly resting themselves; and the sight of these men gave our friend a much happier impression of Valle Crucis than anything he'd yet seen.

Quick as ever to catch their mood their guide approached these men who rose at once and greeted them with frank, easy, natural simplicity. "He's not had time to give them the least hint," thought our analytical friend. "It must be the open air."

But after the conversation had drifted to the special devotion to agricultural pursuit of the great Cistercian Order, the thought did begin to insinuate itself into our lad's suspicious brain that it was not by a mere accident that these tonsured farmers should at that exact moment have been resting in the cloisters. Receiving an easy and almost secular farewell from these new acquaintances they were now led up a narrow flight of steps to the monks' dormitory. Through this they passed quickly, all too quickly for Rhisiart's taste, for he was beginning to compose in his mind a more succinct and effective address to their friend with the Phorkyad eye than he had as yet been able to deliver, and those agreeable cubicles each with its own especial window and breviary-shelf pleased and attracted him not a little. "How glad I would be," he thought, "when the bell rang for bed in this busy place!"

But they now reached a doorway at the head of a much smaller and more secretive-looking flight of steps than the one they'd come up, and at this door their guide deserted them; only turning to inform them, as he disappeared down this narrow descent, that it led directly into the church.

The cell of Father Pascentius, who was evidently a favoured personage, was of considerable size, and, as their guide had hinted, contained more books than the whole of that collection at the end of the sacristy. He was seated at his desk before a beautiful transcript of the works of Saint Bonaventura, and by his side stood a handsome boy of about fifteen for whom he had obviously been translating, and no doubt criticizing, the work before them. He greeted them warmly enough, but didn't rise from his seat. Indeed, instead of doing so, he put his arm round the boy's waist and asked him a question about the passage they had been studying.

The boy, naturally enough, found it embarrassing to be thus catechized before two strange young men, and blushed and blundered in his reply; but instead of releasing him in the presence of these signs of nervousness, the Father seemed to take pleasure in his discomfort, and pressed him with further questions.

Finally, just as Rhisiart had reached in his mind the climax of what he was about to say, the theologian asked the boy why he was in such a hurry to be gone.

This time the lad answered earnestly and to the point. "There's an archery-match at the Tassel to-night, Father, and Davy Gam is giving a new bow to the winner, and I promised to go."

"To go with whom?"

"With Sieffre of Dyffryn Clwyd, Father!"

"With that young rogue; eh? Well, I'm sure — I don't know. Didn't I say I was afraid I might have to keep you in to-night?"

"Yes, Father."

"Well, I'm sure — I don't know."

The boy's lips trembled. Like a wild bird he glanced at the narrow window and then down at the great book on the desk.

"What do you think these gentlemen would say if they knew why you may have to give up the archery-match to-night?"

The blood rushed to the boy's cheeks and he hung his head.

"Look at me, Griff!"

But Griff only bent lower.

"Well, off you go! But remember—"

Rhisiart moved aside to let the lad reach the door, and when he was gone Father Pascentius gave utterance to a heavy sigh.

"Well," he repeated, motioning his visitors to be seated, "well — I'm sure — I don't know. But now to business, to business, as the Prior would say. Your case" — and he turned his black eyes on our friend— "is more simple than yours" — and he turned them on the Lollard— "but it's clear you both have come into this country at the same summons as brought Father Rheinalt and me to Glyndyfrdwy the other night. Now, of that, my sons, I would say nothing, if I were you, when we meet at the court tomorrow. Owen has his friends here, of whom as you know I am one, and he has his enemies, among whom, as you may not know, is our good Prior. But Owen's quarrel won't come up at the court tomorrow, unless either of you are unwise enough to bring it up. But you, Master Rhisiart, will have to defend yourself from the charge of breaking the King's peace in the matter of Brother Huw. That's the charge that the King's friends at the Tassel and my lord Fitz-Alan of Chirk will bring against you; and considering that Hugh Burnell and his son Denis and the yeomen of a couple of shires are encamped only half a mile away, it's a serious charge." He paused and, lifting up one of the vellum covers of the great book under his hand, produced a paper of notes, which he proceeded to scan.

“The line I would suggest you take in your defence, my son, is that you were moved by your zeal for Holy Church to protest against the impiety of Master Simon in taking it upon himself to put to death a Brother of Saint Francis without trial before the proper authorities. Our house has already many points of litigation against the Earl of Arundel, and if you steadily repeat in court, ‘I drew my sword for the rights of Valle Crucis,’ and refuse to discuss anything else, our Abbot — I should say our Prior — will be forced to defend you.”

Rhisiart bowed, swallowed with an effort the eloquent speech he had been composing, and expressed his becoming gratitude.

“And now,” said Father Pascentius, referring again to his notes, “having decided that we’ll keep our Welsh controversy out of it altogether, and in the matter of Brother Huw that we appeal to the privileges of the Church, it remains, Master Brut, to arrange your line of defence.

“Now I would suggest,” and he settled his unwieldy form more comfortably in his seat and stretched out his legs, “that you answer me, here and now, a few crucial questions and that — when we’ve prepared your answers — I write them down. Is that your pleasure, my son?”

“Hereafter as may be,” replied the cautious heretic.

“I have before me,” continued Father Pascentius, “the opinions of certain followers of the deceased Master Wycliffe, and I will take the most questionable of these opinions in due order. Firstly, John Becket of London holds and maintains that Christian baptism is of no value if done by a priest living in mortal sin. Do you, my good son, separate yourself entirely and absolutely from this unphilosophical and crazy notion? For what parent anxious to save the soul of his child would think of bothering himself about the life of the officiating priest — the mere medium of the divine mercy?”

"I certainly can, Father," replied the Lollard, "absolutely and entirely separate myself from this opinion."

Rhisiart looked out of the window, feeling as weary of all this as the youthful Griff. And since the window opened upon the deep well-stocked fish-pond and since standing in a flat-bottomed boat, his clothes fastened about his waist and his legs bare, was an excited monk with a rod and a great net, his thoughts were agreeably distracted.

But Father Pascentius continued. "Secondly, we have the opinion of one John Purvey, a friend of Master Wycliffe, that decisions of Popes and councils have no value unless they are grounded expressly on Holy Scripture or on reason and should be publicly burnt as heretical. Now, Master Brut, do you absolutely and entirely separate yourself from this un-Catholic view, which, as you can clearly see, destroys the tradition of the Church, the authority of the Father, the unity of our communion with the departed, and the faith once for all delivered to the Saints?"

Rhisiart was drawn back sharp from the window by the abrupt tone of his comrade's answer: "I do not!" said the Lollard firmly. Father Pascentius was not in the least perturbed.

"Quite right," he said. "I can see you are a cautious student of the necessary antinomies and contradictory truths in our Holy Faith! I can see that you recognize the profound danger of emphasizing any single aspect of Catholic Doctrine lest other aspects, no less important, should be disparaged. There have been, and no student of history can deny it, local councils and individual Pontiffs whose arbitrary and capricious decrees have been implicitly, if not explicitly, burnt as heretical by a more universal authority. Securus judicat orbis terrarum, and it is only by the patience of the Holy Spirit and by the patience of Rome in holding back her decisions till the orbis terrarum has spoken that this grave danger of arbitrary caprice in local councils and individual Popes is avoided. You see, Master, my question concerning this man's heresy was designed to test your theological balance. Had you replied too hastily in an unqualified dissent from Master Purvey's opinion I would have felt anxiety lest you might fall into the opposite heresy of judging truth by vulgar majorities. The Catholic Faith is the great sublimator and subsumer of the inevitable contradictions and paradoxes of the human mind. To balance her orbis terrarum she has her Athanasius Contra Mundum. She is at once the centre and the circumference wherein the pendulum of our poor fallible reason swings.

"I know well, Master Brut, that with your well-balanced nature you are fully aware of the ferocious and fanatical extremes into which reason and logic can lead us. Isn't it much more likely that the critical thought of so many generations of wise and learned men, giving articulation to the inspired piety of the people, should be in the right of it rather than the arbitrary opinions of John Purvey?"

Rhisiart nodded at his obstinate companion with such a frown on his narrow Norman visage and his lips sucked in to such an extent that his face took in the appearance of the handle of a carved walking-stick.

"Surely," his look said, "you cannot follow a Jackanapes Purvey against the shrewd legal wisdom of universal common-sense?"

But the Lollard was unshaken. "I cannot separate myself," he repeated, "from Master Purvey's opinion that in the Holy Scriptures, reasonably interpreted, is to be found the Truth."

"But not the only truth, my son! And not the most important truth. The Church as the Bride of Christ can answer you, my dear lad, in Christ's own words. Was He referring to our poor, crazy, logical faculty when He said, 'I am the Way, the Truth, and the Life?' But let me pass to another opinion of this disciple of Wycliffe — No! no — I beg his pardon! — we return again here to John Becket who certainly disgraced his martyred namesake when he maintained the following amazing thesis: that his own teaching — the teaching of this worthy citizen of London — was more likely to be edifying to others and pleasing to God than all the teaching of the Church in all previous times."

The Lollard smiled at this. "Not having heard Master Becket's discourses, Father, I cannot say; but I confess I think the good gentleman's tone does smack a little of self-conceit."

Father Pascentius, without a movement of his great heavy body, turned his burning eyes once more upon his notes.

"Do you, my son," he began again, "utterly and absolutely separate yourself from the opinion of William Chatrys, otherwise called Sawtry, priest of Kings Lynn, when he maintains that after the words of consecration the bread remains bread and nothing more? This, my son, I needn't point out to you, is an opinion which cuts at the very root of our Holy Religion. Surely, surely my dear child, you cannot subscribe to such a denial of the supreme article of our Faith?"

To Rhisiart's amazement Master Brut hesitated before replying. This was a serious shock to our friend, who thought that only Mohammedans, Turks and Chinamen refused to believe in the Miracle of the Mass. Then very slowly, word by solemn word, as if he were sealing each syllable with his blood, the Wycliffite answered. "It remains bread, but bread plus the body of Christ. It does not cease to be bread, but it remains holy, true, and the Bread of Life. That I believe to be the very body of Christ."

Never had Rhisiart seen such dark fire in any human eyes as that which shone from the eyes of Father Pascentius as he gazed at and through the pale but unruffled countenance before him.

But he spoke gently and even tenderly. “You have weighed your words well, my son, and if you will allow me I will make a note of them exactly as you uttered them.” He bent over his desk and wrote, and when he’d finished he repeated the words to the accused and asked him if they were correct.

Master Brut, with a faint smile, inclined his head.

Rhisiart began to feel extremely uncomfortable. Matters were getting out of control and he was being carried out of his depth. He stared at the paper in the monk’s hand as if it had been a death-warrant, while a rush of confused images swept through his brain of historic occasions when a few scrawls upon a bit of parchment had meant life or death.

“Thank you, my son,” murmured Father Pascentius, folding up the paper; “and now I will tell you frankly what I think. You weighed your words so well that I think it depends entirely upon the prelate who judges your case. In the same hands as those in which the unfortunate Master Sawtry found himself you would be condemned. Henry Spencer, the Bishop of Norfolk, has declared his intention as is well known, of making all you Gospel-men ‘hop headless,’ as he is pleased to put it, ‘and fry-faggots,’ and Archbishop Arundel is of the same kidney. Our good Bishop, however, Bishop Trevor of St. Asaph, is totally averse to such unintelligent harshness. He’s a theologian, not a bully; and he would at once remember all the profound metaphysical issues involved, relative to the change of ‘substance’ and the continuity of ‘accidents’ to which your words obviously refer.

“The unlucky thing is — I speak to you two lads as a fellow Welshman — that our good Prior is looking for the Archbishop’s word with the Holy Father in regard to filling our Abbot’s place when he leaves us. With Abbot Cust, who also is a theologian and well read in the metaphysic of the schools, you would be perfectly safe. But I doubt—” He hesitated and pondered. “However,” he went on, with a quick glance at door and window, and with the flicker of a conspirator’s smile, “we three are sworn adherents of Owen, and Owen has taken a very natural fancy to you both, and, after all, the bread does retain, to our relative and fallible senses, the ‘accidents’ of bread, and if our old gentleman” — he paused and, folding his hands on his great belly, gazed at the vaulted roof “could, perhaps, see you to-night, he might, sick as he is, be persuaded to give our ambitious Prior” — here he unclasped his hands and leaned heavily forward over the great book— “a very considerable — shock.”

There was a deep silence among them for a second or two, while there came through the narrow window the brooding voice of a distant wood-pigeon. Then Father Pascentius lifted up the vellum cover of Saint Bonaventura and dropped it, and again lifted it up and again dropped it, and while the wood-pigeon, in a voice soft as the divine afflatus of a scholastic philosophy as yet unrevealed to the wisest, was answered by the voice of its mate, he leant back once more in his chair. He now appeared to be surveying an alien speck upon the noble parchment before him, a speck that may have been the result of a sneeze of his own but more probably was caused by Griff’s distress over the complexities of seraphic argument.

Touching this speck upon the great tome as if it had been a fairy’s seal he now addressed his visitors with an air of such pensive casualness that it made them feel as if the arrival of a hundred heretics from Hereford was less important than the dropping of a single tear upon Saint Bonaventura.

“Suppose somebody,” he murmured, looking down at the tip of the plump finger he had placed upon this small speck, “suppose somebody should — as is of course quite easy in a community like ours — have been whispering for several days in a certain old gentleman’s ear that since he has to die anyhow he might just as well spend his last breath check-mating the English? Isn’t it possible that when tomorrow comes such an old gentleman might decide to hold his court in person? I ask you, isn't it just possible he might?"

Though to all appearance it was of the mark left by Griffs tear that the Father asked this question, Rhisiart hastened to prolong the topic by boldly enquiring how it came about that with such a patriotic influence at Abbot Cust's elbow this drastic document from the Abbey had reached Owen that morning.

The burning Phorkyad eyes were raised at this, and there was a significant pause.

"Well, I'll be frank with you, son," said the theologian. And after what seemed a suspicious glance in the direction of an eaves-dropping wood-pigeon, he went on gravely. "The King must have heard something in Scotland. And after our experience of Owen's discretion last night can we wonder at it? At any rate, here is Hugh Burnell, a sturdy Shropshire squire and, let me tell you, a man worth a dozen of these border-barons, encamped at Oswestry. It was from his camp and with a guard of his bowmen that this Italian arrived, not only a go-between, as Master Young guessed, between Rome and King Hal, but, as our Prior soon discovered, between Rome and the Archbishop.

"The Prior snatched at this grand chance. He was up all last night sending messengers and letters; and there was nothing for the Abbot to do but to implore Owen to yield on every point. I myself added a note to Father Rheinalt with a hint about Huw and the Maid and this Ruthin woman — aye, my lads, but there's been a fuss about her. Grey's people were over here before dawn making their complaint — but now that he's sent you two as well and I never thought he'd wit enough for that — we may, if the old man can be brought to the scratch, give Owen the breathing-space he needs."

Rhisiart's thin face had grown by this time dark red with excitement. Here he was, playing a living, nay! a leading part in momentous, in historic transactions!

"Father!" he burst out. "Was Master Young right in thinking so strongly that Owen ought to wait?"

But the wily theologian evidently felt he had gone far enough in his talk with these simple young men. He rose ponderously from his seat.

"By my confession!" he cried in Welsh, using a phrase familiar to Rhisiart in Modry's tales, "I'll chance it! Come along, Masters. We'll pay a visit to the old man!" Thrusting his notes into the pocket of his habit, and opening the door with caution, he conducted them down a short passage-way to an airy platform, where half-a-dozen winding steps led up to the private rooms of the Abbot of Valle Crucis.

Without knocking, and moving as quietly as his great bulk permitted, the monk opened the door of his Superior's ante-room. Here they were met by an intelligent-looking lay-brother who seemed less surprised at their appearance than might have been expected. "He's intended to do this all the time!" thought our astute friend.

"Brother Gerald is studying medicine," remarked the theologian, introducing the man in a series of low whispers. "How is he to-night?"

The lay-brother shook his head. "He will get up," he whispered. "You'll find him reading by his fire. He's eaten nothing. He can't sleep. Does" — he paused and jerked his head in the direction of the dormitory— "he know you've brought them?"

Father Pascentius made his characteristic gesture of wiping out all human follies and reducing the whole troublesome drama of existence to kindly nothingness. "Who knows what he knows?" he murmured. "At any rate, here we are! May we go straight in?"

Brother Gerald glanced quickly at the young men as much as to say, “You see what he is! You see what little good it would do for me to protest!” and moving straight across the ante-room, opened the inner door.

Rhisiart was quite taken aback by the simplicity of Abbot Cust’s cell. It was much smaller than Father Pascentius’ study. A good many books, however, chiefly of an antique devotional nature, though our alert Oxonian did notice a dilapidated and evidently much-studied Virgil, occupied two sides of the little room. Next to the window, which was filled with dark reddish-coloured glass, hung a large wooden crucifix, of somewhat ghastly realism upon the rude features of whose victim flickered the light of a couple of rustic candles both of which were dripping upon their iron sconces.

Unlike any ecclesiastic our friend had ever seen, the frail figure that rose from the hearth to greet them wore a straggly beard. This beard was of a reddish tint, and combined with the extreme pallor of the man’s emaciated countenance and the fragility of his diminutive frame, it gave him the appearance of a small fish, a holy and red-finned roach, the Abbot of the Fish-Pond. It was his enormous learning and his mystical piety that had been the cause of his rise to an Abbot’s throne; but his appointment had been much more popular with the Welsh than with the great barons of the border. Chirk and Ruthin and Dinas Bran were all delighted when the formidable Prior, as well adapted to this difficult world as Abbot Cust was ill-adapted, began to harry and drive and dominate and overawe this gentle creature of another element.

“What a contrast to our old friend of Caerleon!” thought the young men; but they both knelt down with unsimulated humility before this abject little figure, not so much because he was reported to be the most learned Abbot in Wales as because there was something about him suggesting that his days were near their end.

"This is going to be," said our friend to himself, "the most important conversation I've ever had in my life!" But Father Pascentius had barely seated himself opposite the Abbot, with the medical lay-brother and the two visitors established on wooden stools between them, when a sound that caught the quick ears of Brother Gerald caused him to jump to his feet and hasten through both the doors into the little passage from which they had entered.

The Abbot showed so much anxiety over this new disturbance that Rhisiart wondered if he didn't fear the intrusion of the formidable Prior, and he noticed that even Father Pascentius fell silent.

"Is it the Prior?" seemed indeed to be what they were all thinking; and for several minutes, as people do when something menacing is threatened, they all swung round and stared at the door.

The general tension was increased rather than relaxed when Brother Gerald hurriedly returned with a grave face.

"It's Mistress Lowri," he announced, bowing quickly to the Abbot and glancing at Father Pascentius. "I told her my Lord Abbot was too ill to see her in his reception-room and I told her it was against our rule for her to see him here; but she says it's a matter affecting the honour of the house and a matter too, if I understood her correctly, relating to tomorrow's court." He now turned point-blank to the sick man. "She refused to be satisfied until I told you, my Lord, that the news she brought was of such importance that —"

"Where is she now?" the latter enquired of the messenger.

"In my Lord's reception-room."

"Have any of the Fathers seen her?"

"I don't think so, Father. She came straight through the garden to my Lord's postern, and Brother Iorwerth let her in."

"Are all the Fathers in the church?"

"I think so, Father."

The theologian turned to the Abbot. "It almost seems to me, my Lord," he said, "that this would be an occasion for relaxing our rule. If you were well enough you would certainly go down to your reception-room. And since it's an affair for your court tomorrow—" He paused, as Abbot Cust sank back with a nervous spasm into his chair, and then added, "You remember you saw the Lady Charlton here once, and we all felt grateful to you for stretching a point when so much depended—"

"But Mistress Lowri!" gasped the sick man.

Father Pascentius rose. "I will take the full responsibility, my Lord, and if the Prior—"

The mention of his troublesome subordinate seemed to rouse the old man and he spoke in a tone of defiant authority. "Go and fetch her yourself, Father. My days are numbered." And then as if the fact of having asserted himself in the small matter of breaking a monastic rule gave him courage for a bolder plunge, he looked challengingly at his medical attendant and announced in a trembling voice, "If it kills me, Brother, I shall preside over our court myself tomorrow."

Father Pascentius gave a quick glance at the Lollard and left the room. In his absence, Abbot Cust seemed to become a different person. He sighed, he shrugged his feeble shoulders, he rubbed his face with his thin hands. And then he glanced almost humorously at his visitors.

"Mistress Lowri," he said, "is a good Welshwoman and a true ally of Owen's. She is living — miserere nobis — in venial, though let us hope not in mortal, sin; but I am not without hope for her. Her daughter is a good girl — a very good girl — and I don't want — I don't want when I'm so near my own last account — to break the bruised flax!"

"My Lord," began Rhisiart boldly, "I don't know if they've told you that it was to save Brother Huw from being burnt, burnt illegally, burnt contrary to your own jurisdiction by Master Simon of Chirk, that we, in company with the Abbot of Caerleon—"

Abbot Cust raised his hand to stop him. "I know," he murmured, "I know, my son." And then with a heavy sigh, "This burning for heresy is a new thing in our land. There have been cases — I suppose there are cases — but I don't like it, I don't like it!"

"Are we to blame the present King, my Lord," interjected Master Brut eagerly, "or is the Archbishop—"

The Abbot gave him a long, sad, weary look. "These are dark times, my son, dark and cruel times; and I can well see that if our rulers resort to such methods it is natural that violent and godless men like Master Simon will take upon themselves—"

"But in some matters, my Lord," broke in Rhisiart, full of boyish pride at being permitted to talk freely with a mitred Abbot, "our ways are better, aren't they, than our fathers' before us? We saw just now in the church, my Lord, the tomb of Edwardus filius Yeo; and our guide informed us—"

Abbot Cust's withered face brightened perceptibly. It was clearly an immense relief to him to pass from modern persecution to mediaeval crime. "Ah, my dear child!" he said, assuming the joyful expression of a scholarly historian, "we are dealing here with a most interesting subject!" He moved in his chair as he spoke and leaning forward from its edge warmed his bony fingers over the fire. He forgot the chapter house, he forgot Master Simon, he forgot Mistress Lowri. He became a passionate Welsh archaeologist proud of the darkest secrets of his country's mythical past. "From what I can gather," he began, "it seems that this particular benefactor of ours was one of these curious disciples of our great Saint Derfel. I suppose you lads have never heard of Saint Derfel and his Horse? Well, for many hundreds of years this curious Being has been the object of what to my mind is undoubtedly a most interesting heathen cult. The Church of our ancestors, as I always say, was wise in assuming the canonization of this queer figure, though I doubt myself whether the Holy Father had anything to do with it!

"I have myself — but alas! I shall die without finishing my notes — made some slight investigations into this extraordinary subject, and it appears," and he quoted a Latin author unknown to either of his hearers, "it appears that not only was the deflowering of young virgins a definite part of the worship of this ancient Welsh god, but that certain unscrupulous men made use of this dark tradition to satisfy their unholy desire under the guise of priests — no! I mustn't say priests — under the guise of disciples, of this singular Personage and his Horse. It was, I understand, as one of the worst of such offenders that this 'Edwardus,' who later was privileged to decorate our Lady chapel, was found guilty. And the curious thing is, my dear boys, that there still survive, in out-of-the-way districts of this country, ignorant and simple people who—"

But Master Brut could contain himself no longer. For some while now Rhisiart had been aware that though the Lollard's eyes were fixed with absorbed interest on the aged antiquary, he had begun scraping the floor with his feet and muttering "um-um-um-um" without knowing he was doing it.

“Pardon me, my Lord,” he cried, his eyes eager and stern and grave under his smooth brow, “but how can the Church tolerate such evil superstitions? How can you, my Lord, tolerate them?”

“I don’t — quite — follow you, my son,” and the old man sighed and leaned back in his chair.

The Lollard began afresh: “Isn’t all this making of saints out of devils part of the same concessions to evil as the selling of Indulgences and the preserving of relics, and the tyrannical claims of messengers from Rome like that Italian last night?”

“But, my son, my son,” murmured the old man, “Saint Derfel and his Horse are like Bran and his Crow, and like Rhiannon and her Birds. The Church in her wisdom has always sought to consecrate rather than to destroy; and as Father Pascentius writes in some notes upon Saint Thomas that I’ve had the benefit of reading, the ultimate nature of the Deity, what He is Absolutely in Himself, must be forever unknown to our finite intelligence. Every good Catholic is, in this absolute sense, in the dark, and must ever be in the dark, about God. But the Church has always been tender and indulgent to the instincts of awe and worship, even where—”

But in a voice vibrant with emotion the Lollard interrupted him. “With humble submission, my Lord,” he said, “it remains that — whatever the Church teaches — we possess, as Saint Paul says, the mind of Christ.”

The Abbot sighed heavily; more, Rhisiart was certain, from anxiety as to the fate of this audacious free-thinker than from any personal irritation. Evidently desirous of dodging any further allusion to the desperate psychologizing of Saint Paul, the old man now changed his tone. “But apart from theology,” he pleaded, “surely you, my son, as a good Welshman, must feel that these old legends have played, and will play again, an important role in the preservation of our national spirit?”

Rhisiart, thinking of all that Modry's tales had done for himself, threw in his word at this: "Yes, surely, Walter! Yes, surely!"

But Master Brut, undeterred, flung out his deepest thought. "Not in our superstitions," he cried, "but in our language is the salvation of our race; and I hope a time will come when in our own tongue and in our own mountains the Gospel of Christ will so stir Wales that once again as in the days of Saint David—"

The Abbot lifted his hand. "My son, my son!" he groaned; and for a moment he closed his eyes, and Rhisiart was sure he was praying for this misguided and unbalanced soul. But once more, while Brother Gerald glared indignantly at the presumptuous heretic, the old man returned to his favourite topic. "It must be my blundering exposition of this old Derfel cult," he said, "that leads you to speak as you do. I have gone very deeply into it and I can assure you—"

But to our friend's disgust, though to the obvious relief of the lay-brother who evidently regarded these antiquarian predilections as a sign of his patient's approaching end, the door now opened to admit not only Father Pascentius and Mistress Lowri, but a roughly accoutred burly gentleman whose genial and brusque manners over-rode every soul present. It was pitiful to Rhisiart to see the collapse of the old prelate to whom he had been listening with such rapt respect.

Abbot Cust fell back in his chair without the heart to do more than make a weak, faint gesture with his hand to bid them all be seated.

But the Englishman, standing erect in his cross-gartered hose, his great leather jerkin, his muddy shoes with their gleaming spurs and his broad leather belt with its couple of hunting-knives, took complete possession of the situation. He was certainly one of the most good-natured magnates that our friend had ever seen. His broad red cheeks, big nose and shrewd grey eyes were quite spoilt from the point of view of good looks by certain noticeable smallpox scars, but the honest friendliness of his smile, in spite of the fact that most of his front teeth had been knocked out in quarter-staff, made him a person — Rhisiart felt at once — whom even as your enemy you couldn't hate!

He had been talking to Mistress Lowri as he crossed the ante-room, and now having bent the knee to the silent Abbot whose bearded chin had sunk down upon his chest, he went on with what he'd been saying to her, though out of respect for the sick man in a much lower tone of voice.

The lady's dark eyes, after her quick obeisance to the Abbot, flashed provocatively at Rhisiart, and her red lips parted in a mocking smile; and all the while she was listening to the Salopian Sheriff's words she concentrated upon our friend, disregarding everybody else. These beguiling advances, although lips and eyes were alone employed, were anything but wasted. Our friend's inner consciousness went promptly whirling off upon an imaginary future in which he was the cause of sundry desperate and distracting quarrels between a mother and a daughter. Sheriff Burnell was, it seems, half-rallying and half-threatening the lady. He kept chaffing her about his son's infatuation, he kept chaffing her about her infatuation for Owen, and all the while he kept referring to her purpose in coming so secretly to the Abbey, which apparently concerned the fate of her husband, Master Simon.

"But you know where he is," Burnell was saying. "And you could lay hands on him if Denis gave you the men and my Lord here gave you the licence. But what would you do with him when you got him? He's your lawful husband, isn't he? Starve him to death at the foot of Denis's bed? That's the point, isn't it, my Lord?" and he turned to the comatose figure in the chair. "That's the point, isn't it, Father?" and he warded off with unruffled aplomb the black fire that was being shot at him from beneath the brows of the theologian. “King Harry wants his liege subjects to live in peace, and you, reverend Fathers, want all of us husbands and wives to consort amiably and piously together for the procreation of loyal, faithful, baptized and Christian souls! But the point in this case, it seems to me, is that the King’s justice, of which Hugh Burnell, not Denis Burnell, is the custodian, has a claim upon the body and goods of Master Simon, commonly called the Hog, that must precede the claim of his espoused wife, even though she burns to have the custody of him, and even though she is the friend of the Constable of Dinas Bran. What do you say, Father?”

Father Pascentius began his wily handling of the situation by imploring the Sheriff to sit down.

And the man did sit down, with a great deal of creaking of his leather attire and not a little scraping of his spurs on the floor; and he sat down opposite the comatose Abbot, upon whose narrow forehead, white as ivory, the firelight was flickering.

But having very sagaciously got the sturdy Salopian into a deep seat by a warm fire and opposite a nodding old man, with knuckles that clutched the arms of his chair like gleaming bones, Father Pascentius whispered something to Brother Gerald, who darted to a little cupboard in the wall and brought out a small gold vessel, which he filled from a larger vessel in the same recess and presented to Sheriff Burnell.

The Salopian smiled benevolently at the whole company, raised the gold vessel to his face, smelt it, held it up towards the unnoticing head opposite him, and disposed of half of it in a gulp. But so strong was the wine that even this seasoned drinker spluttered a little as it went down and spilled a few purple drops upon his brown leather jerkin.

“Malmsey?” he chuckled, smiling at Father Pascentius.

“The oldest in Wales,” replied the commentator upon Saint Thomas. “The King has no better. The Archbishop none so good.”

The Sheriff glanced at the two young men. “Once in a way — to the Lord Abbot of Valle Crucis — English or Welsh — guilty or not guilty — will you fill for the lads?”

At a nod from the Father the troubled and outraged Gerald refilled the gold beaker; and between them the Lollard and Rhisiart drained it to the dregs.

“To my Lord Abbot!” they cried in turn.

Something in their warm heart-felt youthful tones reached the old man in his prostration, and raising his hand with an effort, “Pax vobiscum, filii carissimi!” he whispered.

While this was going on, Mistress Lowri with a burning spot in each of her white cheeks, but with her beautiful head modestly cast down, had seated herself on the floor close to the old man’s feet; and the Abbot now, with a gesture that was evidently spontaneous, laid his hand for an instant on her bent head.

“Be as good a woman, daughter,” he murmured, “as your child is a good girl.” The head he had touched with its dusky weight of fragrant hair sank still lower.

Rhisiart couldn’t see her face but he was bewitched by the manner in which, as her dark riding-cloak fell back, the folds of her green-and-gold gown settled themselves about her crouching limbs.

“Pray for all — for all the” — murmured the old man softly— “for all the faithful departed — et videbit omnis caro salutare Dei.”

In the silence that fell upon them after this Rhisiart could catch, far away in the Church below, the deep-voiced intoning of the monks.

The rich wine had already begun to go to the boy’s head, for he had had nothing to eat since their meal in the Saracen’s chamber; but as he sat there on his stool close to his comrade, while Father Pascentius on one side of the fire and Brother Gerald on the other looked from the Abbot to the Sheriff and from the Sheriff to the Abbot, and the ghastly face upon the wooden cross stared reproachfully upon them all, a deep quiescence fell upon him, and an indescribable feeling possessed him that was profoundly sad and yet in some strange way comforting and sweet.

Abbot Cust was lying back in his chair now with his eyes closed and his hands folded, breathing softly.

“My Lord sleeps,” whispered the careful Brother.

“Come, Father,” said the robust Salopian, looking up at the theologian, “you are a sensible Welshman as I am a sensible Englishman. We’re not young hot-heads like these lads here; and we’re no — God rest my poor Bessy’s soul! — no avengers of injury!” Saying this he glanced at the woman on the floor, whose own eyes were fixed on those of the dazed Rhisiart who was trying to defend himself from them by calling up the image of Tegolin.

“Well, Father,” he went on, “putting aside all the Norman legalities so dear to your good Prior, what’s to be done with all these hostages Glendourdy’s given up? I would suggest, as a plain servant of His Majesty, that we pack them all off to-night before my Lords of Chirk and Ruthin arrive, and before little Davy at the Tassel gets wind of it, straight to my son in Dinas Bran. There they’ll simply be prisoners at the King’s pleasure, and not Welshmen in the hands of Lord Marchers. I had definite authority from the King to raise these troops from his loyal county of Salop; and I had orders to use them at my own discretion. Grey and Fitz-Alan are as jealous of each other as wolf-hounds. Grey had the King’s ear in Scotland and has now posted home with the hope of catching your friend Owen off-guard. But Owen by his submission to my Lord Abbot, and by handing over these people, has dished him neatly, and cut the ground under his feet. These lads are here" — and he glanced humorously at Rhisiart and the Lollard— "and your daughter and her Friar are here" — he looked at the lady on the floor — "and the Ruthin hussy's here, too. Now wouldn't the best thing for all concerned be to hurry off the whole lot of them under a strong guard of my Salopians, who care for none of these things, to my son at Dinas Bran? They'd be His Majesty's prisoners then under the care of His Majesty's Constable; and our good Prior down below will be as neatly cheated of his precious court-trial, which might end," and he gave the young men a shrewd and significant glance, "most unpleasantly; and Grey, with his friends at the Tassel, will be cheated of their revenge on Owen."

His long speech ended, the robust Englishman made an instinctive motion of his hand towards the golden beaker which either the Lollard or Rhisiart had placed on the floor between them; and Father Pascentius made a sign to Gerald to refill it.

While the Brother was thus engaged, Abbot Cust, to everyone's astonishment, opened his eyes and leaned forward. It was clear to them all that he had formed some definite resolution. But he sighed heavily before speaking, and murmured sadly, "Usque quo Domine, sanctus et verus, non judicat et vindicas sanguinem nostrum?" But after that, he straightened himself in his chair; and as if to reassure the perturbed Brother Gerald he deliberately twitched the end of his beard with his finger and thumb.

"If I agree to your demand, Sheriff," he said, "and allow you to take them to your son, will you swear on your word as a Shropshire gentleman and before all these present that you'll write to King Henry of Owen's submission, and that none of these people will be given up, save into the King's own hand, or into that of his Lord Deputy at Chester?"

The faithful Gerald was so agitated by this miracle of energy in his master that he spilled quite a quantity of the precious wine as he handed the cup to the Sheriff.

"Brother! Brother! Be careful!" pleaded Father Pascentius; and it struck Rhisiart's mind as quaintly characteristic of the commentator that at what was perhaps a life-and-death moment to some of them he should be fussing over spilt Malmsey.

But Hugh Burnell rose to his feet with the cup in his hand. "The King!" he murmured, tilting it to his lips. And then, with a wink at Mistress Lowri, "Heddwch!" he cried, using the historic word with which the bards proclaimed peace.

"And now," said Abbot Cust, with a faint smile, as his head sank against the back of his chair and his hands, too weak to pluck his beard again, lay like used-up gloves on his lap, "we won't torment our medical brother here any more. I know he has been long impatient to get us to bed."

The Sheriff bent one of his steel-protected knees to the ground, while our two friends knelt down completely.

"Bless us, my Lord!" prayed Rhisiart hoarsely.

"Gratia Domini nostri Jesu Christi cum vobis nobisque in saecula saeculorum!" whispered the old man, raising his fingers with an effort.

As he got up Rhisiart became aware that the smell of spilt Malmsey was mingled with the heavy fragrance of feminine hair. Mistress Lowri had risen to her feet and was standing by his side.

The Sheriff was asking Master Brut about the price of a yoke of oxen at Hereford fair and Father Pascentius was bending over the old man, so that the lady was able to whisper anything she pleased in our friend's dazed ear.

The Malmsey-fumes in our lad's head were still at work, and he thought to himself, as she drew off her glove and let her fingers rest for a second on the sleeve of his tunic, that he'd never seen such a slender waist. Certain unchaste words from some old voluptuous ballad about loosening a lady's zone came into his head.

"How can she be Tegolin's mother?" he wondered, as the image of the maid's boyish figure in her page's dress opposed itself to this Circean form, whose green-and-gold gown seemed to cling like a serpent's skin to her sides and to her flanks. All this while, as he was wondering what kind of fabric it could be that had the trick of displaying all the charms of her body with such tantalizing completeness, she was whispering to him that he need have no fear of Denis Burnell. "It'll just be a pleasant adventure for a brave boy like you," she said; "nor need your friend have any fear. The King is much more easygoing than any of these monks. They say he'd have let off these London heretics if it wasn't that the Archbishop keeps egging him on."

She paused and, with a gesture that made Rhisiart think of some woman in the tale of Math fab Mathonwy, slipped her fingers under her warm belt, as if to ease for a second its pressure against her waist.

"My daughter's such a little nun," she sighed. "Her only trouble'll be the nearness of her mother. I hope you aren't as virtuous as all that! What kind of a girl is this pet of young Grey's? They say he's half insane about her. Some men are like that. It's curious, isn't it? While a lad like you—"

"Mistress!" interrupted Hugh Burnell, "you'll have seen plenty enough of this young gentleman by the time the King pardons him. But remember — there's one thing that I won't allow — never mind what the Fathers say — and that's that you should get Master Simon into your hands. That I won’t have! I’m not so simple as not to know what you’re after.” He moved up quite close to her as he spoke. “Give me your fingers!” he commanded.

She obeyed him, meek as a maid.

“Burning — burning!” And he pretended to drop hastily and in horror the hand she’d given him. “you’ve been thinking of nothing else, you pretty one, day and night — I know you, if Denis doesn’t! — of what you’ll do to this husband of yours when you’ve—”

The Abbot’s voice broke in at this juncture, and to Rhisiart’s mind there was something at once awe-inspiring and grotesque about the look of that straggling beard and extended neck as he peered round the stooping figure of his attendant. “If you torment that wretched sinner, woman, or cause him to be tormented, to whom by your own will you were united, I swear to you, on the word of an old man about to meet his Judge, your soul shall burn in unquenchable fire!”

Our friend couldn’t help glancing at Mistress Lowri’s face when these terrible words had made a silence in the room; but not a feature quivered as she slightly inclined her head. “Her lips must be as hot and dry as her hands,” the boy thought; and as the idea of burning lips transferred itself to burning limbs, even if it were in the fire of Hell, his pulses beat to a yet wilder tune.

“What’s the matter with me?” he thought, as Father Pascentius came forward to usher them out. “Am I as wicked as this woman?” And all the way through the monk’s dormitory, and all the way down the stairs into the cloisters, till the chanting from the church reduced even Hugh Burnell to silence, our friend tried desperately to fathom this wickedness in himself. Why was it that when Tegolin slept with him under his sheepskin his feelings had been so gentle? They had been amorous feelings, too; but amorous with a tender, sweet, diffused sensation that seemed hardly more intense than what the girl herself must have felt!

But now, just because this woman's fingers were so dry and hot and the nerve of cruelty in her was so quivering, he was stirred to such a point that his knees knocked together as he helped her to descend the stairs.

When they reached the cloisters, however, and paused to listen to the chanting in the church, all the boy's feelings, both good and bad, vanished in a pressing physical need. He perceived that the Lollard made no bones about this natural necessity, but boldly retired — chanting or no chanting — behind a stone buttress that buried itself in the dark and dewy obscurity of that enclosed lawn, but our friend was far too shy to do this, and it was only when emerging from the cloisters into the paddock between the men's guest-house and the women's guest-house that he had the courage to leave them and seek the latrine in the former place.

It had struck his mind before, but never so much as now, how queer it was that a pressing physical need of this simple sort should be able to obliterate everything else. '"Twould be the same," he thought, "if I were on my way to be executed, or to see Lowri have her husband executed. It shows how Nature comes first. Comes before the most agitating drama — before all good and all evil, before everything]"

Returning to rejoin the others, who were waiting for the appearance of Tegolin and Alice, he passed — with his interest in life fully restored — the chief kitchen of the Abbey. He was surprised to find this building a good deal smaller than the one in his Oxford College; but how convenient it was, compared with that! He couldn't resist entering this place for a moment, the practical Norman in him being fascinated by such curious inventions. There were no less than three shining spits against the furnace, connected by an iron bar in such a manner that they could be turned at the same time by any small boy. This boy could stand, too — Rhisiart noticed — well out of the way of the cook when he was basting the meat. But the polished containers for disposing of the refuse were of such a scientific kind that our friend longed for Modry to see them. His mother had never taken any interest in such things, but he had listened to Modry, and watched her too, and he knew as well as anyone what modern contrivances in such a place meant!

There was nothing very much going on at that moment in the Valle Crucis kitchen. Rhisiart indeed found it deserted except for an elderly lay-brother from Scotland who was engaged in preparing a special kind of Scotch griddle-cake. This he laconically explained was for the supper of Prior Bevan who came from the Scotch border; "And he's a true man, young Master, and honest, and that can't be said of many!"

While our friend was regarding with wonder the singular iron plate, like a small tin shield, upon which the Scotsman was at work, there came a voice at the door, and swinging hastily round Rhisiart saw the most unhappy simulacrum of a human being he had ever seen in his life. He was a man half-naked, with a face so emaciated that little remained of any recognizable personality except the misery in his eyes. This misery was neither passionate enough nor recent enough to be called despair. In a sense it was sadder than that; for despair had ceased to be concerned with the necessities of life and this unhappy one was kept alive by the momentary relaxations of suffering that occurred in his daily hunt for such necessities.

Rhisiart could see at once he was a stage below the level of the outcasts that in Hereford were known as vagabonds. He certainly wasn't a beggar. All the beggars he'd seen before had been "characters," characters of a sort! But in the man who now stood mumbling in the doorway there was nothing left but physical craving. He lacked the heart even to lift his curse, still less his hand, against anything, human or divine. He had no love, no hate, no wrath, no grievance. He hadn't even self-pity. His abasement was so complete that it was beneath humility, below resignation. His need was so dominant that it had obliterated the last human emotion — the emotion of gratitude. Either he had once been flung a scrap from that kitchen-door or had managed to pillage some garbage from one of those neat receptacles for refuse before it reached the pigs, for he now hovered in that entrance in his rags and his nakedness with an air that partook at once of a migratory bird and of a starving cat.

But the Scotsman no sooner set eyes on him than he snatched up a skewer from a hook by the fire and drove him away with a volley of obscure curses. Rhisiart would have left the place in disgust; for the last thing he wanted was for the Sheriff to think he was skulking off.

But the image of his friend, the Lollard, suddenly presented itself to his consciousness. Like a younger boy with an older one he had come by this time to divine pretty well how at any crisis his comrade would act. "I'm not afraid of a scurvy Scot," he thought, and snatching up one of the Prior's half-cooked cakes and a repulsive bone that had a quantity of red meat still clinging to it, he pursued the outcast, crying out, "Stop! stop!" 'Twas a wonder the wretch didn't only run the faster; but either Rhisiart's tone was different from the curses he was used to, or the boy's high-pitched Norman accent had a magnetic authority, for he stopped and turned and gathered his rags about his nakedness.

Thrusting the cake and bone into his hands the lad waited, panting. He felt no great spasm of pity, for the distressing stench that emanated from the wretch blotted out such feeling; but like a child feeding an animal he was curious to see what he would do.

But the creature looked at nothing, saw nothing, understood nothing except the wet raw meat adhering to the bone. This he began hastily devouring, until his white lips and even his hollow cheeks became greasy and bloody; and while he gnawed he pressed the Prior's cake tightly against the hairs on his chest, and every now and then, over the bone, Rhisiart could see the whites of his eyes as he glanced suspiciously round him.

And it was lucky for Rhisiart that he did glance round him, for the Scotsman, skewer in hand, was obstinately limping after them, and our touchy friend would certainly have expressed his shame and disgust in some disgraceful act if the bone-gnawer hadn't fled away.

"Foul fa' your thievish hand!" panted the cook. "I'm na sae muckle of a puir kitchen-knave that ye can gar me gang to nourish such as he. Do ye ken who'a be, ye thieving Jackanapes? Ye might as well give scraps to Judas Iscariot!"

Anxious though he was to rejoin the others, Rhisiart reduced his pace to the Scotsman's limp, as they returned, and listened to a lurid description of a creature he had taken upon himself to champion.

It appeared that the man had been caught making love to a plough-boy, and though there was no question of actual sodomy, the women had hunted him out of his home, the Church had excommunicated him, Lord Grey had had him flogged almost to death, while the children of any hamlet he tried to enter were encouraged to drive him away with curses and stones. And, as the Scot explained, "When ilka bairn in his kelpy Welsh tongue cries droog at a man when 'a shows his face ye'll ken a critter's best dead than alive. Why, laddie, the very dogs maun hae their spit at him; and yet the man lives! He just canna dee, I reckon, till the Deil carries him awa."

Our young man experienced not a little personal uneasiness as well as indignant pity when he heard the cook's story. His mind reverted most uncomfortably to that dusky corridor at Glyndyfrdwy. But what would the Lollard have done? Refused to go a step towards Dinas Bran till he'd got the fellow clothed and fed and given a fresh start?

With his hand in his belt he wondered whether he should offer this moral Scotsman a small piece of silver, but instead of doing so he confined himself, as he bade him farewell, to enquiring his name.

"Gibbie Saunders I were, young Master," was the reply, "free born by the braes of Annan. Brither Jock I be now; but aye! I wad gie the banes from my ribs, laddie, to be auld Gibbie Saunders at hame among the lavrocks!"

But it wasn't of Brother Jock's troubles that our friend thought as he hurried to rejoin his companions in bondage. A deep shame such as he had never known in his life took possession of him. No wonder that ghastly head on the Abbot's crucifix had hung so heavy! "What luck," he thought, "to be mad like the Friar! What luck to be as good as Tegolin!"

But he soon had occasion to test the sincerity of this new feeling, when among the whole crowd of his friends — all the "hostages of Glendourdy" as they were called by the bluff Salopian — he sat down with the Sheriff's men by a bivouac fire at the foot of that eminence he knew so well. There were blazing torches there as well as the fire; and from all sorts of odd angles, in the dusk of that summer evening, the red-glancing lights and flickering flames fell with strange effect upon moving faces and shifting garments as he shared, hungrily enough, that solid soldiers' meal.

Mistress Lowri had made no effort to refuse on behalf of her Constable's "hostages" this timely refreshment. "She's saving her man's larder, the cunning bitch!" Rhisiart heard one trooper whisper to another with yeoman maliciousness — and indeed it had crossed his own mind to wonder what kind of repast, if any at all, would be awaiting him in that half-ruined fortress.

But in his present mood it was with a singular relief that he answered Tegolin's quick concern as she handed him the bowl of sweet mead and the platter of ox-tongue. He tried hard not to look at the tightly-buckled cincture, above which the breasts of Lowri ferch Ffraid seemed to draw the fire-light and drain the twilight.

But the treacherous thought slipped somehow into his mind as to whether the points of those breasts under that green-and-gold gown were as burning as her limbs, as her fingers, as her lips.

The Ruthin girl seemed to be in radiant spirits and kept edging herself closer and closer to Tegolin's side. Her heavy-lidded eyes he didn't scruple to catch, as she sat munching that good Shropshire fare and plaiting and unplaiting the end of her companion's braid as it lay across her lap.

But the sweet mead he kept drinking, although, after that heady wine, it tasted like pure milk and honey, didn't tend to diminish the excited conflict going on between his senses and his conscience. As he listened to the deep voice of Hugh Burnell, still talking to Master Brut about the price of beasts in Hereford fair, and to the jerky whispers of Mad Huw who had got into his head that he would surely find his King safe and sound in the great keep of the fortress, the lad tried desperately to fix his mind on the red braid of the Friar's Maid.

But the more he drank the more did the red braid seem to melt into the Ruthin girl's lap. "I must be losing my wits," he thought, "or is the Abbot's curse working on me as well as on Mistress Lowri?"

The Salopian conscripts, most of them yeoman-farmers with a sprinkling of journeymen-craftsmen, were evidently thoroughly enjoying their trip across the border. Rhisiart caught snatches of a lively conversation going on where a young springald from Shrewsbury, upon whom this good mead appeared to have the same effect as it did on himself, was asking a veteran of thirty, who had been in the Irish wars, as to the precise number of maidenheads that had fallen to his prowess.

The Lollard and Hugh Burnell on the other hand were now engaged in a heart to heart talk about border politics, from which, as he listened, he gathered that they were practically of the same opinion, namely that Wales ought to be liberated from the Norman castles and their oppressive occupants, and ought to have a prince of her own and even a parliament of her own, but that this prince should do homage to the King in London and that, as against France or Scotland or the Turk, England and Wales should be staunch allies.

It was perhaps this absorption of her protector's parent with Master Brut that brought it about that our friend now found himself in close juxtaposition with the gold-and-green gown, and divided by the whole blaze of the fire from Edeyrnion's chaste Maid; and it was likely enough that the complete disappearance of the red braid, which had already been melting into the Ruthin girl's lap, was what at that juncture made his conscience throw up its hands. For the red braid had become a kind of heraldic symbol to him, like a red lily on his shield, and now, in the place of this pure token, there were only the fiery tongues of flame!

And Mistress Lowri was talking to him now, talking in a low intense voice about what his future was to be, and what a great part he might be destined to play in Owen's revolt. Her words were the words of a mature woman encouraging a young man's most secret ambitions, but behind her words there was a quivering caress, a furtive, flickering caress, as if with electric finger-tips she were searching for the very passion-pulse of his naked being!

"Denis knows, and he knows," was one of the things she murmured as she tossed her head in the direction of Hugh Burnell. "Yes, they know and so does Fitz-Alan, what I feel about Wales and about Owen. But they think it's just a woman's folly. Owen himself — and he knows I know it — thinks that I'm just their spy, their agent, their bought and treacherous tool! But I'm like you, Richard" this was the first time anyone had called him "Richard," and it gave him a curious thrill— "I've got Norman blood — well! to tell you the truth, Angevin blood — but it only makes what's Welsh in me more dangerous and more deadly! Has anyone told you about me, Richard? How my father deserted my mother; and how I've played the whore to keep the old lady in comfort and peace? Well, never mind that! But I'm a bastard — just as Tegolin is — and she takes after her father, just as I do after mine."

While she spoke, and she soon returned to what Rhisiart's future would be when the revolt broke out, he could see her playing with one of her silken gloves, drawing it off and drawing it on, and finally letting her bare hand lie between them, like a lovely little white bird only waiting to be caught. Nearer and nearer to that fatal white hand his fingers kept hovering, but she suddenly made the mistake of speaking of Tegolin and her Friar in a tone that made it possible for him to clasp his own knee with both his hands, and to utter a wordless prayer to that ghastly-drooping head he had seen on the Abbot's wall.

And it was then, in the tension of the struggle within him while her voice mingled with the leaping and lapping and licking of the flames in front of them, that he had a curious hallucination. The smoke of the bivouac fire as it swept away into the darkening sky had been for some while taking strange shapes, but now it took definite and recognizable shapes. It took the shape of a gigantic figure, in the armour of the ancient days, mounted on a huge war-horse, and the word "Derfel" came into his mind, coupled, however, not with the word Saint, but with the word Gadarn, the Mighty, and following Derfel Gadarn was the wraith of the old poet he had seen die so hard, and the grotesque figure of the preposterous Scab; and along with them, leaping and bounding, was the wolfish apparition of Rhys the Savage.

Nor was this all; for as that bivouac smoke broke into the substance of his secretest trouble, he seemed to see the shape of Owen himself, hesitating there, his hand raised to his forked beard, and his eyes fixed, in one of his strange seizures; while, over against those others, and as if offering him an alternate destiny, the whirling smoke began to take the form of the mysterious Bran himself. Yes, in the strange mood in which he was now, with the corporealizing of those smoke-wisps, he felt he knew, as he had never known before, what he really felt about the man these English called "Glendourdy". There was something subtly tragic about him, something that really did approach — as he recalled how he stood by the Bard's side in his golden array — a figure decked and adorned for sacrifice.

And the lad remembered how, in one of Modry's tales, when Bran the Blessed brought his army into Ireland to avenge Branwen's wrongs, the only way of crossing the dangerous river was that his people should pass over the body of their lord.

There was one sentence Modry always used to quote in the old tongue; and because it was one of the few moral tags she ever did quote it had remained in his mind. "A vo penn bit bont," she would say — He who is the head, he will be the bridge.

No! he hadn't touched yet those burning fingers lying at his side, though he felt them there through all his bones, and he knew that the yielded willingness of her whole body was in them and every one of its quivering nerves!

But now as the sign came from Hugh Burnell for the ascent of the castle-hill he couldn't have sworn — no! not on the handle of his crusader's sword — whether he was sorry or glad he hadn’t done it!

How steep that ascent was! All manner of irrelevant questions kept coming into his head. How had they dragged the stones up here to build this place? His back hurt him as he thought of the serfs who must have done it. No! he hadn’t taken thought enough of these things! Would the all-enduring common people really gain if Owen were victorious?

He could see some red lights at one spot in the great circular ramparts above him. Was that where the entrance was? But more arresting to his mind was a single yellow light he could see, high in some turret up there. “I warrant Mad Huw thinks the sad face of his King is watching us from that window!”

The nearer they approached the castle, the less he could see of anything but those encircling ramparts. But his imagination built up corridors, passages, buttresses, stairways, balconies, courts, towers — a vast, intricate world of masonry under the twilight sky. “It’s a real Welsh fortress,” he thought, “built before Edward’s time; built, I daresay, when John destroyed Mathrafal.”

But what, he wondered, was it before that? And the idea arose in him that there was probably a peaceful hill-city up there, before there was a castle at all. But whose city? And vague memories came back to him of Modry’s tales about Bran, how he was so huge that he could cross the Irish Sea on foot, so huge that no roofed abode could contain him. “The City of Bran the Blessed,” he said to himself, and he tried to imagine that somewhere within those walls was to be found a secret chamber, where, older than Caesar, older than Derfel and far more majestical, was the gigantic head of Bran the Blessed, immortal, indestructible, pitifully smitten, but able to give surcease to all human sorrow!

Aye! it came back to him, as he climbed this hill of his long desire — a "hostage" not a conqueror now — the way Modry had comforted him with the thought of Bran the Blessed, as they listened awestruck one summer night to the wild weeping of his frivolous mother!

He had been walking now for some while in silence a few paces behind the Lollard — for Hugh Burnell had taken chivalrous possession of his son's ambiguous lady — and he was watching how the green and the gold of that gown mingled with the buff of the man's jerkin and the glint of his steel, when suddenly Tegolin appeared at his side.

"Gwion Bach!" she said gently, laying her hand on his arm, "don't'ee forget the Tassel-farm."

He made an effort to look straight into her face as they paused in the ascent, but his eyes sank upon that boy's dagger of hers swinging so gallantly in that absurd out-worn fashion against her hip. Something like a groan came from him; and then he suddenly felt an unaccountable rush of anger.

"Why did you refuse that girl?" he cried irrelevantly. "She wanted to serve you. She hates young Grey."

"I've not refused her, Gwion Bach," she replied softly. "She is going to serve me!" and then with one more attempt to meet his eyes, but the wind swept the torch-flare down so that they were left in darkness, she drew away from him and was gone.

It was by the light of several smoky flambeaux, gleaming and red like the eyes of a dragon above the entrance, that they reached the castle gate.

Tegolin had gone ahead, with the Friar and the Ruthin girl, and had already passed under the archway. The Lollard, after his evangelical custom, had fallen into the rear. Hugh Burnell was giving instructions to his men. So that it came to pass, as if by a deliberate intention of chance, or, shall we say, of Derfel Gadarn, that our friend entered Dinas Bran side by side with its lawless chatelaine.

And Mistress Lowri in that dark archway did at last possess herself of his hand. “Shall we burn together, Rhisiart?” she whispered. And for answer he pressed those hot fingers in a clasp as feverish as their own.

VIII. THE SWORD OF ELISEG

IT WAS MUCH darker inside than outside the walls of Dinas Bran; and it was characteristic of the divided rule under which the already half-ruined place raised its battered head that there was a great scarcity of torches and lanterns.

Having succeeded in troubling the most deadly nerve in Rhisiart till his whole nature was in a turmoil, the lady of the castle completed his discomfiture by taking no more notice of him than if he had been one of the English troopers who were now handing over their prisoners to the Constable.

Having been embraced by her “protector” with a solicitude as tender as if she had returned from a pilgrimage to the Holy Sepulchre rather than from the Abbey at the foot of their hill, Lowri led her daughter and her daughter’s new attendant across the wide-stretching grassy court, which although empty now looked big enough to contain the tents of a squadron of troopers, towards her rooms on the further side, the side which faced the precipitous slopes of the Eglwyseg Rocks.

Into such neglect for several hundreds of years had the fortress fallen that many of the upper chambers upon which the outer walls abutted had sunk forward into the court, leaving the lower ones, which were in most cases more strongly vaulted and buttressed, to be reached through scattered heaps of ruins. The only chambers in Dinas Bran which were habitable were those ranged round the huge circle of the outer walls. The ancient banquet-hall was still sometimes used; but of the chapel and the castle library nothing but heaps of stones remained, some of them still carved and moulded, others shattered out of all recognition.

Rhisiart stared inquisitively at these pitiful stones, for they lay in heaps in every direction, and he tried in vain to imagine how the place looked in the heyday of its glory, before the treachery of his own ancestor had left it to alien hands.

One curious effect these ruins had upon him as he waited in the draughty damp-smelling darkness, along with the Lollard and the mad Friar, was to evoke such a different Dinas Bran from the one he had imagined that it was no longer a rival to the imaginary one and no longer mingled with it or impinged upon it. All the while he had been approaching the real Dinas Bran, that other, that mystical one which he had created in his childhood, had kept blending with it, had kept rising out of it and beyond it into more fabulous, more enchanted towers. But now as he stood in that dim guardroom, listening to Mad Huw's irrelevant whispers and quiveringly conscious of the dark nerve which Lowri had set twitching in his inmost being, these two Dinas Brans separated completely. The imaginary one lifted itself clean out of this draughty mad-house of broken stones, of which Lowri was the evil spirit and wherein he must meet "burning" with "burning," and limned itself on those flying cloud-wracks of the mind's horizon that no madness could touch and no burning blacken!

That Dinas Bran, painted with mystic pigments upon a spiritual canvas, rose up still in its immortal air, clear of all these tumults.

But they were no pleasant moments, these first moments of his treading that deep-indented stone floor that had been trodden by Princess Myfanwy and by Madoc ap Griffith. Obsessed by the adder-tongue of lust, of that particular lust drugged with cruelty that he had come to recognize as his master-devil, he recalled how a Russian student at Oxford, a youth who had come in the train of Chrysoloras, the tutor of the Emperor Manuel, always used to say, when he went to a bawdy-house, “My insect wants a bite”. How deeply he himself had been shocked by this expression! But now he began to feel that this Russian knew what he was talking about! It seemed to him that he could actually feel an “insect” of lust within him, that was only connected with his brain by a thin corridor, and that had no connection at all with his heart or his soul.

He was looking at this moment through an archway, where there was a light gleaming from the wall, and where the modern long-bows of the Sheriff’s men as they lounged about, chattering with the Constable’s servants, gave him a very queer sensation. He could hear the familiar English jokes, with their customary allusions to the Scotch wars and the Lollard heresy and the doubtful loyalty of the Percies and high price of French wines.

“How different,” he said to himself, “from the old days, when people treated serious things seriously, and there was none of this modern cynicism that spoils the romance of everything! And God! how draughty it is in here and how cold for midsummer!” The cold indeed seemed doubly unnatural; not only unnatural at that time of year but as if the very walls themselves of this lost fortress had died with its defenders and were now corpse-walls, riddled with the smell of decomposition.

Even that evil desire, which existed in him apart from his will and which was like a devouring insect in his deepest nerve, ceased to give him any pleasure. He knew he would obey it. That woman had touched him with her dry hot fingers and he must obey it. But what he longed for, as the noisy laughter of these Shropshire intruders mixed with the high-pitched broken English of the natives, was to feel again all he had felt when hand in hand with Tegolin he had first set eyes on Owen’s forked beard!

He tried to catch the Lollard's eye, but the worthy man was giving his full attention to Mad Huw's excitement, which seemed to be plunging into the deep patience of that bland countenance like hail into a pond.

Rhisiart shivered, and thrust his hands — they were cold enough now! — into the folds of his jerkin, while through the stone doorway and over the heads of the soldiers he could catch a glimpse of the mountains away towards the north. And a strange feeling came over him. It was a feeling of the vanishing away of all things, the absorption of all things; the rushing down in a cataract of annihilation of loves and hates, of bodies and the bones of bodies, of souls and the thoughts of souls, all of them swallowed up like unreturning ripples in the great ocean of Being.

It was the physical sensation of cold that brought this feeling. He was sure of that. It was the death-chill wafted against his face from the damp stones; and as the four winds of heaven ambuscaded one another and wailed at one another, and mowed and mumbled and mewed at one another along the grave-stone indentations and hollow channels of that gusty floor, he felt that he would never be warm again, never be naturally happy again. The infernal ice was closing in on him and his twitching nerve. Oh it wasn't ordinary cold! It was a particular kind of cold. He knew that well enough. It was a cold that had a shiver in it that came from some deeper level than mere damp, or mere stone, or the mere teeth of the wind. It was a shiver that had something metaphysical in it. He had felt it once at Hereford, when he was a little boy, down by the bull-baiting field in winter, when there was frozen mud and ice everywhere, and the servant who was with him had gone to help in the killing.

There were great blocks of ice in the river that day, and some of them, drifting down from the slaughter-ditch, had blood on their surface. He hadn't wept but he had pressed his forehead against an iron post with a ring in it, and had felt glad that those blocks of ice were being carried away, and had wished that the animal they were killing and the men who were killing it and his mother’s servant who was helping, yes and himself too who was there to look on, might all be carried away.

He wished now that it could be suddenly five hundred years hence, be at the opening of the twentieth instead of the opening of the fifteenth century, with his bones lost and Lowri’s bones lost, and the shard of that insect within him, that was now goading him to his perdition, lost, too!

“No, I haven’t seen him, Master. I never told you I’d seen him,” Mad Huw was saying to the Lollard. “But I know he’s here; and I know he’s here because my head doesn’t ache any more, and I don’t hear voices any more. And shall I tell you something else? And you can hear this too lad, if you like.”

But his voice was almost inaudible though he had been speaking low enough before. “I’m no trouble to the Maid any morel” he declared. “Yes, I do what she tells me. She’s like the Mother of God to me, now that he’s here. She’ll be sending for me soon and I shall go! I shan’t cry out. I shall do what she says without a word. If she told me to go back where she first found me I should obey. With him here I’m let off everything! I haven’t to think what to do or what to say. It’s all happiness now, because I know he’s safe. He’s safe and waiting his—”

But at that moment they were confronted by an apparition. An old man, grey as a ghost, stood before them, solemnly bowing to each of them in turn and with every bow introducing himself with stately politeness. “Adda ap Leurig ap Coel,” he said, and repeated it three times.

Grey as a ghost he was, this formal little man, and so lean and so upright that he resembled one of the pillars of the groined roof under which they stood. His garments were grey and his head was grey and his countenance was grey.

Mad Huw broke into the pleased laugh of an infant who had been offered a bauble. The Lollard gave him a polite smile. Rhisiart scowled. But the apparition went on. “Seneschal Adda. And my Lord has sent me to show you your rooms.”

“A dungeon A dungeon!” cried Mad Huw in extreme delight. “And you’ve got chains for us?” and he stretched out his hands towards the official, the folds of his old travel-stained habit looking almost black against the other’s neat garb.

“I’ll come back for you, Brother,” said Seneschal Adda quietly, “and for you, Master Rhisiart. Will you follow me, Master Brut?”

“No, no, it’s all right!” cried the Lollard hastily, laying a restraining hand on his companion’s impetuous arm. And then to the other: “I shall be able to see my friend later, eh, Seneschal?”

Adda ap Leurig bowed without speaking; but in spite of the darkness his prisoners caught a suggestion in his look that he didn’t regard the sight of Rhisiart’s scowling face as an unmixed advantage.

But the Lollard moved up close to our friend and paused for a moment till he caught his full attention. Then with an unruffled face and his usual flickering smile, a smile that was neither gay nor sad, a smile that always made Rhisiart a little uneasy, for it seemed to rise to the surface of that placid countenance from a psychic level different from that of most human smiles, he uttered the following enigmatic words:

“If you’re called upon to make any decision, lad, make the negative one! I’m quick at catching the aura of a place; and I tell you I’ve never felt so many mixed currents of good and evil as there are here. Everything in this castle's confused to a point of insanity — embrouillé à la folie! So look to yourself, gossip. Prenez garde à cela."

"You heard what I told Master Brut?" whispered Mad Huw as soon as they were alone.

Rhisiart assured him that he had heard every word. He felt at that moment that the merest mention of his royal namesake would be more than he could bear. But a new burst of bawdy camp-merriment reached them from the lighted guard-room. "The English are enjoying themselves," he muttered vindictively in Welsh.

"They are good-natured lads," remarked the Friar quietly. "Our quarrel isn't with them, and never will be. No, not even if Owen raises the dragon."

Rhisiart gave him a wicked look. "They'd have burnt you, all the same, that other night."

"No, no, my son. Not they, not the soldiers! And even Master Simon wouldn't if he hadn't been tormented in his mind. It was her," and he lowered his voice and made a motion with his head towards the interior of the castle. "She's in league with the Scab, and if you don't know what that means, you don't know the power of Satan round here. Why, they tell me" — and his voice sank to a yet more solemn whisper— "that those two are plotting to give Derfel another bride. They say there's a maiden in this castle — Yes, and they say when her men have caught Simon that she'll—"

"Your precious Simon would have burnt you!" interrupted Rhisiart savagely; and then he added out of pure malice: "But our Lollard must have felt like you about him, for I've never seen a priest of God take more trouble than he did to drive the evil spirit out of a man!"

Mad Huw's generous temper vanished in a flash; and in its place came a harsh professional austerity. "To drive out devils by Beelzebub, the Prince of Devils," he began angrily; but remembering the context of these words, he sighed deeply, and in a tone that had less bigotry in it, a tone that reverted to the purer disciplines of his Order, he said gravely: “Lollardry is the first step to atheism, my son. Your friend may be a good man. I daresay he is. But he is opening the flood-gates to the tide that will sweep everything away.”

One of the Shropshire yeomen was carolling a bawdy stave; and Rhisiart could catch through the illuminated arch an indecent refrain he had often heard on summer evenings, floating out from the beer-houses on the warm air, along the river-wharves of Hereford.

“What tide, Brother?” he asked mechanically.

“The tide of reason!” cried the Friar fiercely, “the tide of mad, wicked reason!”

The loudness of his tone attracted into their dusky alcove a couple of young pages who had been listening to the troopers’ song, and with the quick instinct of their tribe these lads soon perceived that their intrusion was not displeasing to Rhisiart.

“Please, sir,” the taller of the boys shyly began, “are you the Oxford astrologer who’s come to help Owen drive out the English?”

But Rhisiart, who liked the lad’s appearance, disregarded this admonition. “If I were an astrologer,” he said, “what would you like me to predict? That Owen should become Prince of Wales? Or that your Constable’s father should give him up to King Hal?”

“The Crow’s going to put you in the Princess’ Bower,” announced the boy irrelevantly. “I heard my Lady tell him; and the one the King’s going to burn for spitting on the Blessed Sacrament he’s putting in the Traitor’s Tower, where the Friend of the English died of shame.”

“And, please, sir,” threw in the smaller page, “the Crow’s cross today because my Lady has sent Lawnslot and Gerallt to bring Simon the Hog up here. Please, sir, ’twas me, not Rawlff who heard she’s sworn to chain him to the ‘Old Skeleton’! Rawlff says such doings will bring down the Blessed One’s curse upon us all. Be you afeared of the Blessed One’s curse, Master?”

Rhisiart’s pinched Norman face had had a troubled frown upon it ever since her mother had carried Tegolin away; but it relaxed now into the first smile he had smiled since entering the castle. He seized the last speaker’s arm above the elbow. “Let’s feel your muscle,” he murmured, “and you’ll soon know if I’m afraid or not! They say in Hereford, where I come from, ‘A lion’s gamb and a deer’s heart’, but who the devil do you mean by ‘the Crow’? No secrets now! Tell me of whom you’re talking!” And he tightened his bony fingers round the arm he held till the boy screwed up his face and struggled to escape.

The older boy contemplated his companion’s predicament with a mixture of complacency and jealousy. “I’ll tell you, sir,” he interjected, “for no one can make him speak — not even my Lady!”

Rhisiart released this young hero and turned to the taller one. “Well! you tell me,” he said.

“‘Tis Adda ap Leurig we call ‘the Crow,’” the latter replied eagerly. “He’s the oldest man in the place. He was born here and has lived here all his life. He’s the only one, except my Lady, who durst go near Ysgerbwd Hen, the ‘Old Skeleton,’ where my Lady’ll chain up the Hog when Lawnslot and Gerallt have caught him. Under the Traitor’s Tower he is, by the nettles and burdocks, where the men’s latrine drains out. Grrr! But there’s a filthy smell down there, Master, when the wind’s in the quarter. Luned says my Lady often goes down there to hear Ysgerbwd Hen rattle;

but the Constable doesn't like her going, Luned says, because of the nettles and the smell, and because it's where the men's latrine runs out."

"Who's Luned?" enquired Rhisiart. Save for the grail-messenger, the only possessor of this name he'd ever known was a silly relative of his mother's.

"She can climb better than him," said the boy, indicating his friend. "She's older than me," he went on. "She's eighteen. But in a few years I shall marry her, and we shall have seven sons and three daughters."

"She's very nearly nineteen. She waits on Ffraid ferch Gloyw."

"Who's Ffraid ferch Gloyw?"

"My Lady's mother. She never comes down the tower. And that's where Efa is! Efa waits on her, too."

"Who's Efa?"

"Efa's his friend" — and he indicated the younger page— "and she's younger than Luned. They say Ffraid ferch Gloyw makes her sleep every night in a bed that's older than the castle. They say it has a piece of the Blessed One's cauldron worked into it."

"Why does she make her sleep in that?"

Rhisiart was aware of a distinct stirring of excitement with regard to this Efa who was "wanted" by Derfel. In Luned on the other hand he seemed able to feel very little interest. So, to divert the boy, he enquired who it was, or whose bones they were, that bore the name of the "Old Skeleton."

The lad looked hurriedly at the younger page as if to make sure that it was right and proper to reveal these secrets of Dinas Bran; but since his friend was listening awestruck to Mad Huw's revelations he was forced to test Rhisiart's reliability by his unaided wit.

"You're the one, aren't you, sir?" he said, "that the bowmen of Chirk tried to kill and who'd have done it if the Scab hadn't thrown an illusion over you so that they couldn't see you?"

Rhisiart suppressed his natural reaction to this, and contented himself with enquiring whether such was the version of things given by the Bard. There was something all the same peculiarly irritating in the idea that his defiance of all the scientific archery of Chirk should be attributed to the black arts of the Scab!

"I am Owen Glyn Dŵr's cousin," he added sternly; and he took the opportunity, in a casual and nonchalant way, of toying with his antique dagger and of surveying it from every possible aspect before he replaced it in his belt. But the name "Owen" was enough without the dagger.

"Ysgerbwd Hen is the skeleton of Hywel the Bard," whispered the lad. "I only found that out myself last winter. He," and he indicated the younger page, "only knows it because I told him. Hywel the Bard loved Princess Myfanwy and she used to let down a rope from her window when the Prince was away; and the Prince heard of it and came back suddenly. The Prince chained him where she could see him from her window. That's what they say my Lady will do with the Hog."

"Did you tell me," asked Rhisiart, "that this Ffraid ferch Gloyw is the Lady Lowri's mother?"

The boy glanced about him and spoke in still lower tones. So low indeed did he speak that Rhisiart was forced to draw him very close before he could hear.

"Yes, yes, her mother," he said, "and we're all afraid of her except my Lady; and my Lady's a little afraid of her. Luned says it was to give her a home that she consented to live with the Constable."

“Does Luned like her?” asked Rhisiart; and as he bent down to catch the reply the boy’s breath reminded him of some forgotten day in his childhood when he had scrambled through a briar-rose hedge. But though the lad was panting with excitement something seemed to prevent his replying.

“Well?” Rhisiart repeated; and then, quite sharply, “I want to know whether Luned likes her.”

Rhisiart began to feel as if this unknown maid’s discretion were a rebuke to his own curiosity; and to change the subject he asked the boy his name.

“Rawlff ap Dafydd ap Llwyd,” replied the youngster proudly, “and he’s Iago ap Cynan. We’re Owen’s men,” he added, “though we wear the Constable’s livery. But the Constable knows it. Nobody can deceive him, not even my Lady!”

Rhisiart didn’t miss this remark, and it made him thoughtful. “I must be careful,” he said to himself, and he became aware that something in his colloquy with these two boys had a little cooled the response of his itching insect-nerve to Lowri’s beckoning.

But it would be certainly awkward if the Constable knew as much as the boy hinted he knew. It would not be very nice to share the fate of Hywel the Bard. “I must be careful,” he thought.

Meanwhile the younger page, catching his own name, had turned for a second from the extraordinary revelations Mad Huw was disclosing to him, so that Rhisiart was enabled to make further use of this antidote to his worser devil by clutching the boy’s arm again. The older lad, however — perhaps because of the insight into life he was learning from the sagacious Luned — snatched from this casual gesture a hint that if he didn’t make some swift self-assertive move, it would be the son of Cynan and not the son of Dafydd who would be the Oxford scholar's friend; and pretending that he had heard a summons from the guardroom he begged Rhisiart's pardon, and pulling his friend after him ran off beneath the lighted arch.

It may be imagined how astonished Master Adda the Seneschal was when, returning from disposing of the Lollard in the Traitor's tower, he discovered his sulky hostage loitering at the entrance of the guardroom and listening with the utmost good-humour to the troopers' revels. He was still more surprised when, as they made their way to that chamber in the wall from which to an accustomed eye the "Old Skeleton" could be seen among the elder-bushes, he heard this uncompromising young Norman — for in his long life on the marches he had come to know well enough that type of profile — begin talking to him with friendly assurance.

"How comes it, Master Adda," was one of Rhisiart's questions as he and the Seneschal crossed the court, "that you, a Welsh gentleman of high birth, should be serving the son of the English Sheriff?"

The base-court of Dinas Bran was as draughty as it was dark; and our friend, as he pulled his cloak about his ears, made no effort to discern the effect of his words upon his companion's countenance. But at all events the old man's tone was neither shocked nor hurt.

"I might retort, young gentleman," he said, "by enquiring how you yourself, a Hereford Bonheddwr, have come all this way to join Owen, to whom I understand you're only very distantly related. But why should either of us ask such foolish questions? Welsh and Norman, Welsh and Saxon, we have mixed with each other now for at least three hundred years. Though not of the House of Madoc ap Griffith, I am of the blood of the old Talaith of Powys, and it is my privilege to possess, for my family has lived at Meifod since John burnt Mathrafal, a bronze sword which goes back to the days of King Eliseg."

“King Eliseg!” cried Rhisiart. “But he was of Arthur’s time; and it was long before Arthur’s time that swords were made of bronze.”

The Seneschal was silent. He had shown so many visitors to Dinas Bran this old Bronze Age weapon and had told them so often it belonged to King Eliseg that it was distasteful to him to be reminded of the gap between the sixth century B.C. and the sixth century A.D.. He consoled himself by remarking that Eliseg of Powys possessed in his time as cunning a magician as Arthur of Caerleon, and that his bronze sword was as enchanted as the other’s steel one. “But I wish,” he said, “Owen Glyn Dŵr and Harry Bolingbroke could settle their account alone, like Gwydion and Pryderi, for to speak frankly I think a war between the two races is absurd.” He laid his hand on Rhisiart’s arm and spoke with grave earnestness. “Owen possesses the belt of Eliseg; and I possess his sword; and there’s an old englyn, “When the sword of Powys goes back to the belt of Powys it will reach across all Wales.”

They were passing just then close to a certain aperture in the ramparts, where the constant rain working upon some original flaw in the masonry had caused an enlarged opening to appear, a jagged and sorrowful opening, that gave the impression of something desolately ruinous. Through this aperture Rhisiart could see nothing but darkness; but the night wind as it blew damp and chill between the crumbling stones evoked such a feeling of exposure and discomfort that it took the heart out of Master Adda’s englyn. The old Seneschal, however, was so accustomed to these rebuffs to his antiquarianism from across the border that he was only made more intent upon impressing the Oxonian with his knowledge.

“There’s Myfanwy’s Bower,” he now announced, “where the Lady Lowri has arranged for you to sleep. And this is my chamber, as it was my father’s and my grandfather’s, and I would be honoured” — and Rhisiart saw his erect old figure bend in a courtly obeisance— "if you would enter for a moment."

There was nothing to be done but to obey; and our friend was well rewarded for his affability; for when the Seneschal had taken him by the hand and made him bend his head to avoid the lintel he was ushered into what was — though it was of small dimensions — the most perfect example of a twelfth-century chamber he had ever seen.

While the old man was engaged in lighting three large iron lanterns that were suspended from the roof, Rhisiart walked gingerly to the window. The room was more remarkable for its twelfth-century carving than for its furniture, but our young friend did notice one heavily embroidered chair whose appearance reminded him of a certain Lombardy merchant's shop in Hereford where his mother used to meet her fashionable gossips and, while the obsequious Italian unrolled his Moorish fabrics and dusted his Venetian curios, would chatter about the latest town scandal. Thrusting his shoulders with some difficulty through the narrow window at the end of this low-roofed chamber, Rhisiart gazed downwards, both to the left and the right, in an eager endeavour to catch a glimpse of that audacious lover's skeleton, but the night was much too cloudy, and all he could see was a thin stream of light, emerging from what seemed to be a larger room than this, where the dark walls curved away to the northward.

A pungent scent of elder-blossom did, however, reach him from the darkness, mixed with a vague sourness on the air which suggested the pollen of nettle-flowers and perhaps also the presence of that latrine of which the page had talked. The combination of these smells with the thick darkness, a darkness which in a manner he couldn't define, suggested that the whole castle was suspended in a void rather than founded on a hill, held him at his post of observation for an unpardonable time.

He behaved indeed as if Master Adda were his private attendant rather than his indulgent jailer. But he was reduced to a blush of shame over his impoliteness, when, on withdrawing his head from the window, he not only found that the Seneschal had already extracted his bronze relic from its hiding-place and was holding it as if it were a piece of the True Cross, but that the figure of a young girl had suddenly materialized, like an apparition of Myfanwy herself, and was standing at the Seneschal's side, swinging at arm's length a little silver lamp. Either from the lamp or from the girl there now spread through the vaulted chamber a queer Oriental perfume that brought to Rhisiart's mind a dark-eyed, indeed devilish-eyed, pedlar, who used to come to their house in Hereford and talk for hours in the kitchen.

And as the light of her lamp threw its rays upwards, every aspect of her personality seemed emphasized by this Saracenic odour; and it was on this undulant wave of Sabean incense that her personality sank into his confused consciousness. He guessed at once that this was the discreet young handmaid of whom the page had spoken; and though her extreme pallor was mitigated by the way the light she carried mingled with that of the lanterns above her head, Rhisiart could see that her coils of dark hair fell on either side of features that were more striking than beautiful. Luned's nose was the reverse of delicately moulded. Her upper lip protruded beyond her lower. Her chin was too prominent. And though her neck and throat had a warm, soft, disarming appeal, not only were her breasts too womanly for her years, but they seemed to our friend unnecessarily emphasized by the broad band beneath them.

"The Sword of Eliseg!" murmured Master Adda, holding out the weapon towards him,' as if it rested on a royal cushion.

But Rhisiart merely nodded at him. "Let me introduce myself, Maiden," he cried eagerly, and approaching the girl with the sort of obeisance that he had seen the Hereford nobles offer, when they singled out a particular tradesman's daughter from among the spectators at some public joust, he made as though he would lift her unresisting left hand, for she held the lamp in her right, magnanimously to his lips.

"The sword of Eliseg!" repeated the Seneschal; and then it became evident to our impetuous friend that the girl's dark eyes were wide-open in a strange, defiant, excited gaze, and were fixed, not on him at all, but on the rusty bronze weapon, with its double edge and simple cross-handle.

"Put it away! Don't let him touch it!" she cried indignantly. "You know perfectly well, Master Seneschal, what my Mistress feels about the Blessed One alone being revered in this castle. Eliseg's magician was Saint Derfel."

Rhisiart let her hand drop. He recognized that her excitement was so great that she was totally oblivious of the fact that he had taken it at all. She was completely absorbed in her emotion; and her eyes, as they confronted that rusty weapon, were bright with anger. The lad received the impression that she regarded it as she might have regarded something that was an obscene threat to her girlhood. The old man drew back.

Rhisiart could see that Luned's tone cowed him. He muttered something that the boy couldn't catch and, hurriedly bearing away the weapon to the further side of the chamber, replaced it reverently in a wooden chest that stood against the wall.

Meanwhile the girl did look at Rhisiart. She looked at him with a friendly surprise. He was not sure whether he liked this surprise. It was clear she was astonished as well as pleased to find him so youthful and inexperienced.

"My Mistress has sent me to bring you to her," she said gravely; and then smiling at Master Adda as he returned from concealing his precious relic, "I didn't know," she said gently, though with a faint suspicion of reproach, "that Rhisiart ab Owen had not yet seen his room. It's to be Myfanwy's Bower, isn't it?"

Master Adda hastened to explain that he was even then on his way to guide the young gentleman to Myfanwy's Bower; and leaving his lanterns burning in the vaulted roof and accompanied by Luned with her silver lamp he hurriedly proceeded to escort his hostage to what might have been called the tragic heart of Dinas Bran.

But no sooner was Rhisiart in the air and in the obscurity of the court, where the sandal-wood fragrance that emanated from the girl was carried away by the wind and where her lamp only caused a pale-flitting watery moon to glide along the flag-stones, than the riotous sound of the troopers in the guard-room reached his ears, and this virile revelry made him feel rebellious.

"I wish I'd taken Eliseg's sword in my hand," he remarked aloud, addressing no one in particular; and as he spoke he swung round and looked at the faint light issuing from the chamber they had left.

"Luned says our Lady's mother has forbidden me to show it to anyone," interposed the Seneschal; "otherwise I'd not only have let you take it in your hand, but I'd have let you stretch it out of the window and hear the skeleton rattle."

Rhisiart couldn't help glancing, and dark though it was, at Master Adda's face as he uttered these vicious words. Their tone, as they emerged from that sedate grey figure, was startling. "It was my ancestor," the Seneschal went on, "who lent it to Jennap ab Adam when he killed him and exposed him to the crows; and they say that at sight of it, especially when the stars are in their midsummer position, those adulterous bones—"

But the girl startled them both at that point by the suddenness with which she lifted her lamp and swung it full upon Rhisiart's face. Then she turned to the old man.

“You’d better let him do what he wants,” she said, letting the light slowly sink down. “If he doesn’t do what he wants now he’ll want to do it worse when he’s thought of it at night.” She paused for a moment. “I speak for the Lady Ffraid,” she added in a low tone.

Rhisiart gazed at her through the darkness in bewilderment, but all he saw was her small, dark, obscure figure, round whose indistinct garments, caught up below her full bosom, the lamp she carried was making bizarre patterns on the stones.

The Seneschal, however, was far too anxious to have his treasure appreciated by an Oxford scholar to care greatly how the opportunity was restored to him. “Come then,” he said. “It was my young Lord Mortimer who last held the sword. Meredith ab Owen, when I showed it to him, said he was no friend to Saint Derfel.”

The girl’s voice rang out at that; and Rhisiart was aware of a new note in it. “My Lady says that Meredith ab Owen is the only one of all the Welshmen she knows who has remained true.”

“True to what, young Mistress?” murmured Adda ap Leurig.

“True to Bran the Blessed!” she cried excitedly. This display of emotion about what, after all, was only superstition, irritated young Rhisiart.

“She just repeats what the old woman tells her,” he thought; and he couldn’t help raising his shrill Norman voice in a high-pitched argumentative tone, as they retraced their steps. “Bran wasn’t any more a saint than Derfel. Master Brut and I have just heard the Abbot talk of these things. He didn’t say it in so many words; but I gathered his drift, and I’m sure he implied that Derfel and Bran were both—”

“Not a word of him!” cried the young lamp-bearer. But, she added more gently, “I’ll wait for you here. What you do, Master Seneschal, do quickly!

My Lady—” she stopped and turned away.

But Rhisiart, as he entered for the second time that vaulted chamber, was uncomfortably aware of her figure in the darkness outside, standing tense and taciturn, her face towards the rising wind and her lamp making a flickering pool upon the ground.

As he stood there nervously waiting, while the Seneschal crossed the room to his precious chest, a thing he did as reverently as a priest approaching his altar, he realized that the girl’s attitude had roused in him a surge of complicated feelings. He felt in some odd way as if the indulgence she had given him to handle Derfel’s sword was a greater restraint than her opposition. And he rebelled fiercely against this restraint. He experienced an uncomfortable sense of being as young as Rawlff ap Dafydd! He had the feeling as he stood there, with drops of sweat bursting out on his forehead, as if this whole great mass of half-ruined masonry were isolated from the rest of the world and were growing more isolated every moment!

It was as if Dinas Bran were really in some extraordinary manner not as solidly material as other places. And why shouldn’t there be spots like this on the surface of the earth where the electric currents of good and evil have clashed and contended for so long that they had drawn the opacity out of “matter,” showing it to be what Aristotle said it was, entirely malleable by mind?

He felt just then that Dinas Bran had become like an enormous meteorite without any planetary gravitation, drifting up and away towards the northern constellations and carrying with it all its good and all its evil!

“How old is this castle?” he asked suddenly; and in immediate reply to this, though it meant leaving his sacred chest unbarred, the Seneschal promptly brought over to his visitor a parchment-covered volume from which, as they stood side by side, he proceeded to read.

As if in order to concentrate the stranger's attention on the antique text, the old man insisted upon touching with his fingernail each single word in the line as he pronounced it; and the nervous Rhisiart was only just able, by wrinkling his hooked nose and drawing in his lips with an audible sucking sound, as if someone were tickling him, to endure at all the movements of that ancient human claw under the lantern-light.

A drop of sweat from his forehead finally just missed falling on the page, and he became so irritated by the courtly polish of that ridiculous fingernail that he was driven to cry aloud; "Allow me! Allow me!" and incontinently drawing his dagger proceeded to use its sharp point as a substitute for that moving finger.

Though he heard with his ears the words the man was reading, he only responded to them with half his mind. What he was thinking now was that though his "insect-lust," to use the Russian's expression, had a cruel and wicked aspect, it was also connected with the preservation — perhaps the "insect" itself had the gleaming shard of a fire-fly — of his independent identity against forces that were fain to swamp it and swallow it. There did come to him all the same, though muted and muffled, certain nursery memories as he watched that dagger-point; and of these he recalled enough to be conscious of a suspicion that the "Crow" was applying to Dinas Bran details that belonged to a quite different stronghold.

"And they did not any of them know the time they had been there; and it was not more irksome to them having the head with them, than if Bran the Blessed had been with them himself... but one day.... 'Evil betide me if I do not open the door to know if that is true which is said concerning it.'.... So he opened the door and looked towards Cornwall... and when they had looked they were as conscious of all the evils... as if all had happened in that very spot... and because of their perturbation they could not rest, but journeyed forth with the head towards London. And they buried the head in the White Mount—”

It had clearly become a ritualistic performance with the old man, this reading from the life of the Blessed Bran; but he carried the book away now, and moved back to the iron-bound chest.

Our friend could see how his hands shook with eagerness as he opened this receptacle; and there was a moment, when he rose from his stooping position, with the blade in his hand, that Rhisiart fancied he heard those old bones creak, much as the Bard’s bones outside were said to creak under the power of Derfel’s sword! The lad’s thoughts came thick and fast as the old man held out the rusty relic, presenting it once more just as if it lay on a velvet cushion.

Rhisiart’s desire was to treat the whole thing lightly, as a casual whim that he wanted to satisfy before his introduction to Tegolin’s grandmother; but there was something in the old man’s excitement, in the aloofness of the girl outside, in the thought that it was actually this very weapon that had been brandished in Jennap ab Adam’s hand as he rose from Myfanwy’s side, that stirred up once more the tumult in his conscience. He stood there irresolute, staring at that rust-covered brazen blade, but feeling a curious childish longing to rush out into the court and rejoin the wise Luned!

But what a fool he would appear to the expectant old man! What a weak, unmanly, fool! Besides he couldn’t disappoint him now. But why did his wrist feel like this, feel just as if it had been suddenly turned to lead? The whole thing was the silliest trifle. Why then was his forehead damp and his heart pounding? Master Adda was evidently disconcerted by this protracted pause. Fortunately the light from the lanterns in the roof fell in such a way as to leave the agitation in the face of the tormented young man partially concealed.

"Don't be afraid," said the Seneschal with tender consideration for what he regarded as a spasm of religious awe. "Even if King Eliseg's magician was none other than Derfel Gadarn the sword has brought no ill-luck to Mortimer who was the last to whom I showed it. I'm speaking of Sir Edmund of course, not of the young Earl."

Rhisiart bit his lip. Why the devil didn't Luned come rushing in and give him an excuse for avoiding this curst elongation of clotted rust that looked so like a stalactite of blood?

"So Meredith refused to touch it?" he found himself murmuring; though so little had he intended to hesitate any longer that he actually felt the wind already bringing in through the window the rattle of the Bard's bones as he brandished the "pitiless bronze." It was just as if it were his physical body hesitating, and not himself at all! Why had Meredith ab Owen refused to touch it?

But Master Adda was once more quoting his ridiculous jingle about the sword and the belt. Rhisiart felt at that moment that he completely understood Griffith ab Owen's attitude to all these devilish superstitions. When one's nerves were on edge and one had serious matters on one's mind these absurdities were too much! "After all," he thought, "I'm a Norman as well as a Welshman; and I like clear issues. I like to be honestly wicked and I like to be honestly good."

"Embrouillé! Embrouillé! What cursed things decisions are!" Oh why didn't that girl make some sign and end this wretched scene? Or why didn't this old man with his shaky hands get weary of waiting, and put that piece of rust away! Why when you'd committed yourself to some fantastical caprice couldn't you just stop and without giving any reason change your mind?

But what was this? His legs had suddenly begun to move, apparently of their own volition, and he was walking hurriedly towards the window, and without the bronze sword! As he went he found he was uttering the words, "One minute — one minute — one minute," over and over again.

Arrived at the window he once more squeezed his shoulders through its narrow orifice and peered out into the darkness. He felt rather than heard that Master Adda had followed close behind him with that rusty abomination. By God, if there hadn't appeared some kind of rift in that cloudy sky! Yes, and there — right under that protrusion from the wall which no doubt was the balcony of Myfanwy's Bower — he could catch a glimpse of something that wasn't nettles! Was it the white blossoms of elder-bloom or was it — He had a curious feeling, as he stared downward, as if the whole castle, yes! with the whole mount that bore it, were surrounded by a dizzy, precipitous gulf, not a slope he could climb, but a gulf, a gulf that sank down and down and down, with that white thing at the bottom!

But his body, and by Christ his tongue too were playing their tricks once more and behaving in a way that was not only beyond his will but unpredicted by his mind! He was back under those lights in the vaulted roof again, and he was eagerly, almost cajolingly, begging the Seneschal to replace the sword of Eliseg in its chest.

"The time hasn't come," he was saying, "for me to hold it. In a year perhaps, if I can be of use to Owen, I may be worthy... but not yet—" This reference to Owen and indeed the whole line he took of being "unworthy," whether it were an inspiration reaching him from the figure outside or some atavistic reversion to crafty Norman diplomacy, had an effect upon the old man that was beyond anything he could have calculated.

The Seneschal nodded his head several times gravely and feelingly and then, with complete satisfaction and without the least demur, proceeded to do exactly what had been required of him. Thus for the second time that night was the sword of Eliseg thrust back into darkness.

Once out again in the open air of the court-yard Rhisiart experienced an access of shyness with regard to the girl with the lamp. He was profoundly thankful that the stars in that midsummer sky were obscured by clouds so that Luned couldn't notice how embarrassed he was.

And it certainly was enough to make a person look a fool, this silly relinquishing of a natural caprice for absolutely no reason! But Luned spared his feelings; and the sword being relegated to temporary oblivion, she at once became younger, gayer, more girlish. She even began teasing Rhisiart about sleeping in Myfanwy's Bower, assuring him, in a tone that was almost mischievous, that Mistress Lowri was very particular about the men who had that privilege; and that Efa said whenever a young man with the heart of a bard slept there he wasn't allowed to sleep alone, but that an Ellylles slept with him.

"And the Ellylles who slept with him had two peculiarities. In the first place her body and all her bodily ways were what he loved best in the whole world. But in the second place her head was the head of a skull! And Efa said that this was because, in grievous pity for what was chained at the foot of her tower, Myfanwy's flesh died before she died. Efa said that after the bard's death Myfanwy never left her Bower; and that though they kept burying her in Valle Crucis her body always returned at night. Efa said that her head was as bare as the head in the chains before they could make her lie quiet; and 'twas only when she stopped having any lips at all that she would sleep by Jennap ab Adam. That's what she says; but I think she didn't mind him having her body, because her spirit never left the Ysgerbwd Hen!"

The patient Seneschal lent the same benevolent ear to these tales of the lamp-bearer, as they reached him through the darkness, as he would have lent to the confidential talk of Efa and Luned themselves, had he come upon them on the battlements.

And as for Rhisiart, it was far more important that his foolish behaviour over the sword should be forgotten than that the wise Luned should be rebuked for chattering. The girl was indeed in the liveliest spirits when they entered for a moment that fatal Bower. She went so far as to sink down laughing on the pile of last year’s bracken, covered with a thick blue rug, which was to be the young man’s bed.

Since it was she who held the light, Rhisiart was unable to catch more than a glimpse of her face as she lay on his couch, but the faint outlines of her form on that blue coverlet brought back to his mind with a sweet shiver of romance the feelings he’d had in the cattle-shed by the river when Tegolin shared his rest. He took but scant notice of anything in Myfanwy’s Bower save that blue rug with the damsel’s form upon it, but he saw enough to realize that the chamber had been recently garnished with all the modern decorations of the flamboyant epoch which had just ended. There was nothing here of that twelfth century dignity and simplicity that hung about the faded embroidered chair and the carved chest in Master Adam’s room. How his modern-minded mother would have adored these fantastical decorations! The very window, jutting out from the castle-wall, was full of foliated tracery. And as he glanced at these things all manner of sophisticated Oxford discussions floated at the back of his mind and he resolved that he would take the first opportunity that offered itself of indicating to the ladies of Dinas Bran that their passion for these fourteenth-century novelties was a vulgar innovation and quite out of keeping with the atmosphere of the place.

As they came out into the court he became aware of a sudden change of sound in the guard-room at the castle-entrance. The tipsy laughter and riotous snatches of song had ceased, and an intermittent clamour of surprised voices had taken its place. This was followed by the passing across the court of a silent band of men, not more than half-a-dozen in number, carrying on a hurdle some unfortunate captive, whose tightly-bound figure, as the group drew near, was thrown into prominence by the yellow blaze of several streaming torches.

The man himself, as far as Rhisiart could tell, as he was hurriedly borne past them, was unconscious though still living; but what caused Rhisiart's most dangerous nerve to start pulsing within him was the fact that before the bearers bore their load away to the northern extremity of the court, he was certain he recognized the features of the unlucky Master Simon, the Hog of Chirk.

So those monks were right in their surmise; and right in their priestly estimate of Lowri's nature. The woman had managed to get into her power the man she was ready to risk Hell for the pleasure of torturing. As the flare of the torches vanished he heard the great sentinel bell of Dinas Bran striking midnight, and each stroke of this solemn announcement sank into his soul.

Instead of following the men, however, who were carrying the unfortunate Master Simon, the old Seneschal, who had stood still to watch the passing of that cortège, now proceeded to conduct his young hostage to the eastern side of the castle's base-court. Luned's lamp still flickered around them like an ignis fatuus; but the figure on the hurdle had taken the heart of the girl's liveliness, and not a word did she utter until they arrived at the foot of what was called the Ladies' Tower. Here she whispered something to the Seneschal; and the old man turning gravely to Rhisiart intimated that at this point he would bid him good-night.

But he turned to the girl again before he left him. “I suppose your pages, young Mistress, will be all asleep when he comes out? Will he be able to find his way to the Bower alone? I don’t want him to get into any trouble with the Sheriffs people. They’re evidently making a night of it over there.”

“My Lady will arrange it,” replied Luned, “and if not,” she added quickly, “I’ll show him the way!”

Our friend had himself begun to speak, and had got as far as the words, “I know exactly,” when his cheeks suddenly got hot. Was there in the whole of Oxford, he thought, a greater fool than he?

IX. THE LADIES' TOWER

Rhisiart's blush of shame and abrupt pause caused no astonishment to the bearer of the lamp. She was asking the old gentleman some practical and indeed domestic question. At any rate the lad caught the word "brisket" and the word "venison" as he frowned gloomily at the entrance to the Ladies' Tower, wondering whether Lowri, as well as the old woman, was awaiting him up there, and whether it was here that they'd put Tegolin and the Ruthin girl.

"I don't care for her," he said to himself as he glanced at his guide: "She's too dark, and her figure's not like the figure of Owen's daughter. Perhaps she's got Saracen blood! She looks lovingly at me; but she certainly doesn't admire me! What a man wants, when he's left his horse and his sword behind him, isn't patronizing love but some sort of respect." And the Norman mind of our friend, aware of a midnight reaction against everything embrouillé, went so far as to clear up the difference between a man and girl by deciding that nothing was easier than to make a woman love you but nothing harder than to make her admire you!

"Besides," he thought, "love imprisons a person. Brut talks nonsense about not making friends with boys. They do admire anyone!"

Having returned old Adda's farewell bow and having cordially thanked him for his kindness, Rhisiart now followed the girl through a narrow archway and up a winding flight of stone stairs. So small was the circumference of this spiral ascent that Luned would have disappeared completely every third or fourth step had she not made a habit, as they mounted, of swinging completely round and, with one arm clinging to the surface of the great column round which the steps circled, stretching the lamp down with the other till it illuminated every step he took.

This precaution, as he quickly discovered, was by no means a work of supererogation, for some of the steps were almost completely worn away in the centre, and he had to place his foot sometimes on their extreme right side and sometimes on their extreme left.

He caught a glimpse, at several points in the ascent, of various rough carvings on the stone column round which the steps revolved, one of these, a gross love-knot intertwined with two initial letters, brought with a sudden rush to his mind a philosophical illumination he had once had on a staircase in Oxford as he contemplated a similar mural design.

He nearly missed one of the dangerous steps as he tried to recall the exact nature of the intellectual truth revealed to him on that occasion. It was after attending a lecture on Virgil, and it had to do with that poet's bold passage about "mind animating matter" which the lecturer associated with the Aristotelian view of the nature of God. It gave him, he remembered, some sort of intimation as to the presence of the divine Nous in the very lowest forms of the inanimate, even in a stone wall, for instance, like this very one, against which, by her flickering lamp, he could see his guide's rounded arm!

At last they reached a small closed door with a little stone platform in front of it. There was a cord dangling down from the top of this door with a piece of lead tied to the end of it, and at this cord Luned vigorously pulled, waiting at each pull to hear the result; and Rhisiart thought he could just catch, though far away and as if at the end of an unseen corridor, a faint tinkling response.

A long pause ensued after this, during which they listened intently for the sound of steps, and though they neither of them heard anything resembling steps, heard nothing in fact but each other’s exhausted panting, it gave them an opportunity to draw closer together, and Rhisiart laid the tips of his excited fingers upon the wrist that held the lamp.

The girl gave her dress several little violent jerks with her free hand, brushed some dust from her skirt, and pushed back a wisp of heavy dark hair that had fallen across her cheek.

“You mustn’t be surprised,” she began, gently repulsing his fingers, “if my Lady talks to you in a whisper and makes you talk in a whisper. Efa always goes to bed earlier than Sibli and me, and my Lady won’t let her out of sight, even when all the doors are barred. My Lady makes her sleep in the Tower bed.”

“Why is that?” enquired Rhisiart, wishing that he had the courage to snatch the light from his all-knowing guide.

“For a very good reason,” replied Luned, and her face, as the lamp threw the curve of her chin and the contours of the cheek into relief, assumed the expression of a resolute nun.

Luned hesitated. Then, with a gesture that he had already remarked as characteristic of her, she stiffened her short frame to its full height, jerked back her dusky head in a movement which threw forward her bosom, and with a bold and gallant rush of words, though speaking with an obvious effort, “You’ve heard, I suppose,” she said, “of the brides of Derfel.”

Rhisiart nodded.

“Well, Èfa has been chosen to be the next one!”

“Chosen?” he protested. “But hasn’t he been dead for a thousand years?”

Luned gave him a reproachful look as if this stupid levity were ill-timed. “They want to give her to him on the night they proclaim Glyn Dŵr. They say that the people of Ardudwy will rise in greater numbers if Derfel has a new bride."

"Why did they choose this particular girl?" enquired Rhisiart. Luned was silent; and then, disregarding his question, she brought out in a quick burst of words, while her dusky cheeks darkened still further, "Efa wants to be given! She wants to be the one! We can only hope, my Mistress says, that her child — if she has one — will burn Derfel's image and his Horse with it!"

These last words were spoken with so much feeling that our friend's predatory desire received a shock; and once more it was made clear to him how right the Lollard was in his use of the word embrouillé. He contented himself, however, with a humble enquiry as to the origin of this "Efa" who alone among the maids of North Wales actually wished to be the bride of a devil.

Luned showed no hesitation in satisfying his curiosity. "She's a niece of Rhys ap Tudor of Môn," she explained. "She's a cousin, therefore, of Owen's; and I suppose in some degree a relative of your own. But you won't see anything of her to-night, unless we wake her by talking very loud! She sleeps sounder even than Sibli."

"And who is Sibli?" and he raised his hand to his mouth to conceal a yawn. It began to present itself to his mind as a discouraging certainty that he was not destined to enjoy any sort of love-making that night.

But before Luned had time to answer his half-hearted question they both heard little tapping steps behind the closed door; not by any means quick steps, but steps that dragged and tapped, steps that were presently accompanied by the sound of a high-pitched voice muttering to itself. Luned lowered her lamp and they both gazed in silence at the dark outline of the barrier in front of them.

Presently the door was opened inwards, very cautiously and very slowly; but nothing appeared where Rhisiart expected to see a human head. A hoarse sound, however, made him look much lower; and there, only a yard from the ground, between the iron-clamped wood-work and the stone door-post, flickered what seemed a woman's features. Towards this face Luned directed her lamp, and Rhisiart stared down at it in astonishment. The face showed unmistakeable signs of having been roused from deep slumber. It had still about it the nameless scum of the wharves of Lethe; and it kept wavering up and down in that narrow crack as if its owner were repeatedly rising on tiptoe and repeatedly sinking back again upon her heels.

The personage addressed opened the door a few inches wider but still barred the way. "She says 'we,'" she muttered in a kind of malicious chant as she opened the door an inch or two further; and her tone had a gloating mischief that made Rhisiart feel extremely uncomfortable.

He glanced quickly at the dusky profile of his companion. Had she betrayed him? How did he know that this mysterious Ffraid ferch Gloyw was not in the habit of sacrificing young men to Bran the Blessed, just as report said that the Scab sacrificed young women to Derfel Gadarn?

"She says 'we,' she says 'we,' she says 'we'!" chanted the woman, while her head bobbed up and down in the aperture like the quick-silver in a barometer. "We're tired, we're tired, we're tired. To bed, to bed, to bed!"

But Luned thrust her back, and squeezing herself through began whispering hurriedly, evidently explaining to the woman, whom Rhisiart thought to be the loathliest creature he'd ever seen, exactly who the visitor was. "She thinks a lot of him," Rhisiart heard her whisper; "and I wouldn't wonder if he doesn't enter her service. He got into trouble about the Hog of Chirk. He defended the Hog when she was hanging him. Lawnslot was there and he’s told me all. In the guardroom they call him Master Leap-before-you-look, because of the way he faced the archers of Chirk.”

It was Luned herself and not this malicious porter who now pulled the door wide-open; but Rhisiart only found himself in a round, low, stone vestibule, with three steps leading up to an arch on the opposite side, and nothing in it but filthy straw, scattered heaps of what looked like human excrement, and three extremely menacing rusty chains attached to iron rings in the wall.

“Tell my Lady we’re here and ask her whether we’re to come in.” Before obeying these orders Sibli rose and fell several times on her high shoes, which gave vicious little clacking sounds as her heels came down. She was a dwarf, but not a particularly small dwarf. But her chief peculiarity, and what had formerly earned her many a silver groat from the inquisitive whores and wanton wags of Chester, was a birth-mark on the tip of her sharp chin, from which a long tuft of hair protruded. This tuft of hair had been dyed on one occasion by a couple of lively prentices in that rowdy town with an indelible pigment of a brilliant purple colour; and it was on the strength of an appendage of so unusual an aspect that this gnome-like creature had earned her living till she entered the service of the ladies of Dinas Bran.

The dwarf now tapped her way on her high shoes up the stone steps and disappeared through the arch, leaving Rhisiart and Luned alone. Both the young people had regained their composure and they proceeded to contemplate each other with shy interest. There was an antique lantern suspended from the roof by a twisted iron chain, and the girl tried to extinguish her own little lamp by vigorous puffs of her breath. In this she was unsuccessful; and as the lad bent down to try the force of his lungs on the obstinate flame, she made no attempt to prevent her dark tresses brushing against his forehead.

From her whole person there still emanated that fragrance that reminded him of a certain Moorish jewel-box of inlaid cedarwood that his light-natured mother used to unlock on festival mornings, and there was such a glow about her ripe lips and warm-breathing bosom that he felt a longing to quench the fever in his nerves, caused by the sight of the figure on the hurdle, by playing, without further restraint, that role of a lean hawk seizing upon a soft-plumaged pigeon to which he considered his Norman blood entitled. Hotter and hotter did this blood in his veins grow as he hovered over her.

He was staring now at the extinguished lamp clasped against her body and covering, as she pressed it to her, the embroidered band that was tied so tightly under her bosom. As for the discreet damsel herself she had certainly become shy and silent; but she displayed no token of alarm or any sign of repugnance. In fact, if instead of frowning at the lamp he had glanced at her face, it is possible that he would have detected the quiver of the faintest approach of a smile upon her lips.

This was the first time in Rhisiart’s life that he had been the cause of a girl’s becoming shy and silent. Tegolin of course had taken the lead from the beginning, and Tegolin’s mother had carried him off his feet, and with neither of them had he felt in the least formidable.

But the hint he’d had in Valle Crucis of a certain nerve in Lowri that fatally corresponded to the same nerve in himself had had the effect of making him a different person from the lad who had been so horrified at his thoughts when he allowed them to run riot about the imaginary arrow in Tegolin’s bare shoulder.

The wickedness excited in him by Lowri's burning fingers, and by the picture she had conjured up of letting him make love to her in the presence of her victim, had been accentuated to such a pitch by the sight of the man on the hurdle that he felt now as though he were a lost soul, a soul for whom the seduction of a discreet and nun-like maid could be the occasion for nothing but cynical satisfaction.

Looking round with the idea of finding a place to deposit the girl's ubiquitous lamp, which he had already come to regard as possessed of an annoying identity of its own, he caught, through an arrow-slit in the wall, a glimpse of the sky. "Ah!" he thought, "the stars, the stars! If only I could see the stars I would be a man. I would dominate this girl and beguile her mistress like a real adventurer! But there are no stars! This damned tower has blotted them out! Yes, if I could see only one single tiny star I'd be a man!"

Unfortunately for our friend he had no practical experience as to what measures a man took to make a sensible girl yield up her virtue. All he had discovered in himself was a will to be unscrupulous. All he had discovered in her was a prejudice against Saint Derfel. So he decided that he must just wait and see what opportunity the devil would give him! There was no doubt as to what he wanted to do. He wanted to twist his lean limbs and his fiery spiritual desires, like the glittering scales of a snake, round every curve of Luned's struggling form; conquering her not only physically, but also spiritually, so that there should be no part of either her body or her soul that did not cry out. "Rhisiart, I'm afraid of you! Rhisiart, I can't resist you! Rhisiart have mercy!"

It may perhaps have been, though in such crises one can never be sure, only the rapidity of the dwarf's return that saved Luned from the ultimate test of a maid's discretion; but as it worked out, her hooknosed companion lacked even the courage to take her hand in his own, as together they ascended the steps and passed under the arch and the two lanterns.

Here they were confronted by a pair of heavy curtains, between which the little Sibli, turning towards them like a jubilant fiend, bent low in a mocking curtsey. As the little creature did this she raised one of her bird-like claws to her chin and made a motion as if directing, in an obscene wish to humiliate both them and herself, its tuft of purple hairs towards them. But she swung round and with all the force of her small arms pulled aside the curtains and held them apart while they passed through.

Rhisiart was at the first moment far too overpowered by the Lady of the Ladies' Tower to take any definite notice of her surroundings; but, as time went on, his impressions of the singular apartment in which Mistress Ffraid now spent her life gathered weight and clarity.

One thing our friend had at once to admit; and that was that in place of resisting the influences of the elements the chief peculiarity of the tower-chamber was its exposure to them. In one part of it indeed the roof was entirely uncovered to the sky; and in order to dispose of the rain when it entered there was a deep groove cut in the flag-stones, leading to an aperture through the outside wall.

The Lady Ffraid passed most of her hours seated or reclining on a dais at the southern end of the chamber from which, by a nice calculation, she was able to watch the particular segment of the sky with its changing constellations, where appeared those celestial bodies with whose influences she was especially concerned. Immediately below this opening the apartment was hung from roof to floor with the biggest piece of tapestry Rhisiart had ever seen upon which could still be detected — though many of the colours and some of the forms were very dim — a striking representation of a deadly combat between a yellow and a red dragon.

Rhisiart's artistic Oxford friend would have been hard put to it to find any trace in this extraordinary apartment either of the flamboyant modern style, so dear to their parents, or of any conscious reversion to the austere beauty of the twelfth century, so treasured by themselves. The place contained indeed hardly any furniture at all; and what it did contain were such huge, rough, clumsily-carved objects as might well have been unearthed from the ruins of Mathrafal or left here from the days when Eliseg built the castle, or even have reverted to a still deeper level of antiquity, to nothing less than the sacred hill-city of the Blessed One himself!

But these details were only revealed to the young man by degrees. At the present moment as he advanced towards the southern extremity of the chamber, which resembled more than anything else the narrow platform with its wide altar-space of an ancient Greek stage, all he had eyes to see was the Lady Ffraid ferch Gloyw, whose name the little Sibli was now mockingly informing him meant nothing more than "Bridget, the daughter of Claudius." He climbed the two or three easy steps that led to the place where the Lady Ffraid was sitting, and in his desire to approach with a dignity becoming a cousin of Owen's he stumbled over the edge of a heavy Moorish rug, which among several others of a similar kind was spread out upon the dais. This stumble gave something grotesque to his approach. Indeed he was enraged to hear Sibli utter, without an attempt to suppress it, a high-pitched scream of pure delight.

But he was relieved to notice, as he recovered from this shock and dropped, as he'd seen his mother's noble admirers do, on one knee before her footstool, that the Lady Ffraid was totally devoid of any irritable punctiliousness. What he found disturbing about her, though neither Luned nor Sibli seemed in the least troubled by it, was not that she was exacting or particular or in any conventional way terrifying, but that she possessed a brain about five times more penetrating than the one with which he himself at that epoch of his life had been endowed.

"But she oughtn't," he said to himself, "to make me feel the superiority of her mind. That's not what women were intended to do. However, I'm not as frightened of her as some would be, or as stupid with her as some. Brut would be conceited enough to interrupt her. But I wish she would let me talk a little more!" And he went on to decide that if she did let him speak he would tell her about his meeting the great scholar Chrysoloras who taught Greek to the Emperor of Constantinople.

But it certainly was not about Chrysoloras, or the Emperor of Constantinople, that he found himself discoursing now, as he stood like a sulky school-boy in his dark Oxford tunic, with his thumbs dug deep into his belt. In fact he was completely tongue-tied. Tegolin was his good angel; Lowri his evil one. But this old woman — No, it was impossible to say what effect she was having on him. Was she throwing a "veil of illusion" over him? Was she trying to bewitch him? "I must say to myself," he thought, "Rhisiart is Rhisiart, over and over again. That's the best way when you're being bewitched. But what a lot of wrinkles she has! And they all seem aiming at me. I must pull myself together. Rhisiart is Rhisiart — Rhisiart is Rhisiart — Rhisiart is Rhisiart! — and I'd better not listen to what she's saying. It's with their words they do the damage. I can't stop up my ears, but I can look about."

He did realize that the old lady was speaking of Owen and giving him elaborate instructions as to how to use his influence over Owen; and the gist of her words, as far as he permitted himself to catch it, was that he must detach Owen from Crach Ffinnant and Derfel Gadarn.

In pursuance, however, of his drastic resolution to hear without listening, he forced his eyes to wander in the direction of little Sibli; and what he saw there was disagreeable enough to counteract any spell; for the dwarf was positively wriggling with pleasure at the embarrassed stupidity of his appearance. As she met his wandering stare she pressed her tiny knuckles against herself in an ecstasy of vicious satisfaction and swayed to and fro, poking her chin at him.

It is clear that Ffraid ferch Gloyw, for all her cleverness, underrated the childish cunning of the youth before her. She must have thought that his wandering attention was simply unmannerly curiosity. That he was deliberately resisting her instructions with an interior effort of will cannot have occurred to her. Living isolated in that tower-room, pondering day and night on the influences of the stars, the old lady had correctly divined Owen's need of a devoted young scholar; and the moment she heard of our friend's presence in Dinas Bran the thought must have come to her that if this devotion could be steered in a direction hostile to Derfel, Owen's destiny would gather momentum; and would revert, in fact, to the pure cult of the Blessed One from which these Derfel superstitions had diverted it.

At this point, however, there arose in Rhisiart's consciousness such a vivid memory of what Luned had told him about this singular young maid who "wanted to be given to Derfel" that he had less difficulty in keeping his response to the great lady's instructions cautiously mechanical. Rhisiart was Rhisiart now in the most primitive sense, as he contemplated the great piece of furniture near the warm peat-fire which he had heard spoken of as the Tower bed. So it was actually into the old, black, oaken boards of that archaic structure that there had been inlayed, perhaps a thousand years ago, a real fragment of Modry's favourite "cauldron of renovation" which Bran had given to the King of Ireland!

"Is she asleep now in that bed?" he thought, while his latest "Certainly, Madame!" sounded more intelligent than before. "And where would her head be? Just behind where that modern shield was leaning against the thing?"

Whether the sleeping girl's head was behind it or not, this polished shield became at once interesting to Rhisiart because it was so bare of every device. A deep, dark mirror it was, this plain shield, and the longer he stared into it the stranger, the more impossible grew the reflections he saw in it. For instance, he fancied he could see within it, not, as was to be expected, Sibli's lantern or Luned's freshly-lit lamp, but the actual movements of the voyaging clouds across the bare space in the roof, and what looked like the journeying of the stars themselves in and out of the moving clouds! He even assured himself — though he knew such a thing was totally out of the question — that he could see the flutterings of dark wings mingled with those clouds and with those stars.

"Has my coming here," he thought, "disturbed the crows of Dinas Bran, or is this shield, like Owen's crystal, a mirror of the future rather than of the present?"

And then, while the Lady Ffraid was still formulating an elaborate schedule, just as if she were never going to see him again, as to the methods by which he should turn the heart of Owen from serving Derfel, he suddenly realized that the sleeper in the Tower bed was peeping at him over the top of the shining shield! Yes, it was here, like a mermaid in a sea-shell, that the mysterious Efa had been sleeping all this while. She wasn't asleep now, however! On the contrary, with her elbows on the top of that shining shield, she was straining towards him with her whole body, straining with a wordless cry, "Take me! Take me!"

If our friend had already been lending no very attentive ear to the great lady’s instructions, it may be well imagined that he now became entirely oblivious of them. His being was absorbed in that bright shield-rim, over which those pleading eyes, disheveled curls, and warm, soft neck were outstretched towards him, like the very figure-head of the Cyprian Barge emerging from the haven of Love!

“How young she is!” he thought. “She’s a lot younger than me!” And incontinently he gave himself up to the most reckless and wanton interchange of glances. His narrow skull, with its predatory beak and snatching lips, must have looked to the Lady Ffraid, as she bent above it, like the human cranium of a man-headed kestrel. Taught by nobody but Nature herself how to prolong this eye dalliance, Efa instinctively pretended to be struggling in vain to resist the sweet rape of his hawk-pounce.

But the Lady Ffraid suddenly turned her head towards the Tower bed. “Lie down, child, at once,” she commanded sternly. “Bring that light nearer, Luned! It gets in her eyes over there. Lie still, child! You mustn’t lift your head from the pillow! Come nearer, Luned! Come nearer, Sibli! And, Luned, you’re too hot in that gown. Take it off, girl! Master Rhisiart has seen maidens in their shifts before. He’s a gentleman. You needn’t be shy of him. Take it off for her, Sibli! Do you hear, woman?”

It may be imagined that our visitor’s gentility didn’t prevent him from turning his eyes from the Tower bed to the sight of the dwarf’s helping Luned to disrobe; and when the girl’s figure was disclosed in her white smock, he certainly did feel less curiosity as to how far the wanton Efa had obeyed her mistress. Of one thing our young man was certain; namely, that Luned’s shyness in laying aside her gown was quite unaffected; was, in fact, something altogether different from the self-conscious shrinking of the younger girl.

When the dwarf had folded up Luned’s dress and they had both brought their lights to their mistress’s side, Ffraid ferch Gloyw spoke again.

“Listen, you three! I’m going to do something now that will keep Efa quiet, even if it doesn’t send her to sleep. I’m going to tell our young friend’s fortune. Sit down here by my side, Master Rhisiart, and show me your hands. There! No; like that! Nearer with the lamp, Luned; you’d better kneel down, girl, and hold it close.”

Rhisiart now became aware of a most eager excitement among all the feminine beings in the Tower-room. From the invisible Efa to the great lady herself there was projected into that peat-warmed chamber the particular vibration that any beating of the great wings of Destiny always arouses in the daughters of men. But for himself during this moment of tense expectation, as he laid his hands with their palms upward upon that prophetic lap, the lad couldn’t help glancing at the voyaging clouds and the apparently voyaging stars, as they pursued each other across that opening in the roof. And he began to wonder if there could be any real connection between the influence of those remote splendours and the snail-track hieroglyphs in his ape-like palms. And then from that starry hole in the roof he proceeded to look down at these same monkey-human hands of his! And as he looked at them he fancied he could feel a queer tickling in them, as if his “line of life” and “line of heart” were actually responding to the far-off influence of those splendours in the firmament!

“I believe,” he said to himself, “she made Luned take off her gown. I believe she wants me to fall in love with Luned.” And then as he stared down at his hands, while the Lady re-arranged the cushions that supported her enormous bulk, he seemed to grow aware of the twin orbs of her vast bosom bulking larger and larger upon him, as if in some superhuman vitality of maternity, they were irresistibly drawing him towards them!

"It would be like falling into the Pontic Sea to fall into her arms," he thought and he hardened his heart like a child when it stiffens its body. He suddenly began to feel suspicious of the whole atmosphere of this Tower-chamber. He felt as if some secret core of free egoism and masculine profanity was in danger of being submerged and lost in this super-feminine place. He felt obscurely hostile to all four of them. Up here together they seemed too powerful! He felt as if his only defence — the only way he could beat off this influence — would be by unscrupulous love-making. He felt now as if even his eye-encounter with Efa hadn't resulted in the pure, irresponsible conquest he had intended!

It was as if every feminine presence here — and he began to feel as if the Tower-room itself were a colossal feminine entity — were doing her best to absorb and drain out of him the very fount of his manhood.

With a savage self-insight, such as he had never known before, he recognized this core of his nature to be something free, hard, shameless, untamed, uncaught; and this it was that all this feminine sorcery — yes! even Efa's pretence of resistance over the rim of the shield — was bent on swallowing up!

He even found himself turning in his helpless desperation towards the disinterested viciousness of Tegolin's mother. She, at any rate, that depraved and shameless creature, had turned her sex into a lust that was motiveless, that was impersonal, that led nowhere, except perhaps to Hell, and that left him as he was, a free, uncaught, independent adventurer!

He even began to experience a malicious sympathy with his princely cousin's association with Crach Ffinnant. The Scab wouldn't let him be swallowed up as he himself was now in danger of being.

But the fortune-telling was on the point of starting in earnest; and our friend assured himself that less astute intelligences than his own — the well-meaning Lollard for instance — would by now have been absolutely bamboozled! “Rhisiart is Rhisiart,” he repeated like a charm. “And I expect,” he said to himself, “it takes the kind of legal mind that would have made me resemble Master Young, if I’d stayed at Oxford, to cope with situations like this.”

But now that Sibli was holding a taper close to his extended palms, while Luned, kneeling at her mistress’s feet, was pressing so close in her lively curiosity that her warm breasts touched his knees, Rhisiart had an admirable opportunity to take in in detail the appearance of Ffraid ferch Gloyw. She certainly had a figure of terrific proportions. Not only was she a very tall woman, quite as tall as himself, but her person was so enormously stout that her height was lost in the mountainous curves of her form. Her face, which our friend decided may once have been beautiful, was now covered with a multitude of little wrinkles. These wrinkles even descended to her double chin; while the creases about her nose and about the curves of her cheeks were accentuated by a certain habit she had acquired of twitching her nostrils and screwing up her eyes.

But her hair was the chief wonder of her appearance; and had our friend been less absorbed by the expectant itching in his palms, little Sibli would have had further opportunities for bursting into malicious derision at the sight of his naive astonishment.

As it was, whenever he did glance at the wrinkled countenance bending over his hands, he was filled with amazement, not only at the monumental enormousness of the woman’s face, but at the masses of hair, thick and curly, which, as in that vision of the Ancient of Days in the Book of Revelation, were whiter than the whitest wool.

“Let us all repeat a ‘Hail Mary’,” whispered the Lady, closing her eyes; and without a moment’s hesitation two, if not three, feminine voices joined her in the words, "Ave Maria gratia plena, Dominus tecum... benedicta tu inter mulieres... benedictus fructus ventris tui."

Rhisiart crossed himself, and bowed his head over that portentous lap. The words brought Modry to his mind. She too upon uncanonical secular occasions could often be caught murmuring the consecrated words. It must, he thought, be a habit of the Welsh; and he couldn't help wondering what the difference was between the tone of his friend, the Lollard, in such matters and the way the thing sounded in these rich feminine murmurs, as if it were an incantation!

But though his own lips moved in familiar response, there stirred, deep within his nature, a protest of reckless and impious defiance. Call it his wickedness, call it what you like, he felt he must keep the central core of his identity from being drugged, swamped, dissolved, in this Tower-room piety. The Blessed Virgin reinforcing the Blessed Bran was too much! He was once more conscious of a reaction in favour of the scurrilous Scab. The shameless thought actually crossed his mind that he would be ready himself to represent the demonic Derfel in the sacrifice of Efa's virtue to Owen's success!

But Luned's soft breasts were pressing closer still against his knees as she and Sibli stretched forward. The dwarf, as he could feel, was actually squeezing her purple chin against his shoulder; while over them all the great waves of fragrant warmth kept flowing from the burning peat-sods behind the Tower bed.

"It is in your line of heart, child," the old lady was proclaiming now. Her voice had precisely the same rich, low, chanting cadence as when she murmured Ave Maria, gratia plena, and Rhisiart was reminded of that deep-toned wood-pigeon he had listened to in the theologian's cell in Valle Crucis. "Yes, it is in your line of heart — there, just at that point! — where I can see the crux of your destiny. Strangely enough, though, the point I mean — do you see that protective square? — has nothing to do with any woman. Do you remember, girls, the night Owen himself came to me? This square upon Master Rhisiart's heartline corresponds almost exactly to what I found in Owen's. Your hands are quite different, child — well! — I mustn't tell you how they're different — but you and my Lord your cousin have at any rate that square in common! But you have a more unusual line of heart, child, even than Owen's. I've never seen one quite like it; and I confess it looks to me as if you would never be happily married. At this moment, as far as I can make out, you are being offered the love of several ladies; but though you will take some minor advantage of their feelings — that is indicated quite clearly — you will not be united in any serious manner to any of them! In fact, my dear child, from what I see there" — and she indicated that portion of his palm from which the four out-spread fingers diverged— "the curious thing is that unless an element of — of something I don't like to see at all is allowed to enter, it is impossible for you to get involved with any woman. On the other hand, you have a sensitive conscience, capable of causing you a great deal of acute distress; and so it looks to me as if—"

But at this point the little Sibli could restrain herself no longer. She uttered three shrill screams of elfin merriment; and Rhisiart became aware that the small creature, in her vicious interest, was actually digging her sharp chin into the back of his neck.

"Could I not, Lady Ffraid," he murmured, "overcome this — this influence in my stars — if I used" — he hesitated a second— "if I used all my will, and even" — he stopped again in a still longer pause while his cheeks grew hot— "even prayed to the Blessed Saints?"

The huge head with its animal-like covering bent in silence over his hand. The dwarf's guttering candle spilled a trickle of grease over his jerkin. Luned's soft bosom pressed so hard against his knees that it must have hurt her. And there arose in that tower-room a faint whispering and rustling as the summer wind passed through it on its devious and spiral way; stirring the thick curls of the great lady, agitating the dead reeds on the floor, causing the fighting dragons on the arras to bulge and swell.

Sometimes it sounded as if it were sighing down the tower-steps, with longdrawn broken gasps, longing to snatch at love-messages engraven there, longing to carry them across the valley and hide them in the lonely cracks and crevices of the Eglwyseg Rocks.

Sometimes it swept up to the roof of that tower-room, and went eddying on, softly and sadly, like a messenger whose message none had understood, into the vast air-spaces that separated Dinas Bran from the northern constellations.

"It looks to me," murmured Ffraid ferch Gloyw at last, "that your real danger, child, the supreme danger of your life, lies in yourself, and springs from your obstinate fear of committing yourself to any woman's love."

These conclusive and final words had an instantaneous effect in that warm, yet draughty chamber. They seemed to suck up in an arctic void all the magnetic currents that were rocking and lulling our friend, as if he had been a sturdy infant passed from one lap to another.

The little dwarf revealed her feelings at this anti-climax by a portentous yawn, followed by a grumbling apology to the visitor for the candlegrease she had spilt on his doublet. Luned rose stiffly to her feet and stretched herself with a deep-breathed sigh; while the old lady, returning his hands to him with a gesture of aristocratic indifference, enquired in an abrupt tone whether he was comfortably lodged for the night.

"The Seneschal has put me in Myfanwy's Bower," our friend explained, "but, as Mistress Luned knows, I haven't had much opportunity as yet of enjoying this privilege." As he spoke he also rose to his feet, and stepping backward a pace or two took the opportunity of once more fixing upon his mind — for somehow her talk had given him the impression of a last interview — the extraordinary personality of this mother of Lowri and grandmother of Tegolin.

Ffraid ferch Gloyw's face looked nobly monumental as he surveyed it from this distance, but screwing up her dark eyes she met his boyish stare with an amused smile.

"Do you see my daughter in me?" she asked him, "or do I remind you of our dear red-haired Maid?" And then, without giving him time to reply, "My daughter and her daughter," she said lightly, "take opposite sides as to your cousin's future. Lowri holds by Derfel while our Maid follows me in remaining faithful to the Blessed One."

Now it must be admitted that Rhisiart's experience of intellectual woman, whether old or young, was extremely slight, in fact might have been called nil; nor had Providence — when it caused the most frivolous lady in Hereford to give birth to a son who was as grave when he made love as when he said his prayers — chosen to compensate him for this peculiarity by any exceptional insight, as it is called, into human nature. Insight into the complications of jurisprudence, both civil and canonical, he did possess; and since he had gone to Oxford he had struggled to apply the niceties of Aristotelian metaphysics to the vagaries of human reason.

But he had of late begun to feel that even this was like fishing for minnows with a salmon-net. The strands were perfect; but the stream flowed through them, and the minnows followed the stream. In plain words the events of life — although they did have a certain resemblance to Aristotle’s ideas — had the peculiarity of tumbling down upon him in impish disorder, as if they desired, without quite losing their labels, to behave as unlike philosophical events as they possibly could.

It had been no small shock to Rhisiart when he found his senses were more stirred by the wicked lust of the mother than by the sweet fidelity of the daughter. And now there seemed to be absolutely nothing in what he had learnt at Oxford that accounted for the fact that when Ffraid ferch Gloyw tried to lure him to the Blessed One by the naughtiness of Efa and the shyness of Luned he still should resist!

And he had by this time got a shrewd inkling that the methods of the Blessed One in the liberation of Wales were little to his taste. Had he become a hostage for Owen in Dinas Bran only to have it softly suggested to him on every side that his compatriots could get their freedom without drawing a sword? The proud, unscrupulous Norman blood in his veins rose in revolt as he stood there, sulky and sleepy, among these women. He found himself thinking with relief of that old warrior, Abbot Hywel, on his black horse, and of Father Rheinalt and his savage maledictions upon the Saxon.

Nothing would make them — holy men though they were — talk of liberating Wales without the sword! He began to curse himself for letting Luned come between him and King Eliseg’s “pitiless bronze,” and full of this sulky reaction against the great lady, to whom he seemed to find it all the same so hard to say farewell, he told himself that he was entirely glad that the daughter of Rhys ap Tudor had resolved to be Derfel’s bride!

“If I weren’t so sleepy,” he said to himself, “I’d ask the old lady to let Luned show me the way to Myfanwy’s Bower.” But it wasn’t only sleepiness. He recalled how clear and simple his purpose had been when he dug his crusader’s sword into the turf at his first sight of Dinas Bran. “Something’s gone wrong with me,” he said to himself. “These women have confused my mind. I wonder if life was as mixed up as this to King Richard when he was my age?”

What was Ffraid ferch Gloyw whispering to Luned now? Had she forgotten he was standing there, waiting to be allowed to go? Well, he must make the move himself. To fall into unfathomable gulfs of delicious oblivion in Myfanwy’s Bower seemed at that moment the only paradise in the world! He fancied that he caught a sudden darkening of Luned’s cheeks as he did at last make his good-night bow, but though he saw the girl’s eyes turn to her mistress, it was clear that Ffraid ferch Gloyw took for granted that an Oxford scholar could find his way about a castle without assistance.

Overcome by this access of sleepiness there might have been an awkward moment as he stood blinking at the great lady like a hook-nosed owl. And awkward it evidently did seem to Luned and the dwarf; for, as if inspired by a simultaneous desire to throw off some uncomfortable oppression, they carried the lights they held to a large iron chest at the back of the dais. Here they deposited them; and the effect of this move, for the lights on the walls were burning low, was to leave all the three feminine faces in deep shadow as the young man moved away.

But before he reached the curtain leading to that littered vestibule, the voice of the Lady made him turn round again; and sleepy as he was, he was relieved that she did speak, for he felt that his sudden departure was not falling out as a triumph of good manners.

She spoke quietly, so as not to disturb Efa. “You will have to choose, my dear child!” she said. And as if to emphasize her words she rose portentously from her couch, letting the mighty robe she wore sink down from her shoulders. Though still in shadow, her huge bulk in that peat-warmed chamber began to tower up before him, till it became a shape of superhuman proportion, its vast girth accentuated rather than diminished by the plain grey garment she wore, bound at the waist by a dusky cincture.

"Yes, you'll have to choose," she said, "between the one path or the other if you're to be intimate with Owen. The stars are predicting a fatal encounter; the invisible powers are gathering; and upon the alternative, whether his course will be guided by Bran the Blessed or by Derfel the Accursed, his whole future and the future of Wales will depend."

Muttering some rather feeble remark about a hope that the Lady Ffraid would pray for them all Rhisiart bowed low before the whole group of women and, parting the curtains asunder, passed out of their sight.

He had only just crossed the evil-smelling vestibule, however, and was standing under the lighted archway surveying the dark stone steps, when the curtains behind him opened and closed; and behold there was Luned, with a cloak thrown over her white smock, carrying her silver lamp.

"My Lady told me to lend you this because the stairs are so dark," she whispered, "but my Lady would rather I didn't go any further. She thinks we might meet the Sheriffs men and there'd be talk." She paused and half-turning round gave the curtains behind her a quick, apprehensive glance. But they had fallen back in their heavy folds and formed a massive barrier between the two of them and the chamber they had left. "It isn't that my Lady," Luned went on — while our suspicious friend assumed that she was only making what in a military language is called a "covering movement"— "it isn't that my Lady would mind our own people, who're all Welsh, seeing us, for they would understand. It's only that these English soldiers—"

And as she continued whispering, in the vein so shrewdly interpreted by our friend, enlarging upon the intelligence with which the Welsh would "understand" while the English would only indulge in ribald grossness, he himself, with a design that was no less clear to her, was engaged in taking the lamp from her hand. “It isn’t that my Lady doesn’t know,” she murmured, “how entirely to be trusted you are, and how you are an Oxford scholar and Owen’s cousin. It’s only that in a place like this there’s such a lot of gossip that one has to be careful. And it isn’t as if my Lady didn’t trust me with anybody, and especially with—”

Whether the discreet Luned heard herself uttering these final sensible words it was hard to say, but certain it is that, even before she ceased to have the breath to go on, the no longer sleepy Rhisiart had arrived at that point in masculine sensation where a girl’s words mean no more than the beating of the wings of a moth against a panther’s ribs. He had got the lamp away from her without extinguishing it, and had managed, without letting her go, to balance it, along with her cloak, upon one of the stone-mouldings; but what he couldn’t do was to cleanse the fetid air of this vaulted place, which certainly was, with its damp walls and its human excrement, the most inharmonious spot for such an encounter as could well have been selected.

On that night with Tegolin at the farm all had been in keeping with his romantic feelings. The mad monk, the sleeping cattle, the scent of hay, the sound of the river, the presence of his crusader’s sword, the flower in the Maid’s red braid, everything had worked in with his mood. But in this vile-smelling vaulted chamber he found, as he twined his bony frame about his not unwilling captive, that a totally new feeling took possession of him. For the first time in his life he realized the nature of pure lust.

They were both on their feet — indeed nothing else was thinkable in that foul alcove — but as her response increased and her breath came in gasps he had no desire for anything else than to press her more and more tightly against him.

There was a narrow window behind her, through which, as he held her, he could detect a group of those pale northern stars in which destiny had written so much. The sky was clear where those particular stars receded into a gulf of blue-black space, and what a queer pattern they were making! He found a curious satisfaction in observing those points of light as he strained her softness against his hardness, for they helped him to escape from the malodorous atmosphere of the place, and especially from the presence of one particular faecal entity which had already arrested his attention and that might well have been formed in the bowels of the Blessed One himself, as by the flame of that iron-socketed torch it took to itself the role of a reproachful witness.

The girl was shivering a little in his arms now as they swayed to and fro in front of that narrow aperture; but our friend was too absorbed to consider whether this was due to any weakening response of her nerves or simply to the contrast between this draughty evil-smelling spot and the fragrant peat-fire she had just left.

But Rhisiart was throwing into his caresses all the pent-up masculine irresponsibility which the matriarchal aura of the tower-room had drained out of him. He hadn't forgotten the words of Rawlff ap Dafydd, but in his present temper it only heightened his sensuality to think that he was stealing a march on that sturdy page. The ecstasy he was enjoying was shot through, like radiant parti-coloured silk, with the flickerings of his savage imagination.

Unlike the desire of some lads whose wantonness might have led them into "making love" to a maid with whose personality they weren't in love, Rhisiart's feelings were mental rather than physical. His caresses were electric and intense rather than violent and gross, but they were completely devoid of that fiery passion that redeems the senses. What he felt most definitely was a thrilling wonder at the pure mystery of feminine response. Wonder too at the intensity of the feelings which he himself was experiencing! These feelings, as they increased, seemed to grow more and more general. It was no longer the conscious personality of the little lamp-bearer that he held in his arms. They were not Luned's breasts any more that came to life under his touch. They were the breasts of girlhood in the abstract. And as he contemplated those distant points of light through the narrow aperture beyond her head they ceased to be what human custom called stars. They became flame-points of quivering angelic desire plunging into the dark coolness of uttermost space.

It is true that his ecstasy in rocking her to and fro and associating his feelings with those shivering points in the ether was not entirely unalloyed. The "Hail Marys" which she had repeated just now kept tolling their muted reverberation like a bell-clapper muffled in black velvet.

But the fact that his emotion was more imaginative than personal seemed to give him a sort of license to be unscrupulous; and his consciousness that the girl was responding to him with her body, even while resisting him with her will, increased this unscrupulousness. But that concerted feminine appeal to the Mother of God — Hail Mary! Hail Mary! — didn't grow less. And for some strange reason, though it troubled his conscience, it increased his lust. Out there, with those distant stars, it seemed like the cry of the ultimate darkness, of the primordial femininity of original matter, ravished by the energy of light.

But what was that? Could it have been only a frantic croak from some nocturnal bird? There! He heard it again! And it seemed to him that across the form he was embracing, and into that narrow window through which the stars had become his accomplices, there came from the base-court below several deep-throated human groans.

The Russian's "insect" in him was alert in a second. Had Lowri even now, while her infatuated Constable slept, slipped down to her victim's side? Had she taken with her one of her unscrupulous Welsh attendants; that Lawnslot, for instance, whom he'd seen with her on Midsummer Day and who certainly had the look of a born executioner? God! There was the sound again! And as he lent his ear to it, instead of releasing the now quite docile girl, he began to play with the monstrous fancy that he was holding Lowri; Lowri who was calling upon him to love her more, more, while in a frenzy of satisfaction her eyes devoured the helpless Simon.

And it happened to Rhisiart that the more these outrageous thoughts mounted up in him the more did that bell-clapper sound— "Hail Mary! Hail Mary!" — mount-up with them. "Ave Maria, benedicta tu inter mulieres!"

Oh, he had known evil before; but he had never known it was so embrouillé; that it held in its depths such varieties of deadly sweetness!

Luned had forgotten to shiver now, though she still had the wit to cast a glance now and then in the direction of the curtains. She was apprehensive, no doubt, of seeing a lifted candle, and beneath it the dwarf's illuminated chin!

But the stars through that window were all Rhisiart could see— "benedicta tu inter mulieres" — and they seemed to be growing larger and larger! Burning angels of the spheres they were, moving so rapidly in their eternal circles that their very speed made them motionless. And as Luned responded more and more to him, and playing upon her nerves he drew from her response what seemed to him like dark vibrant music; he began to feel as if all those enormous burning Beings were projecting in ever-widening circles a dazzling and glittering spray of desire as they plunged and dived and floated, and then rose up again, following the great astral wheel of super-mundane life that is encircled by the Primum Mobile of the cosmos!

Yes, he was sharing, he was sharing the high translunar impulse of those celestial creatures as they drew sweeter and ever sweeter music from the dark bosom of eternally receding space!

In the exultation of these moments all manner of wild heresies that he had heard of at Oxford returned to his mind, gathering a new and fearful meaning. He recalled how one young scholar from Italy had confessed to him that he knew a man at Padua who denied that the earth was the centre of the universe! He recalled how it was whispered that a student from Prague, who had recently arrived to study the doctrines of Master Wycliffe, had promulgated the blasphemous thesis that all the stellar heavens, including the Primum Mobile and the Empyrean, were the material body of God Himself.

"Does God, then," came the bold thought into his head, "hold infinite space to his heart as I am holding this girl?" And all the while, as he kept wondering how far this ecstasy of his could stretch without breaking, those glittering stars in that blue-black gulf grew larger and brighter. They were no longer little round pin-pricks in a great black tent. They were alive. They were enormous Beings. They were quivering with feelings akin to his own. He was one of them! He could feel the vast hollows of ether about him, wafting breath after breath of dark, delicious, primordial coolness against his burning face.

What did love matter to that abysmal coolness on his face and to those flashing fires that were now whirling about him? "No, no! I don't love you," he thought. "You're not going to catch me that way! If you want love-making you shall have love-making; but my fate's free, my fate's my own!" And it rushed into his mind that what Owen wanted was a man who could save him from himself, save him from all these superstitions; a man who knew Roman Law and Church Law and Common Law, a man who couldn't be fooled by wizards and bards and priests and women!

What did she say? That Wales can be free without fighting for it? Shiver, shiver in your black air, you burning stars! Yes, yes, my sweet one — but it's those proud glitterers I must follow — and take Owen and Wales with me!

But his ecstasy was over now; and with a gasp that was half sob, half sigh, he let her go. Aware for the first time that in his excitement his dagger had fallen from its sheath, he bent down to pick it up; glad enough at the excuse for avoiding her eyes. A strange shame, an intolerable shyness, took possession of him; and a heart-felt wish formed itself in the depths of his consciousness that neither tomorrow nor the next day, nor the day after that, need he see her again, nor breathe that sandal-wood fragrance!

But his punishment was only beginning; and the first stroke of it came as a direct result of his discourtesy in averting his eyes from her. For what must his gaze fall upon as he shook his belt and dagger into place, but that repulsive faecal entity whose loathsome presence had so outraged him at the start. And then — alas, for masculine resolution! — the tower-chamber began again to exercise its soft, sweet, maternal influence.

How calm the girl was as she slowly and languidly repossessed herself of her mantle! That protracted embrace, in which he thought he had been spiritually ravishing her, in which he imagined he had played the part of those high stars plunging into the yielding ether, though it had left her submissive and docile, had given her a power over him that made him feel like a helpless child! He had expected to suffer remorse, but he had expected also to be able to look at her like a hawk looking at a captured linnet!

But here she was, as she cheerfully adjusted her mantle and pushed back her heavy hair from her ears, meeting his eyes with an effortless triumph that was like the unrippling, undeviating upheaval of a wave that had sucked down a ship. The Welsh word for fate — tynghed — came into his head. Modry had taught him that word before he was six, in her tale of Arianrod.

Yes, he had used those softly-panting breasts for his impersonal pleasure. Now it was their turn; and they would be more personal! Those soft eyes that watched him from above that gently-heaving bosom had a look in them that he had seen before. He had seen a little girl he used to play with in Hereford with exactly that look when she cuddled a tiny toy soldier. He was that toy soldier now. “I’ve put a tynghed on you for good and all,” that look assured him. He glanced furtively, wearily, at the arrow-slit in the wall through which his soul had voyaged into space.

But the stars he had identified with his free ecstasy were smaller, paler, feebler, further away. They seemed to be weeping for his defeat; while the excremental entity upon the floor grinned at him.

And now, in a tone as rich and mystical as the voice of Mistress Ffraid herself, there issued from that warm, happy, care-free throat, as she handed him the lamp and lifted her face to be kissed, words that were the seal of his responsibility. “I’ll be feeding the crows at the foot of our tower to-morrow,” she said, “when the castle-bell strikes noon. I shan’t expect to see you but if you are by any chance on this side of the court—”

She said no more. Nor had she need to say more. An indescribable weakness, as if the hard core of his independence had turned into a warm-flowing sluice, reduced him to silence. Tenderly she smiled back at him as she parted the curtains; and he fancied he could hear the derisive chuckle and could glimpse the painted beard of the dwarf, as the words of Mistress

Ffraid returned to his mind. "If you want to help Glyn Dŵr you must choose between Bran and Derfel." Bran? Derfel? What had he known of either of them, when with a free heart he planted his crusader's sword in the grass above the river, while Griffin — Yes! What were those stable-men at Glyndyfrdwy doing with old Griffin now? Were they feeding him properly? Were they making sure that he had his bucket of water?

He unbarred the door at the head of the stairs and closed it behind him. He turned Luned's light upon the dark-winding steps. He felt as if his old adventurous, reckless, free heart were rolling down those steps in front of him, tapping the damp flag-stones in the darkness. "Griffin would be no good to me here," he thought, as he followed his heart down. "A prisoner doesn't want a horse."

But the image of the old piebald at that moment was too much for him. By the time he reached the place where the steps were worn away the twitching of his mouth increased; and before he arrived at the bottom his throat was swelling with the sobs of a little boy.

X. RHISIART LOOKS ON

THE FOLLOWING THREE months of our friend's incarceration in Dinas Bran passed in a manner so different from all he had expected that he decided that the only thing he could count on in the great world both with regard to himself and with regard to the events that happened was that no prediction was possible! To his bewildered surprise, and, we may add, to the relief of all the more normal elements in his nature, the very next day after his escapade with the dwarf he was informed by his young acquaintance, Rawlff, that the Constable had left the castle to go on some secret errand of the King's and had taken the Lady Lowri with him.

It was now three months since these two had vanished; and not even the all-knowing Luned had been able to satisfy his curiosity about them. Rumours of the wildest kind kept spreading through the castle. Some said that Denis had interrupted, on that first night of Master Simon's captivity, a scene between his mistress and her former husband which had shocked him so that he punished her by carrying her off, no one knew whither! Another rumour went so far as to declare that he had forced her to journey with him all the way to the great Nunnery at Shaftesbury, and had caused her to be shut up there.

Certain it was that since her departure the unhappy Simon had made several unsuccessful attempts to escape. Rawlff gave it as his opinion, based on something Luned had let fall, that in spite of her cruelty to him the man was actually pining for her; and if he had escaped would have risked his life in pursuit of her.

This in Rhisiart's opinion was a fantastic view, founded on the romantic illusions of youth, and he had on several occasions held both the son of Dafydd and the son of Cynan spell-bound for a whole summer afternoon, while he revealed to them certain cynical truths about human nature and about the relations between men and women. Listening to him on the battlements with either the fertile plains of Bromfield and Ial stretching beneath them to the eastern horizon, or the rugged mountain ranges of Saint Tysilio mounting up towards the west, the pageboys not only displayed an intense interest in these ideas but a lively admiration for the brain that entertained them; for they could not help reflecting that only experiences of a most startling character could have led to conclusions so drastic.

These frequent and intimate parleyings between our friend and the two pages did not pass unnoticed. Rawlff himself admitted to Rhisiart one day that Lowri's servants, Lawnslot and Gerallt, had asked him point-blank what it was that Master "Leap-before-you-look" was always talking about.

"What did you say?" Rhisiart asked.

"I said bull-baiting in Hereford and bear-baiting in Oxford," replied Rawlff.

"You said well," commented our friend; and he thought, "At his age I wouldn't have answered like that. That's where they're cleverer in Wales than in England."

But these warm late summer days had not only been completely different from what he had anticipated; they had been also very much happier. The castle hadn't yet — as he had been sure it would — married him off to Luned. Besides he had got fond of Luned, and he would have got more than "fond" of Efa if she hadn't, one hot August day, slapped his face so viciously that his cheek hurt him when he lay on his left side at night.

Tegolin, it seemed, preferred the company of her mad Friar to that of Luned and Efa. She had known them from their childhood. But with neither of them, though for very different reasons, could anything have persuaded her to be confidential.

Alice of Ruthin, too, seemed rather to avoid than to cultivate the society of the tower-chamber ladies. This was partly, as Rhisiart knew, a matter of race and class. No English girl of such humble extraction could feel at ease with high-born maids of the Welsh aristocracy. But it was also, he decided, a matter of personality, for the further his acquaintance with Alice grew the less he liked her; while her attendance on Tegolin proved a serious obstacle to his getting the Maid to himself.

Did Tegolin, he wondered, chafe at all under this restraint? Did she miss the romantic excitement of their first companionship? He couldn't tell. He had never fancied she was in love with him. But he had felt from the start that there was an unbreakable link between them; and it seemed strange she should have settled down so easily to this queer confined life without making any move to enter into closer touch with him. As a matter of fact they hadn't had one really intimate conversation since they had been together in Dinas Bran.

But it wasn't that he gave any deep thought during these peaceful months to Tegolin's feelings. She was always the same to him, always kind and natural. She had never been a demonstrative person save in her heroic championship of the Friar; and if she was a little more reserved than formerly, and now and then a little abstracted, he attributed these things to the moods of Mad Huw, who seemed to be growing more and more dependent upon her.

In the absence of the Constable and his mistress the management of the castle reverted to old Adda, though there was a general awareness of the obscure influence of Ffraid ferch Gloyw in the background. The Seneschal’s position during this momentous time was by no means an enviable one. But Adda ap Leurig was a self-assured old man of great dignity of deportment and of no small diplomatic experience. He was proud of his post; and on one occasion when the famous Welsh robber, Gruffydd ap Dafydd ap Gruffydd, who had had trouble with Lord Grey, was brought in duress to Dinas Bran, he managed to uphold so vigorously the jurisdiction of the Sheriff of Shropshire against that of the Bishop of St. Asaph that, in the course of the legal debate as to who should have the privilege of hanging him, Gruffydd ap Dafydd escaped scot-free.

But trouble was in the air; and that it was a trouble much more charged with dangerous electricity than the case of the notorious robber was proved by the fact that hardly a day passed after the first of September without messengers of some sort arriving at the castle, agitated and excited, bringing tales of movements of English troops or of Welsh insurgents.

It was no doubt the absence of Denis Burnell that made the place a centre for the intrigues that were going on; for Adda ap Leurig had for so long followed a policy of drawing the two races together that everyone on the Marches knew that if anyone could patch up a quarrel between a Welshman and an Englishman, that one was the old antiquary of Dinas Bran.

It was so long, too, since Wales had fought for her independence that there were a great many Welshmen on the Marches who, without losing anything of their racial traits, had won for themselves, among the King’s officials, positions of great responsibility.

Hitherto old Adda had ostentatiously refused to believe that Owen was plotting to strike for anything more important than a tract of bracken-covered upland between Gwyddelwern and Derwen of which Lord Grey had robbed him.

But as September advanced the rumours that kept reaching the hill-fortress grew so wild and startling that it became hard for the Seneschal's prisoners to believe that the old man knew as little about the trend of events as he publicly averred.

During July and August he had evidently enjoyed his position of authority and the chance which the border-situation of his impregnable fortress offered him in his role of peace-maker. But when September came, and the fatal day drew near to which the dying words of Iolo Goch had pointed, it was clear to everyone in the castle that their Seneschal had become a changed man. He kept his counsel, but his countenance grew daily greyer and more taciturn; and Rhisiart noticed that there was a perceptible tightening in the discipline in the place, and that a closer guard was kept, not only upon the unlucky Hog of Chirk but even upon his own movements and those of his friend, the Lollard. He kept wondering whether, after all, the astute old man wasn't in constant touch with both the Sheriff and the Constable. Was he playing some complicated and double part, intending all the while, when the returning army was near enough, to hand his hostages over to the King?

Our friend had his moods of considerable nervousness. A pretty end it would make to the grand adventure of his life to be hung, drawn, and quartered with every circumstance of Lancastrian cruelty before he had struck a single blow for the cause! Night by night as the days wore on — each more lovely in its autumnal peacefulness than the last — he communicated these apprehensions to Master Brut; but nothing that he said could destroy the heretic's aplomb.

“I may have to suffer in the end,” the Lollard would say, “and I daresay neither of us will live to be as old as Master Adda; but I feel a stronger confidence than I can describe to you that the Lord Jesus intends to use us for the cause of Wales and her religious liberty, before our hour comes. If Henry of Lancaster were as near as Shrewsbury, and all his host with him, I should still feel the same. If I could only persuade you to let me read—” and the man’s discourse would swing off to those interminable theological points, illustrated by his Greek text, which Rhisiart found so unbearably tedious.

And there was still another worry to our friend, as those lovely September days went by, arising from the missionary zeal of his fellow prisoner. It seemed to Rhisiart that the Ruthin girl was up to some shameless game with the worthy man. Master Brut had an innocent habit, or at least it seemed innocent to Rhisiart, of relating to him at night every detail of his patient attempts to initiate this languorous hussy into the mysteries of the Christian Faith.

It was not, of course, concealed from our astute friend that when the good Wycliffite did this he had an eye to killing two birds with one stone, and by appealing for intelligent sympathy in his struggle with the soul of this tantalizing baggage to instill sideways a drop of evangelical truth into the careless heart of his comrade in arms.

But Rhisiart discounted all this in his growing suspicion that Alice was leading her teacher a fine dance. His own regard for Master Brut, quite apart from the man’s mania for making converts, had increased steadily all this summer. He had never met a person, certainly not another young man, so considerate to his moods, and so interested — and our friend had many of these and loved to express them — in his ideas.

One aspect of the Lollard’s nature, however, suited Rhisiart less well; and that was his sociability. Master Brut was always coaxing the young people of the castle — and the man seemed to have no prejudices either with regard to sex or class — into joining in various open-air games. Certain ball-games he especially loved to organize, for these were adapted to women as well as men; and though he always explained the rules of these games as if they were old traditional country sports, Rhisiart secretly suspected that the best of them were invented by himself and invented solely to give the girl from Ruthin an opportunity to enjoy herself with her social superiors.

Rhisiart in his own heart despised and hated all games. It was one of his quarrels with what he called the garish vulgarity of modern times that young people were no longer content with the old-fashioned pastimes of mumming and miming, jonglerie and jousting, all of which had about them an aspect of the poetic, but must needs play at some hit-or-miss sport, with a Jack-in-the-Pulpit solemnity, such as made a man feel a complete zany.

But Walter Brut was a difficult person to turn aside when he had once set his hand to a thing; and one by one his little group of players at Ting-a-Ring, at Hit-and-Run, at Shuttle-Cock, at Bob-Bunting, at Save-your-Saucer-Sally, at Spy-Fox, increased and increased; until before hay-time was over and harvest begun, not only Rhisiart himself but Lowri’s two henchmen, Lawnslot and Gerallt, and the pages Rawlff and Iago, together with Tegolin and Alice and Luned and Efa, got into the habit of meeting at the foot of the Ladies’ Tower every fine afternoon, thus to disport themselves. Here, divided into opposing sides that generally assumed the names — to avoid touching modern politics — of Greeks and Trojans, the Lollard would elaborate such unexclusive sports that the high-born had no advantage over the low-born, nor the men over the women!

It was upon an occasion of this kind, on the fourteenth of September, in the year of grace fourteen hundred, that Rhisiart, having grown weary of comparing the movements of Tegolin with those of Efa, and of Luned with those of Alice, sat down upon a stout-backed bench by the old Seneschal's side and tried to disperse both his own dislike of games and his bearer's dislike of war.

"May I ask you, sir," he began, "a rather delicate question?"

Adda ap Leurig sighed. At the first sound of the young man's breaking silence, his grey face had lit up, for he believed that at last he was to be asked for another sight of Eliseg's sword. But the word "delicate" dashed this hope to the ground.

"Well?" he groaned, watching Efa leap up from the flagstones like a young deer and intercept a lightning-like fling of the ball, thrown by Lawnslot to Gerallt, "what is it, lad?"

"You haven't heard anything," enquired our friend, "to suggest that people in this castle think there's something — I mean any kind of plighted troth — between Mistress Luned and me?"

The old gentleman couldn't restrain a smile. "Dear me, no!" he responded hastily. "Certainly not!" Then more gravely, after clapping his hands to indicate appreciation of a piece of brilliant play by young Rawlff, "I have recently discovered," he remarked, "that many round here hold the view that it would be a good thing if Owen gave his remaining daughter to someone with Welsh blood. It has gone against the grain with many, though I approve of his policy myself, to see him with so many sons-in-law who have nothing Welsh about them except their lands!"

Our friend's eyes shone, and his swarthy cheeks darkened with pleasure. "Would I really—" he began.

The sly old antiquary was delighted with the effect of this casual suggestion; for it is certain that whomever else he may have considered as a partner for Owen's child, he had never thought of Rhisiart.

"I only hope," he went on hurriedly, "that when this foolish war-scare has blown over — for of course we know in our hearts that Providence has intended our two races to live side by side — you'll be able to make your cousin see that the policy of all wise people must be the unity of Ynys Prydain! Why, in that old book of mine from which I recall reading to you a passage on your first night here, it is always assumed that the rulers of Wales do homage for their lands to the King in London. You must remember, lad, that we gave London her kings in the old time; and who knows whether in future times we shan't do the same! The great thing is for the two races to intermarry."

"But, sir!" interrupted Rhisiart, proud to think he was discussing affairs of state. "Didn't you say that people round here blamed my cousin for marrying his daughters to—"

The old gentleman gave him a shrewd glance; "I said his daughters, lad. What I would like to see would be a marriage between Meredith ab Owen and a little princess of the House of Lancaster. Then, if there were a child, for you must remember that Owen through his mother is as much the rightful heir to South Wales as he is through his father to Gwynedd and Powys, that child would be, I tell you, successor to both Edward the Third and Rhodri Mawr! That is," he added with a frown, "unless the Percies dethrone King Harry to put the little — bravo! well caught, Mistress Efa! — the little Earl of March in his place."

While they were thus conversing Rhisiart observed the familiar figure of Mad Huw approaching them. Now it was well known to every gossip in the castle that the Grey Friar was always careful to avoid the sight of his devoted Maid when she was engaged in these youthful sports. Some scandalmongers maintained that it was a carnal temptation to the worthy man to see her fling herself about in the ardour of the game. Others attributed it to a cloistered prejudice against any mingling of the sexes. Whatever its cause, Rhisiart felt an uncomfortable sense of foreboding when the man broke his custom and came hurrying up to them.

"They tell me in the guard-room," he began at once, taking no notice of our friend and addressing the Seneschal, "that there have been three messengers today asking for Master Denis. I listened while the men at the gate were talking; and I heard them say that it was true the Usurper had returned from Scotland. I heard one man say he'd got his whole army with him and had already reached York. Of course we know" — here he turned to our friend and gave him a significant and exultant look— "what this lost soul is after, and that God has already defeated his devil's design — But I've come to suggest to you, Master Seneschal, that the castle-beacon should be lit at once. We know where God's Richard is; but it might be wise to warn the people that the enemy of God is on his way."

The mingling of native shrewdness with maniacal fantasy in Mad Huw's remarks struck Rhisiart deeply. As he looked from this prophetic figure standing there with its outstretched arm pointing towards the gate, while the game before them grew momently more absorbing, it struck him that it was a curious thing to see all these lovely young creatures so oblivious of the larger game of which the more responsible minds in Dinas Bran were so gravely aware.

Of course it was absurd of the Friar to suggest lighting the castle beacon of an English out-post to warn the Welsh of the approach of the English King. But if the Constable chose to be absent when events of such importance were in the air anyone in Dinas Bran had a right to make suggestions.

“Master Seneschal must be wishing more than any of us,” Rhisiart now blurted out, contemplating with his swarthy narrow face and sucked-in lips both the Friar and the old man, “that Denis Burnell would return.”

Adda ap Leurig directed towards the young man a dull unresponsive stare. “That is as it may be,” he replied laconically. And then added, “But I trust you and Master Brut and you too Brother Huw, aren’t tired of the manner — inadequate as I admit it is — in which the Constable’s responsibility has been carried on in his absence?”

Nothing in any king’s court could have surpassed in dignity the bow and smile with which Mad Huw received these words.

But Rhisiart was less polite. “You won’t hand us over to Bolingbroke, I trust, sir, whatever demands you receive from the English camp?”

The old man’s face stiffened; and he gave a quick glance at the Friar, evidently afraid lest the allusion to Richard’s enemy should produce an outburst. But Mad Huw was following at that moment some rather severe test of his Maid’s skill so intently that he didn’t seem to have caught our friend’s words.

Rhisiart followed the Friar’s gaze. Certainly the Maid of Edeyrnion looked by far the most athletic of the four girls and by far the best proportioned. Alice’s figure was more voluptuous; but the boyish resilience of Tegolin’s muscles struck our friend’s mind as more beautiful. But just now he was not only concerned with beauty. He found a peculiar and special pleasure, though it could hardly be called an aesthetic one, as he watched these girls at play, in their appealing awkwardness. How funnily they threw the ball when they got hold of it! Was that due, he wondered, to the natural softness of the upper portion of a girl’s arm where it touches her bosom, or was it due to some inescapable pliability in her bones that forbade the stiffer purchase necessary for a powerful fling? And if their awkwardness pleased him, another thing that afforded him satisfaction was to watch their self-consciousness increase as they began to get hot and dishevelled, and to note how in any pause their fingers would fly to their heads or to their belts.

From these philosophical contemplations our friend, turning his attention to his neighbour, found the Seneschal sitting bolt upright upon the bench, his thin figure erect, and his eyes fixed, not on the crisis in the match, but on the ground at his feet. It was at once evident to Rhisiart that the man was making some important decision; so that it did not surprise him when lifting his head and speaking with a grave deliberation he uttered the following words: “I may as well tell you, young Master, that there is to be a conclave to-night over our supper-board at which your presence, and that of your heretical friend over there will be required. My Lord of Nannau and his friend, David Gam, arrived at the Tassel last night. Father Rheinalt is expected this afternoon at Valle Crucis, and as soon as the Prior has received him, he and Father Pascentius will come up here to meet these gentlemen.”

Rhisiart’s countenance fell. The last persons he desired to meet in Dinas Bran were Hywel Sele and the notorious David. He was faintly reassured by the thought of Tegolin’s father being present; but towards Father Pascentius his attitude was only a little less nervous than towards the brutal pair of Anglophiles.

But the Norman blood in his veins did him a wise turn at this juncture. While he was debating legal niceties in the Oxford lecture-rooms this same Norman blood had often stood him in good stead; and now it enabled him to turn upon the Seneschal a frank, disarming, and almost stupidly ingenuous face. It enabled him in fact to open his eyes and mouth with modest astonishment. It enabled him to express the hope that in his meeting with Sele and David he would bear himself as befitted a cousin of Glyn Dŵr's; and he concluded by expressing a puzzled and almost childish wonder that the impetuous Rheinalt should dare to meet these dangerous and remorseless free-booters; and that he hoped the patriotic Cistercian wouldn't say anything to excite their fury. The tone he took completely reassured the old man.

"To tell you the truth, Master," the Seneschal said, "I had this morning a message from Owen himself proposing to come and meet these men. But I replied at once begging him not to run such a mad risk. I told him that it would be very difficult for me to protect him. I warned him that it wasn't only Welshmen who knew about the date prophesied by Iolo Goch, and now so near."

All sorts of agitating ideas rushed through Rhisiart's head at this piece of news. But he forced his narrow face to grow almost square in its simple ardour, while his indrawn lips fell apart in a look of gaping trustfulness.

And Adda ap Leurig went on making the mistake that sly old men make when they underrate the subtlety of youth. He added yet more to his revelations; for he was clearly anxious for reasons of his own not to keep his prisoner in the dark, as long as such enlightenment could be, as it were, brought about inadvertently and without too great a shock. So, like a butterfly whose antennae are delicately feeling the plant it hopes to use for its purpose, the Seneschal lingered upon his words, ready to shear off the moment their implications produced trouble.

"I knew," he went on, "from Owen's message, that he was growing anxious about your fate and that of your friend. I could see he fully understood my dilemma, being, as I am, the Constable's representative here.

And it seemed to me that in his consideration for both parties — for myself as responsible for you to the King, and for you as his hostages with the King — he was prepared to take a very serious personal risk. It was to avoid this risk — for Hywel Sele, in spite of their relationship, which is, I understand, much nearer than your own, hates Owen with a murderous hatred — that I took the course I did; for I was sure that both of you honourable young gentlemen would have bidden me to do so. I refer to the course of strongly dissuading him from such madness. In fact I went so far as to forbid him, in the name of the Constable, and of the Sheriff, and of the King, to come near Dinas Bran at this dangerous moment! As to his further plans, I told him I wished to hear nothing of them, and indeed refused to hear anything. I told him bluntly that I held Dinas Bran for the King, and that if he approached it in the present tension of feeling, I should man the walls and hoist the Royal Standard."

The old man drew breath, and sank back on the bench, exhausted with his effort. But this didn't prevent his directing towards his hearer, through half-closed eyelids, a long searching look.

Our young man, however, promptly turned away his head, leaving Master Adda to close his eyes to the warm autumnal sunlight, and to subside, or pretend to subside, into a peaceful sleep. But Rhisiart's face now took on its narrowest Norman intensity. He sucked in his lips till his mouth became like a crack in a sun-baked ridge of sandstone, and he fixed his frowning stare not upon the game, which was reaching its close with the victory of Tegolin's side, but upon the scarred and broken terraces of the Eglwyseg Rocks.

Ever afterwards, thinking of this moment, he associated these jagged precipices and cosmogomic bastions with the grim thoughts against which his spirit was beating like a wounded bird. Was it the old man's intention, he wondered, to make an indirect appeal to him, and through him to the Lollard, to be ready, for Owen’s sake, to be handed over to Henry of Lancaster?

A horrid vision came between him and those blood-streaked jagged rocks. He saw himself in the position of an unhappy traitor he had once seen on the scaffold in Hereford; and the pit of his stomach turned at the thought. He saw Master Brut bound with chains to a bull-baiting stake while men in leather jerkins and with bare hairy arms piled faggots round him. His lips just then were not available for smiling; but a sardonic self-mockery crossed his mind when he recalled the dark emotion with which he had thought of making love to Lowri while her eyes met those of the victimized Simon.

“There’s nothing,” he thought, “like being put through it oneself to see one’s blood-lust in its true proportion!” And then he thought, “What a thing that it should be my life that will probably end now and not anyone else’s! And except for the ordinary execution-crowd no one will know! The crowd will disperse, each to his home; but where will Rhisiart be?”

He was so absorbed in his dark thoughts that he was hardly aware that the match was over and that the players were either standing about discussing the game or moving slowly away. Seeing their outward forms with only a very faint consciousness of their identity, he now noticed the Friar and Tegolin advancing to meet each other. With this same lacklustre eye he watched them meet. With this same lacklustre eye he watched the childish pride with which the Friar congratulated the girl on her victory.

Mad Huw and Tegolin, after all, he had only known for a few months; but himself, his consciousness, Rhisiart’s feeling about Rhisiart, he had known as long as he could remember, and it was this that now faced its end! That punctilious little grey man at his side, no longer pretending to sleep, talking quite naturally to Luned just as he might have done if it had been someone else, had been hinting that the youth called Rhisiart was destined to be hung and quartered! Then there would not be anyone in the world to say, “Rhisiart is Rhisiart — that is, I am I.”

Our friend had got as far in his thoughts, when once more he felt physically sick. He couldn’t forget certain particular circumstances of what he had seen in Hereford. Barrels of burning lime, or bubbling tar, rose up before him; into which certain shapeless and bloody objects, that five minutes before had been the limbs of a living man, were plunged by the help of iron prongs. “I mustn’t begin to spue,” he thought, for he suddenly felt in his vitals the nausea that comes to mortal men when they really take in that what has happened to someone else is likely to happen to themselves.

Instinctively he turned his gaze to his friend, Master Brut, resolving that he would ask him in a moment to accompany him on a walk round the battlements. He felt he must tell Master Brut what peril they were in — and tell him at once. The excellent man would probably preach him a sermon about trusting in the Lord, and expound to him where the doctrine of Master Huss in regard to death differed from that of Master Wycliffe, but for some reason he felt just now that such a discourse would be a comfort.

But just as he was going to summon his friend, young Efa came running up to the Lollard to implore him to accede to some caprice that had suddenly entered her lively head.

Rhisiart was actually on his feet now; but he hung back, watching Efa’s coquetry. The young girl was certainly the loveliest creature, save Owen’s daughter, that he had ever seen, and he felt that for lighthearted love-making, as intense in its concentration as it was remorseless in its dodging of responsibility, he and Efa were exactly suited to each other. They were indeed, he now decided, too suited to each other; for ever since she had slapped his face in the ruined chapel, where they had come much nearer to cheating Derfel than they had intended, he had shown himself as haughty with her as she was haughty with him.

It had entered his head once or twice that this mutual pride was silly, since, like himself, she had no heart, that organ he so especially dreaded in women! But a slap in the face was a slap in the face; and it wasn't very nice to have to sleep on his right side for nearly a week!

All the same, as he watched her now, leaning forward against the Lollard's stout figure and twisting between her fingers one of the buttons of his tunic, while her curls brushed his shoulder, the doubt did penetrate our friend's consciousness as to whether he'd been wise in doing nothing but sleep on his right side. Suppose he had given his dignity to the devil and made love to her again? Would a couple of months spent in irresponsible pleasure have enabled him to regard those bubbling barrels and iron prongs with equanimity; or would they —

But Efa had left the Lollard now — apparently with his consent to her plan — and was racing from Luned to Tegolin, and from Tegolin to Alice.

Not only the hang-dog Lawnslot — whose ugly visage had from the start brought bloody executions into Rhisiart's mind — but quite a large group of troopers from the guardroom were still hanging about, some no doubt with the hope of an assignation with the Ruthin girl, others just content to stare as long as they dared at the irresistible Efa. Rawlff and the other boy, however, had clearly had enough of feminine society. They had both been on the losing side; and Rhisiart saw them now hurry off with obvious relief upon some private enterprise of their own.

But Master Brut now approached the Seneschal with a bland and smiling countenance.

“With your permission, sir,” he said, “our four lasses propose to give us a round or two from an old Welsh dance. Mistress Alice knows it quite as well as our young ladies here, and little Efa swears to me that there is nothing in it that could offend.”

Adda ap Leurig seemed at first unable to catch his meaning. “Offend?” he repeated as if thinking aloud. “Offend? It must need be that offences come, but woe to that man by whom — but quite right, quite right, though for myself you’ll have to excuse me. I’ve got to make certain — arrangements — we’re expecting various important guests to-night to what poor cheer our kitchen and buttery can provide, and I must bestir myself. Master Rhisiart will tell you that I hope to have” — he spoke with a deliberate gravity and emphasis— “the honour of the presence of you both at our little — banquet. And you, Brother,” and he turned to Mad Huw, who was evidently undergoing some interior emotional struggle, “must beg Mistress Tegolin to excuse you, too; for I have a wounded man on my hands in need of spiritual consolation.”

There was something about this direct appeal to his divine office — an appeal which, owing to his eccentricity, the poor man had not received for years — that touched the Friar to the heart. His whole face lit up. “Certainly I will come,” he responded. “At once, at once! Let us not linger a moment. Even now it may be too late!”

Rhisiart did not fail to notice, as the two went off together, the fine politeness with which the Seneschal refused to give to any of them that look of sly complicity with which normal human beings tend to conspire together to make sport of the abnormal. “The Welsh,” he said to himself, “are certainly the most civilized people in the world.”

But the Lollard wanted his help now to spread upon the ground long strips of brightly-coloured ribbon, making squares and angles and oblongs upon the flag-stones.

“At home,” the Lollard said, “our ribbons are fastened to the pole; and the dancers hold them in their hands. But in this dance, which is called the Dawns Gwymon or Sea-weed Dance, the girls pick up the ribbons from the ground and exchange them with one another. It must have been danced originally upon the sea-sand and like all extremely ancient dances it has a number of inflexible rules for every movement, and nothing is left to chance or to personal mood or caprice.” He now turned to the four young dancers who were talking eagerly together, and began clapping his hands in a monotonous beat. The troopers who had drifted to the scene immediately followed his example, as also did Lawnslot and Gerallt. By degrees, under a few signs from Master Brut, all the men present formed themselves into an extended circle around the dancers, every one of them keeping up this monotonous beat of hand-clapping.

Rhisiart was quite startled by the peculiar sensation that came to him as he joined the other men; a feeling as if in some odd fashion he were joining a musical accompaniment that had had no beginning and could have no end! He felt as if he and all his companions were intruding upon some unearthly ritual that had always been going on, though only as they began to share it had it become visible and audible to them; and as he clapped his hands in rhythm, he felt as though the stiff, mechanical movements which the four girls now began to make, as they stooped to pick up the ribbons and raising them above their heads wove them into a swaying pattern as they danced, were inescapably forced upon them by this monotone of beaten hands.

Where he stood he was facing the Lollard, and though the man’s face was often concealed by the weaving and unweaving of the dance, when he did catch sight of it, it wore an expression that completely puzzled him. It was a religious expression, and might have been called a mystical expression, and yet it was full of a kind of ecstatic sensuality. Its expression reminded him of the look he used to catch in Hereford Cathedral on the face of a certain choir-boy when he was singing the tantum ergo.

For himself Rhisiart was surprised at the difference of his feelings from those he had when he was watching the game of ball. "It must," he thought, "be those barrels and prongs". But it couldn't have been the barrels and prongs; for that vision of unspeakable frightfulness had already sunk away to the far background of his mind, where it lay like a blood-red bruise. No, it was something different. While that game had gone on he had watched each one of these girlish forms with satyrish interest. But now in some strange way the natural appeal of bodies and limbs struck him with a piercing sense of pathos. "It's for the bearing of children," he thought, just as if he had never seen a woman before, "that their hips are formed like that!"

The truth was that all the mechanical movements they were making now, as their arms rose and fell and their bodies bent and straightened with the weaving and unweaving of the ribbons, and all in obedience to the unceasing beat of the hands that encircled them, emphasized this curious pathos. Those soft arms, those tender bosoms, those curved limbs, what could be more unlike the complicated series of clear-cut, doll-like, automatic gestures into which they were being forced under the mandate of that monotonous clapping?

At any rate, as he went on beating his hands, he felt as if he could hardly distinguish one girl from another! The voluptuous limbs of Alice seemed forced into a frieze-like purity of outline as they followed these scrupulous measures, while the luxuriant breasts of Luned seemed to tighten and dwindle into Artemisian maidenliness as she spasmodically lifted and lowered her arms.

Tegolin's red braid, not content with tapping against her own shoulders seemed sometimes to resemble a fiery shuttle that passed in and out of the flaxen curls of Efa, and the dusky tresses of Luned. At certain moments in the dance, under rules so automatic that the gesture reminded Rhisiart of priests at an altar, each pair of dancers formally and lightly gave each other a mechanical kiss.

From where Rhisiart stood, beating his hands together, he could see further than the stiff movements of these soft creatures hypnotized out of their natural capriciousness by the imperative of an archaic tradition. He was tall enough to see through a gap in the battlements the whole plain of Maelor spread out before him.

And as he gazed he was aware that a peculiar and emerald-coloured light had obliterated all impertinent and teasing details, leaving intact only the universal aspects of the world — the earth, the air, and the water. Yes, stretched out before him in that curious Homeric light, for the girls were dancing close to the battlements, Maelor melted into Bromfield and Bromfield melted into the pastures of Shropshire. The light was indeed so green that it was as if the fiery sun had changed into a huge translucent emerald. The rich aftermath of meadow grass broke the distance into a vast chess-board of the Immortals, and so enchanted in its windless calm did the scene look that the smoke that rose from the plain and kept forming itself into filmy wreaths took the shape for him of god-like Beings moving across an emerald stage.

And then he thought of the thunderbolt that was to fall on all this when Owen raised the red dragon. Instead of soft blue wreaths of delicate vapour there would be vast-rolling clouds of black smoke, and shrieks and tumult and blood and flames! Beat — beat — went his hands, along with the hands of his companions; and the more tired the men grew of clapping the more obstinately they clapped.

The girls themselves were well-nigh spent by this time, but Rhisiart knew in his heart that until they actually fainted away nothing would induce them to stop till the men stopped.

But suddenly the men did stop; and instantaneously the girls sank back against the battlements; sank back so entangled with ribbons that they might have given Rhisiart, or anyone else who had the heart to think of such things, the idea of tangles of sea-weed and iridescent sea-spray clinging to a flotsam of stranded Nereids!

But the thoughts of our friend, as well as the thoughts of every other man there, had left both the dance and the dancers. A burst of trumpet blasts had reached them from the gate of the castle, and as they all turned towards the guard-room they saw the emblazoned pennon of the Royal Arms flutter slowly to the top of the flagstaff. There was a general rush across the court towards the guard-room; and Rhisiart and the Lollard heard several shrill bugle-calls summoning the castle servants to appear at the gate.

Never had our friend seen Mistress Lowri look prouder or happier than when on the arm of Denis she came up the steps that afternoon.

The misty autumn sun fell upon her rich dress, for she had been riding, according to the fantastical new fashion, in plum-coloured velvet and a sweeping crimson sash, but it fell too upon that indescribable radiance that emanates from women when they feel that the stars in their courses are fighting their battle!

Old Adda was far too discreet to ask any questions at their first encounter or to reveal any of his own difficulties. He held his black wand of office very straight and bowed with a low and separate bow to both Denis and Lowri.

Nor did Denis ask any questions of his Seneschal. He began to converse easily and leisurely with the old man, almost as if he were deliberately giving his lady time to greet the Lollard and our friend; and when Rhisiart, struggling to steel himself against the woman's fascination, turned to look at Denis, he found that in spite of Lowri's magnetic appeal he continued staring at him for a considerable time.
